ABBREVIATIONS, SYMBOLS, AND BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The following pages explain the abbreviations that are used in the more technical parts (see above, p. xiv 3 i. [a]) of the Encyclopædia. The list does not claim to be exhaustive, and, for the most part, it takes no account of well-established abbreviations, or such as have seemed to be fairly obvious. The bibliographical notes will, it is hoped, be welcome to the student.

The Canonical and Apocryphal books of the Bible are usually referred to as Gen., Ex., Lev., Nu., Dt., Josh., Judg., Ruth, S(a.), K(i.), Ch[r.], Ezra, Neh., Esth., Job, Ps., Pr., Eccles., C(an)t., Is., Jer., Lam., Ezek., Dan., Hos., Joel, Am., Ob., Jon., Mi., Nah., Hab., Zeph., Hag., Zech., Mal.; 1 Esd., 4 Esd. (i.e., 2 Esd. of EV), Tob., Judith, Wisd., Ecclus., Baruch, Epistle of Jeremy (i.e., Bar. ch. 6), Song of the Three Children (Dan. 3_{23}), Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Manasses, 1-4 Macc.; Mt., Mk., Lk., Jn., Acts, Rom., Cor., Gal., Eph., Phil., Col., Thess., Tim., Tit., Philem., Heb., Ja[s.], Pet., 1-3 Jn., Jude, Rev. [or Apoc.].

An explanation of some of the symbols (A, ℵ, B, etc.), now generally used to denote certain Greek MSS of the Old or New Testaments, will be found above, at p. xvi. It may be added that the bracketed index numerals denote the edition of the work to which they are attached: thus OTJC(2) = The Old Testament in the Jewish Church, 2nd edition (exceptions RP(2), AOF(2); see below). The unbracketed numerals above the line refer to footnotes; for those under the line see below under D_2, E_2, J_2, P_2.

When a foreign book is cited by an English name the reference is to the English translation.

It is suggested that this work be referred to as the Encyclopædia Biblica, and that the name may be abbreviated thus: Ency. Bib. or EBi. It will be observed that all the larger articles can be referred to by the numbered sections (§§); or any passage can readily be cited by column and paragraph or line. The columns will be numbered continuously to the end of the work.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BIBLICA

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

VOLUME III

L

LAADAH (לַעְדָּה, § 35; perhaps abbrev. from אֶלְעָדָה 'El passes by'; cp ELADAH), a Judahite; 1 Ch. 4 21 (μαδαθ [B], ααδα [A], λαδηι [L]). For a probable solution of the problem of 'Laadah,' see LECAH.

LAADAN (לַעְדָּן), 1 Ch. 7 26 23 7 ff. 26 21 AV, RV LADAN (q.v.).

LABAN (לָבָן; λαβαν [ADEL]), son of Nahor (Gen. 29 5 J; cp 24 47, where 'Bethuel, son of,' should be omitted as an interpolation).[1] He was also brother of Rebekah (24 29), and became father of Leah and Rachel (chap. 29), and of several sons (30 35 31 1); he was therefore uncle and father-in-law of Jacob. According to P (25 20) he was, like Bethuel, 'an Aramæan' (אֲרַמִּי, EV 'a Syrian'); but P does not mean to deny that he was a Nahorite; 'Milcah' and 'Aram' are both probably corruptions of 'Jerahmeel,' and the northern Jerahmeelites dwelt at 'the city of Nahor.' It is in fact here that the tradition given by J places the home of Laban (24 10 27 43); the God of Laban, too, is called by E the 'God of Nahor' (31 53). Elsewhere (see NAHOR) it is suggested that 'Nahor' is most probably miswritten for 'Ḥauran'; very possibly J and E had before them corrupt versions of the traditional narrative.

It would be unfair to criticise the character of Laban as if he were a historical individual; we can only venture to infer that the later Israelites criticised the character of the Aramæans very unfavourably. It is essential, however, to notice the religious difference between Laban and Jacob; note especially the incident with the teraphim (Gen. 31 30; cp 35 2, and see TERAPHIM). Since Laban—i.e., the Laban-tribe—resides in or near a city of Ḥauran it is archæologically important to try to clear up the name. A very similar name, LIBNI [q.v.], is given in Ex. 6 17 Nu. 3 18 to a son of Gershon, son of Levi; in 1 Ch. 6 17, however, Libni's father is called Gershom. Now, Gershom (=Gershon) is a 'Jerahmeelite' name. Gershom in Ex. 2 22 is the son of Moshè (Moses), who was the son of Amram (Ex. 6 20, P); Amram, like Abram, contains in our view an abbreviation of the name Jerahmeel. Levi too is claimed elsewhere (LEVI, 1) as a Jerahmeelite name; it corresponds to Leah, which is explained elsewhere (LEAH) as a fragment of a feminine form of Jerahmeel. The natural inference, if these data be granted, is that Laban and Libni are both connected with Leah and Levi; לבן, Laban, may be from לוין, and Libni may be a further development of לבן.

Hence the Levi-tribe was at one time viewed as the equal of the Jacob-tribe, though afterwards it had to accept an inferior, dependent position. It thus becomes unnecessary to combine Laban with an Assyrian god Laban (cp [ilu] libitti, 'god of brickwork,' KB 3 2 100 f.) mentioned by Delitzsch and Sayce (Hibb. Lect. 249, n. 3), or with the Lapana (probably Helbon) of Am. Tab. 139 35 37, or to regard the name as originally a title of the Ḥarranian moon-god (Schr. KAT(2) on Gen. 27 43; Jensen, ZA, 1896, p. 298; cp Goldziher, Heb. Myth. 158; Wi. GI 2 57). Gunkel (Gen. 292) finds the Laban legend free from mythology; on the other side, see Winckler, op. cit.

T. K. C.

1 Similarly the references to Bethuel in Gen. 24 15 24 50 (J) are to be viewed as interpolations. See Mez, Gesch. d. St. Harran, 19 ff. and Dillmann's Genesis. In Gen. 22 20-23 (J) the list should end with 'and Laban and Rebekah.'

LABAN (לָבָן; λοβον [BAFL]), an unknown locality (Dt. 1 1); perhaps the same as LIBNAH (2, q.v.). Cp WANDERINGS, § 10.

LABANA (λαβανα [BA]), 1 Esd. 5 29 = Neh. 7 48, LEBANA.

LABOUR (יְגִיעַ, Gen. 31 42; עָמָל, Dt. 26 7), Labourer (εργατης, Mt. 9 37). See SLAVERY. The use of 'labour' for 'fruit of labour' (e.g., Hab. 3 17) is one of the most questionable Hebraisms of the EV.

LACEDÆMONIANS (λακεδαιμονιοι [AV], λακαι. [A]; see Swete, ad loc. and App.), mentioned only in 2 Macc. 5 9; elsewhere always 'Spartans' (σπαρτιαται) is used. See JASON, 2 (end), SPARTA.

The Jews claimed kinship with the Lacedæmonians (see SPARTA for diplomatic relations between the two peoples about 300 B.C. and 145 B.C.). For the presence of Jews in Sparta, we may compare 1 Macc. 15 23, and in the Peloponnese generally, Philo, Leg. ad Cai. 36.

LACHISH (לָכִישׁ; λαχεις [BAL, etc.]). A city in the Shĕphēlāh (Josh. 15 39, μαχης [B*A], λα. [Bab superscr. λ]). Its king, with four other Amorite kings, was defeated by Joshua at Gibeon (Josh. 10 3-15; cp GIBEON, § 1, MAKKEDAH); on the fate of the city and its population, see Josh. 10 31 f.

1. History. It seems to have been a 'chariot-city' (Mic. 1 13; cp 1 K. 9 19 and BETH-MARCABOTH). The Chronicler speaks of its fortification by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11 9). Amaziah fled thither from a conspiracy (2 K. 14 19; see AMAZIAH, 1). Sennacherib besieged and took the place on his expedition against Egypt, and sent the Rabshakeh thence to Jerusalem (2 K. 18 14, 17, cp 19 8; Is. 36 2 λα[χ]ης [Γ], cp 37 8 [om. ℵAOQ]). Lachish was one of the two last 'fenced cities' to be captured by Nebuchadrezzar's army (Jer. 34 7). It is mentioned in a list of cities in Nehemiah (11 30); but on critical grounds we cannot assume that Jews really dwelt there in the period referred to (see EZRA ii., § 5, n. 3). Prof. Petrie's inferences from his excavations entirely bear out this opinion—viz., that, 'after the return of the Jews Lachish appears to have been hardly reoccupied' (Tell el-Hesy, 29).

In Mic. 1 13 Lachish is called 'the beginning of sin for the daughter (i.e., people) of Zion.' Possibly some heathen Philistine rites (cp Is. 2 6) had been introduced at Lachish, and spread thence to Jerusalem. The play on the name of Lachish is obscure. Read perhaps רַתְּקִי מֶרְכָּבָה [ו]רְכָשִׁים, 'Make ready chariot horses';[1] cp Ass. narkabâte rakisu, 'chariot-horses,'

1 See Ges.-Buhl, s.v. רתק; and, for the rest, Che. JQR 10 576 f. [1898]. MT is rendered in RV, 'Bind the chariot to the

Del. Ass. HWB 622; rākis and lākīsh produce an assonance. The people of Lachish have good cause to flee, for they are partners in the sins of Jerusalem.

The antiquity of Lachish is proved by the references to it in some of the Amarna tablets (15th cent. B.C.). Zimrida (cp ZIMRI) was prince of the city under the Egyptian king Amen-ḥotep IV. Efforts were made to shake his allegiance to Egypt; but he handed over the man who had tried to seduce him to an Egyptian official. Soon after, however, Lachish rebelled against him; the fate of Zimrida remains uncertain.

See Am. Tab. 217, 219, 181, and Peiser, OLZ, 15th Jan. 1899. Max Müller, however (OLZ, 15th March 1899), finds some difficulties in the situation supposed by Peiser. No. 219 is the famous tablet found at Tell el-Ḥesy (see below, § 2) and included by Winckler in his edition of the Amarna Tablets.

There is also in the British Museum a bas-relief (found at Kuyunjiḳ) with this inscription, according to Winckler, 'Sennacherib, king of the world, king of Assyria, took his seat on the throne, and the captives from Lachish marched up before him'[1] (Textbuch, 37). This confirms the inference from 2 K. 19 8 that Sennacherib's siege of Lachish was successful.

Eusebius and Jerome place the site of Lachish 7 R.m. S. of Eleutheropolis, towards the Dārōm (OS 274 9 135 22). This does not agree with the position of Umm Lāḳis, which most recent scholars have identified with Lachish, this place being W., not S., of Eleutheropolis. In fact, its sole recommendations consist in a very slight resemblance of its name to that of Lachish (ḳ, not k, is the second consonant),[2] and in its being only three-quarters of an hour from 'Ajlān (Eglon); cp Josh. 10 34. It presents, as Conder states, 'only a few traces of ruins, two masonry cisterns, and a small, low mound' (PEFQ, 1878, p. 20). On the ground of this apparent insignificance, Robinson long ago rejected it (BR 2 389), adding that the mound of Tell el-Ḥesy must certainly represent some important city; 'a finer position could hardly be imagined.' It was left for Conder, however, to point out that Lachish ought to be, and for Petrie virtually to prove that it was, the city which Tell el-Ḥesy represents. The work of excavation was begun by Flinders Petrie in April 1890. A study of the walls and of the pottery of different levels led him to the conclusion that 'the earliest dwellings are not later than the seventeenth century B.C., and the latest belong to the fifth century B.C.' 'The great walls below the level of the ash-bed belong to the pre-Israelitish or Amorite times. The stones below the bed of ashes belong to the rude period of the Judges. The ashes represent a desolation when the tell was used by alkali-burners. [Bliss accounts for the great bed of ashes differently.] The buildings above the ashes represent the cities of the various Jewish kings to the time of the Captivity.' It was in the third city, in the stratum overspread by the ash-bed, that the cuneiform tablet was found; other tablets must or may have been carried off by foes.

2. Site.

Petrie identifies the tell with Lachish for three reasons.

1. The position commands the only springs in the district, except those of Tell en-Nejīleh (see EGLON ii.).

2. It corresponds sufficiently with the geographical determination in the Onomasticon, being only three miles farther from Eleutheropolis than Eusebius and Jerome say that Lachish was.

3. It agrees with the situation represented on Sennacherib's bas-relief, and the remains in the tell permit a conception of the fortunes of the site which agrees with the data of history. F. J. Bliss took up Petrie's work in March 1891. His general conclusion agrees with that of his predecessor; the importance of the site is such that hardly any other identification appears possible.

Whether Umm Lāḳis is really the site of a Jewish settlement which took the place of the old Lachish, is less certain. G. A. Smith (Twelve Prophets, 280 f.) has suggested that Umm Lāḳis may represent the ancient Elḳoš, which, according to Epiphanius, was 'beyond Bēt Gabrē, of the tribe of Simeon' (cp ELKOSHITE, c). The consonants are suitable; but we should not have expected the vocalisation Lāḳis. Conder has identified Umm Lāḳis with the Malagues of the Crusaders. To the present writer the site of Lachish appears to be identified with virtual certainty by Petrie's brilliant investigation. Cp BRONZE, HONEY, POTTERY; and, on the strategical importance of Lachish, see GASm. HG 234 f.

See Flinders Petrie, Tell el-Hesy: a Memoir (1891); F. J. Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities; or Tell el-Hesy excavated (1898). For a fresh translation of the Lachish tablet see Peiser, OLZ, 15th Jan. 1899, and cp WMM, OLZ, 15th March 1899. W. Max Müller adheres to Umm Lāḳis (in spite of the ḳ) as the site of Lachish. He thinks the letter was addressed, not to the Egyptian grand vizier, but to a neighbour of Zimrida. The grounds for the prevalent view are not, however, discussed.

LACUNUS, RV LACCUNUS (λακκουνος [BA], βαναιας ? [L]), the name of one of the sons of Addi in the list of those with foreign wives, 1 Esd. 9 31 (see EZRA i., § 5 end). If we compare || Ezra 10 30, we shall see that the name has arisen from the names 'Chelal, Benaiah' (כלל בניה), the final ל of Chelal having been taken with the following name, and the ב read as a כ—i.e., לכניה.

LADAN (לַעְדָּן, § 38; λααδαν [BL]).

1. An Ephraimite, 1 Ch. 7 26 RV, AV LAADAN (λαδδαν [B], καθααν [A]); whose name appears in v. 20 as ELADAH (q.v.). See ERAN, EZER ii., 3 and cp EPHRAIM i., § 12.

2. RV, AV LAADAN, a Gershonite name, 1 Ch. 23 7-9 (εδαν [B], λεαδαν [A], λαα. [L]) 26 21 (χαδαν [B once], λεδ. twice λααδᾱ [A], λααδαν [L]). See LIBNI, 1.

LADANUM (לֹט, lōṭ, στακτη [ADEFL], RESINA), Gen. 37 25† (RV^mg. MYRRH) 43 11† (EV MYRRH), is the name of a resin called by the Arabs lādhan or lādan[1] which was yielded by some species of Cistus. It was known to the Greeks as early as the times of Herodotus and Theophrastus by the names λῆδον, λάδανον, and λήδανον, which are very closely allied to the Arabic name.

Ladanum is described by Herodotus (3 112) as particularly fragrant, though gathered from the beards of goats, on which it is found sticking; similarly Dioscorides (1 128). Tournefort, in modern times (Voyage, 1 29), has given a detailed description of the mode of obtaining ladanum. He relates that it is now gathered by means of a λαδανιστήριον or kind of flail[2] with which the plants are threshed. When these thongs are loaded with the fragrant and sticky resin, they are scraped with a knife; the substance is then rolled into a mass, in which state it is called ladanum or labdanum. Ladanum consists of resin and volatile oil, and is highly fragrant, and stimulant as a medicine, but is often adulterated with sand in commerce. The ladanum which is used in Europe is collected chiefly in the Greek isles, and also in continental Greece. It is yielded by species of the genus Cistus (especially by C. creticus) which are known in this country by the name of Rock Rose; they are natives of the S. of Europe, the Mediterranean islands, and the N. of Africa. According to Tristram (FFP 235) Palestinian ladanum is derived from Cistus villosus, L., which grows 'in the hill districts E. and W. of Jordan,' and is 'especially plentiful on Carmel.' Cistus creticus, which is only a variety of this and distinguished by its viscidity, is 'the common form on the southern hills.' [Fonck thinks of the Cistus salvifolius, which is also plentiful on Carmel, for the ladanum; but H. Christ (ZDPV 65 ff. [1899]) questions this identification.]

Ladanum is said by Pliny, as it was long before said by Herodotus, to be a product of Arabia, though this has not been proved to be the case in modern times. Enough, however, has been adduced to show that ladanum was known to, and esteemed by, the ancients; and, as it is swift steed'; but the first word (רְתֹם) is, strictly, untranslatable, and רכש can hardly be used of a chariot-horse (see HORSE, §§ 1, 4). The order of the words 'chariot' and 'swift steed' is also scarcely possible; to alter it in the translation (G. A. Smith) is arbitrary. If, however, Prof. Smith's rendering might stand, his explanation would be at least plausible. He sees an allusion to the Egyptian subsidies of horses and chariots (in which the politicians put their trust), which would be received at Lachish, as being the last Judæan outpost towards Egypt.

[1] 'Came forward into his presence' (M'Curdy, Hist. Proph. Mon. 2 427). Cp Meinhold, Jesaja u. seine Zeit (1898), who also adopts Wi.'s translation of šallat maḫaršu etiḳ. Bezold, however (KB 2 115), renders 'received the spoil of Lachish'; and Del. 'brought up before himself (i.e., took a minute survey of) the spoil of Lachish' (Ass. HWB 159 a).

[2] So Robinson. According to Conder the name is pronounced Umm Lags. Sayce states that, after repeated inquiries of the fellāḥīn, he assured himself (in 1881) that the name was Laṭis; but Bliss confirms Conder's statement; Umm Laggis is the form which he gives.

[1] According to Mordtmann and Müller (Sab. Denk. 84) the lādhan is the proper Arabic form derived from Persian.

[2] Specimens of the implement can be seen in the Museum at Kew (Crete and Cyprus).

stated to have been a product of Syria, it was very likely to have been sent to Egypt both as a present and as merchandise. The word lādan is found in the inscription on a S. Arabian censer (Sab. Denk. 84), and in Assyrian in the list of objects received as tribute from Damascus by Tiglath-Pileser III. (KAT(2) 151, 18). The biblical narrative (J) shows that לֹט was some precious gum produced in Canaan or at least in Gilead.

LADDER (סֻלָּם ; κλιμαξ) Gen. 28 12†. The rendering 'ladder' is unfortunate; a 'flight of steps' is meant according to most scholars. Cp BETHEL, § 2. Probably, however, מַעֲלָה, 'ascent' is the right reading (adapt suffixes accordingly), cp Neh. 3 15 12 37 (𝔊 κλίμακες = מעלות). So Che. See STAIRS, 4.

The classical use of the term 'ladder' in topography (cp Paus. viii. 6 4 and see Frazer's note) is exemplified in The Ladder of Tyrus, RV . . . OF TYRE (κλιμακος τυρου [ANV]), 1 Macc. 11 59, the northern limit of the region over which Simon the Maccabee was made commandant (στρατηγός) by Antiochus VI., son of Balas. Josephus (BJ ii. 10 2) defines it as a high mountain 100 stadia N. from Ptolemais. It is the steep and lofty headland now known as the Rās en-Nāḳūrah—'the natural barrier between Phœnicia and Palestine' (Stanley). True, we should have expected the title to have been rather given to the Rās el-abyaḍ, the Promontorium album of Pliny. Regarded from the S., however, the Rās en-Nāḳūrah, which Neubauer (Géogr. 39) identifies with the סולמא של צור of the Talmud, may have presented itself as the end of the Lebanon and the barrier of Tyre.

LAEL (לָאֵל, §§ 22, 37,[1] '[belonging] to God'; or, the form having no sure parallel in Hebrew, read 'Joel,' see GENEALOGIES i., § 7, col. 1664, no. 3), a Gershonite, Nu. 3 24 (δαηλ [BAF], δαουηλ [L]).

Gray (HPN 207) quotes the parallel of LEMUEL in Prov. 31 1, and, as more remotely analogous, BESODEIAH and possibly BEZALEEL. All these names, however, are liable to grave suspicion. Nöldeke, indeed, has shown that there were such Semitic names as Lael (in later times?), but not that MT is correct in its reading. T. K. C.

LAHAD (לַהַד), b. JAHATH (q.v., 1), a clan of Judah, 1 Ch. 4 2† (λααθ [B], λα[α]δ [AL]), Jerahmeelite, to judge from the names (Che.).

LAHAI-ROI ([בְּאֵר] לַחַי רֹאִי), Gen. 24 62 25 11 AV, RV BEER-LAHAI-ROI (q.v.).

LAHMAS (לַחְמָס ; μαχες [B], λαμας [A], λαμμας [L]), Josh. 15 40 RVmg., or, according to many MSS, Lahmam (לַחְמָם), as in EV. A town in the lowland of Judah, perhaps the modern el-Laḥm, 2½ m. S. from Eleutheropolis (Bēt Jibrīn).

LAHMI (לַחְמִי ; ελεμεε [B], λεεμει [A], λοομι [L]), 'brother of Goliath' (1 Ch. 20 5†). See ELHANAN, § 2.

LAISH. 1. (לַיִשׁ ; λαισα [BAL]), the original name of the northern frontier-city DAN (q.v.), Judg. 18 7 14 27 29 ([ουλαμ]αις [B], αλεις [A]). Another form (probably) is Lesham (see LESHEM). In the list of Thotmes III. it perhaps appears as Liusa (Mariette, Brugsch, etc.). On the narrative in Judg. 18 see JUDGES (BOOK), § 12.

Winckler (GI 2 63 ff.) endeavours to show that the foundation of Dan is related not only in Josh. 19 47 and Judg. 18, but also in Judg. 1 22-26. The city 'in the land of the Hittites' called Luz ('unto this day') must have been Dan; the statement that it was called Luz involves a confusion between the name of the sanctuary (properly an appellative meaning 'asylum'—see LUZ) and that of the city. Winckler also suggests that Laish and Leshem really mean 'there is not' and 'nameless' respectively, in allusion to the destruction of the old city by the Danites. It may be more natural to suppose that here, too, there is an early writer's misunderstanding, and that Laish (whence Leshem) is a corruption of Luz, or of a name from which Luz is corrupted.

2. Is. 10 30. See LAISHAH. T. K. C.

LAISH (לַיִשׁ, as if 'lion,' § 68 ; in 2 S. 3 15 לוש Kt.), evidently a short form of Laishah (Shalishah). See LAISHAH, PALTI. The name occurs in 1 S. 25 44 (some MSS have Kt. לוש ; αμεις [B], λαις [A], ιωας [L]); and in 2 S. 3 15 (σελλης [B], λαεις [A], σελλειμ [L, for which, see BAHURIM, n. 1]).

LAISHAH (לַיְשָׁה ; λαισα [Qmg.], of which εν σα [BA] is a corruption: λεις [Theod.], λαις [Symm. et forte Aq.]), a place in Benjamin near Gallim (?) and Anathoth (Is. 10 30† RV, AV 'unto Laish'). According to Conder (PEFQ, 1875, p. 183) and Van Kasteren (ZDPV 13 100 f.) it is the modern el-'Isāwīyeh, a small village on the E. slope of a mountain to the NNE. of the Mount of Olives, less than an hour's walk from the neighbouring village of 'Anātā. The site still shows traces of high antiquity (Guérin, Judée, 3 80 f.; Gray Hill, PEFQ, 1899, pp. 45-47). It is doubtful, however, whether we can trust the name Laishah any more than GALLIM [q.v.]. Both 'Laishah' and 'Laish' are probably distortions of SHALISHAH [q.v.], the name of the district in which 'Gibeah of Shā'ūl' (rather 'Gibeah of Shalishah'), mentioned just before (see v. 29), was situated. For another possible corruption of the same name see MERAB, MEPHIBOSHETH. Cp further SHECHEM.

Grove (Smith, DB(1), s.v.) suspects the identity of Laishah and the Eleasa of 1 Macc. 9 5 (αλασα [A], ελ. [ℵV]), where Vg. gives Laisa, while Halévy (Kohut Mem. Semitic Studies, 241 f.) identifies Laishah with CHEPHIRAH [q.v.], both names, according to him, meaning 'lion-town.' T. K. C.

LAKUM, RV Lakkum (לַקּוּם ; δωδαμ [B], ακρου [A], λακουμ [L]), an unidentified town in Naphtali (Josh. 19 33).

LAMB (שֶׂה, śeh, Gen. 22 7 f. etc.; כֶּשֶׂב, keśeb, Lev. 4 35 etc.; כֶּבֶשׂ, kébeś, Lev. 14 12 etc.). See SHEEP; and cp CATTLE, § 2.

LAMECH (לֶמֶךְ), Gen. 4 18-24. See CAINITES, § 8 f., SETHITES.

LAMENTATION. Lamentations for great calamities, especially for deaths, held an important place among the customs of the Israelites. We may regard these lamentations in different aspects, according as they are private or public, nonliterary or literary. The origin of lamentation is a simple cry or wail, and even when art had elaborated new kinds of lamentation in which musical instruments played a part, the simple cry was a necessary accompaniment—such a cry as the prolonged wēlī, 'woe is me,' still customary in Syria, with which 'ōi lī, hōi āḥī, hōi ādōn, 'ah, me,' 'ah, my brother,' 'ah, lord,' in 2 K. 9 37 (𝔊L), 1 K. 13 30 Jer. 22 18 34 5 may be compared. This is what is primarily meant by the nèhī (נְהִי ; cp νηνία, and see BDB)—i.e., 'wailing' (EV)—of Jer. 9 10 [9] 18-20 [17-19] 31 15 Am. 5 16 Mic. 2 4[1]†. The heart-rending wēlī, however, is not the only expression of woe; songs in measured verse and with musical accompaniment are chanted by the professional mourning women of Syria, and so it was in Palestine of old (cp MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 1). We may presume that public lamentations were on the same model. Pinches[2] (Smith's DB 2 980 b) has translated a Babylonian hymn, 'probably prehistoric,' which, at any rate in a wide sense, may be called an elegy (like the 'Lamentations'). For a dirge in the stricter sense we can go to the twelfth tablet of the Gilgameš epic, where we find the lament of Gilgameš over the dead hero Eabani (cp CREATION, § 20, n. 4; JOB, § 4).

1. Character.

[1] Cp Nöld., 'Verwandtschaftsnamen als Personennamen' in 'Kleinigkeiten zur semitischen Onomatologie' (WZKM 6 314 [1892]).

[1] The term is used here rather widely.

[2] Cp BOR, Dec. 1886, pp. 22 f.; Halévy, RP 11 160. It has also been compared with Ps. 79 (Che. Ps.(1) 223).

Thou takest no part in the noble feast; to the assembly they call thee not; thou liftest not the bow from the ground; what is hit by the bow is not for thee; thy hand grasps not the club and strikes not the prey, nor stretches thy foeman dead on the earth. The wife thou lovest thou kissest not; the wife thou hatest thou strikest not. The child thou lovest thou kissest not; the child thou hatest thou strikest not. The might of the earth has swallowed thee. O Darkness, Darkness, Mother Darkness! thou enfoldest him like a mantle; like a deep well thou enclosest him!'[1]

The result of the crying and lamenting of Gilgameš was that Ea-bani's spirit, after holding intercourse with Gilgameš, was transferred from the dark world of the shades to the land of the blessed. Wailing, it would seem, had an object, apart from that of relieving the feelings of the mourners, and in this case it was to effect an improvement in the lot of the dead. Perhaps, however, it may once have been intended as an attempt to influence the supernatural powers, and to bring back the departed tenant of the body;[2] for this we may compare the familiar Arabic mourning phrase addressed to the dead, 'Depart not.' At the same time there is a considerable mass of evidence that suggests a very different object—viz., to drive away the spirits of the dead lest they should harm the living.[3]

The most trustworthy specimen of an ancient Hebrew dirge is David's lament over Abner (2 S. 3 33 f.; see ABNER).

2. Of Specimens. Whether the reported lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (2 S. 1 17-27) can safely be classed with this, or whether it is not rather a literary product of the post-exilic age, is becoming somewhat doubtful (see JASHER, BOOK OF, § 2). At any rate, in Am. 5 1 we have a beautiful specimen of a new class of elegy—the prophetic:—

Prostrate is fallen to rise no more | the virgin Israel;
There she lies stretched on the ground; | no one raises her up.

Jeremiah (38 22) represents the women of the house of the king of Judah (Zedekiah) as singing a dirge containing these words,

Misled thou wast and overpowered | by thy bosom friends;
Thy feet sank in the mire, | but those remained behind.

Other specimens of prophetic dirge-poetry will be found in Jer. 9 19 21 22 [18 20 21]. The prophet, however, who, more than any other, delights in elegy, is Ezekiel (see Ezek. 19 26 17 27 2 32 28 12 32 2 cp also 32 18), and among the many passages of 'limping verse' in the later portions of Isaiah there are some (e.g., Is. 14 4*b*-21) that bear an elegiac character.

The little elegy in Am. 5 1 helps us to understand the Lamentations wrongly ascribed to Jeremiah. The death which the singers of these poems lamented was that of the Jewish nation (cp Jer. 9 19 [18] Ezek. 19), and as early as the time of Amos this form of speech was in use. As Robertson Smith has said, 'the agonies of the nation's last desperate struggle took a form modelled on the death-wail sung by "cunning women" (Jer. 9 17) and by poets "skilful of lamentation" (Am. 5 16) at the wake (אֵבֶל) of the illustrious dead.'[4]

The researches of Budde leave no doubt that one of the metres specially used in dirges was that of

3. Metre. the so-called 'limping verse,' in which 'the uniformly undulating movement which is the usual characteristic of Hebrew poetry, is changed to a peculiar and limping metre.'[5]

In the Psalter the 'limping verse' is often found; but there is only a single passage in which, Budde thinks, it is used for the purpose of lamentation. This is Ps. 137 4-9; but it is questionable whether Budde's view is correct; and still more doubtful is it whether the use of what this able critic calls the elegiac metre can be taken to prove the early exilic date of this remarkable song (see PSALMS, § 28, ix.).

The term Ḳīnāh-metre for the so-called 'limping verse' is convenient. We cannot, however, regard the theory that it is primarily elegiac as proved. Budde's attempt to explain why it is not used in David's famous elegy (ZATW 2 45)—viz., that this elegy had a private character—is far from convincing; and even apart from this it is hazardous to assert that because some early elegiac passages are in the 'Ḳīnāh metre,' the metre must therefore have been reserved originally for elegiac poetry. See Minocchi, Le Lamentazioni, 36.

Wetzstein's description of the funeral ceremonies in modern Syria will be found in Bastian's Zt. f. Ethnologie, 1873. LAMENTATIONS (BOOK)[1]

In Hebrew Bibles the Book of Lamentations bears the superscription אֵיכָה, 'Ah how!' (cp 1 1 2 1 4 1).

1. External characteristics. The Talmud, however, and Jewish writers in general call it קִינוֹת, Ḳīnōth (i.e., 'elegies' or 'dirges'), which is the Hebrew title known to Jerome in his Prologus Galeatus (Ieremias cum Cinoth, id est, Lamentationibus suis). 𝔊's title is Θρῆνοι. A fuller title, assigning the book to Jeremiah, is found in Pesh. and in some MSS of 𝔊—e.g., in Bᵇא, but not in A and B*—and in 𝔊 and Pesh. Lamentations is attached to the Book of Jeremiah (Baruch intervening in the former version). At the same time Bא have the introductory verse assigning at any rate chap. 1 to Jeremiah. It is a mistake to suppose that this arrangement of Lamentations is original, the scheme which accommodates the number of the sacred books to the number of the twenty-two Hebrew letters being self-evidently artificial, and the evidence that this arrangement (adopted by Jos.) had an established place among the Jews of Palestine being scanty and precarious. It is noteworthy, too, that the translation of Lamentations in 𝔊, which agrees pretty closely with our Hebrew text, cannot be by the same hand as the translation of the Book of Jeremiah.

The poems which make up the book are five, and the first four are alphabetical acrostics—successive stanzas (each consisting, in chap. 3, of three verses, elsewhere of one verse) beginning with successive letters of the alphabet. The last poem (chap. 5) has twenty-two stanzas, like chaps. 1-4, but is not an acrostic.

In chaps. 2-4, however, by an irregularity, the פ-stanza precedes the ע-stanza. The sense shows that this is not due to a transposition of the original order of the stanzas, whilst the fact that the same irregularity occurs three times makes it plain that the deviation from the common order rests on a variation in the order of the alphabet as used by the author (cp WRITING). According to Bickell, Cheyne, and Duhm, the same irregularity occurs in the true text of Ps. 9-10 (an acrostic poem), and not a few critics (including Bickell, Baethgen, König, and Duhm) find it in that of Ps. 34. It is perhaps better, however, to prefix צַדִּיקִים to v. 18 (as Street long ago suggested), and to omit יהוה (Che. Ps.(2)). Another case of want of uniformity concerns the use of אשר and ש relativum. In Lam. 1 only אשר occurs (vv. 7 12); in

[1] In 1882, when Robertson Smith printed the article 'Lamentations' in EB(9), it was hardly possible to give more than the vaguest determination of the date of the Lamentations. Budde, whose commentary (1898) marks our entrance on a fresh critical stage, is naturally more definite in his conclusions; the present writer has retained all that he could of Robertson Smith's work, in order to recognise the continuity of criticism. Some of the retained paragraphs, as being specially distinctive, have been marked with signs of quotation. This does not apply to translations from the Hebrew.

LAMENTATIONS (BOOK)

Lam. 2 אשר in v. 17, ש in vv. 15 f.; in Lam. 3 neither אשר nor ש; in Lam. 4 and 5 only ש (4 9 5 18). The observation is König's (Einl. 420).

The metre of the first four poems differs from that of the fifth. The metre of the fifth poem consists of ordinary three-toned lines; the metre of the first four poems is in the so-called 'limping verse,' which, being specially, though not exclusively, used for elegies, is commonly called the Ḳīnāh metre (first fully made out by Budde[1]). To speak of five Lamentations is incorrect. It is only chaps. 1 2 and 4 that are properly dirges, as referring to a death—the death of the Jewish nation (see LAMENTATION, § 2). These are highly elaborate and artificial poems in which every element of pity and terror which the subject supplies is brought forward with conscious art to stir the minds of the hearers. In their present form they appear to be rather late works; but they may perhaps have embedded in them phrases of earlier elegies[2] such as were used liturgically in the fifth month (Ab) in Zechariah's time (Zech. 7 5), and of course earlier, to commemorate the fall of the temple.[3] To suppose that our Ḳīnōth were already composed when Zechariah gave his decision to the deputation (Zech. 7 3) is hardly consistent with the evidence. Let us now consider their contents.

2. Lam. 1.

'The first elegy commences with a picture of the distress of Zion during and after the siege (1 1-11); Jerusalem, or the people of Judah, being figured as a widowed and dishonoured princess. Then, in the latter half of the poem she herself takes up the lamentation, describes her grievous sorrow, confesses the righteousness of Yahwè's anger, and invokes retribution on her enemies.' In a carefully restored text, it is seen to be a beautiful, though monotonous, composition in elegiac metre.

In v. 6 MT is correct. By turning אילים, 'harts,' into אֵילִים, 'rams,' 𝔊 spoils the figure. Verse 7 is grievously corrupt both in MT and in 𝔊. Read in the first stichus, 'ז' ירו' כָּל־מַכְאֹבֶיהָ; between יְמֵי and קֶדֶם is a collection of variants, all corruptions of 'כל־מכ'. In the last hemistich read, מְשֹׁאָתָהּ, 'her desolation.' In v. 10 MT is rough; read 'Zion (צִיּוֹן) spreadeth forth her hands because of her pleasant things' (Bickell). In v. 14, for נִשְׂקַד read נֶעֱקַד; in aβ read בִּידֵם הִסְגִּירַנִי. On v. 19 see Budde.

3. Lam. 2.

'In the second chapter the desolation of the city and the horrors of the siege are again rehearsed and made more bitter by allusion to the joy of the enemies of Israel. The cause of the calamity is national sin, which false prophets failed to denounce while repentance was still possible, and now no hope remains save in tears and supplication to stir the compassion of Yahwè for the terrible fate of his people.' The structure is the same as in chap. 1, except that פ introduces the 16th, ע the 17th verse as in chaps. 3 and 4. There is more vivid presentation, more dramatic life, more connection and progress of thought; but the religious element is less pervasive.

These are among the blemishes which need removal. In the very first verse 'covers (imperf.) with a cloud' (יָעִיב) is an impossible word (note Paseḳ after בְּאַפּוֹ). Probably we should read הֵבִישׁ, 'put to shame'; ע and ש are easily confounded. In v. 2*b* both AV and RV overlook the metrical structure. The rendering of MT should be 'He hath brought to the ground, hath profaned the kingdom, and its princes.' The first verb, however, is unsuitable, and the combination 'kingdom and princes' is unnatural. Read נֵזֶר מַמְלָכָה, 'the royal crown' (cp כתר מלכות, Esth. 1 11, etc.), and all becomes plain. Verses 4 6 7 8 have given much trouble, but are not incurable. Read (see Crit. Bib.):

'Foe-like, he hath bent his bow, | his arrows he prepareth;
He slaughtereth and killeth the children, | the delights of the eye,
In the tent of Zion he hath poured out | his wrath like fire.'

'And he hath smitten to pieces his dwelling with an axe, | hath destroyed his sanctuary,
Yahwè hath brought low in Zion | ruler and judge,
And rejected in the fury of his anger | king and priest.'

'Yahwè hath rejected his altar, | hath cast down his sanctuary,
He hath delivered into the hand of the foe | all her precious things,
Terrible nations stretch out the line | in Yahwè's house.'

'Yahwè purposeth to destroy | the precious things of Zion,
He hath not kept his hand from annihilating [all her palaces].
He hath annihilated bulwark and wall, | together they languish.'

In v. 12 MT makes the little children call out for 'corn and wine' (דגן ויין, a doubly impossible phrase), and, in v. 18 (according to EV), it reads 'Their heart cried unto the Lord, O wall of the daughter of Zion.' Clearly wrong, and, v. 18 especially, not to be superficially dealt with. Verse 12 can be restored with certainty; there is no question asked, and therefore no answer is returned. Read, 'They say to their mothers, Wo unto us! for our life goes.' Verse 18 should probably be read as follows:

Cry out because of Jerusalem's disgrace, | Zion's insult,
Let tears run down like a torrent | day and night,
Give thyself no pause, | let not the apple of thine eye cease.

4. Lam. 3.

'The third elegy [if we may call it such] takes a personal turn, and describes the affliction of the individual Israelite, or of the nation under the type of a single individual, under the sense of Yahwè's just but terrible indignation. But even this affliction is a wholesome discipline. It draws the heart of the singer nearer to his God in penitent self-examination, sustained by trust in Yahwè's unfailing mercy, which shows itself in the continued preservation of his people through all their woes. From the lowest pit the voice of faith calls to the Redeemer, and hears a voice that says, "Fear not." Yahwè will yet plead the cause of his people, and so in the closing verses the accents of humble entreaty pass into a tone of confident appeal for just vengeance against the oppressor.' Of the two views (individual or nation) here indicated respecting the subject of the elegy, the latter appears to be the one most easily defensible. As in the case of so many of the psalms and in that of the Songs of the Servant of Yahwè (see SERVANT OF THE LORD), the speaker is the company of the humble-minded righteous who form the kernel of the Jewish community. Hence it is easy for the imagined speaker to pass from the 1st person singular to the 1st person plural, and to say in v. 48 that he weeps unceasingly for the disaster of his country-people (בַּת עַמִּי). The vehemence of the imprecations at the close of the elegy is most easily intelligible if the offences referred to have been committed against the Jewish people, not against an individual (e.g., Jeremiah), imagined by the poet. This is the view of Hupfeld (on Ps. 38), Reuss, Cheyne, Löhr, and especially Smend (ZATW 8 62 f. [1888]). It is opposed especially by Stade (GVI 701) and Budde, mainly (see the latter) on two grounds: (1) the occurrence of certain expressions in vv. 1 and 27 (Oettli wrongly adds v. 14), and (2) the inconsistency of personifying the community elsewhere as a woman, but here as a man. Against this we may urge (a) the analogy of so many other poems, which are marred (as indeed Lam. 3 appears to some to be marred) by the assumption of an individualising reference, (b) the possibility of interpreting vv. 1 and 27, as Smend has done, of the people conscious of its solidarity (הַגֶּבֶר) and looking forward to an extended future (בנעוריו?), and (c) the probability, admitted by Budde, that Lam. 3 is the latest of the five poems—it is, in fact, rather a poetic monologue of Israel than an elegy. On vv. 52-58 Budde remarks, 'Abruptly the poet turns to his own sufferings. . . . To regard the community as the subject is possible (cp Ps. 6, etc.), but more probably it arises from the inconsiderate use of the psalms which served as models.' It is surely not right to assume inconsiderateness, when such a highly characteristic idea as the solidarity of all good Israelites is in question; the idea was one which had incorporated itself in the Jewish system of thought.

2 Just so, phrases of earlier psalms may conceivably have passed into some of the existing late psalms. Proof and disproof are alike impossible.

As to vv. 1 14 and 27. It is no doubt quite possible to explain, 'I am the man,' as 'I am the people'; and the particular word for 'man' (גֶּבֶר) occurs again in vv. 27 35 39. But the closing words 'by the rod of his fury' (בְּשֵׁבֶט עֶבְרָתוֹ) are peculiar, inasmuch as the name of Yahwè has not been mentioned, nor will it be till v. 18. It is probable that the text is corrupt. In v. 14 a doubt is hardly possible; עַמִּי, 'my people,' should be עַמִּים, 'peoples.' In v. 27 בנעוריו, 'in his youth,' introduces a new idea (that a young man has time before him to profit by chastisement), which is not further utilised. Here, too, the text seems to be corrupt.

In v. 1 read perhaps אֲדֹנָי הַפֹּקֵד עַל־עֲוֹנִי, 'it is the Lord who visits mine iniquity,' and in v. 27 טוֹב כִּי יִשָּׂא אִלֵּם גַּעֲרַת יהוה, 'it is good that he bear mutely the rebuke of Yahwè.'

The variant מנעוריו is thus accounted for. מִנֹּעַר in Ps. 88 16 requires a similar correction. A few other blemishes may be mentioned. 'Gall and travail' (v. 5) should be 'my head (רֹאשִׁי) with travail' (Prätorius, ZATW 15 326 [1895]). In v. 16*a* the 'teeth' and the 'gravel-stones' are troublesome; Löhr leaves the latter, but gives dots, expressive of perplexity, for the former; v. 16*b* is, on linguistic grounds, hardly less improbable. The reading we propose is as simple and appropriate as possible. 'And I girded sackloth on my flesh; I rolled myself in ashes' (see Crit. Bib.). In v. 39 'a living man' cannot be right; ארם חי should be אלהים. Not improbably we should read, 'Why do we murmur against God, (against) him who visits our sins?' Cp v. 1 as above.

'In the fourth acrostic the bitter sorrow again bursts forth in passionate wailing. The images of horror imprinted on the poet's soul during the last months of Jerusalem's death-struggle and in the flight that followed are painted with more ghastly detail than in the previous chapters, and the climax is reached when the singer describes the capture of the king, "the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of Yahwè, of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the nations." The cup of Israel's sorrow is filled up. The very completeness of the calamity is a proof that the iniquity of Zion has met with full recompense. The day of captivity is over, and the wrath of Yahwè is now ready to pass from his people to visit the sins of Edom, the most merciless of its foes.' At any rate, even if the fourth acrostic is not the work of an eye-witness, the poet stands near enough to the horrors of the siege of Jerusalem to be able to describe them, and there has been trouble enough since then to awaken his imaginative faculty. It must be admitted, however, that through literary reminiscences and an inborn tendency to rhetoric the author falls short in simplicity and naturalness of description. It is also certain that corruption of the text has here and there marred the picture. Happily the faults can often be cured. Verses 1 f., for instance, should run thus,— a. c. s.

5. Lam. 4.

How is Sheba's gold polluted— | the choice gold!
Sacred stones are poured forth | at every street-corner!
The sons of Zion—so precious— | to be valued with fine gold—
How are they esteemed as earthen pitchers, | the handiwork of the potter!

It is a most beautiful and moving piece of rhetoric. All the critics misunderstand the first line, and few have done complete justice to the second. It is not the 'dimming' or the 'changing' of fine gold that is referred to, nor is the first stichus so overladen as MT represents. It is the desecration of the image of God in the persons of slaughtered citizens of Zion that calls forth the איכה ('alas, how!') of the elegy. (For 'at every street-corner' cp 2 19, and the interpolated passage Is. 51 20.) Reading יִשְׁמָא for ויעם, makes MT's phrase, 'sacred stones,' secure.[1] In v. 3 the 'sea-monsters' should probably rather be 'jackals.'[2] Verse 5 is in a very bad state; the beginning of the cure is due to Budde. Read,

Those that ate the bread of luxury[3] | perish in the steeets.
The delicate, the possessors of halls, | embrace ash-mounds.

Verse 7 gains not less by critical treatment. 'Her Nazirites' (נזיריה) should be 'her dignitaries' (רֹזְנֶיהָ); the absurdities of the second part of the verse in MT are removed elsewhere (see SAPPHIRE). Verses 14 f. in MT (and therefore also in EV) are a mass of inconsistencies. It can hardly be doubted that the true text runs nearly as follows—

Her princes wander in the countries, | they stumble in the lands,
And they are not able to find | for themselves a resting-place.
'Away'—men call unto them—'away, | away, rest not,'
For they find no resting-place, | they may not sojourn any more.[1]

The mistakes of MT were caused by the reference to bloodshed in v. 13, from which, however, vv. 14 f. are quite distinct. The passage is reminiscent of Jer. 6 22, Dt. 28 65.[2] On v. 21 see § 8.

6. Lam. 5. 'The fifth chapter, which [in vv. 1, 20-22] takes the form of a prayer, [is not an acrostic, and] does not follow the scheme common to the three foregoing sections. The elegy proper must begin with the utterance of grief for its own sake. Here on the contrary the first words are a petition, and the picture of Israel's woes comes in to support the prayer. The point of view, too, is changed, and the chapter closes under the sense of continued wrath. The centre of the singer's feeling lies no longer in the recollection of the last days of Jerusalem, but in the long continuance of a divine indignation which seems to lay a measureless interval between the present afflicted state of Israel and those happy days of old which are so fresh in the recollection of the poet in the first four chapters. The details, too, are drawn less from one crowning misfortune than from a continued state of bondage to the servants of the foreign tyrant (v. 8), and a continued series of insults and miseries. And with this goes a change in the consciousness of sin: "Our fathers have sinned, and are not; and we have borne their iniquities" (v. 7; cp Zech. 1 2-6, and similar complaints in very late psalms).'

The contents of chapter 5 are such that we are compelled to enter immediately on the question of its date.

7. Date of Lam. 5. The author of the poem endeavours, it is true, to express the feelings of an earlier generation; he indites a complaint of the sad lot of those who have not only survived the great catastrophe, but also remain on the ancestral soil. He cannot, however, preserve consistency; he speaks partly as if he were one of a people of serfs or day-labourers in the country-districts—especially perhaps in the wilderness of Judah (see Budde on v. 9)—partly as if some of those for whom he speaks were settled in or near Jerusalem and the cities of Judah (v. 11). Moreover, he says nothing of the sword of the all-powerful enemy, which had robbed Judah of the flower of her population; less eminent foes are referred to under conventional terms (of which more presently). This is a matter of great moment for the critic, who by the help of the Book of Nehemiah can with reasonable probability determine the author's age. The important distichs are vv. 6, 8, 9, 10, 18, of the first four of which we give a rendering based on a critically emended text. (The MT of v. 6 has caused hopeless perplexity.)

6 We have surrendered to the Miṣrites,
We have become subject to the Ishmaelites.
8 Arabians rule over us,
There is none to deliver out of their hand.
9 We bring in our corn (לַחְמֵנוּ) with peril of our lives
Because of the Arabian of the desert.
10 Our young men and our maidens are sold
Because of the terror of famine.

The terms 'Miṣrites' (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b) and 'Ishmaelites' are conventional archaisms, many parallels for which use are probably to be found in the Psalter (see

1 Budde proposes אַבְנֵי יְקָר, 'precious stones'; cp v. 2.

PSALMS [BOOK]), and, so far as 'Miṣrites' is concerned, in the fourth elegy (Lam. 4 21; see below, § 8). The enemies intended are the Edomites who had probably joined in the Babylonian invasion, and had occupied the southern part of the old territory of Judah, and perhaps, too, the Nabatæan Arabs, one of whom was the Geshem or Gashmu of whom Nehemiah speaks[1] (Neh. 2 19; cp 4 7, 'the Arabians'). The trouble from these foes (at any rate from the Edomites) no doubt began early; but it also continued very long (see EDOM, § 9; NEHEMIAH, § 3). Their dangerousness was particularly felt at harvest-time; this is indicated in v. 9, of which a welcome illustration is furnished by Is. 62 8 (age of Nehemiah), where we read—

By his right hand has Yahwè sworn | and by his strong arm,
Surely I will no more give thy wheat | to be food for thy foes.

The trouble from insufficient agricultural labour and from the general economic disturbance doubtless continued, and it is difficult not to illustrate v. 10 (according to the text rendered above) by the thrilling account which Nehemiah gives (Neh. 5 1-13) of the sufferings of the poorer Jews, and of the selling of their children into slavery. Once more, it is not denied that there are features in the description in Lam. 5 which suggest an earlier period; but we cannot shut our eyes to the accordance of other features with the circumstances of the Nehemian age. Nehemiah certainly has not yet come; mount Zion is still desolate (v. 18; cp Neh. 1 3), and such central authority as there is does not interest itself greatly in the welfare of the Jewish subjects. It is still possible to speak of Yahwè as 'forgetting' his servants 'for ever,' and to express, in a subdued tone, the reluctant admission that it might not be God's will to grant the prayer for the restoration of Israel as of old,—

Unless thou hast utterly rejected us,
(And) art exceedingly wroth against us.
(Lam. 5 22; cp RV.)

Still, though the situation of affairs is bad, a deliverer—Nehemiah—is at hand. The allusion in v. 12*b* to Lev. 19 32 (in the Holiness-law) suggests that the writer is a member of that stricter religious party among the Jews, which presumably kept up relations with men like Nehemiah and Ezra, and afterwards did their best to assist those great men. It does not seem necessary or natural to suppose with Budde that vv. 11 f. are a later insertion (see his note); Budde's mistake is partly due to his following the corrupt reading of MT in v. 12*a*, which ought almost certainly to be read thus,

Grey-haired men and honourable ones suffer contempt;[2]
The persons of old men are not honoured.

The points of affinity between Lam. 5 and Job, Psalms, and 2 and 3 Isaiah also deserve attention.[3]

(a) Job. Cp v. 15*b*, Job 30 31; v. 16*a*, Job 19 9*b*. (b) Psalms. Cp v. 1, Ps. 44 13 [14] 89 50 f. [51 f.]; v. 8 (פרק, 'to deliver'), Ps. 136 24; v. 10 וְלַעֲפוֹת, Ps. 11 6 119 53†, but note that in all these passages 'זל is miswritten for פַּלָּצוּת (Ezek. 7 18, etc.); v. 11 ('Zion,' 'cities of Judah'), Ps. 69 35 [36]; v. 15, Ps. 30 11 [12]; v. 17*b*, Ps. 6 7 [8] and (for use of חָשַׁךְ) 69 24 23]; v. 18 (הִלֵּךְ), Ps. 38 7 81 4, etc.; v. 19, Ps. 45 6 [7] 102 12; v. 20, Ps. 13 1 [2] 74 10 89 46 [47] (אֹרֶךְ יָמִים, Ps. 21 4 [5], etc.); v. 21, Ps. 80 3 7 [4 8]. (c) 2 and 3 Isaiah. V. 2 (נֶהְפַּךְ, sense), Is. 60 5; v. 3 (יְתוֹמִים אֵין אָב), Is. 63 16, the Jews no longer 'bnē Israel'; v. 7 (סָבַל), Is. 53 4 11; v. 11 ('Zion,' 'cities of Judah'), Is. 40 9; v. 18, Is. 54 10 [9]; v. 22*b*, Is. 57 16 54 12 [11].

[1] In v. 9*b*, however, the writer may also be thinking of כַּעֲרָבִי בַּמִּדְבָּר in Jer. 3 2. It is worth noting that in all probability Hosea (5 13) calls the king of Muṣur an Arabian (see JAREB).

[2] שָׂבִים וְנִכְבָּדִים נָקְלוּ (cp Lev. 19 32*a*).

[3] (3 Isaiah = Isaiah, chaps. 56-66.) In the selection of phraseological parallels Löhr's very full tables (see below, § 13) have been of the greatest service. A little more criticism on his part would have made his tables even more useful.

LAMENTATIONS (BOOK)

When we put all these data together, no earlier date seems plausible than 470-450 B.C. (i.e. pre-Nehemian). At the same time, a later date is by no means impossible. The shadows of evening darkened again, till night fell amidst the horrors occasioned by the barbarity of Artaxerxes Ochus (359-338 B.C.). Then, we may be sure, the fasting for the old calamities assumed a fresh vitality and intensity. It is at any rate difficult to place a long interval between Lam. 5 and Lam. 1-4, and Lam. 2-4 contain some elements which at least permit a date considerably after Nehemiah.

As it is the poorest of these plaintive compositions, we may conjecture Lam. 5 to be also the earliest. There is only one point of contact between Lam. 5 and Lam. 1-4—viz. in v. 3, cp 1 1—and this is of no real significance. In Lam. 5 3, the 'mothers,' if the text is right, are the cities of Judah (Ew., Löhr); more probably, however, we should read אַרְמְנֹתֵינוּ,[1] 'our citadels.' Those high, strong buildings, where formerly the warriors had held out so long against the foe, are now, complains the poet, untenanted and in ruins (cp Lam. 2 5), as helpless and incapable of helping as widows. In Lam. 1 1 Jerusalem itself is compared to a widow.

8. Date of Lam. 4.

We next turn to Lam. 4, which, like Lam. 5, seems to contain an archaising reference to Muṣri (cp MIZRAIM, § 2 b), by which the writer means the land adjoining the S. of Palestine occupied by the Edomites after their displacement by the Nabatæans. Verse 21 should probably run—'Rejoice and be glad, O people of Edom, that dwellest in Miṣṣur'[2] (בְּמָצוֹר). Were it not for the archaistic Miṣṣur (Muṣur), which may point to a later age when archaisms were fashionable, we might assign v. 21 to some eye-witness of the great catastrophe; words quite as bitter are spoken against Edom by the prophet Ezekiel (chap. 35).

Another suspicious passage is v. 20:

The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of Yahwè, | was taken in their pit,[3]
Of whom we said, Under his shadow | we shall live among the nations.

That the king intended is, not Josiah (so Targ.), but Zedekiah, is certain. But a writer so fully in accord with Jeremiah and Ezekiel (see vv. 6 13) as the author of Lam. 4 would never have written thus, unless he had been separated from the historical Zedekiah by a considerable interval of time. Zedekiah, to this writer, is but a symbol of the Davidic dynasty; the manifold sufferings consequent on subjection to foreigners made even Zedekiah to be regretted.[4] Budde's view of this passage is hardly correct. The words 'Under his shadow we shall live,' etc., surely cannot refer to the hope of a feeble but still 'respected' (?) native royalty in the mountains of Moab and Ammon. It is in fact strictly 'David,' not Zedekiah, that the poet means. At the accession of each Davidic king—each restored 'David'—loyal subjects exclaimed, 'Under his shadow we shall live among the nations.' The strong rhetoric and the developed art of the poem are equally adverse to the view that it is the work of one of the Jews left by Nebuchadrezzar in Jerusalem. How long after Lam. 5 it was written, is uncertain; see below, § 9.

Points of contact between Lam. 4 and other late works. (a) Job. Terms for gold and precious stones in vv. 1 2 7; cp Job 28; v. 3 יְעֵנִים (Ḳr.), Job 39 13 (crit. emend.; see OSTRICH); v. 5.

[1] 2 S. 20 19 hardly justifies the equation, 'mother' = 'city.' Zion alone, in the poet's time, could be called 'mother' (cp Ps. 87 5, 𝔊). The play on armanoth and almanoth is a very natural one. Budde would take 'father' and 'mothers' literally; but 'father' should be 'fathers' and 'as widows' should be 'widows' to justify this view.

[2] בְּאֶרֶץ עוּץ not only makes the second part of the 'limping verse' too long, but also makes the poet guilty of an inaccuracy (see Uz).

[3] Seinecke gives the right explanation (GVI 2 30). SS, however, explains 'anointed of Yahwè' as a phrase for the pious kernel of the Jewish people.

[4] Read כְּשַׁחְתָּם (see Budde).

Lam. 2 and 4 are rightly regarded by Nöldeke and Budde as twin poems. They agree in poetical structure; both too are highly dramatic. Both speak of the strange reverses suffered by the leaders of the state; both, with much pathos, of the fate of young children. The reference to 'the law' (tōrāh) in v. 9 stamps the writer as a legalist; the idealisation of Jerusalem in v. 15*b* would incline us to make the poem nearly contemporary with Ps. 48, or even later than that poem, if Ps. 48 3, presupposed in Lam. 2, is corrupt. The reference to 'solemn feasts and sabbaths' in 2 6 is as imaginary as the supposed reference to the resounding cries of the worshippers in the temple in 2 7. The same date must of course be given to both the twin poems. They probably belong to the same age as the many 'persecution psalms' in Ps. 1-72—i.e., to the latter part of the Persian period (see, however, PSALMS [BOOK]).

Lam. 1, Budde fully admits, can hardly be the work of an eye-witness of the fall of Jerusalem. That it is much later in origin than Lam. 2 and 4 seems an unnecessary inference.[2] Here, again, the parallels are very important.

The date of Lam. 3, relatively to Lam. 1 2 and 4, is very easily fixed. It shows a further development of the art of acrostic poetry which reminds us of Ps. 119, and its superabundant literary reminiscences place it on a level with the poorest of the canonical psalms. That, like some at least of those psalms, it is pervaded by a deep and tender religious feeling, may be most heartily admitted. Budde (p. 77) is probably right in assigning Lam. 3 to the pre-Maccabæan portion of the Greek age.

It is true that, according to a tradition only recently called in question, the author of Lamentations is the prophet Jeremiah (cp Bābā bathrā, 15*a*). A picturesque notice prefixed to 𝔊's version says that, 'after Israel was taken captive and Jerusalem laid waste, Jeremiah sat down and wept, and sang this elegy over Jerusalem,' and the introduction of the Book in the Targum runs, 'Jeremiah the prophet and chief priest said thus.' There is also a passage in the Hebrew canon itself which was anciently interpreted as connecting the name of Jeremiah with our book. In 2 Ch. 35 25 we read, 'And Jeremiah composed an elegy upon Josiah, and all the singing men and singing women uttered a lamentation over Josiah unto this day; and they made it (i.e., the singing of such elegies) a stated usage in Israel; behold it is written in the Lamentations'; see JEREMIAH ii., § 3 (1). 'Josephus says[4] that the dirge of Jeremiah on this occasion was extant in his days (Ant. x. 5 1), and no doubt means by this the canonical Lamentations. Jerome on Zech. 12 11 understands the passage in Chronicles in the same sense; but modern writers have generally assumed that, as our book was certainly written after the fall of Jerusalem, the dirges referred to in Chronicles must be a separate collection. This, however, is far from clear. The קינות of the Chronicler had, according to his statement, acquired a fixed and statutory place in Israel, and were connected with the name of a prophet. In other words, they were canonical as far as any book outside the Penta-

[1] Let another expression of thanks here be given to Löhr for his useful labours.

[2] Robertson Smith inclined to Ewald's view that the ע stanza originally preceded the פ stanza; Budde is of an opposite opinion.

[1] מנגינה implies no affectation of originality (Bu.); ני=ם (dittography).

[2] Read מְרוֹרַי (note the parallelism).

[3] רחמיו, if written רחמ', would easily fall out after קרם. Omit רחמיו in v. 22. (So partly Bu.)

[4] This passage of his article in Ency. Brit. is quoted and endorsed by Robertson Smith in OTJC(2) 181, n. 2; he refers to Nöldeke, Alttest. Lit. (1868), 144.

teuch could be so called in that age.' It thus seems highly probable that in the third century B.C. (see CHRONICLES, § 3) the Book of Lamentations was used liturgically by a guild of singers, and that a portion of it was ascribed to Jeremiah as its author. Even this evidence, however, is some three centuries later than the events referred to in Lamentations. It is also discredited by its connection with an undoubted error of interpretation. The reference in Lam. 4 20 to the last representative of the much-regretted Davidic family is couched in terms which the Chronicler felt unable to apply to any king later than Josiah; Lam. 4 therefore had to be a dirge on Josiah, and who could have written such a dirge but Jeremiah?

Though there is a considerable element in the vocabulary of Lamentations which can be paralleled in Jeremiah, there are also many important characteristic words not used by the prophet, and some distinctive Jeremianic ideas are wanting in those poems. And in spite of a certain psychological plausibility in the traditional theory (cp Jer. 8 23 [9 1] 13 17 14 17) it must be admitted that the circumstances and the general attitude of the prophet make it extremely difficult to conceive his having written these poems. From Jer. 38 28 39 14 it is plain that during the capture of the city he was not a free man, and could not go about observing the sad condition of the citizens. Nor was his attitude towards the Chaldæans the same as that implied in the poems, for the poems are the expression of unavailing but ardent patriotism, whereas Jeremiah persistently counselled patient submission to the foreign rule. The sense of guilt, as Budde remarks, is very imperfectly developed in Lamentations. Here the blame of the national calamities is thrown on the prophets and priests; but Jeremiah's prophecies are full of stern appeals to the conscience. There are some passages, too, which in the mouth of Jeremiah would go directly against facts—e.g., 2 9 and 4 17 20 (see Löhr, 16). It is at best a very incomplete answer that in chap. 3, where the singer's complaint may be thought to take a more personal turn, Jeremiah himself may be pictured in his isolation from Israel at large. Indeed, upon a close examination it turns out that this interpretation rests on a single word in 3 14—viz., עַמִּי, 'my people,' which, as we have seen, should rather be עַמִּים, 'peoples,' so that the singer of chap. 3, as the general argument of the poem requires, is a representative of Israel among the heathen, not an isolated figure among unsympathetic countrymen.

It is unnecessary to adduce seriatim the similarities of expression and imagery in Lamentations and the Book of Jeremiah respectively. It is admitted that the Book of Jeremiah had an enormous influence on the subsequent literature, and it would constitute a perplexing problem if in poems dealing with the religious aspects of the national troubles there were not numerous reminiscences of Jeremiah. Driver (Intr.(6), 462) has made a judicious selection of some of the more striking similarities. On the vocabulary see Löhr, ZATW 14 33 ff.

13. Literature. The most urgent question is that relating to the text. Here, as elsewhere, a very natural but no longer justifiable conservatism has hindered an adequate treatment of critical questions. It must also be remembered that the date of Lamentations can be satisfactorily discussed only in connection with the date of Psalms and Job. The older literature is fully given by Nägelsbach (p. 17); but recent commentaries, from Ewald's onwards (if we put aside those in which JEREMIAH [q.v.] and Lamentations are treated together), are much more important. Ewald treats the five Lamentations among the Psalms of the Exile (Dichter, vol. 1, pt. 2, (2) 1866). See also Thenius in KGH, 1855, who ascribes chaps. 2 and 4 to Jeremiah; Vaihinger, 1857; Reuss, La Bible: Poésie Lyrique, 1879; S. Oettli, in KGH, 1889; M. Löhr, 1891, and again in HK, 1893; S. Minochi (Rome, 1897); K. Budde, in KHC (Fünf Megillot), 1898. Recensions of the text have been given by G. Winckler (AOF(2), 3 445) refers Lamentations to a partial destruction of Jerusalem in the time of Sheshbazzar, in which, he thinks, the temple was not destroyed. See, however, OBADIAH. Among the Introductions König's gives perhaps the most distinctive treatment to the critical questions; but Driver's is fuller.

T. K. C. (with some passages by W. R. S.).

LAMP, LANTERN. Before we proceed to a consideration of the use of artificial light among the early Hebrews there are eight Hebrew (including Aramaic) and Greek terms which have to be mentioned.

Passing over such terms as אוֹר, מָאוֹר, מְאוּרָה, φῶς, φωστήρ, and the like, we have:—

1. Terms.

1. נֵר, nēr, sometimes rendered 'candle' in AV (e.g., Job 18 6 21 17 29 3, etc.), and even in RV also (Jer. 25 10, Zeph. 1 12), for which, as the Amer. Revisers recognise, 'lamp' is everywhere to be preferred: so in RV of Job, l.c., and in AV also of Ex. 27 20. Cognate with nēr is:

2. נִיר, nīr, used only in a figurative sense, AV 'light' in 1 K. 11 36, 2 K. 8 19, 2 Ch. 21 7 (mg. 'candle'), but RV 'lamp' (so also in Prov. 21 4 where AV 'plowing,' mg. 'light,' RVmg. 'tillage'; see the Comm.), and AV also in 1 K. 15 4. From the same common root is derived מְנוֹרָה, mĕnōrāh,[1] which, with the single exception of 2 K. 4 10, is always used of the temple candelabrum (see CANDLESTICK).

3. לַפִּיד, lappīd (deriv. uncertain), though rendered 'lamp' in AV Gen. 15 17 Job 12 5 (RV also in Dan. 10 6 Is. 62 1), should rather be 'torch' (as in RV, so already AV in Nah. 2 4 [5], Zech. 12 6); it is rendered 'lightning' in Ex. 20 18 EV. On the apparently cognate פלדות (Nah. 2 3 [4] AV 'torches') see IRON, § 2, col. 2174.

4. נֶבְרַשְׁתָּא, nĕbraštā, in Bibl. Aram. Dan. 5 5, EV 'candlestick.'[2]

5. λύχνος (in 𝔊 for no. 1), 'candle' in AV of Mt. 5 15 Mk. 4 21 Lk. 8 16, etc., but 'lights' (in pl.) Lk. 12 35; RV 'lamp(s).'

6. λυχνία (in 𝔊 for mĕnōrāh, see 2 above), 'candlestick' AV Mt. 5 15 Mk. 4 21 Lk. 8 16 11 33 (RV 'stand'), and EV Heb. 9 2 Rev. 1 12 2 1 5 etc. (in Rev., RVmg., 'Gr. lamp-stands').

7. λαμπάς, 'lamp' AV Rev. 4 5 8 10, etc., and EV Mt. 25 1-8, properly 'torch' (so EV in Jn. 18 3, RV in Rev. l.c., and RVmg. in Mt. l.c.). The word was transferred from the torch to the later invented 'lamp.' In Judith 10 22 mention is made of silver 'lamps' (λαμπάδες ἀργυραῖ).

8. φανός, Jn. 18 3†, EV 'lantern' (properly a torch).

2. Introduction of Lamps. The oldest form of artificial light was supplied by torches of rush, pine, or any other inflammable wood. The origin of the lamp is quite unknown. Classical tradition ascribed its invention to the joint efforts of Vulcan, Minerva, and Prometheus, whilst Egypt, on the other hand, claimed the credit for herself. At all events, according to Schliemann, lamps were unknown in the Homeric age, and, on the authority of Athenæus (15 700) were not in common use (in Greece) until the fourth century B.C. With the Romans, too, the candela is earlier than the lucerna and the candelabrum, and was used, even in later times, by the poorer classes rather than the more expensive lights requiring oil.

3. Description. The oldest kind of lamp is the shell-shaped clay vessel consisting of an open circular body with a projecting rim to prevent the oil from being spilled. This variety is found in Cyprus from the eighth to the fourth century B.C.,[3] and many Egyptian specimens, ascribed to the middle of the second millennium, were found at Tell el-Ḥesy.[4] These rude clay vessels have survived in the E. to the present day. The earliest Greek and Roman lamps (lychni, lucernæ) are almost always of terra-cotta, bronze is rarer.[5] In Egypt and Palestine, on the other hand,

[1] According to Hommel, Süd-arab. Chrest. 128, the related מנהרת in Hal. 353 = 'torch.'

[2] Deriv. quite obscure; see the Lexx. According to Barth (ZA 2 117) the n is a nominal prefix.

terra-cotta or even porcelain lamps do not seem to occur before the Roman and Byzantine periods respectively.[1]

Another popular variety is the shoe-shaped lamp, several specimens of which were found by Peters at Nippur,[2] sometimes plain, 'sometimes blue enamelled, and a few in copper.' They appear to be all post-Babylonian. (The older lamps were of a squarish shape; the most elaborate specimen was evidently Seleucidan.) Lamps of this description were used by the early Christians (cp Dict. Christ. Ant. s. 'Lamps,' 919).[3]

Generally speaking, therefore, the lamps of the Semites and Egyptians contrasted unfavourably with those of Grecian or Roman manufacture, and we may further conclude that the Hebrew lamp underwent little improvement and elaboration previous, at all events, to the time of the Seleucidæ. We may also infer, incidentally, that there are no grounds at present (at least) for supposing that P's temple-candelabrum was marked by any exceptional beauty—even in Samuel's time the sanctuary was lit only by a nēr (§ 1, 1 above).

4. Early Jewish Lamps.

In spite of the numerous references to the nēr in the OT we have really no indications to guide us to its shape, and in the light of the evidence above (§ 3) we can only surmise that it approximated to—if it was not identical with—the plain shell-shaped clay utensil already described. As the interesting passage in 2 K. 4 10 proves, a lamp of some kind formed a part of the furniture of every room, and the exceptional use of mĕnōrāh suggests that already it was customary to set the lamp upon an elevated stand. This we know was done in NT times. At all events we must not suppose that a candelabrum of the typical classical shape is intended in this pre-exilic reference. The more usual practice was to set the lamp upon a niche in the wall.

As the term pištāh, פִּשְׁתָּה, shows, the wick was commonly of FLAX [q.v.]. Whether, as in Egypt (cp Herod. 2 62), the oil was mixed with salt (to purify the flame) is unknown; see OIL.

The Oriental prefers to keep a light burning throughout the night[4]—a custom not wholly due to fear of darkness—and Kitto (Bibl. Cycl., s.v.) suggests that this practice gives point to the familiar 'outer-darkness' of the NT. The contrast implied in the term 'outer' refers to 'the effect produced by sudden expulsion into the darkness of night from a chamber highly illuminated for an entertainment.' Probably the custom originated in the widespread belief which associates and sometimes even identifies light and life.

5. Beliefs and metaphors.

So, the extinguishing of light is the cessation of life, Prov. 20 20, cp Prov. 13 9 24 20 Job 18 6 21 17 29 3. Similar is the use of nīr (§ 1, 2 above), and the metaphor 'quench the coal' in 2 S. 14 7 (COAL, § 4). The light may typify the life of the individual, of the clan, or of the nation. In 2 S. 21 17 where David is the 'lamp of Israel,' we may perhaps see in the people's anxiety to safeguard his person a trace of the primitive taboo of kings.[5] Again we find the widespread custom of the ever-burning sacred hearth or lamp (cp CANDLESTICK), on which see NAPHTHAR and cp Paus. i. 26 6 f., viii. 53 9, and Class. Dict., s.v. 'Prytaneum.'

On the association of the deity with flame, see FIRE.[6] Finally may be mentioned the Lydian custom (Paus. vii. 22 2) of lighting the sacred lamp before the image of Hermes in the market-place of Pharæ before approaching it for oracular purposes. This may, conceivably, illustrate 1 S. 3 3 where the point is emphasised that the lamp has not gone out. Did the writer believe that there would have been no oracle had the light been extinguished?[7]

From primitive cult to established custom is an easy step. On the lighting of torches and lamps on the occasion of marriage festivities see MARRIAGE.[1] Whether, as Bliss has conjectured,[2] lamps ever played a part in foundation-ceremonies, cannot at present be proved. The burning of lamps before the dead is too widely known to need more than a passing mention; see, further, MOURNING CUSTOMS. On lamps in Jewish festivals see DEDICATION, FEAST OF, col. 1054, and TABERNACLES, FEAST OF. S. A. C.

[6] So the Yezīdis light lamps at sacred springs (Parry, Six months in a Syrian monastery, 363).

[7] As it stands the passage is difficult. It is ordinarily supposed to indicate that it was still night-time (in v. 15 read: 'he rose up early in the morning'). Are we to suppose, therefore, that the nēr only burned for a few hours (note that יִכְבֶּה is intransitive)? This would be opposed not only to P, but also to universal custom.

LAODICEA (λαοδικια [Ti. WH] from ℵ everywhere; in TR everywhere λαοδικεια, which is certainly the correct Gk. form [Authors and inscrr.]. B has λαοδικια in Col. 2 1 Rev. 1 11 3 14; but λαοδικεια in Col. 4 13 15 16. Latin, Laodicea; but also Laodicia and other wrong forms are found. The ethnic is λαοδικευς [Lat. Laodicensis], Laodicean, Col. 4 16 [cp COINS]). The NT passages indicate the position of Laodiceia[3] as (1) in the Roman province of Asia, and (2) in close proximity to Colossæ and Hierapolis. A coin represents the city as a woman wearing a turreted crown, sitting between φρυγια and καρια, which are figured as standing females. This agrees with the ancient authorities, who are at variance whether Laodiceia belongs to Caria or to Phrygia.[4] It was in fact close to the frontier, on the S. bank of the Lycus, 6 m. S. of Hierapolis and about 10 m. W. of Colossæ (Col. 4 13 16). In order to distinguish it from other towns of the same name, it was called Λαοδίκεια ἡ πρὸς (or ἐπὶ) τῷ Λύκῳ (Laodicea ad Lycum, Strabo, 578).

Laodiceia probably owed its foundation to Antiochus II. (261-246 B.C.), and its name to his wife Laodicē. The foundations of the Greek kings in Asia Minor were intended as centres of Hellenic civilisation and of foreign domination. Ease of access and commercial convenience were sought, rather than merely military strength. Hence they were generally placed on rising ground at the edge of the plains (Ramsay, Hist. Geogr. of AM, 85). Such is the situation of Laodiceia, backed by the range of Mt. Salbacus (Baba Dagh) and, to the SE., Mt. Cadmus (Khonas Dagh). Being a Seleucid foundation, Laodiceia contained a Jewish element in its population, either due to the founder or imported by Antiochus the Great about 200 B.C. (Jos. Ant. xii. 3 4).[5] In 62 B.C. Flaccus, the governor of Asia, seized twenty pounds of gold which had been collected at Laodiceia, as the centre of a district,[6] by the Jews for transmission to Jerusalem (Cic. Pro Flacco, 68; cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 10 20, a letter addressed by the Laodicean magistrates to Gaius Rabirius in 48 or 45 B.C., guaranteeing religious freedom for the Jewish colony).

[1] Also a classical custom. Probably the flame was originally regarded as a vivifying and fertilising agent; cp especially Frazer, Golden Bough(2), 3 305. One remembers that Hymen is figured with a torch.

The prosperity of Laodiceia began only with the Roman period (Str. 578, μικρὰ πρότερον οὖσα αὔξησιν ἔλαβεν ἐφ' ἡμῶν καὶ τῶν ἡμετέρων πατέρων, which sums up the first century B.C.). Strabo traces the growth of the city to its excellent territory and its fine breed of sheep; but the real secret lay in its situation at a knot in the imperial road-system (cp Pol. 5 57). At Laodiceia the great eastern highway met three other roads: (1) from the SE., from Attaleia and Perga; (2) from the NW., the important road from Sardis and Philadelpheia; (3) from the NE., from Dorylæum and northern Phrygia. The city was thus marked out as a commercial and administrative centre. It was the meeting-place of the Cibyratic conventus, and a banking-centre (Cicero proposes to cash there his treasury bills of exchange—Ad Fam. 3 5, pecunia quæ ex publica permutatione debetur. Cp id. Ad Att. 5 15). To this financial side of the city's repute refers Rev. 3 18 ('I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire'). Laodiceia also became great as a manufacturing town. The fine glossy black native wool (of the colour called κοραξής, Str. 578) was made into garments of various shapes and names, and into carpets.[1] A reference to this trade is found in Rev. 3 18 ('I counsel thee to buy of me . . . white raiment' [ἱμάτια λευκά—not the dark garments of native manufacture]). The town thus rapidly grew rich. Although it was passed over in 26 A.D. as not sufficiently important to be selected as the site of a temple to Tiberius (Tac. Ann. 4 55), it needed no help from the imperial exchequer in order to repair the havoc wrought by the great earthquake[2] of 60 A.D. (Tac. Ann. 14 27, propriis opibus revaluit). Hence the boast in Rev. 3 17 ('I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing').

Asklepios (Æsculapius) enjoyed great honour at Laodiceia. He is there the Grecised form of the native deity, Mēn Karos, whose temple was at Attouda, some 12 m. to the West (cp NEOCOROS). It was connected with a great school of medicine. That Laodiceia identified itself with this worship is clear from its coins, which under Augustus have the staff of Asklepios encircled by serpents, with the legend Ζεῦξις or Ζεῦξις Φιλαληθής: Zeuxis and Alexander Philalethes were two directors of the school. The expression in Rev. 3 18 ('eye-salve to anoint thine eyes with, that thou mayest see' RV) refers to the 'Phrygian powder' (τέφρα Φρυγία) used to cure weak eyes. We may infer that this was made at Laodiceia, and that the Laodicean physicians were skilful oculists. Thus the three epithets 'poor and blind and naked' in Rev. 3 17, are carefully selected with reference to three conspicuous features in the life of the city.

Of the history of Christianity in Laodiceia little is known. From Col. 2 1 ('for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh'), it is clear that at the time of writing Paul was not personally known to the bulk of the converts at Laodiceia. This inference is by no means irreconcilable with Acts 19 1 [on the expression τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη, 'the upper coasts' AV, 'the upper country' RV, see GALATIA, § 7, col. 1596, and PHRYGIA, § 4]. The foundation of the Laodicean church must be traced to Paul's activity in Ephesus (Acts 18 19 19 10, 'so that all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word'). The actual founder of the church would appear to have been Epaphras (Col. 1 7 4 12 f.). From Col. 4 16 we gather that Paul wrote also to Laodiceia when he wrote to Colossæ; but the Laodicean epistle is lost—unless we accept the view that it is the extant Epistle to the Ephesians (cp COLOSSIANS, § 14). The epistle, extant in Latin, entitled Epistola ad Laodicenses, is a forgery.[3] The subscription to 1 Tim.—'The first to Timothy was written from Laodicea' AV—is also false.

The site of Laodiceia (mod. Eski-Hissar, the 'Old Castle') is now quite deserted; the ruins are many but not striking. The old city has served as a quarry for Denizli, a large Turkish town at the foot of the Baba Dagh, about 6 m. to the southward.

Literature. Ramsay, in his Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, 1 32 ff. 341 f. 2 512 542 ff., etc., gives nearly all that is known of Laodiceia and the Lycus valley generally, with map of Laodiceia. LAPIDOTH, RV LAPPIDOTH (לַפִּידוֹת, as if 'torches' or [cp לַפִּידִים, Ex. 20 18] 'lightning flashes'; λαφ[ε]ιδωθ [BAL]), husband of DEBORAH (Judg. 4 4). There is reason, however, to suspect that both 'Deborah' and 'Lappidoth' may be corruptions, the former of the name of the centre of the clan of Saul (Ephrath—i.e., Jerahmeel; see SAUL, § 1), the latter of PALTIEL, the origin of which was of course unknown when the Deborah legend was elaborated. The narratives in Judg. 4 and Josh. 11, and the song in Judg. 5, have in fact most probably undergone considerable transformation. See SHIMRON-MERON, SISERA. T. K. C.

LAPIS LAZULI (Rev. 21 19 RVmg.), the name by which a well-known blue mineral (mainly silicate of aluminium, calcium, and sodium), the source of ultramarine, has since the Arabian period been designated;[1] it is now brought chiefly from SW. Siberia, through Persia and Turkestan. To the Greeks it was known as σάπφειρος, to the Hebrews as סַפִּיר, sappir (see SAPPHIRE), to the Assyrians and Babylonians (most probably) as the uknû-stone, to the Egyptians as the ḫspd. It was prized alike for personal ornaments and for architectural decoration. A large number of Egyptian objects of luxury made from it have been preserved; various Assyrian seal-cylinders, inscribed tablets, and the like, in lapis lazuli, are also known (1450 B.C. onwards). Burnaburiaš of Babylonia sends to Napḫuria of Egypt (i.e., Amenḥotep IV.) two minas of uknū-stone and a necklace of 1048 gems and uknū-stones. There is frequent mention of uknū in the 'Statistical' Table of Thotmes III. (RP 2 19 ff.), and Rameses III. is so rich in uknū that he can offer pyramids of it in his temple at Medinet Habū. It was one of the seven stones placed as amulets and ornaments on the breast of the Babylonian kings, and was used to overlay the highest parts of buildings. It is sometimes called uknē-šadē (uknū of the mountains), and Esarhaddon specially mentions the mountains of Media and the neighbouring regions as sources of the uknū. The inscriptions at ed-Deir el-Baḥrī speak of it as brought from the land of Punt.

LASEA (Acts 27 8, πολιc λαcαια [λαcεα WH, after B]: πολιc αλαccα [A], λαccαια [ℵ*], λαιccα [ℵc], λαcια [minusc. ap. Ti.]; Vg. THALASSA [tol THALASSIA; codd. ap. Lachm. THASLASSA, or THASSALA]). From Acts we learn that it was 'near' (ἐγγύς) Fair Havens, and the configuration of the coast thereabouts restricts us to the N. or the E. There was probably frequent communication between the town and Paul's ship, which lay for 'much time' at FAIR HAVENS (q.v.). The ruins of Lasea were discovered, apparently, by Captain Spratt, in 1853. They were first examined and described by the Rev. G. Brown in 1856. The site lies about a mile NE. of Cape Leon(d)a (= Λέοντα), a promontory resembling a lion couchant, 4 or 5 m. E. of Fair Havens. According to Mr. Brown, the peasants still call the place Lasea. This position agrees with that given to a place called Lisia, which in the Peutinger Tables is stated to be 16 m. from Gortyna (see Hoeck, Kreta 1 441, but cp Winer(8), § 5, n. 55). The true name, according to Bursian (Geogr. 2 567), is Alassa, and the place is identical with the Ἀλαί of the Stadiasmus Med. 322, and the Alos or Lasos of Pliny (HN 4 12); but Bursian is in error in identifying the remains near Cape Leonda as those of Leben, one of the ports of Gortyna (Strabo 478), and in putting Lasea on the islet now called Traphos which lies close to the coast a little to the NE. of Fair Havens.

LASHA (לָשַׁע, pausal form; λαcα [EL]; Δαcα [A]), or rather Lesha, a frontier city of Canaan (i.e., on the W. side of the Jordan), Gen. 10 19†. Jerome (Quæst. in lib. Gen.) and the Targum identify it with Callirrhoe, a place famous for its hot springs, near the Wâdy Zerḳā Ma'īn, on the E. side of the Dead Sea (see Seetzen's account in Ritter, Erdkunde, 15 575 ff.). The situation of Callirrhoe, however, is unsuitable. Halévy proposes to read לָשׁוֹן, lāšōn, which is used in Josh. 15 2 of the southern end of the Dead Sea (Recherches bibliques, 8 164); but the article would in this case be indispensable. Seybold (ZATW, 1896, p. 318 ff.) actually identifies Lesha with Zoar (also called Bela), which, as the southern point of the Pentapolis, seems to him to be naturally expected in such a context. Wellhausen (CH 15) maintains that we should read לֶשֶׁם, Lesham · the letters ע and ם have a close resemblance in their Palmyrene form. In this case, the 'border of the Canaanites' is given thus—from Sidon to Gaza, from Gaza to the Dead Sea, and from the Dead Sea to Lesham—i.e., Dan (cp LESHEM). Most probably, however, the original text referred to the Kenites or Kennizzites (not to the Canaanites), and the 'border' was drawn from Miṣṣur (not 'Zidon') to Gerar and Gaza (?), and in the direction of Sodom and Gomorrah as far as Eshcol (?)—i.e., perhaps Ḥalūṣah. LASHARON, RV Lassharon (לַשָּׁרוֹן; τηc αρωκ (?) [B], om. A, λεcαρων [L]), a royal city of Canaan, mentioned with Aphek, Josh. 12 18 (EV). מֶלֶךְ, 'king (of),' before לַשָּׁרוֹן is, however, probably an interpolation; it is not represented in 𝔊. Thus the true sense will be, 'the king of Aphek in the (plain of) Sharon' (see APHEK). Those who retain the MT suggest that Lasharon may be the modern Sārōnā [SW. of Tiberias. Kautzsch, HS, renders MT 'the king of Sharon.' Observe, however (1) that מֶלֶךְ לַשָּׁרוֹן should mean grammatically 'one of the kings of Sharon' (see Ges.-Kau. § 129 c), and (2) that Sārōnā, as a place-name, is probably a late echo of the older name of a district (see SHARON, 2). 𝔊 in Josh. 12 9-24, gives twenty-nine kings, MT thirty-one. It is more likely that the original writer made thirty.] W. R. S.

LASTHENES (λαcθεν[ε]ι dat. [ANV], -ηc [Jos.]), the minister of Demetrius II. Nicator (see DEMETRIUS, 2), who was ordered to lighten the fiscal burdens of the Jews. A copy of the order was also forwarded to Jonathan the Maccabee (see MACCABEES i., § 5), and appears in 1 Macc. 11 30 ff. in a form closely akin to that in Josephus Ant. xiii. 4 9 [§§ 126-130]).[1] From Josephus (Ant. xiii. 4 3) it would seem that Lasthenes was a Cretan who had raised a number of mercenaries (cp CRETE, col. 955) with which Demetrius had been able to commence his conquest of Syria. The honorific titles bestowed upon him in 1 Macc. 11 31 f. (συγγενής, πατήρ; see COUSIN, FATHER) testify to his high position, which (compare 10 69 74*a*) may have been that of governor of Cœlesyria, or grand vizier of the kingdom (cp Camb. Bib. ad loc.). Later, when quietness had been gained, the whole of the army of Demetrius was disbanded (probably at the instigation of Lasthenes) with the exception of the 'foreign forces from the isles of the gentiles' (11 38),[2] a circumstance which gave rise to widespread dissatisfaction; see, further, ANTIOCHUS 4; TRYPHON.

[1] The most noteworthy differences are (a) v. 37, ἐν ὄρει τῷ ἁγίῳ as compared with the preferable τοῦ ἁγίου ἱεροῦ [Jos. § 128]—ὄρει apparently a corruption of ἱερῷ, and (b) v. 38, αἱ δυνάμεις αἱ ἀπὸ τῶν πατέρων as against στρατιωτῶν [Jos. § 130]—the reading of Macc. being apparently a doublet with אבותיו read for צב[א]ותיו (as in 10 72 [see MACCABEES, FIRST, § 3 end]).

LATTICE. Although the manufacture and use of glass (more particularly for ornamental purposes) was known to the civilisations of the East from the earliest times (see GLASS, § 1), we are without evidence of the employment of glass-panes in the construction of windows. Indeed, no openings such as windows were at any time common—a fact which finds sufficient explanation in climatic considerations. In Assyria and Babylonia, to avoid openings of any kind in the outer walls, the ancient architects used doorways reaching to ten or more feet in height, which were intended to light and ventilate the rooms as well as to facilitate the movements of their inhabitants (Place, Ninive, 1 313, see Per.-Chip., Art in Chald. 1 186 ff.). In Egypt, again, the openings were small but admitted of being 'closed with folding valves, secured . . . with a bolt or bar, and ornamented with carved panels or coloured devices' (Wilk. Anc. Eg. 1 363, cp illustr. p. 362, fig. 132). Of the construction of the house among the ancient Hebrews we know but little (see HOUSE); the etymology, however, of some of the terms employed for certain parts[1] suggests constructions of lattice work, such as have happily not yet disappeared.[2] At the present day the windows looking out towards the street are small, closely barred, and at a considerable height from the ground. In the olden times these windows seem to have looked over the street, and in the case of houses built upon the city-wall offered an easy escape into the surrounding country (cp Josh. 2 15 2 Macc. 3 19). Cp HOUSE, § 2.

1. Use and form.

The OT words correctly rendered in EV 'lattice' or 'window' are four, to which מֶחֱזָה, meḥĕzāh (EV 'light'—i.e., light-opening, window) in 1 K. 7 4 f. may be added. Of three other words (nos. 5-7) AV mistakes the meaning.

2. Hebrew names.

(1) אֲרֻבָּה, 'ărubbāh (cp Ar. 'araba, 'to tie [a knot]'), EV 'window,' used of the latticed openings of a dove-cote (Is. 60 8 ν[ε]οσ[σ]ος [BℵA, etc.]), of the sluices of the sky (Gen. 7 11, etc. καταρρακτης [in Is. 24 18 θυρίς]), and metaphorically of the eyes (Eccl. 12 3 ὀπη). On Hos. 13 3 (καπνοδοχη [AQ*]; δακρυων [B] comes from ακριδων [Compl.]—i.e., אַרְבֶּה; EV 'chimney'), see COAL, § 3.

(2) חַלּוֹן, ḥallōn, θυρίς, EV 'window,' Gen. 26 8 Josh. 2 15 Judg. 5 28 Jer. 22 14 (where read חלוניו with Mich., Hi., etc.), not necessarily a mere opening (חלל, to bore, perforate), since 2 K. 13 17 shows that it could be opened and shut, but probably an opening provided with a movable covering of lattice-work (cp אֶשְׁנָב,[3] 'lattice,' Judg. 5 28*b* Pr. 7 6 [where AV 'casement']). בית חלוני 1 K. 6 4 is very probably the bēt ḥillāni, 'place of openings' or fortified portico, an architectural expression used by Sargon (Khors. 161 f., cp KB 2 48) as a W. Palestinian term for bēt appāti (see FORTRESS, col. 1557, and references in Muss-Arn., Ass. HWB s. v. xilani). In 1 K. l.c., 'ב' ח seems to be identical with or possibly a portion of the אוּלָם in v. 3.

(3) חֲרַכִּים (pl.), ḥărakkim, Ct. 2 9, cp חֲרַכָּא in Tgg. for חלון.

(4) כַּוִּין (pl.), kawwīn, Dan. 6 10 [11], Aramaic.

To these AV adds

(5) שמשת (pl.), šᵉmāšōth, Is. 54 12; but see BATTLEMENT, FORTRESS, col. 1557 n. 1.

(6) שֶׁקֶף, šĕḳeph, 1 K. 7 5 (cp שְׁקֻפִים 6 4 7 5), a difficult word which seems rather to denote a cross-beam (RVmg. 'with beams'); and

(7) צֹהַר, ṣôhar, Gen. 6 16 (in P's description of the ark). AV may be nearly right though, in spite of the support given to the rendering 'opening for light' by Tg., Pesh., Vulg., etc., many scholars now render 'roof'—e.g., RVmg., Budde, and Ball; Ges.-Buhl and others who compare Ar. ẓahr, Ass. ṣêru (in Am.

Tab. ṣu'ru), 'back.' It is doubtful, however, whether this comparison is legitimate. (a) The meaning of the Heb. root זהר צהר, 'to shine,' is well-established. (b) Jensen more safely connects Ass. ṣēru with צַוָּאר, 'neck' (Kosmol. 28, n. 1); and (c) there is no support for a word like צֹהַר, 'roof,' in the Babylonian Deluge-story. 𝔊 has ἐπισυνάγων, which is not a rendering of צֹהַר (Schleusner, Ball, and others) but a corruption of καπνοδοχήν. Josephus (Ant. i. 3 2) mentions a roof (ὄροφος), but is silent about the window, which in fact seems to be usually passed over in the accounts of the ark contained in the various deluge-legends (see DELUGE, § 20, n. 5), though, to be sure, J incidentally refers to a 'window.'[1] For RV's rend. 'light,' i.e., a great light-opening, cp Symm., διαφανές. [On the whole it may be best to read אֲרֻבָּה (cp 𝔊, reading as above). Pasek in MT warns us to criticise the text. Cp PSBA 23 141. —T. LAVER.[2] Solomon's temple (see TEMPLE), besides its sea of bronze (see SEA, MOLTEN), had also ten bronze lavers (כִּיּוֹר; see POT, and cp COALS, § 3, FURNACE, § 1 [2]; λουτήρ 𝔊, but in Kings χυτρόκαυλος [AL-ογ]; Vg. labrum,[3] but four times luter, once lebes, and twice concha). The passage in 1 K. (7 27-39)[4] is evidently in great confusion; and but little help in the elucidation of the wholly inadequate details in MT's description can be obtained either from 𝔊 (7 13 ff.) or from Josephus (Ant. viii. 36). The figures in Stade (GVI 1 338 340 f.), Nowack (HA 2 43 f.), and Benzinger (HA 2 52 ff.; Kön. 49) may assist vague conjecture as to what may have been the appearance of structures which obviously none of the describers had ever seen.

1. In Kings.

Fresh light, however, has been thrown on the whole passage (1 Ki. 7 27-39) by Stade's new discussion in ZATW 21 (1901), pp. 145-192, mainly through discoveries of bronze chariots in Cyprus. The 'undersetters' (RV for כתפת) and the 'stays' (ידת) are now intelligible, and so too is the construction of the 'mouths' of the 'lavers.' Klostermann's excision of vv. 34-36 is found to be inadequate to the explanation of the present state of the text, which has arisen by the interweaving of two parallel accounts.

1. Of the lavers themselves all we are told is that they were of bronze, four cubits (six feet) in diameter, and that they had a cubic capacity of forty baths (90,000 cubic in., 52 cubic ft.). Thus they must have been about 2 ft. in depth and when filled with water their contents alone (325 gallons) must have weighed about 1½ tons.[5]

2. Each laver with its foot rested on a 'base.' Of these 'bases' (מְכֹנוֹת, mĕkōnōth; μεχωνωθ; bases) also we have no satisfactory description. Each of them was four (𝔊, Jos., five) cubits long, four (Jos., five) cubits broad, and three (𝔊, Jos., six) cubits high. Each consisted of מסגרות (misgĕrōth; συγκλειστόν, συγκλείσματα) and שלבים (šĕlabbīm; ἐξεχόμενα); but how these words should be rendered is quite uncertain.[6] Benzinger argues with some plausibility that the šĕlabbīm were the primary elements in the quadrilateral structure, and the misgĕrōth only secondary. The misgĕrōth were decorated with lions, oxen, and cherubim.

3. Each base rested on solid brazen wheels 1½ cubits in diameter; the axles of these wheels moved in yādōth—'hands' or 'stays'—which projected from the lower part of the base and were of the same piece with it.

4. The ten lavers as described in Kings were ranged five on the right side and five on the left side of the house facing eastward. According to 2 K. 16 17 king Ahaz (see Benzinger) cut up the mĕkōnōth and removed the misgĕrōth. Presumably if the lavers themselves remained they stood at a lower elevation than formerly. Perhaps, however, the bases were renewed, since they are said to have been broken in pieces by the army of Nebuchadrezzar (2 K. 25 13 16 = Jer. 52 17 20;[1] cp Jer. 27 19). What their function was is not stated in MT. Josephus, who must at least have known the arrangements of the temple of his own day, says that the lavers were 'for cleansing the entrails of the animals sacrificed, and also their feet (?).'

On the probable mythological significance of the lavers, see SEA [MOLTEN].

2. In P.

The laver (Jos. Ant. iii. 6 3 περιρραντηριον) of Ex. 30 18 28 35 16 38 8 39 39 40 7 11, Lev. 8 11 (all P) stood on its 'foot' (כֵּן, 𝔊 βάσις, Jos. κρηπίς; basis) between the door of the tabernacle and the altar. The laver belongs wholly to one of the later strata of P. (See Dr. Introd.(6), 38; Addis, Doc. Hex. 2 276, etc., and the Oxf. Hex.) Its dimensions or shape are nowhere stated; it is said (Ex. 38 8) to have been made out of the mirrors of the women (a very late Haggadic addition, thinks Wellhausen), and its use was for Aaron and his sons to wash their hands and feet therein when they entered the tabernacle.

When we compare the account of the tabernacle in P with the (very late) description of Solomon's temple in 1 K. it seems curious that the laver and its bases should be left undescribed in P; the case is reversed with the golden candlestick: perhaps we may conclude that the laver and the candlestick were one. Moreover, it may be worth noting that the use of only one laver in P when contrasted with the ten in 1 K. finds an analogy in the CANDLESTICK [q.v., § 1]. See further SCAFFOLD.

1. Law and custom.

Law is, originally, custom. As has been already shown under GOVERNMENT (esp. § 9), the old tribal system knew no legislative authority, no persons holding superior power whose will and command were looked upon as law or as constituting right. This does not, however, imply a condition of arbitrary lawlessness; on the contrary, tribal custom formed a law and a right of the most binding character. Its authority was much more powerful than that established by any mere popular custom in modern society. To break loose from tribal custom was, practically, to renounce the family and tribal connection altogether; any gross infraction of that custom was necessarily followed by expulsion from the tribe and deprivation of all legal right and protection. Further, it is to be remembered that in virtue of the intimate relation between the tribe and its god, every tribal custom is at the same time a religious custom—i.e., compliance with it is looked upon as a duty to the divinity by whom the custom is upheld. This was felt perhaps more keenly in Israel, than amongst other peoples; law and righteousness were the special concern of Yahwè; in his name justice was dispensed and to him were all legal ordinances referred. To a certain extent also Yahwè was the creator of the law. Through his servants the priests, he gave his 'decisions' (תּוֹרֹת, tōrōth), which were to a large degree instructions on points of right. Such a divine utterance naturally becomes a law, in accordance with which other cases of the same kind are afterwards decided. When viewed in this light the fact—to our modern ideas so surprising—that all violations of religious observance are looked upon as crimes against the law and as ranking in the same category with civil offences, becomes intelligible. The worship of the tribal god forms a part, by no means the least important part, of the tribal custom; no distinction between worship and other integral parts of tribal custom is perceived.

In this connection we must bear in mind that even before the monarchy Israel had attained a certain degree of unity in matters of law; not in the sense that it possessed a written law common to all the tribes, or a uniform organisation for the pronouncing of legal judgments, but in the sense that along with a common god it had a community of custom and of feeling in matters of law. This community of feeling can be traced back very far; 'it is not so done in Israel,' and 'folly in Israel, which ought not to be done,' are proverbial expressions reaching back to quite early times (Gen. 34 7 Josh. 7 15 Judg. 19 23 20 10 2 S. 13 12).

The settlement in Western Palestine, so important in all respects, was peculiarly important in its effect on the development of law. From the nature of the case the law had to be greatly extended. The new circumstances raised new legal problems.

2. Change from nomad to settled life.

For one thing, the conception of private property has for peasants settled on the land a significance quite different from that which it possesses for nomads. Property with the Bedouin is uncertain; it may be gained and lost in a night; for peasants a certain security of ownership is indispensable. Again, with the settlement on the land a certain differentiation of ranks and classes became inevitable.

To the Bedouin social distinctions in our sense of the word are unknown; within the tribe all are 'brothers'; no one is master and no one is servant. Life in village and town soon brings with it great distinctions. 'Rich' and 'poor' become 'high' and 'low,' and the protection of the poor and of the alien becomes a pressing task for the new system of law.

To these considerations it has to be added that, by the settlement, the bonds of clanship came to be gradually loosened, and their place taken, so far, by local unions (see GOVERNMENT, § 15); upon this there naturally followed a weakening of the power which tribal custom had exercised through the family. The individual was not so dependent on the community; he could with greater ease break loose from the restraints of custom. A certain relaxation of discipline began to make itself felt. The later view, therefore, which characterised the period of the judges as one of lawlessness (Judg. 17 6 etc.) is partly correct. Custom had lost its old power and required the support of some external authority.

The first step towards meeting this requirement was when, by the settlement, the heads of clans and communities (see GOVERNMENT, § 16), gradually acquired the character of a superior authority which could be regarded as having been appointed by Yahwè and could thus come forward with a claim to legal powers. Their judicial utterances had no longer merely a moral authority; they had behind them the weight of the whole community, which was interested in giving them effect. The development of a kind of public law was thus possible. In one instance at all events this is plainly seen—viz., in the case of the penalty for manslaughter. Under the tribal system vengeance upon the manslayer is purely the affair of the avenger of blood—i.e., the family: the support of the tribe at large is involved only in cases where the slayer belongs to another tribe. In settled communities, however, the supreme authority must, from a very early date, have begun to recognise it as falling within its domain on the one hand to guarantee security of life, and, on the other, gradually to displace the perilous custom of blood revenge by itself taking in hand the punishment of the slayer.

3. Fixed tribunals.

This advance towards the formation of an outside authority was at first by no means an adequate substitute for the unqualified power of custom which it sought to displace, and this insufficiency showed the need of fuller political organisation. There must be an organisation that would render possible or guarantee the development and consistent administration of a uniform system of law.

The monarchy provided a system of uniform common law by furnishing a regular tribunal and by supporting with its authority the ancient customs and legal practices. The king and his officials were no legislators; in fact for a considerable time after the establishment of the monarchy there was no real law at all in the modern sense. The judicial decisions of the king and his officials were determined simply by the ancient customary practice, and some time, it would seem, passed before even this law was codified, although doubtless it may have been common from an early date for single legal decrees to be publicly posted up, for example, at the sanctuaries. The first attempt at a comprehensive collection of legal precepts and a book of laws is probably to be found in what is known as the Book of the Covenant, dating probably from the ninth century (Ex. 20 24-23 19; cp HEXATEUCH, § 14, LAW LITERATURE, §§ 6-9).

A single glance shows that the appearance of the Book of the Covenant was not the introduction of a new law; the book was a setting down in writing of long-current legal practices. It nowhere enunciates great legal principles, or attempts to exhibit an abstract system of law, with a view to its application to concrete cases; it is merely a collection of individual legal decisions. Its origin is clear. Either the frequent repetition of similar decisions had given rise to an established precedent, or a single decision had been given by a divine Tōrāh—in either case with the same result, that a fixed rule was established. Hence is explained the nature and scope of the contents of the collection. It deals exclusively with the circumstances and incidents of every-day life; such matters as the legal position of slaves, injuries to life or limb resulting from hostility or carelessness, damage to property, whether daughter or slave, cattle or crop. The ruling principle is still that of the jus talionis. Trade or commerce as yet there is none—at least no laws are required for its regulation. That ordinances for the divine worship and general ethical precepts for the humane treatment of widows and strangers should also be included and placed on the same level will be readily understood after what has been said above (§ 1). Still, a distinction is made between jus and fas at least in so far as the form of decree in the mišpāṭīm (ethical and legal) differs from that in the dĕbārīm (relating to religion and worship).

4. Book of the Covenant.

The object of this codification probably was to secure a greater degree of uniformity in adjudication and punishment. It is matter for surprise that we are nowhere informed by whom this collection was introduced as an official law-book or whether it was ever so introduced at all. If what we are told regarding Jehoshaphat's legal reforms (2 Ch. 17 9) comes from a good source, it would be natural to think of him in this connection (see Benzinger, Comm. on 2 Ch. 17 9 ff.). On the other hand, it is also equally possible that the Book of the Covenant was never an official law-book (like Dt.) at all, that it was simply a collection undertaken privately (perhaps in priestly circles). As containing only ancient law and no new enactments, such a collection would need no kind of official introduction but gradually come to be tacitly and universally accepted.

With the law of D the case is different; it was brought in as the law of the state by a solemn act in the 18th year of Josiah (621 B.C.), when king and people made a solemn 'covenant' pledging themselves to its faithful observance (see 2 K. 23 1 ff.). This accords well with the fact that Dt. claims to be more than a mere compilation of the ancient laws; it comes before us as a new system. Though in form and in contents alike it connects itself very closely with the Book of the Covenant, its literary dependence on it being unmistakable, it nevertheless, as a law-book, marks a great advance in comparison with the other, inasmuch as it embodies an attempt to systematise both the civil and the ecclesiastical law under a single point of view, that of the unique relationship of God to his people. The norm for determining what is right and what is wrong is no longer merely ancient law and custom: the supreme principle is now the demand for holiness. As a consequence, much of what has long been established law must disappear; in the sphere of worship, indeed, the law-book has expressly in view nothing less than a thorough-going reform. In spirit the legislation is characterised by its humanity; humanitarian ordinances of all sorts, provisions for the poor and for servants, for widows and orphans, for levites and strangers, have a large place.

The priestly law in like manner, after the exile, was introduced much as D had been (Neh. 8-10). This law aims only at the regulation of worship; law and ethics in the broader sense are purposely left alone; the constitution now given to the community everywhere presupposes a state organisation and civil rights. It is only exceptionally that matters belonging to the domain of law properly so called are dealt with, and even in these instances that is done only in so far as the questions are connected with the hierocratic system of P. Within P, the law of holiness (H) forms a separate collection (Lev. 17-26 and some other isolated precepts; cp HEXATEUCH, §§ 16 ff., LAW LITERATURE, § 15, LEVITICUS, §§ 13-23), though it does not seem ever to have received separate recognition, but only to have come into currency in conjunction with the Priestly Law as a whole. As distinguished from P, H includes ethical and legal enactments (especially Lev. 19), which are made from the point of view of the holiness of the people, as in Dt. (the mild humanity of which it also shares).

6. The Priestly Law.

The tōrāh, however, the written and official law, related only to a small part of civil life. Alongside of it was still left ample room for the play of ancient consuetudinary law. It is much to be regretted that in the literature which has come down to us we have no codification of this consuetudinary law in the form into which it had developed at the time of the introduction of the Priestly Law, and in which it is presupposed by that law. For long afterwards it continued to be handed down only by oral tradition, and even amongst the scribes of a later epoch there was still strong reluctance to commit the Hălāchāh to writing.

7. Oral Law.

The further development of law was the main business of the scribes. The tōrāh continued to be the immovable foundation; the task that remained was, either by casuistical interpretation of the written law or by determination of the consuetudinary law, to fill up the blanks of the tōrāh and bring into existence new precepts. The law thus arrived at—which in authority soon came to rank alongside of the written tōrāh—was comprehensively termed hălāchāh (consuetudinary law). As it gained in authority the scribes, though not formally recognised as lawgivers, gradually came to be such in point of fact. The results of their legislative activity are embodied in the Mishna. This rests, however, on an older work of the period of R. 'Akiba b. Joseph (circa 110-135 A.D.), under whose influence it probably was that the hălāchāh hitherto only orally handed down first came to be codified. From what has been said it will be evident that the Mishna may very well contain many fragments of ancient legal custom, but that it would be hopeless to attempt with its help to reconstruct the old consuetudinary Hebrew law as this existed (say) in the Persian or in the Grecian period.[1] (Cp LAW LITERATURE, § 22 f.)

All jurisdiction was originally vested in the family. The father of a family had unlimited powers of punishment (Gen. 38 24, cp Dt. 21 18 ff.). With the coalescence of families into clans and tribes (see GOVERNMENT, § 4) a portion of the family jurisdiction necessarily also passed over to the larger group, and was thenceforth exercised by the heads of the clan or tribe. The old tradition in Israel was that the elders acted also as judges. All three variants of the story of the appointment of 'elders' as judges (Ex. 18 13 ff. Nu. 11 16 ff. Dt. 1 13 f.) have this feature in common that they place the elders alongside of Moses as his helpers in the government of the people—i.e., in pronouncing judgments (in the gloss Dt. 1 15 the word is quite correctly given as 'heads of tribes'). The lighter cases come up before the elders, whilst Moses reserves the graver ones for himself. This judicial activity of the heads of tribes and clans we must, of course, regard, not as an innovation, but as an ancient usage. The tradition, however, is once more in accordance with the facts of the case when, as alongside of and overruling every human decision, the deity is regarded as the supreme king-judge. The weightiest matters, those namely with which human wisdom is unable to cope, come before God; for Moses dispenses law as the servant and the mouth of God—as a priest—upon the basis of divine decisions (see above, § 1). The people come to him to inquire of God and he is their representative before God, to whose judgment he submits the case (Ex. 18 15 19). The same conditions continued through the later period; alongside of the jurisdiction of the tribal heads and of the judiciary officers that of God as exercised through the priests was still maintained.

The entire position otherwise accorded to the elders shows that their judicial activity was not the consequence merely of an office with which they had been invested. Their authority as a whole, and in particular their judicial influence, was purely moral. In the main therefore we find the same conditions as are even now found to prevail among the Bedouins, and so far as the present subject is concerned we may safely venture to avail ourselves of what we know of these last to supplement the deficiencies of our information regarding ancient Israel.

Amongst the Bedouins, also, then, it is within the competency of the sheikh to settle differences; but his judgment has no compelling power: he cannot enforce it against the will of the parties and cannot order the slightest punishment upon any members of the tribe. The family alone can bring pressure to bear on the members. Further, many tribes have, in addition, a ḳāḍī, as a sort of judge of higher instance for graver cases; for this office men distinguished by their keenness of judgment, love of justice, and experience in the affairs and customs of the tribe, are chosen. As a rule the office of ḳāḍī continues within the same family; but even his judgment is not compulsory. There is no executive authority provided for carrying it out. If in the last resort a problem proves so involved that not even the ḳāḍī is able to solve it, nothing remains but to resort to the judgment of God (cp Burckhardt, Bem. 93 ff.)

As already remarked (§ 2), after the settlement these elders in their character as heads of the local communities (ziḳnē hā'īr, זקני העיר) gradually acquired the powers of a governing body (cp GOVERNMENT, § 16). So far as their jurisdiction was concerned, this meant that as judges they acquired a certain executive power for carrying out their judgments. How soon this development took place, and with what modifications in detail, we do not know. Stories like those of the wise woman of Tekoa (2 S. 14 4 ff.) and of the trial of Naboth (1 K. 21 8 ff.) prove the fact, at least for the period of the earlier monarchy. Dt. knows of the 'elders' as an organised judicial institution. From the manner in which the function of judging is assigned to them in certain cases, it is clearly evident that the elders also had executive powers (cp esp. Dt. 19 12 21 2 ff. 22 15 ff.). In this executive capacity they act as representing the entire body of the citizens; this finds expression, in the case of death-penalty, in the fact that it is for the entire community to carry out the sentence (Dt. 17 7). A solitary exception is made in the punishment of murder; even long after the unrestricted right of private revenge had been abolished, and trial of crimes against life had been brought within the competency of the regular courts, there survived a relic of the ancient deeply-rooted custom which gave the avenger of blood the right of personally carrying out the death sentence on the murderer (Dt. 19 12).

(a) Elders.—By inference from these facts we may safely conclude that the judges presupposed by the Book of the Covenant were in the first instance the elders of the different localities—all the more so as the judicial competency of these elders must in the earlier times have been still more extensive than when the Book of the Covenant was written. Singularly enough, the Book gives no sort of indication of the composition of the tribunal, the forms of process, and so forth—in this case also merely taking for granted the continuance of long-established custom.

9. Judges.

It may be permissible to hazard the conjecture that in connection with that dependent relation in which sometimes the rural districts stood to the larger or metropolitan cities, the jurisdiction of the city would extend also over its 'daughters' (EV 'suburbs'; cp Nu. 21 25 32 42 Josh. 13 23 28 17 11 Judg. 11 26).

As the passages cited above (§ 8) show, the jurisdiction of the elders continued to subsist under the monarchy.

(β) The King.—Alongside of the jurisdiction of the elders, however, and to some extent limiting it, there arose the jurisdiction of the king. The king was judge par excellence (cp GOVERNMENT, § 19). He constituted a kind of supreme tribunal to which appeal could be made where the judgment of the elders seemed faulty (2 S. 14 4 ff.). Moreover, it was also open to the litigant to resort to the king as first and only judge (2 S. 15 2 ff., 2 K. 15 5), especially in difficult cases (1 K. 3 16 ff. Dt. 17 9, see below [γ]). Of this privilege of the king some portion passed over to his officers also, who administered the law in his name. Unfortunately we have nothing to show how the jurisdiction of these officers stood related to that of the elders in its details, and whether (or how far) its range was limited. The same has to be said of the judicial activity of the priests. That they continued to possess judicial attributes is implied both by the Book of the Covenant and by Deuteronomy. Still, on this point an important difference between the two books is unmistakable. In the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 22 8 [7]), as in the ancient consuetudinary law, what is contemplated in cases of special perplexity is a divine decision, a torah of God to be obtained at the sanctuary; God was the judge.

(γ) The Priests.—In Dt. on the other hand (17 9 f. 19 15 ff.) 'the priests, the levites,' as judicial officers constitute a sort of spiritual college of justice: the cause is not decided by means of an oracle or divine judgment; the priests carefully investigate the case just like other judges. The studious care with which the sanctity of their judicial decisions is emphasised (17 10 ff.) warrants the conjecture that the change is to be attributed to D, especially as, throughout, we are left with the impression that D has it in view to enlarge the jurisdiction of the priests as widely as possible, at the expense of that of the elders. The elders retain within their competency only a limited class of offences.

The offences in question are merely such matters as affect in the first instance only the family—a son's disobedience (21 18 ff.), slander spoken against a wife (22 13 ff.), declinature of a levirate marriage (25 7 ff.), manslaughter, and blood-revenge (19 11 ff., 21 1 ff.). Into the last-cited passage (21 5) a later hand has introduced the priests as also taking part in the proceedings: 'for them Yahwè thy God has chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of Yahwè; and according to their word shall every controversy and every stroke be'—an interpolation which clearly shows in what direction lay the tendency of this legislation and its subsequent development. That this studious effort on the one side was viewed on the other with little favour is shown by the fact that in the central ordinance relating to the judicial function of priests (17 8 ff.) 'the judge' is by an interpolation placed on a level with the priests. The simplest explanation is that it is the king who is intended here and that the object was to save his supreme judicial authority as against the pretensions of the Jerusalem priesthood (cp the quite analogous interpolation of the judges in 19 17 f.).

The Chronicler carries back to Jehoshaphat the establishment of a supreme court of justice in Jerusalem and the appointment of professional judges in all the cities (2 Ch. 19 4-11).

Though not absolutely incredible, the statement is rendered (to say the least) somewhat improbable by the fact that in this supreme court the high priest is represented as having the presidency in all spiritual, and the 'prince of the house of Judah' in all secular, causes (see Benzinger, Comm. on 2 Ch. 19 4 ff.). Apart from this, however, Dt. certainly seems to know of the existence of the professional judges in the various cities (16 18 ff.).

Ezekiel and P continue to advance logically along the line laid down in D. In Ezekiel's ideal future state, in which the king is but a shadowy figure almost entirely divested of royal functions, judicial attributes are wholly assigned to the priests (Ezek. 44 24). That P also assigns the administration of the law, not to the secular authority but to the priests, is clear from the representation of Chronicles according to which even David had appointed 6000 lèvites as judges (1 Ch. 23 4, 26 29). This theory, however, was never fully carried out.

In Ezra's time we meet, in the provincial towns, with professional judges who are drawn not from the priesthood but from the ranks of the city elders (Ezra 7 25, 10 14). There were similar local courts throughout the country during the Greek and Roman periods (Judith 6 16 etc.; Jos. BJ ii. 24 1; Shĕbī'ith 10 4, Sōṭā 1 3, Sanh. 11 4; in Mt. 5 22 10 17 Mk. 13 9, it is to these local synedria that reference is made). In localities of minor importance it was certainly by the council of the elders (cp Lk. 7 3), the βουλή, that judicial functions were exercised (cp Jos., l.c.); in the large towns no doubt there may also have been, over and above, special courts. In later times the rule was that the smallest local tribunal had seven members (cp GOVERNMENT, § 31; also Schürer, GVI 2 133 f.). In large centres there were courts with as many as twenty-three members; but in these, in certain cases (such as actions for debt, theft, bodily injury, etc.) three judges formed a quorum (Sanh. 1 1, 2, 3, 2 1). In certain cases priests had to be called in as judges (Sanh. 1 3). On the great Sanhedrin and its jurisdiction see GOVERNMENT, § 31.

10. Judicial procedure.

Judicial procedure was at all times exceedingly simple. In an open place (Judg. 4 5 1 S. 22 6), or under the shadow of the city gate, the judges took their seat (Dt. 21 19 22 15 25 7 Am. 5 12 15 Ru. 4 1, etc.). In Jerusalem Solomon erected a 'porch,' or hall, of judgment, for his own royal court of justice (אוּלָם הַכִּסֵּא, 1 K. 7 7). Plaintiff and defendant appeared personally, each for his own case (Dt. 17 5 21 20 25 1); on a charge being made the judge could call for the appearance of the accused (Dt. 25 8). Such an institution as that of a public prosecutor was unknown; the state or the community in no case overstepped its judicial functions. In every case it was for the aggrieved or injured person to bring forward his complaint if he desired satisfaction. He also had it in his choice, however, to resort to the method of private arrangement, and refrain from coming before the court; in this event, the matter was at an end, for no one else had an interest in bringing it into court. When there is no complainant there is no judge. The 'daysman' is mentioned only in Job 9 33 (מוֹכִיחַ).

The proceedings were as a rule by word of mouth, though in later times written accusations also seem to have been known (Job 31 35 f.). The chief method of proof was by the testimony of witnesses. The father, indeed, who brought a stubborn and rebellious son before the judge needed no such support (Dt. 21 18 ff.); but in all other cases the law invariably demanded the concurrent testimony of at least two persons; on the word of only one witness a crime could in no circumstances be held as proven, still less any death-sentence pronounced (Dt. 17 6 19 15 Nu. 35 30 Mk. 14 56 ff. Mt. 26 60). According to Talmudic law (Shĕbū'ōth 30*a*; Bābā Ḳammā 88*a*; cp Jos. Ant. iv. 8 15) only free men of full age were capable of bearing witness; women and slaves were incapacitated—a rule, doubtless, in accordance with ancient custom, although the OT is silent on the subject. Whether the adjuration of witnesses which is alluded to in general terms in P (Lev. 5 1) was an ancient practice, we cannot say. A false witness was punished, according to the jus talionis, by the infliction of the precise kind of evil he had intended to bring upon his victim by his falsehood (Dt. 19 18 ff.). The warnings so frequently repeated (as in Ex. 23 1 20 16), such stories as that of Naboth (1 K. 21), and the remonstrances of the prophets, show that the evil of false testimony was by no means rare.

Where, from the nature of the case, witnesses were not to be had, the accused was put upon his oath (Ex. 22 6-11 [7-12]). In specially obscure cases God was looked to for the discovery of the guilty party (Ex. 22 8 [7] 1 S. 14 40 f. Josh. 7 14). The only trace remaining in the later law of a divine ordeal (see JEALOUSY, TRIAL OF) is in the case of a wife accused of adultery (Nu. 5 11 ff.). Torture, as a means of obtaining confessions, was not employed; the Herodian dynasty—by whom it was employed freely—seem to have been the first to bring it into use (Jos. BJ i. 30 2-5).

Judgment, in the earlier times pronounced orally, but later occasionally given in writing (Job 13 26), was as a rule carried out forthwith in presence of the judge (Dt. 22 18 25 2); in case of a capital sentence the witnesses were required to be the first to set about its execution, and the whole community was expected to take an active part (Dt. 17 7).

Though in the paragraphs that follow, the various laws are arranged according to their substance, it must from the outset be clearly borne in mind that the ancient law of the Hebrews does not admit of close correlation with the Roman or with the modern systems based on the Roman, and in particular that the sharp distinction between penal and private law by which these last were characterised does not admit of being transferred to the former. One of the most striking illustrations of this is to be found in the manner in which theft is regarded by Hebrew law.

11. Penal law and Jus talionis.

In Hebrew law the dominant principle is the jus talionis—'an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth' (Ex. 21 24). To understand this properly, it has to be borne in mind that, in the earliest stage of development which has been described above, a principle of this kind had its applicability not as a norm for penalties to be judicially inflicted, but only as regulative of private vengeance. It is for the individual himself to pursue his rights; by universal custom he is entitled to do to the aggressor exactly what the aggressor has done to him. In particular, in the most serious case of all, that of murder, the blood-relation not only has the right, but is under the sacred duty, to avenge the deed. In savage stages of society the demand for vengeance is held to be the most righteous and sacred of all feelings; the man who does not exact vengeance is devoid of honour.

An unqualified jus talionis makes endless every affair where it has once been introduced. This appears most clearly in blood-revenge. Naturally, therefore, in the early stage of legal development now under consideration, when the affair is held to concern private individuals only, the injured party has also the right to come to some other arrangement with the aggressor and accept compensation in the shape of money or its equivalent (cp the law of the Twelve Tables: si membrum ruit, ni cum eo paicit talio esto). It was a great forward step which the Israelites made—doubtless before they took possession of western Palestine—when compensation of this kind was allowed to take the place of revenge pure and simple. In doing so they took the most essential first step towards the substitution of public criminal law for private revenge. Compensation cannot for long withdraw itself from the control of general custom, and then there gradually comes into existence a certain definite scale in accordance with which such matters are adjusted (cp Ex. 21 22). At an early period Hebrew custom seems to have demanded such a mode of settlement for every kind of bodily injury (Ex. 21 18); but the earlier usage did not sanction the acceptance of blood-wit, except in the one case of accidental homicide (Ex. 21 30).

Penal law, in the strict sense of the expression, constitutes a third stage, its distinctive feature being that the duty of revenge is taken over from the individual by society at large. Revenge now becomes punishment, that which regulates it is the general interest of the community at large. Custom, and afterwards statute, determine the kind and measure of the penalty; the leaders of the society, the constituted authorities, take in hand the duty of seeing it carried out.

In the ancient Hebrew view of the matter, however, the object of punishment is not completely attained, even when the ideas of retribution and of compensation have found expression. Grave crimes, and specially murder, defile the land; the guilt lies upon the entire people (cp 2 S. 21 24). The blood of the slayer alone can appease the divine wrath and cleanse the land (Nu. 35 33; cp 2 S. 21). Evil has to be removed from the midst of the people by means of punishment (Dt. 19 19).

In close connection with the thought of the transmissibility of guilt, is the idea which makes children, in particular, specially liable for the crimes of their fathers. Even the regularly constituted courts of justice, in specially grave cases, punish capitally the children along with their fathers (2 K. 9 26 Josh. 7 24). In a special degree is blood-guiltiness hereditary; if the avenger of blood cannot lay hold on the murderer himself, he can lay hold on his family. The custom is the same among the Bedouins to this day. In legal practice it is not abolished till Dt. (24 16).

12. Methods of punishment.

In the law the only recognised form of capital punishment is by stoning. In such instances as we find in 2 S. 1 15 2 K. 10 7 25 Jer. 26 23, etc., we are not dealing with punishments awarded by a court of law. In the priestly law, and doubtless also by ancient custom, the death-penalty was enhanced in certain cases by the burning or 'hanging' (more correctly, impalement) of the body, by which the criminal was deprived of the privileges of burial (Lev. 20 14 21 9 Dt. 21 22; cp Josh. 7 25). Dt. here again has a mitigating tendency, enjoining, as it does, the burial of the body that has been 'hanged,' before sundown.

As to the manner in which stoning was carried out we have no details; it occurred without the city (Lev. 24 14 Nu. 15 36 1 K. 21 10 ff., etc.); it fell to the witnesses to cast the first stone (Dt. 17 7). According to Gen. 38 24, execution of the death-penalty by burning seems also to have been customary in Israel. Crucifixion—'crudelissimum teterrimumque supplicium' (Cic. Verr. 5 64)—was first introduced into Palestine by the Romans; see, further, CROSS, and cp, generally, HANGING.

The first express mention of beating with rods or scourging as a punishment occurs in Dt. (25 1-3); but unfortunately we are not told what were the cases in which the judge was permitted or required to award it, except in the single instance described in Dt. 22 13 ff. (unjust charge against a newly-married bride). The manner of carrying it out is also described, 'the judge shall cause [the culprit] to lie down, and to be beaten before his face' (Dt. 25 2); not more than forty stripes may be given. The later interpreters of the law limited the number to 'forty save one' (2 Cor. 11 24, Jos. Ant. iv. 8 21 23), doubtless so as to avoid a breach of the law by an accidental error in reckoning, but perhaps also because in the late period there was substituted for the rod a three-thonged scourge, with which thirteen strokes were given.

The money penalties known to the law are really of the nature of compensations, not strictly punishments (cp CONFISCATION). On the other hand, in 2 K. 12 16 [17], we read of trespass money and sin money which belonged to the priests; but for what offences these moneys were to be paid we do not know; probably they were fines for breaches of ritual.

Of penal restraints upon freedom neither ancient consuetudinary law nor written statute knows anything. On the other hand, however, we have in the historical books frequent mention of imprisonment, stocks and 'shackles,' or 'collars' (cp COLLAR, 3), as methods by which kings sought to discipline disobedient servants or dangerous persons like the prophets (Jer. 20 2 29 26 2 Ch. 16 10 18 25 f.); and imprisonment certainly appears in post-exilic times as a legal form of punishment to be awarded by the judge (Ezra 7 26). See PRISON.

From the modern point of view it is a striking fact that the Hebrew legislation regards no punishments as involving disgrace. In Dt. 25 3 the punishment by beating is expressly restrained within certain limits lest 'thy brother should seem vile unto thee.' The ancient Israelite, like the modern Oriental, differed entirely from us moderns in his conception of personal honour; murder and homicide, adultery and unchastity, falsehood and treachery are in his view matters which do not greatly affect a man's honour, even when they have been detected and punished.

13. Degrees of punishment.

In details the penal enactments which have been preserved are very meagre and defective. In cases of manslaughter, as we have seen, blood revenge was a sacred duty in the olden time. 'Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed' (Gen. 9 5 f.) was at all times regarded as a divine principle; the duty of blood revenge belongs to the nearest relation, the GOEL (q.v.). In principle the right to such revenge is everywhere recognised also by the law (Dt. 19 1-13 Nu. 35 16-21). Still, the transition to a more settled and orderly condition of society entailed the result (among others), that the superior authority, as soon as there began to be such an authority, took blood vengeance also into its own hand, and thus converted it into a death penalty (2 S. 14 4 ff.). It would appear, however, that in pre-exilic times it never succeeded in wholly suppressing private vengeance. The most important restriction of it lay in the distinction now made between murder and manslaughter. Even the Book of the Covenant distinguished the case in which a man 'came presumptuously upon his neighbour to slay him with guile,' and that in which he 'lay not in wait but God did deliver him (his adversary) into his hand' (Ex. 21 12 ff.). It also recognised within certain limits the rights of an owner in defending his property (Ex. 22 2 f. [1 f.]). Similarly, in Dt. (19 11-13), in a case of violent death a man's known hatred of his adversary is taken as evidence of murderous intention. P gives the distinctive features of murder with more precision and somewhat differently; murder is presumed not only where hatred and enmity, or lying in wait, can be proved, but also where a lethal weapon has been used with fatal effect. From the dangerous character of the weapon, murderous intention is inferred (Nu. 35 16 ff.). In the case of murder all forms of the law allow free course to blood-revenge, that is to say, the death-penalty is ordered, and that with the express injunction that a composition by payment of blood-wit is not to be permitted (Nu. 35 31). The manslayer, on the other hand, enjoys the right of asylum; see ASYLUM.

In ancient times the right of asylum prevailed at every sanctuary (Ex. 21 14). The abolition by D of the sanctuaries scattered over the country made necessary the setting apart of special cities of refuge, of which D names three for Judah, P three for E. Palestine and W. Palestine respectively (Nu. 35 11 ff. Dt. 4 41 ff.). In the earlier period the right of asylum belonging to the sanctuaries had doubtless been unlimited. Still, even the Book of the Covenant, and afterwards D, assume, what P expressly ordains (Ex. 21 14), that inquiry is to be made whether the case is one of murder or of manslaughter. If it is found to be murder, the city of refuge must relentlessly give up the murderer to the avenger (Ex. 21 14 Dt. 19 11 ff. Nu. 35 11 ff.). For manslaughter an amnesty at the death of the high priest was introduced in post-exilic times (Nu. 35 25). Formerly, according to P, there was no such relief; if ever the manslayer left the territory of the city of refuge, he was at the mercy of the avenger (Nu. 35 32 f.).

In the case of bodily injuries, also, the law permits the application of talio only where intention is to be presumed. In injuries inflicted in course of a quarrel, for example, the Book of the Covenant provides that the aggressor shall only defray the expenses incurred and compensate the injured person for his loss of time (Ex. 21 18 ff.). For another particular case of injury which may be met by a fine, see Ex. 21 22.

The enactments relating to certain gross offences against morality are characteristic (cp MARRIAGE, § 2). The penalty is death (Lev. 20 10 ff. Ex. 22 18 [20]) in each case, as also for the offence specified in Lev. 20 18. In cases of adultery the injured husband had at all times the right to slay the unfaithful spouse and take vengeance on her seducer. Dt. categorically demands on religious grounds the death of both. Only where violence can be presumed is the woman exempted (Dt. 22 25 f.).

On the other hand the seduction of an unbetrothed maid was regarded as a damage to property, affecting her family, and as such was dealt with on the principles of private law (Ex. 22 15 [16] Dt. 22 26 f.). That the father in such a case was at liberty to exercise very stringent legal rights is shown by Gen. 38. According to P (Lev. 21 9) only priests' daughters were liable to punishment—that of death—in these cases. (Cp MARRIAGE, §§ 4, 6).

That offences against religion came in the fullest sense under the cognisance of the law has been mentioned above (§ 1), also the reasons for that being so. Idolatry and witchcraft are already made punishable with death in the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 22 18 20 [17 19]). In this respect Dt. is exceptionally strict; even solicitation to the worship of strange gods is a capital offence (13 7-16). Finally, P places every deliberate transgression of any religious ordinance, such as breach of the sabbath, or the like, on a level with the crime of blasphemy, which carries with it the penalty of being 'cut off' from one's people (Lev. 24 15).

To private law belong personal rights and the laws affecting property, bonds and obligations, inheritance and marriage. Inheritance and marriage are dealt with elsewhere (see MARRIAGE, §§ 1, 7, and cp below, § 18). In harmony with the unanimous view of the ancient world, only the adult free male member of the community—capable therefore of bearing arms and of carrying out blood revenge—was regarded as invested with full legal rights.

14. Personal rights.

(a) Sons and daughters.—The son not yet grown up and the unmarried daughter are completely under the power of the father, as also are the married woman and the slave. Lists of fully qualified citizens appear to have been drawn up from a tolerably early date; the image of the 'book of life,' already employed by J (Ex. 32 32; cp Is. 4 3), would seem to be derived from this practice, though express evidence regarding it is not forthcoming till later (Jer. 22 30 Ezek. 13 9 Neh. 7 5 64 12 22 f.). The fact that at a later period the twentieth year was taken as the age of majority and fitness to bear arms (Nu. 1 3 Lev. 27 3 ff.), affords some ground for inferring that a similar rule held good for the earlier times also; but it must not be forgotten that under the patriarchal tribal constitution the independence even of grown-up sons is only relative. The original significance of circumcision as an act denoting the attainment of the privileges of full age is treated of elsewhere (see CIRCUMCISION, § 5). Women appear to have been universally and in every respect regarded as minors so far as rights of property went; at least, apart from female slaves, they hold no property that they can deal with as they please. They are incapable of bearing testimony before a court of justice (see above, § 10). See further FAMILY, MARRIAGE, SLAVERY.

(b) Strangers and foreigners.—In the case of aliens distinction must be made between the gēr (גֵּר) and the nokrī (נָכְרִי). (See STRANGER AND SOJOURNER.) The word nokrī denotes the alien who stands in no relationship of protection towards any Israelite tribe. A person in this category would as a rule make but a brief sojourn in the land; in cases when a longer residence was contemplated application would naturally be made for tribal protection. The nokrī in any case of course enjoyed the ordinary rights of hospitality, which means a great deal, great sanctity attaching to the rights of guests. Apart from this, however, he simply has no rights at all (cp Gen. 31 15 Job 19 15); the very laws in the humane legislation of D which contemplate the case of the poor and the depressed in the social scale—the law of remission in the seventh year, the law against usury, and the like—never once have any application to him (Dt. 15 3 23 20 [21]). It is quite otherwise, however, with the gēr—i.e., the alien to the people or to the tribe (for the older period what applies to the people applies to the tribe [1]) who has been received within the territory of one of the tribes or of the nation as a whole, has effected a settlement there, and acquired the status of a protected person. Such a gēr stood under the protection of the tribal god, and enjoyed, among the Hebrews, not indeed the full privileges of a citizen, yet, in comparison with what was obtainable among other peoples, a high degree of immunity and protection. In particular his position had this advantage, that it greatly prepared the way for complete incorporation with the tribe. In the older time he had the right of connubium; it was in this way that the Canaanites were gradually absorbed (see MARRIAGE, § 2).

[1] A non-Judahite Levite is within the tribe of Judah as much a gēr as is the Canaanite; cp Judg. 17 7.

The children of a marriage between a gēr and an Israelitess were regarded as entitled to full Israelite privileges (cp 1 Ch. 2 17); in the case of the children of an Israelite by a foreign wife this was, as might be expected, a matter of course (cp for example Boaz and Ruth). It was otherwise, indeed, when the case was not that of an alien settling as gēr in the country or marrying into it, but of a foreigner who still maintained the tie with his own people and who was followed by his wife to his home: Hiram the artificer was regarded as a Tyrian although his mother was a Naphtalite; she had followed her husband to his native land and thereby had come under the protection of the Tyrians (1 K. 7 13 f.). The converse case is that of Samson's marriage, which, however, has an exceptional character (see KINSHIP, § 8); here the Philistine woman remains in her own home and is only visited from time to time by her husband; in such circumstances the children of the union would not have been regarded as Israelites (Judg. 14 15 1 f.).

From what has been said as to the meaning of circumcision (see CIRCUMCISION, § 5) it seems doubtful whether uncircumcised gērīm also had the right of connubium. In general, the Book of the Covenant enjoined that the gēr was not to be treated with violence (Ex. 22 21 [20] 23 9), and, as we gather from the context, was above all to be secured, without any partiality, in his full rights as a protected stranger before the courts of law. On the other hand the gēr—apart from the Canaanites, who naturally formed an exception here—was manifestly excluded from the right of acquiring heritable property within the territory of the tribes of Israel (cp Mic. 2 5 Is. 22 16 Ezek. 47 22, where the permission to do so is brought in as an innovation).

D renews in a great variety of forms the injunction to treat the stranger (who is placed upon a level with the Levite, the widow, and the orphan) humanely and kindly (10 18 14 29 24 14 19 ff.), to admit him to participation in the general gladness at festal times (5 14 16 11 ff.), and not to pervert his right (24 17 27 19). Just because the stranger, as such, occupies an inferior position he has a double need for love (10 19 26 1-11). On the other hand his position in D is altered for the worse in this respect that the right of connubium is taken away (Dt. 7 1 ff. 23 3 [4] ff. Ex. 34 15 f.), and undeniably for D the gēr and still more the nokrī occupy a lower position in the scale of humanity (cp Dt. 14 21). In all this it is regarded as a matter of course that the gēr shall in a certain sense at least accommodate himself to the religion of his protectors (Ex. 23 12 20 10 Dt. 5 14 16 11 ff. 26 11 31 12). Still, even in this respect the older times demanded but little; he might even keep up his own sacra (cp 1 K. 11 7 f. 16 31); moreover, he need not observe the rule with regard to clean and unclean meats (Dt. 14 21).

P carries its demands upon the gēr much farther; he is required to shun idolatry, the eating of blood or that which is torn, and in general everything that as an 'abomination' could defile the Israelite (Lev. 17 8 10 ff. 15 18 26 20 2 Nu. 19 10-12; cp Dt. 14 21).

Not only is he obliged to observe the sabbath and permitted to share in the feast of the ingathering, he is also under obligation to fast with the Israelites on the day of atonement (Lev. 16 29), may not eat any leaven in the passover week (Ex. 12 19; the feast itself he is precluded from joining in, unless he be circumcised), must make atonement for all transgressions of the law exactly as Israelites do (Nu. 15 14 26 29), and in general keep holy the name of Yahwè (Lev. 24 16)—all this in the interests of Israel, that there be no sin among the people.

On the other hand the gēr enjoys the fullest protection in the eye of the law; not only are the protective injunctions of D renewed (Lev. 19 9 f. cp 23 22 25 6), but also equal rights before the judgment seat are expressly secured to him (Lev. 24 22 Nu. 35 15), an essential advance on the mere appeal to humanity contained in the older laws. The points in which his privileges still fall short of those of the full citizen are mainly two: he is excluded from the worship properly so-called—e.g., from the Passover (Ex. 12 47 f.), perhaps also from the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23 42)—and is denied the right of connubium (Ezra 9 1 f. 11 ff. 10 2 ff.).

Both privileges are obtainable only on condition that he receives circumcision, that is to say, becomes fully incorporated with the commonwealth of Israel (Ex. 12 47 f. Nu. 9 14 Gen. 34 14). Further, the acquisition of landed property is rendered impossible to him by the operation of the law of the year of jubilee (see below, § 15). Finally, no gēr can own an Israelite slave. Should it ever come about that an Israelite comes under the power of a gēr on account of debt, the latter is bound to treat him not as a slave, but as a free labourer, and the relations of the debtor retain at all times the right to redeem him (Lev. 25 47 ff.).

Thus the gēr is by no means treated as on a complete equality with the Israelite.

The laws concerning property, so far as they have come down to us, relate to the disposal of real and movable estate, borrowing and lending, bonds and obligations.

15. Buying and selling. Buying and selling in ancient Israel were transacted in very simple fashion, and the various questions arising out of error, fraud, or over-reaching seldom if ever arose. Israel was not at this period a commercial people.

Certain formalities in the more important transactions of buying and selling, especially in the transfer of land, became customary and obligatory from an early period. The simplest and most ancient of all, doubtless, was that which required that the purchase should take place in the presence of witnesses (cp Gen. 23 7-20). Transactions of this kind (as of every other kind) might be further ratified by oath and gift.

The first mention of a formal deed of sale occurs in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. 32 6 ff.); according to the simplest interpretation of the passage it was executed in duplicate, one copy being sealed and the other open, both copies being handed over for preservation to the custody of a third party (otherwise Stade in ZATW 5 176 [1885]). In the case of such a document witnesses and signatures would of course not be lacking. From Jer. 32 44 we can see that in the time of Jeremiah the execution of a written deed was usual where transfer of land was concerned.

Another ancient custom is met with in the Book of Ruth (4 7); the seller gave his shoe to the buyer in token of his divesting himself of his right of ownership over the object sold. In connection with this is to be interpreted the expression in Ps. 60 8 [10] (cp 108 9 [10]), where 'casting one's shoe' over a thing signifies the act of taking possession (see SHOES, § 4).

The same symbolical action came into use (Dt. 25 9) in cases where a levirate marriage was declined—a declinature practically equivalent to renunciation of right of inheritance. The original meaning of the ceremony is no longer clear to us; nor do we know whether it was regularly observed, or for how long a period; the writer of Ruth knows it only as an archæological fact.

A limit was set to the free disposal of property by the duties of piety which a person owed to his ancestors. To ancestral land the Israelite—like any other peasant proprietor — felt himself bound by the closest ties. The paternal property was sacred; there, often, the father was buried, and children and children's children were expected also to be laid there (1 K. 21 3). It is in this fact that we are to seek the explanation of the provisions regarding the right of redemption that acted as a check upon the right of free sale. Ancient custom from an early date had given the kinsman (lawful heir?) a right of pre-emption and also of buying back (Jer. 32 6 ff.). A legal enactment on this subject, it is true, does not occur earlier than in P (Lev. 25 25 f.). It is open to question whether the right of repurchase there conferred upon the proprietor himself rests upon ancient legal custom; the enactment in P stands most intimately connected with the year of jubilee. The right is unlimited as regards holdings or houses in the country; but in the case of houses in walled towns it lapses in the course of a year (Lev. 25 29 ff.). This also may well have been in accordance with the ancient practice. On the other hand, the regulation according to which all real property which has been sold (houses in towns alone excepted) shall revert again to the old proprietor at the year of jubilee occurring every fiftieth year (see JUBILEE), and without compensation (Lev. 25 13 ff.), belongs to the theory peculiar to P. The effect of course is to convert every purchase into a lease merely, of fifty years at the longest.

Borrowing and lending.—Here also down to the post-exilic period the provisions of the law indicate great simplicity in the relations of debtors and creditors. Even D contemplates only those cases in which indebtedness of one Israelite to another is the result of individual poverty; it knows nothing of any kind of credit system such as necessarily springs up with the development of commerce. This fact must never be lost sight of, if we are to understand the old laws, which do not admit of application to the circumstances of commerce and of which the manifest object is simply to protect the poor debtor against the oppression of a tyrannical creditor (cp PLEDGE).

16. Borrowing and lending.

The old consuetudinary law took for granted that the creditor would seek security by exacting a pledge. In this case he was prohibited by ancient custom from detaining the outer garment of the needy debtor after sundown, this garment being practically his only covering (Ex. 22 26 [25]). Moreover, propriety forbade the exaction of usury from a fellow Israelite (nothing, however, is said as to any distinction between legitimate and usurious interest [Ex. 22 25 (24)]; the clause, 'ye shall exact no usury of him' is a later gloss in the sense of D; cp We. CH 92). The debtor who was unable to meet his obligations was liable not only to the utmost limit of his property, but also in his own person and in the persons of his family; the creditor could sell them as slaves (2 K. 4 1 Neh. 5 5 6 Is. 50 1). In the Book of the Covenant, however, it is already provided that an enslaved debtor and his belongings shall be released in the seventh year of his enslavement—a provision that amounts to a remission of the remaining debt (Ex. 21 2 7).

That these humane regulations were unsuccessful in the attainment of their object is shown by the constant complaint of the prophets who, with one voice, reproach the rich for their hardness in dealing with their debtors. In full sympathy with the prophetic spirit, D accordingly made the regulations more stringent.

The prohibition against taking the mantle in pledge was extended with great practical judgment so as to include all indispensable necessaries (24 6 13 17). In no case is the creditor to make selection of the pledge that suits him in the house of the debtor; he must take the pledge the latter chooses (24 10 f.). The prohibition of usury is so extended as to forbid interest of any kind. So far as fellow-Israelites are concerned there is no distinction between usury and interest (Dt. 23 19 [20] f., cp Ezek. 18 15 ff.). In the case of the foreigner, on the other hand, the taking of usury is allowed.

The law relating to releasing enslaved debtors was extended by D so as to enjoin the remission of every debt in the seventh year (Dt. 15 1 ff.; cp especially v. 9 which makes it impossible to interpret the law [with Di.] as meaning merely that repayment of the debt is postponed for a year). That the law was thoroughly unpractical indeed, and that, strictly carried out, it would put a speedy end to all lending whatever, the framer himself shows that he is more or less aware; hence his urgent appeal to the benevolence of his compatriots: Beware that there be not a base thought in thine heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou give him nought' (v. 9, cp the cold comfort of v. 11). With these exhortations Ezek. 18 5 f. may be compared. It is not to be wondered at that precepts so impracticable in many parts should have had no very great result (cp Jer. 34 8 ff.). The Jews of later times understood very well how to evade them; the famous Hillel is credited with the invention of the prosbul—viz., a proviso set forth in presence of the judge whereby the creditor secured the right of demanding repayment at any time irrespective of the occurrence of the year of remission.

The regulations of the Priestly code were, broadly speaking, as unpractical as those we have been considering.

The prohibition of usury remains in force (Lev. 25 35 ff.). The selling of the debtor into slavery is permitted, but mitigated by the injunction that his master must treat him as if he were a free labourer for wages. The emancipation is no longer fixed for the seventh year of slavery, but, in correspondence with the whole scheme of P, is postponed to the year of jubilee, recurring every fifty years. In this year also all real property that has been sold reverts to the family to whose inheritance it originally belonged. This on the one hand guards against the unfortunate possibility of the liberated slave finding himself in a state of destitution; but on the other hand the postponement to the fiftieth year makes the whole provision illusory so far as many of the enslaved are concerned. Another law, this, which never gained a permanent footing.

Of suretyship the law has nothing to say. That such a thing was known and that it had led to some disastrous experiences, is shown by certain of the proverbs, which are so pointedly directed against it (Prov. 6 1 ff. 22 26 f.).

Compensation for damage to property.—In the Book of the Covenant the ruling principle for this is that liability attaches only to the party whose culpability (whether intentional or unintentional) can be proved, or legally presumed. Such culpability attaches, to begin with, very clearly in cases of deliberate injury, especially in that of theft. If it is sought to apply to Hebrew law the distinction made in the Civil Law between private law and penal law, theft falls under the former category; this appears from the fact that it establishes a claim to compensation only, and is not liable to punishment as a crime. At most, the compensation exacted assumed a penal character only in so far as by ancient consuetudinary law its amount had to exceed the value of what had been stolen (double, for money; fourfold for sheep, fivefold for cattle; see Ex. 21 37 [22 1] 22 3 [2] 6 [5]).

If the thief cannot be detected with certainty the party found guilty (in cases where two Israelites are concerned) after appeal to God (ĕlōhīm) by the lot must pay double to the other (Ex. 22 8 [7] ff.). In cases of unintentional damage, however, compensation was also exigible wherever gross carelessness could be proved, as, for example, where a water-pit had been left open and a neighbour's beast had fallen into it (Ex. 21 33), or where cattle left at large had wrought havoc in a cultivated field (Ex. 22 5 [4]), or where a goring ox had done any mischief (Ex. 21 32 36), or when cattle had been stolen from a careless herdsman (Ex. 22 11 [10]); cp on the other hand v. 12 [11]; see DEPOSIT. Other instances are given in Ex. 22 6 [5] 14 [13]. On the other hand where no culpability can be made out, there is no obligation to compensate, as for example where moneys entrusted have been stolen from the custodian (Ex. 22 7 [6] f.), where a domestic animal has been torn by wild beasts (22 10 [9] f. 13 [12]); cp also 22 14 [13] with 22 15 [14] 21 35 with 21 36. On these points D has not any more definite enactments.

The occasional references in P are in agreement with the mildness of the ancient law. Whoever has embezzled, or stolen, or appropriated lost property is mildly dealt with if he voluntarily confesses his fault; he must restore what he has unlawfully appropriated and pay a fifth of the value, over and above, as a fine (Lev. 24 18 21 5 20-24 [6 1-5]).

The right of inheritance among the Israelites belonged only to agnates—the only relations in the strict sense of the word—the wife's relations belong to a different family or even to a different tribe. Only sons, not daughters, still less wives, can inherit. There are traces to show that in the earliest times the wives, as the property of the man, fell to his heir along with the rest of his estate—a custom which among the Arabs continued to hold even to Mohammed's time (cp 2 S. 16 21 f. 1 K. 2 13 ff. 2 S. 3 7 f.; also Gen. 49 3 f. cp 35 22; the whole institution of levirate marriages probably finds its explanation here); cp MARRIAGE, § 7, KINSHIP, § 10. The law of inheritance, as just stated, appears to have been common to all the Semites (WRS, Kin. 54, 264), in this respect differing in an important point from that of Rome, which otherwise was also one of agnates; in Roman law at least daughters still remaining under the paternal roof could inherit. Stade (GVI 1 390 ff.) deduces the custom, so far as Israel is concerned, from the ancestor-worship which anciently prevailed there; he alone could inherit who was capable of carrying on the cult of the person from whom he inherited. It seems preferable, however, with Robertson Smith (l.c.) to seek the explanation in the connection between inheritance and the duty of blood revenge. Among other Semitic peoples all on whom this duty lay had also, originally, the right of inheritance. In Old German law likewise the two were intimately connected.

Among the sons, ancient custom gave to the firstborn (i.e., to the eldest son of the father) a double portion (Dt. 21 17; cp FIRSTBORN). It was indeed always possible for the father to deprive the eldest son of this birthright and bestow it upon a younger son (cp Gen. 49 3 21 1 ff. 1 K. 1 11-13), and the favourite wife (as might be expected) seems frequently to have contrived this for the benefit of her own eldest son. Custom, however, did not approve of this passing by of the eldest son, and D, in agreement with the ancient usage, positively forbade it (21 15-17).

Whether the landed property also was divided we do not know; the more probable view is that it fell undivided to the firstborn, who had to make some kind of provision for the others. The privilege of the firstborn must have carried with it one obligation at least—that of maintaining the female members of the family who remained unmarried; by the death of the father the firstborn became at any rate head of the family.

The sons of concubines had also a right of inheritance (Gen. 21 10 f.), but whether on an equality with the other sons we do not know. It must be remembered that Hebrew antiquity did not recognise a distinction between legitimate and illegitimate unions in the sense of the Græco-Roman jurisprudence (see FAMILY, § 8). Much, however, depended, it would seem, on the goodwill of the father and of the brother, and no fixed legal custom established itself. By adoption of course full right of inheritance was conferred.

When a man died without leaving sons, the nearest agnate inherited; but along with the inheritance he took over the duty of marrying the widow of the deceased (see MARRIAGE, § 7 f.). If this was not done, the childless widow returned to her own father's house, whence she was free to marry a second time (Gen. 38 11 Lev. 22 13 Ruth 1 8 f.).

The later law exhibits a change only with respect to the inheritance of daughters, conferring upon these the right to inherit, in the absence of sons. It is still only by exceptional favour that the daughters inherit along with the sons (Job 42 15). The express object of the alteration of the law is stated to be to prevent a man's name being lost to his family (Nu. 27 4). At the same time, however, the inheriting daughters are enjoined to marry only within their father's tribe, so that the family estate may not pass to an outside family (Nu. 36 1-12). As has been pointed out by Stade (GVI 1 391), it is not improbable that in this we have a compromise with the older view according to which, strictly, the nearest agnate ought to inherit, undertaking at the same time the duty of levirate marriage (see FAMILY, § 8), just as was the case in old Athens, where the inheriting agnate had the duty either of marrying the daughter, or of making a provision for her suitable to her station. The later law made provision also for the case of there being no marriageable daughter, enacting that in that event the relations of the husband and not those of the wife were to inherit (Nu. 27 5-11).

I. B.

LAW LITERATURE

In the present article we have to consider the origin, the history, and the general characteristics of those parts of the OT which are immediately connected with Hebrew law. In the main these are to be found in the Pentateuch; outside the Pentateuch the most important piece of Law Literature is the closing section of Ezekiel (40-48). The main elements in this literature consist of (a) actual laws or decisions in written form, (b) legal theory, including casuistical discussions which become prominent in post-biblical literature (e.g. the Mishna), ideal systems (see e.g., Ezek. 40-48: see below, § 14) and theories of the origin of institutions (these especially in P: see below, § 17 f.), (c) exhortations to obey the laws (very characteristic of H and D: see §§ 13-15).

1. Jewish Theory. According to Hebrew or Jewish theory, Yahwè is the source of all law (LAW AND JUSTICE, § 1), Moses[1] the medium through whom it was revealed to Israel. Thus in connection with the various orders of law we find such formulæ as 'And Yahwè said unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel' (Ex. 20 22, cp 20 21, and also 34 27, concluding laws of 34 14-26 [cp v. 10] J); 'and Yahwè spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel' (Ex. 25 1, and so, or similarly, repeatedly in P); cp further Dt. 4 1 f. 5 33 4. At a later period the Jews formulated the theory that the oral law or tradition (subsequently written down in the Mishna and other halachic collections), as well as the written law or scripture, was in the first instance communicated to Moses—'Moses received the tōrāh from Sinai, and he delivered it[2] to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets to the men of the great synagogue' (Pirḳē Ābhōth, 1 1).

From the Jewish point of view therefore Law Literature (both biblical and post-biblical) consists of laws originally communicated to Moses orally, and committed, gradually, and at various periods, to writing; for even the oral law—the παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων of the NT—was subsequently written down. It is always the origin of law, however, rather than of the writing down of the law that was of primary interest and importance to the Jews. Moses stands pre-eminent as the human medium through which the Law came to Israel; though in the writing down of the Law Ezra's part is, according to Jewish tradition, at least as important as that of Moses (CANON, § 17).

For present purposes it is unnecessary to discuss at further length the precise sense[3] in which the Jews traced their law and consequently, at least indirectly, their law-literature to Moses. We need only refer to (a) an exception and (b) a consequence.

(a) The prophets also were regarded as media of tōrōth—i.e., instructions, laws—and the priests at various periods delivered 'instructions.'[4] The prophetic instructions, however, scarcely correspond to what we generally understand by law, and the priestly instructions are explanations of the law or laws of Yahwè with which the priests were entrusted (Hos. 4 6, Jer. 28 18 18) in reference to specific circumstances (e.g., Hag. 2 11).[5]

1 Occasionally (Nu. 18 18 Lev. 10 8) Aaron is the medium. There is a tendency, especially among copyists, to associate Aaron with Moses in the reception of instructions.

2 I.e., both written and oral law; the verb 'receive' (קִבֵּל) is specially used of the oral law.

3 The Rabbis differed on the point; for their views see Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, Excursus I., and in (2) addit. note 1.

4 See BDB, s.v. תּוֹרָה, 1 c, d, e.

5 Much of the 'Book of the Covenant,' Ex. 21-23, may be so

LAW LITERATURE

(b) The consequence of this theory of the origin of law is that the Hebrew historians never directly and explicitly record the introduction of a new law. We are thus deprived of what might otherwise furnish us with simple and straightforward evidence with regard to the date of the various bodies of law preserved in the OT. The nearest approach that we possess to such direct evidence of the change of law at a definite date is furnished by Ezekiel in his ideal sketch of a future Jewish constitution (Ezek. 40-48); in this, old customs which had the sanction of earlier law are condemned and discarded, and new laws are enunciated, some of which subsequently gained validity. These changes are directly revealed by Yahwè to the prophet. In D also, the date of which has been determined by criticism within sufficiently narrow limits, older laws are abrogated in favour of new ones; but here the laws are traced to Moses, and are not, therefore, as in Ezekiel, directly represented as new, though indirectly the sense of novelty is here also clearly felt (cp below, § 13).

Before proceeding to a synthetic history of Hebrew Law Literature based on the criticism of the several bodies of law, we may notice the external evidence—unfortunately for the earlier period very scanty—of the existence and diffusion of such a literature among the Hebrews.

2. Written Laws.

Law, but not necessarily the individual written laws or the entire literature of law, was, as we have seen, attributed to Moses. In the main the first four books of the Pentateuch merely relate oral communications which were to be orally communicated to the people. Ex. 34 27 f. (J), however, records that Moses wrote the short body of laws (vv. 11-26) which constituted the terms of the covenant between Yahwè and Israel; a similar statement is found in 24 4, but the precise limits of the 'words of Yahwè' there said to have been written down and the source of the statement (whether J or E) are uncertain.[1] Traditions were also current among the Hebrews that the decalogue was written by the finger of God on stone tables (Ex. 31 18 32 16 E, Dt. 9 10). Again Hos. 8 12 implies the existence in the N. kingdom of written laws, which Ryle (Canon, 33), however, inclines to regard as prophetic teaching; if the text be sound (which is doubtful), the number of these written laws must have been large. We have, thus, altogether, sufficiently good and complete evidence that written laws existed at least as early as the eighth or ninth centuries B.C. in both kingdoms.[2] The context of the passage in Hosea (cp Jer. 7 22 f.) implies that these laws had regard rather to social and moral life than to cultus.[3] Such is the character of the major part of the laws in Ex. 21-23. On the other hand the laws of Ex. 34 11-26, said by J to have been written by Moses, are for the most part concerned with the cultus.

For whom, then, we may ask, were these laws written? Who were to read them? In what sense were they literature? These questions cannot be answered with certainty; but it seems likely that such collections of written laws were in the first instance intended for the priests whose duty it was to give decisions (cp LAW AND JUSTICE, § 3, end).

3. Why written?

When (some of) the laws of Ex. 21-23 became incorporated (probably about the middle of the eighth century) in E, and those of Ex. 34 11-26 (somewhat earlier) in J (see EXODUS, §§ 3 vi.-ix. 4), they became the possession of a larger circle. To all appearance both these sets of laws codify existing practices, and do not introduce changes. There was no need, therefore, for their publication merely as laws. Their appearance in Hebrew literature is rather due to the growth of an historical literature (yet see Kue. Hex. § 15, ET 272).

The publication of Dt.[1] in the seventh century marks an important stage in the history of Law Literature. Dt. was the literary embodiment of a religious reformation, the principles of which affected many established customs.

4. Circulation.

Its publication therefore was necessary: it was essential that the people at large should know what was required of them by the new law. There are in the book passages which clearly imply that such publication was contemplated by its authors, and we learn from 2 K. 22 f. that they saw their designs carried out. Even so, however, we must not think of the book as having a large circulation among many classes of readers. Most of the people were to become acquainted with it by hearing it read to them periodically by the priests and elders[2] (Dt. 31 9-13, cp 2 K. 23 2), just as according to the theory of the book it was in the first instance read to them by Moses (28 58 61; cp 1 5 31 24 29 20 30 10); the only copies of which we actually hear, in addition to the original which was to be kept in the temple (31 26), are the copy which was to be made for the king (17 18) and the copy engraved on stones, referred to in Dt. 27 2 f. 8 (on which see Driver, and, on the text and tradition PLAISTER).

It is reasonable, however, to suppose that other copies were in the hands of instructors of the people. It has been inferred from Jer. 11 1-8 that Jeremiah went about explaining Deuteronomy (see, e.g., Che. Jer.: his life and times, 55 ff.). Still, the very limited circulation even of Dt. is a fact to be borne in mind when we consider the likelihood of the original code having been modified or expanded.

In the early years of the exile (592-570) Ezekiel wrote his sketch of the future constitution. The same period and the later years of exile were probably marked by much legal study and literary production. This, however, rests on indirect and internal evidence which is discussed elsewhere (see also below, § 16 f.). The same may be said of the early post-exilic period.

Certainly, from the time of Dt. onwards, references to written law become frequent. Life is no longer ordered merely or even mainly by long-established and recognised custom, and in cases of doubt by the oral decisions of priests, but 'according to what is written in the (book of the) law of Moses'[3] (Ezra 3 2 6 18 Neh. 13 1 ff. Josh. 8 31 D [cp 1 8 D] 23 6 2 K. 14 6 D, 2 Ch. 23 18 25 4 35 12). Other references from this period to written law are Ezra 7 6 Neh. 8 1. Most significant also is the gradual omission of the words 'book of' before 'the law' when written law is implied. Tōrāh, originally denoting a decision orally delivered, becomes a term for a body of written law (LAW AND JUSTICE, § 1).

Of course long after written law had become a well-recognised institution, many still depended for their knowledge of it on hearing it read to them (see Neh. 8 1 3). The circulation of copies, however, must have become increasingly large; this is in part indicated by the existence of the class of scribes. The number of people who possessed and read the law was certainly considerable in the second century B.C. (1 Macc. 1 56 f.). Later the reading of the law was widely practised; it formed the staple of EDUCATION (q.v. § 3 f.; cp Schürer, GJV⁽²⁾, II 354, ET ii. 2 50).

It is true that the term 'law' was extended so as to cover all sacred literature (see CANON, § 26); but this is only a further proof of the influence gained by the specifically legal literature. It is unnecessary to dwell on a fact so well recognised as that the Jews in the first century were (what they certainly were not, if we are to be guided by our records, down to the time of regarded. The code may not in its original form have been attributed to Moses (cp Nowack, HA 1 319); it rather appears to have been a collection of rules resting on long existing practice. See below, § 7 f.

[3] In this connection the absence of any reference in Hag. 2 10-12 to a written law (such as Nu. 19) on defilement by the dead, and the implication that oral instruction on the subject still needed to be obtained, is significant.

Josiah) the people of the law, the people of the book[1] (cp e.g. Jn. 5 39).

5. Six Periods. The history of Hebrew and Jewish Law Literature may be divided into six periods—viz. (1) the pre-Josianic (§§ 6-9); (2) the Josianic (§§ 10-13); (3) the exilic (§§ 14-16); (4) the earlier post-exilic (§§ 17-19); (5) the later post-exilic (§ 20 f.); and (6) the Rabbinic (§§ 22 f.). From what has been said already (§§ 2-4), it will be easy to understand that a literature of Law in any very precise sense of the term begins only with the second (Josianic) of these periods; in the first we have to do with the formulation and committal to writing of existing laws, but scarcely with the publication, for general perusal or recitation, of any legal work.

1. Pre-Josianic Period.—Written laws were, as we have seen (§ 2), known in Israel at least as early as the eighth century B.C. Some of these laws have survived, editorially modified indeed yet not in such a way as to render their essential features unrecognisable, in the Pentateuch—in particular in Ex. 20-24 34; see also Ex. 13 3-16. Others are probably incorporated without much greater editorial modifications in other masses of law, especially D and H; but the consideration of these latter can be left to later sections. We will confine our attention for the present to the laws which are closely connected with the prophetic narratives of the Hexateuch, and (on this ground and on others) may be regarded with greatest probability as representing early Hebrew collections of written law.

6. Before Josiah.

There can be no question that both Ex. 34 16 (12)-26, and chaps. 20 1-23 19 stand at present surrounded by prophetic narratives; but whether their present is the same as was their original position in the sources is very much open to question; and this is particularly the case with Ex. 21 1-23 19 (cp Kue. Hex. 13, n. 32). If this be the case, can we be sure that the laws in question ever stood in the sources? In other words, can we safely argue merely from their position in the Hexateuch that the codes had been collected in written form as early as J or E?

Certainty does not seem to be justifiable, and Baentsch (Bundesbuch, 122)[2] as a matter of fact is inclined to attribute the embodiment of Ex. 21 1-23 19 in the prophetic history-book to the compiler of JE—to the complex prophetic source the compilation of which must be placed at the close of the seventh century B.C. Yet two or three considerations render it probable that these laws occupied a place in one of the two main sources J or E. (1) If the compiler of JE had not been led by the previous existence of the code in one of his sources to retain it in his compilation, would he not rather have adopted the Deuteronomic code or some laws more in accordance with that code? (2) The code, whether incorporated in the earlier sources or not, is certainly much earlier in origin than JE.

On the whole then, we may conclude that we approximate to the written laws of Yahwè to which Hosea makes reference in the decalogue of Ex. 20, the older decalogue of Ex. 34 and the code of Ex. 20 24-23. At the same time a comparison of Ex. 20 and Dt. 5 warns us that those older laws were sometimes subject to much editorial expansion (see DECALOGUE), and this must be borne in mind in attempting to gain a more definite idea of the law literature of the earliest period; the presence of such expansions can for the most part merely be referred to here: details must be sought elsewhere. [The upward limit of date is determined by the one fact that the laws presuppose a settled agricultural society. See EXODUS ii.]

[1] 'The Introduction of the law, first of Deuteronomy, then of the entire Pentateuch, was in fact the decisive step by which the written word (die Schrift) took the place of the spoken word (die Rede) and the people of the word became a people of the book' (We. Prol.(4), 415). 'As the historical and prophetical books existed in part a long time before they became canonical, so, it is thought, was it the case also with the law (das Gesetz). Nevertheless, in the case of the law, there is an essential difference. The law is meant to have binding force, is meant to be the book of the community. A difference between Law and Canon there never was. It is therefore easy to understand that the Tōrāh, although as a literary product younger than the historical and prophetical books, is yet as law (Gesetz) older than those writings, which originally and essentially bore no legal character, but obtained the same accidentally in consequence of being attached to an already existing Law' (ib. 416).

[2] See now (1900) also his Comm. on Ex. Lev. in HK; he there admits (p. 188) that some laws stood at this point in E (cp 20 18-21 24 3-8) to be found in 20 22-26 22 27-29 23 10-16, and that the judgments (see § 7) stood elsewhere in E at a point not to be defined.

These remnants of pre-Josianic Hebrew law fall into different classes when regarded in respect of their form.

7. 'Words' and 'judgments.' We find (1) absolute commands in Ex. 20 3-17 (the Decalogue), Ex. 34 10-26[1] (the so-called 'older decalogue'), and Ex. 20 23-26[2] (21 15-17) 22 18-22 28-31 23 1-3 6-19; deuteronomic expansions often accompany these ancient commandments in their present setting—see especially Ex. 20 4-6 7*b* 9 f. 12*b* 17 22 22-24 27 23 10 12*b*; (2) hypothetical instructions based presumably on precedent—a codification of consuetudinary law—in Ex. 21 2-14 18-36 22 1-17 25 f. 23 4 f.

Laws of the former (absolute) type seem to have gone by the name of Words (דברים); so at least the commandments of the Decalogue (Ex. 20) were termed (Dt. 5 22 4 13 10 4), as also those of 'the older Decalogue' (Ex. 34 27); and some have supposed that the absolute commands of Ex. 21-23 are referred to by the same term in Ex. 24 3 4 8. On the other hand the hypothetical provisions of Ex. 21 2-24, etc., appear to have been specifically termed judgments (משפטים)—see Ex. 21 1 and perhaps 24 3; and cp Nu. 35 24 (referring to vv. 16-23).

Ultimately, it need not be doubted, these two distinct types of laws had different origins. The main religious

8. Their origin. duties may at a comparatively early date have been thrown into a scheme of ten commands; later, under the influence of the prophetic teaching, and perhaps as a set-off (cp the contrast between Mic. 6 6 f. and v. 8) to still earlier ritual decalogues, other schemes of ten words mainly inculcating moral duties may have been framed. An ancient ritual decalogue seems to underlie Ex. 34 12-26 (DECALOGUE, § 5); individual commands of this kind appear elsewhere—e.g., in Ex. 23 18 (=34 25). A moral decalogue, scarcely earlier in origin than the prophets of the eighth century, clearly survives in Ex. 20.

The 'judgments,' on the other hand, will have originated in decisions given on particular cases by priest or other judicial authority (cp LAW AND JUSTICE, § 4). These judgments, again, need not all have originated at the same time or place; they may very well as they stand represent a selection from the established precedents at different sanctuaries; and to this may be due the differences of form noticeable among them.

Whilst, however, such differences are certainly remarkable, and seem best accounted for by difference of origin, we have not sufficient data to enable us to determine in more than a quite general way what those differences of origin—whether of time or place—actually were. In particular it seems a fruitless task to attempt to reach an actual earlier form of the 'Book of the Covenant' by a series of transformations, such as Rothstein (Bundesbuch, 1887) has proposed.

So again we must be content with alternative possibilities when we come to consider the later literary

9. Literary history. history of both the 'words' and the 'judgments.' The decalogue of Ex. 34 certainly seems to have formed part of the main prophetic source J (EXODUS, § 3, vii.); the Decalogue, generally so-called (Ex. 20), part of the prophetic source E, though whether in an earlier (E_1) or a later (E_2) form is disputed. The 'Book of the Covenant,' again (Ex. 20 22-23 19), is also by most regarded as having formed part of E, though, as we have seen (§ 6), Baentsch thinks that it was first incorporated by JE. However that may be, further alternatives arise. Had the Book of the Covenant an independent existence in writing before it came to form part of E or JE, or was it the compiler of one of those works who first brought together from different written or oral sources the 'words' and the 'judgments'? These questions also must be left undecided.[3]

One point further only needs to be emphasised here. Neither J nor E nor JE came, by the incorporation of these collections of law to be a law-book. The laws form but a small part of the whole and are incorporated not with a view to gain recognition for them; for they were based on long-established precedents, or (as in the case of the Decalogue of Ex. 20) they embodied some of the moral duties on which prophetic teaching naturally laid stress: they owe their place to a historical motive—they are specimens of those customs, enjoying the sanction of Yahwè's favour, which were observed in Israel.

[2] Yet note v. 25.

[3] For a fuller discussion of these and references to literature see EXODUS ii., § 3 f.

2. The Josianic Period.—The second period brings us to the first specimen of Law Literature proper—i.e., of works intended for publicity and having a legal as their leading motive.

10. Time of Josiah.

The historical cause of this new departure was the religious reformation carried out under Josiah, and the leading doctrinal motive of the reformation was the unity of Yahwè; the main reform aimed at in practice, the abolition of local sanctuaries and the centralisation of worship at Jerusalem. This one main reform, however, involved many important changes, especially in the sacrificial customs, the status of the priests, the right of asylum (see SACRIFICE; PRIEST, § 6; ASYLUM, § 3).

In Deuteronomy we find the programme of this reformation (see DEUTERONOMY). Not to repeat a discussion of the exact limits of the original book of Deuteronomy which will be found elsewhere (DEUTERONOMY, §§ 4 ff.) it will suffice to notice here, that, regarded from a literary point of view, the book consists of three elements: (a) previously existing laws, in some cases much, in others probably but little, if at all, modified (§ 12); (b) regulations for carrying into effect the contemplated reforms (§ 13); (c) exhortations, accompanied by threats and promises and illustrated by historical retrospects, to carry out the injunctions of the book (§ 13). The first element is common to Deuteronomy and the historical works of the preceding period which embody laws (§ 6). The second and third elements entirely differentiate the new from the older literary form. The purpose of the earlier historical works was to record and glorify the existing order of things: the purpose of Deuteronomy was to condemn and displace that order. In the earlier period laws owed their position in literature to an historical interest; henceforward history becomes an exponent of legal theory—at first (especially in the Books of Kings in their final form) of the deuteronomic theory, and later (as in Chronicles) of the priestly theory (§ 17).

11. Deuteronomy an innovation.

We turn now to a fuller survey of the various elements, and of the history (so far as it can be discovered or surmised) of the fusion of them as seen in the existing book of Deuteronomy.

(a) Previously existing laws.—It has long been recognised that Deuteronomy is in large part based on the laws now found embodied in the 'prophetic' narratives of our Hexateuch. The extent of this common matter may be seen at a glance by consulting the comparative table in Driver's Deut. (iv.-vii.); see also DEUTERONOMY, § 9; EXODUS ii., § 4. The close relation between the two bodies of legislation, often extending to 'verbal coincidences,' is thus summed up by Driver (8): 'Nearly the whole ground covered by Ex. 20 22-23 33 is included in it [the deuteronomic legislation], almost the only exception being the special compensations to be paid for various injuries (Ex. 21 18-22 16), which would be less necessary in a manual intended for the people. In a few cases the law is repeated verbatim, or nearly so; elsewhere only particular clauses; in other cases the older law is expanded, fresh definitions being added, or its principle extended, or parenthetic comments attached, or the law is virtually recast in the deuteronomic phraseology.' (Yet see DEUTERONOMY, § 9.)

12. Laws not new.

In addition to this legal matter found in the extant earlier codes, we have much similar matter not found there. It is reasonable to suppose that this also was derived, though by no means always without editorial modification, from sources similar to those noticed above (§ 7), whether oral or written. Down to a period much later than that now under consideration the priests gave oral decisions, to which on many ritual points those in need of instruction were referred. From established and traditional decisions of this kind, as well as from written sources, the deuteronomic writers (like the compiler of H; below, § 15) may well have drawn. Particularly noticeable among this legal matter peculiar to Deuteronomy are the laws relative to unclean animals in chap. 14 (cp DEUTERONOMY, § 10) and the laws of chaps. 21 10-25 16 (of which only seven out of a total of thirty-five are found in the legislation of JE; DEUTERONOMY, § 9) which in their greater terseness contrast with the generally diffuse style of even the distinctly legal parts of Dt. and are on this account with probability regarded as drawn more directly and with less modification from existing collections of laws.[1]

The attempts to determine more precisely the exact literary character, if the sources were written, and the previous interrelations of this older matter not found in the legislation of JE have led to no convincing conclusions. Both Staerk and Steuernagel have attempted a resolution of the strictly legislative parts of D into sources, on the ground of the changing usage of the sing. and pl. for the persons addressed. Steuernagel (Deut. vi. ff.). also constitutes into sources various other groups of passages such as (16 21-17 1) 18 10-12*a* 22 5 23 19 25 13-16*a*, on the ground of the common clause 'For any one who does such things is abominable to Yahwè' (כי תעבת י׳ כל עשה אלה). Even, however, if we should grant that the criteria suffice to establish ultimate diversity of origin, they certainly do not establish any separate literary existence for such 'sources.' Steuernagel himself expressly discards the idea that such sources need ever have obtained public currency (ib. xiii.). We can scarcely assert with safety more than this—that these laws, so sharply distinguished in style from the more distinctively novel elements in Dt. (such for example as chaps. 12 f. 17 14 ff. 18 15 ff. 20 1-9), must have had previously some fixed form. The arguments adduced by Dillmann (NDJ 292 f. 340 604 f. 606; cp Kue. Hex. ET, 256; Graf, Gesch. Bücher, 25-27) to show that they must have been written really prove no more than such previous fixity of form whether oral or written.

But whatever conclusions we may draw in detail, there seems ample reason for the general conclusion that, with the single exception, to be noticed immediately, the legal material, even when it cannot be traced to still extant earlier codes, is not the novel element in Deuteronomy.

(b) and (c).—This single exception, this new legal element in Deuteronomy, is the law of the centralisation of worship with its various corollaries. But the influence of this one new legal element is powerful, clearly felt, and far-reaching. Take, for example, the law of sacrifice (chap. 12). Much is assumed as known, for instance the mode of sacrifice; but in respect to the place of sacrifice we find what was absent from the earlier legislation (cp § 9 end) is here present—a sense of change; immemorial practice no longer supports itself by the mere fact of being such: no longer 'as at this day' (12 8) is sacrifice to be offered wherever one pleases, but at one definite place only (12 13 f.). Worship must be centralised; the unity of Yahwè vindicated and outwardly symbolised. What has been legitimate ceases to be so, while some things that had been illegitimate now become legitimate (12 15).

13. New element in Dt.

If the law-book, instead of merely glorifying the existing order of things, aimed at changing it and thus seriously affecting the life of the people, it needed a means of commending the changes to the people and arousing enthusiasm to carry them into effect. Hence the change is represented as long overdue; it should have been made when Yahwè took up his abode in Jerusalem. Hence also the promises and threats with their appeal to the hopes and fears of the people; the insistence on prophetic principles; the didactic historical retrospects.

That the main elements just noted characterised 'the book found in the temple' (2 K. 22 8) is plainly indicated by the narrative of 2 K. 22 f. The legal element is clear from the title—'the book of the tōrah'—by which it is there referred to, and from the correspondence of the actions of Josiah to the demands of the law; the sense of change, the newness of the demands, is seen in the confession that immemorial customs did not conform to the demands of the law (2 K. 22 13); and the hortatory element must be presupposed to account for the alarm produced in the king on hearing the book read.

When this is said it still remains uncertain precisely how much of the present book constituted the book found in the temple. The critical study of Deuteronomy leads to the conclusion that the original book was amplified both in its legal and in its hortatory parts, and that the present work has resulted from the fusion of two different editions, so to speak, of the work distinguished from one another more particularly by different historical introductions (DEUTERONOMY, §§ 4-7): the limited circulation of books (above, § 4) rendered such growth of a book easy.

These processes of expansion in large part are to be placed in the period between the Reformation (621 B.C.) and the fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.) and represent the continuous literary activity of the reforming party.

Two characteristics of this great product of the Josianic period must be referred to before we pass to the next period. (1) Deuteronomy is thoroughly practical; it is the work of men living amid the actual circumstances of the life which they wish to reform. The authors appreciate the effect of the contemplated changes; if their principle involved the centralisation of worship, they see the necessity and make provision for the desanctification of ordinary flesh meals; if they rob the local priests of their custom at the local shrines, they give them their share in the custom of the temple at Jerusalem; if they abolish with the local sanctuaries the numerous asyla offered by the altars there, they institute 'cities of refuge'—civil asyla. (2) This practical character of the work defines its limitations. It is an appeal to the people: prophetic principles are enforced and illustrated in detail by the recital of moral and civil laws and of ritual law so far as it affected the people. On the other hand, the details of ritual, the functions of the priests, receive no attention; these were sufficiently determined by the existing practice at Jerusalem.

3. The Exilic Period.—The literature of the exile bears the marks of the profound change in the external circumstances of the people. The national life has ceased; it is now merely the subject of memory, the subject of hope. Hence the literary activity of the period shows itself mainly in the production of theoretical works, the framing of a constitution for the restored nation; and in the preservation of the regulations of the life that has ceased to be.

14. Ezekiel.

The theoretical element is most markedly present in Ezekiel. In his sketch of the ideal constitution[1] of the new state he borrows, needless to say, largely from ancient practice; as a priest, he was familiar with the duties of the priest and the priestly ritual, and he draws on this knowledge. As contrasted with the Isaianic it is a priestly conception of holiness that dominates him, leading him to give the central significance which he does to the holy city and especially to the temple (Ezek. 40-43 17). This accounts for the almost exclusively ritual and priestly character of the laws which the prophet incorporates in his sketch.

Note the ritual for the consecration of the altar (43 18-27), the regulations regarding the persons who may approach the sanctuary (44 6-15), the duties of the priests (44 16-27), the priestly dues (44 28-31), the materials and fixed seasons of sacrifices (45 13-46 15), the treatment of the sacrificial flesh (46 19-24). As compared with the actual monarchs of pre-exilic times, Ezekiel's 'prince' is an insignificant person, and he comes before us mainly in connection with the sacrifices (45 12-17 46 1-15) and the distribution of the land (45 7 f., 46 16-18). Beyond some general exhortations to the princes not to oppress (e.g., 45 8), almost the only references to other than priestly and ritual matters are in the short section commending just weights and measures (45 9-11).

[1] Cp EZEKIEL ii., §§ 13, 23 f.

Doubtless it was not Ezekiel's purpose to set forth a full constitution for the new state. It is equally clear, however, that his ideal differs from the real state which had passed away in the position given to the priests, and in particular the Jerusalem priests. As compared with Deuteronomy, Ezekiel increases the priestly dues and by depriving the local priests—priests who were not descended from Zadok—of their priestly position, makes of the priests of his ideal constitution a compact and corporate body. In his priestly constitution Ezekiel, moreover, most clearly appears as an innovator. He is well aware that the priests of the future will not be as those of the past with which he had been familiar. In the past, which was the present of Dt., all Levites had exercised priestly functions; in the future all Levites not descended from Zadok, in other words all Levites who had not been connected with the Jerusalem temple, will be degraded into an inferior order: the Zadokites alone will remain genuine priests.

Ezekiel's remoteness from the actualities of life (contrast Deuteronomy) comes out particularly in his division of the country, which he regards as an exact parallelogram.

A particular value, historically and critically, attaches to the legal section of the book of Ezekiel. It shows us, on indisputable chronological evidence, how at least one mind in exile was working on Jewish law at a time when circumstances prevented its being put into force, and how the exile marks the transition from the literary activity, which had been mainly prophetic, to the literary activity of the post-exilic period, which became increasingly priestly and legal.

Criticism has shown that Ezekiel's was not the only mind working in the way just described, and that not to him alone do we owe legal literature of the exilic age.

15. 'Law of Holiness.'

The most important of the remaining legal works the exilic origin of which has been generally admitted (yet see LEVITICUS, § 28 f.) is the Law of Holiness (LEVITICUS, §§ 13-30). Though in its present form incomplete and frequently modified by the editor who incorporated it with the larger post-exilic priestly work, it is not difficult to see the general character and motive of the work of the exilic compiler or editor. Like Deuteronomy it is based on earlier legislation,[1] is parænetic in character (this feature being specially prominent in the closing section; Lev. 26), and is characterised by its humanity (cp, e.g., Lev. 19 3 f.). Like Ezekiel (40-48) it has as its dominant note 'holiness,' and appears to have had as its aim the regulation of the restored community.

H has in addition to these general characteristics so much in common with Ezekiel that Graf, as is well known, concluded that Ezekiel must have been the author of H (Gesch. Bücher, 81-83). As has frequently been pointed out, however (e.g., We. Prol.(4), 386: Dr. Introd.(6), 148 f.), whilst in some important respects H agrees with Ezekiel against D (e.g., the 10th of the seventh month is the feast of the New Year in H [Lev. 25 9*a*] and Ezek. 40 1, not as in P [Lev. 16 29] the Day of Atonement) in others H agrees with P against Ezekiel; thus the priests are sons of Aaron, not of Zadok (as in Ezek. 44 15 ff., 48 11). See, further, LEVITES.

If we may trust the present arrangement, this law-book (H) began, like the legislation in JE (Ex. 20 22-23 16), with the regulation of sacrifice (Lev. 17); it assumes (Lev. 17 4 26 11 19 30 20 3 21 12-20 26 2 31) rather than demands (like Dt.) that there must be but one place of sacrifice. Like Ezekiel, the Law of Holiness gives much attention to the priests and the ritual (chaps. 17

[1] Cp, e.g., Lev. 19 15 with Ex 23 3, Lev. 22 27-29 with Ex. 22 29 23 18 f., Lev. 25 1-7 with Ex. 23 10 f. See further We. Prol.(4), 384. It would be unreasonable, however, to limit the earlier legislation preserved in H to what is found in our extant earlier codes; see above, § 12.

20-24); but it regulates also with considerable fulness family and social life (esp. chaps. 18-20 25).[1]

For proof of the date and extent of H, and for various views as to details, reference must be made to LEVITICUS, § 13 ff., and the literature there cited, but see, especially, Baentsch, Heiligkeitsgesetz. Baentsch's conclusions (on which cp Dr. Introd.(6) p. 149 n.) may be summarised as follows:—"Between the years 621 and 591, and probably within a year or two of the latter term, a writer (H) made a collection of previously existing laws, giving them a parænetic framework and the historical background of the wandering in the wilderness. This collection survives in Lev. 18 20 23 9-12 15-17 18*a* 19*b* 20 22 24 15-22 25 1-7 14 17 18-22 23 24 35-38 29 1 2. Some years later—later also than Ezekiel—another writer (H_2) also made a collection of previously existing laws. These are mainly concerned with the priests and the offerings, and are provided by their editor with a dogmatic framework. This collection survives in Lev. 21 f. Quite at the close of the captivity an exile, anxious that the restored community should be regulated aright, united H_1 and H_2, prefixed chap. 17 (H_3), and concluded the whole with a previously existing prophetic discourse (Lev. 26 3 ff.), to which he made various additions (vv. 10 17 [?], 34 35 39-43) appropriate to his immediate purpose." The details[2] of the foregoing theory and the analysis underlying it have varying degrees of probability; but the complexity of the code seems certain (if only on the ground of the presence of both chap. 18 and chap. 20), and that more than one exilic process is here represented is highly probable.

16. Other collections.

Possibly we should refer to the exile also the writing down and collection of much of the priestly teaching that lies at the basis of a large part of Leviticus and is indicated in Carpenter and Battersby's Hexateuch as Pt. For arguments as to the date of this Pt, see ib. I. pp. 152 f., and Harford-Battersby in arts. 'Leviticus' and 'Numbers' in Hastings' DB.

We find then that in the exile legal study and especially the study of the temple ritual and priestly duties was zealously pursued though (or perhaps we should rather say, because), the temple being destroyed, both ritual and priestly duties were for the time being in suspense: just as after the second destruction of the temple and the permanent cessation of sacrifice in 70 A.D. the rabbinic study of matters connected with the temple continued with great if not increased ardour (see § 23).

4. Early Post-Exilic Period.—The activity of this period resulted in (a) the legal and quasi-historical work known as the Priestly Code (P), and (b) the fusion with that work of older histories (JE) and of the law-book D, producing a work substantially the same as our Pentateuch (on b see § 20 f.).

17. P: its character.

Towards the end of the sixth or at the beginning of the fifth century B.C., probably in Babylon,[3] a great work, historical in form, legal or institutional in motive, saw the light.[4] Its evident purpose is the vindication of the divine origin of Jewish institutions and ritual law. Terse to a degree in its treatment of history generally, reducing the biographies of the heroes of the past to little more than a genealogy and a table of ages, it expands into fulness where the origin or purpose of an institution can be illustrated, as for example in the history of creation leading up to the Sabbath, that of the Deluge closing with the command not to eat blood, the birth of Isaac and the institution of circumcision. What is chiefly dwelt on in connection with the Exodus is the institution of the Passover; the history of the transition from Egypt to Canaan deals fully only with the establishment of the central place of worship—the tabernacle—and of the sacred classes (the priests and Levites) to whose care and service it was confided. Ezekiel in the exile with prophetic freedom legislates afresh; and, with a full sense of the novelty of some features in the constitution which he draws up, presents it under the form of the ideal state of the future. The author of the great priestly history casts his ideal back into the past; what ought to be, was; what ought to be done now, was done by the true Jew of the past; earlier histories represented the patriarchs sacrificing in various spots; to P sacrifice apart from the tabernacle was profanity; hence in his history the patriarchs never sacrifice. P's tabernacle itself is anterior to the temple only in the imagination not in history. The entire work is legal or ritual fact and theory presented under the form of history.

Now, what is the literary inter-relation between the various parts of the work? P consists of two main elements; the history of Jewish institutions already described, and masses of laws mainly concerned with ritual matters.

18. P's two elements.

Were these two elements combined from the first? If not, when was the combination made? Are even the two main elements quite simple or to be resolved into yet further elements? Complete and conclusive answers to these questions are not obtainable. Certain points, however, are clear, and the complexity of P is certain.

(a) The masses of laws in P are in part earlier (for an example see § 15—the Law of Holiness), in part later (see below, § 21) than the priestly history. In large part, however, it is difficult to decide with certainty whether the laws had or had not a separate literary, as distinct from a fixed oral, existence before they were united with this history.

Two things, however, must be observed: (1) For the most part the masses of law have no organic connection with the priestly history. This is true, for example, of the great mass contained in Lev. 1-7 (LEVITICUS, § 7), and again such laws as those of the Nazirite (Nu. 6), of the ordeal of Jealousy (Nu. 5 11-31), and those contained in Nu. 15 19. (2) The laws are not homogeneous. Taking again as an example Lev. 1-7, we find the same subjects treated more than once and in a different manner; thus 6 8-7 38 covers the same ground as chaps. 1-5—viz. the ritual of the various forms of offerings—and the subscription in 7 35 f. refers only to 6 8-7 34;[1] instances of actually divergent laws on the same subject within the priestly code will be referred to in § 21.

(b) The several laws are worked inorganically into the historical framework though often in the vaguest manner.

The laws are delivered to Moses or to Moses and Aaron (cp § 1). Sometimes the place of delivery (e.g., Lev. 1 1 7 38) or time (ib.) is defined. At times (e.g., Lev. 8) a law is cast entirely in the form of a history of its first appearance; and generally what Aaron is bidden to do may be taken as a standing law—actual or ideal—for the priests of the writer's own day. Very frequently, however, the law is quite general in its terms and is only loosely connected with the history by the introductory formulæ (see, e.g., Lev. 1-7 23—exclusive of the parts belonging to H).

(c) Whether or not the history and the various bodies of law in P had a separate literary career of their own before they became united, history and laws belong to the same general period. The force of critical tradition in favour of the early date of the priestly history led Graf, it is true, in the first instance to place the laws, the date of the origin of which was too obvious to be ignored, remote in time from the history. The impossibility of this, however, was quickly seen, not only by Graf's critics, but also by himself. The fundamental characteristics of the laws which point to the period in which they originated are in the history merely a little less explicit. They are there. Laws and history alike presuppose, for example, the single place of sacrifice, the distinction between priests and Levites. In subsidiary matters too, the tie is equally close; both alike, for example, use a number to define the month, and both are generally marked by the same striking linguistic peculiarities.

The production then of this complex work was one of the chief results of literary activity in the earlier post-exilic period. We may consider the possibilities and probabilities with regard to the stages in its growth in connection with the other achievement of the period—the union of this complex whole or of its various parts with JED.

Here we must consider the external evidence. Unfortunately that evidence is ambiguous; and scholars are much divided in their interpretation of it. The evidence consists of the account of the acceptance of 'the law of God which was given by Moses the servant of God' (Neh. 10 29) contained in Neh. 8-10—chapters derived from the memoirs of Ezra but worked over to some degree by the excerptor (see EZRA ii., § 5). Now the law to which the people bound themselves on the 24th day of the 7th month of the year 444 was, at least pre-eminently, the law of P.

19. The Tōrāh of Neh. 8-10.

It is quite clearly P's law of the feast of booths that is found written in the law (Neh. 8 14 f.); for the festival lasts eight days (Neh. 8 18) in accordance with Lev. 23 36 (cp 2 Ch. 7 9 f.), not seven as commanded in Dt. 16 13 (cp 1 K. 8 66 Ezek. 45 25 Lev. 23 41, H). Then compare further in detail the ordinances described in Neh. 10 32-39 with the relevant laws in P—for detailed references see the commentators: note especially the agreement, as to the dues demanded, of Neh. 10 36-40 with Nu. 18; on the relation of 10 32 to Ex. 30 13 f. cp below, § 21 (a).

Was, then, the 'law of God,' read by Ezra and interpreted by the priests and Levites to the people, simply the historico-legal work contained in P, or was it this work already combined with JED and therefore substantially the Pentateuch in its present form? The former alternative certainly seems more probable on the face of it. Would a self-contradictory work like the Pentateuch in its present form have produced the desired effect?

The view that Ezra's law consisted of P alone has been held and defended, inter alios, by Kayser (Das vorexilische Buch, pp. 195 f.), Reuss (Gesch. d. heiligen Schriften des AT[(2)], §§ 377 ff.), Kuenen (Hex. 303), Holzinger (Einl. 438 f.). In addition to the argument already suggested, it is urged that the time allowed in Neh. 8 for reading and interpreting would not have permitted of Lev. 23 being reached by the second day if the whole Pentateuch, not simply P, was the book read. The opposite view—that Ezra read P combined with JED—is adopted, almost of necessity, by adherents of the older critical school (e.g., Di. NDJ 672 f.; Kit. 93 f.), but also by others (e.g., We. Prol.[(4)], 415). Among the grounds adduced for this view is the fact that marriage with aliens (Neh. 10 30 [31]) is expressly forbidden not in P but only in other parts of the Pentateuch (Ex. 34 12 Dt. 7 2 ff.).

5. Later Post-Exilic (post-Ezran) Period.—On the answer to the questions raised at the end of the last section must largely turn our view of post-Ezran literary activity. Most of what will be here discussed must be thrown back before the period of Ezra, if the view that the law read by him was (substantially) the whole Pentateuch be adopted; and some of the processes may in any case have fallen rather in the previous period; a further preliminary remark needing to be made is this, that any strict chronological sequence of the processes now to be mentioned cannot be established. Various hypotheses may be made which nothing yet known serves either to invalidate or confirm. With these precautions we proceed to enumerate various editorial and supplementary labours to which criticism has drawn attention. In some cases it is tolerably certain that those who undertook them were successors of Ezra.

20. Later history of P.

(a) The union of P with JED. This must have occurred, if not before (see preceding section), within a generation or two after, Ezra; otherwise it would be difficult to account for the practical identity of the Jewish and Samaritan Pentateuchs (see CANON, § 24 f.). The result of the union was important; the pre-eminently historico-prophetic character of JED becomes in the whole complex work entirely subordinate to the legal and priestly character of the later work with which it is incorporated which now gives its dominant note to the whole.

The earlier fortunes of JE fall for consideration almost entirely under historical literature; later they are lost in those of the great legal work which henceforward is the normative influence alike over literature (cp CHRONICLES) and over life.

(b) Removal of Joshua.—The process just mentioned was doubtless associated with another. The history of P extended to the conquest of Canaan (cp JOSHUA ii., §§ 5, 12). This last part of the work, dealing with events subsequent to the death of Moses, no longer forms part of 'the law.' Whether this truncation of P took place at the actual time of the union with JED or subsequently may be left undecided; but the date of the process, like that of the union of P and JED, hangs on the date of the Samaritan Pentateuch, which does not contain the book of Joshua.

(c) Expansions of P (or of JEDP). The complexity of P has been briefly discussed already (§ 18). We must here draw more special attention to sections, related in style and spirit to P, which do not appear to have formed part of it originally and certainly may be of post-Ezran origin. The determination of the secondary or primary character of many particular sections of priestly character must often remain inconclusive, for it frequently turns on general considerations which will weigh differently with different minds.[1] If it is unlikely that the law Ezra read was encumbered with the irrelevant histories of J E and the irreconcilable laws of the earlier legislation and Dt., it is scarcely less unlikely that it contained the self-contradictory laws to be found within P or the different representations of the tabernacle and its appurtenances that underlie Ex. 25-31 as well as many of the laws. On the other hand some laws not immediately and conspicuously connected with the history (e.g., those of Lev. 23) must already have been united with the priestly history (§ 18 f). Still, the account in Neh. 8-10 fails to carry us far in actually determining the extent of legal matter contained in Ezra's law-book. As illustrations of the type of expansions to which P was subject the following may be cited.

21. Additions to P.

(α) Laws representing and enforcing actual modifications of praxis. In one or two cases it is tolerably certain that these are not only secondary but also post-Ezran.

For example, the temple tax in the time of Ezra was one-third of a shekel (Neh. 10 32), and, apparently, a novelty; the law of Ex. 30 11-16 (cp 2 Ch. 24 6-10) demands half a shekel; this latter amount was actually paid in later times (Mt. 17 24; cp Schür. GJV[(2)], 2 206). The most natural conclusion is that the law of Ex. 30 11-16 is an expansion of P (which is further indicated by its presupposing Nu. 1) subsequent to the time of Ezra. Again, the tithe on cattle payable to the Levites according to Lev. 27 30-33 and referred to in 2 Ch. 31 6 seems to be as little recognised in Nu. 18 21 Neh. 10 36-38 [35-37] as in Dt. 14 22-29 26 12-15. Once again, the law in Lev. 27 30-33 seems to belong to the post-Ezran period; but in this case it must be placed earlier than the date of Chronicles. Many other similar cases of modifications within P give less clue to the date of their incorporation in the priestly work or the Pentateuch.

(β) Another type of expansions is perhaps to be found in laws embodying practice sufficiently ancient and even primitive, but sanctioned only as a concession to popular feeling by the scribal class.

For example, the ordeal of JEALOUSY (Nu. 5 11-31) and the cleansing by the ashes of the red heifer (Nu. 19) are certainly in some respects primitive. In their present form they betray the general stylistic characteristics of the priestly school; but they stand isolated and unrelated (so far as can be seen) to the main scheme of the priestly work. Cheyne accounts in a similar manner for the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16); see AZAZEL, § 4; Jewish Rel. Life, 75 f.

(γ) A third type of expansions consists of additions to the more historical or quasi-historical material. Most notable is the repetition (Ex. 35-40)—in the form of a detailed account of carrying these into effect—of the directions to build the tabernacle.

Here the relation of MT and 𝔊 renders it probable that we have to do with tolerably late expansions. Whether or not many other sections (e.g., Nu. 7) are primary or secondary depends largely on the assurance with which we are prepared to judge the possibilities of the original writer's prolixity. For details see EXODUS, § 5, LEVITICUS, §§ 2 ff., NUMBERS, § 17 ff.

(δ) Another set of expansions of the primary work is indicated by references to the 'altar of incense' or the 'golden altar.' This is unknown to Ex. 25-29, and first appears in the supplemental section Ex. 30 1-10. The original priestly narrative knows only a single altar, termed simply 'the altar,' and distinguished by the later writers from 'the altar of incense' as the altar of burnt-offering. Cp further Wellhausen, CH(2), 139 ff.

Such are some of the leading instances of the expansion of the law after it had become fixed as to its main form. By degrees the reverence for the letter, which a few centuries later we know to have been intense, must have rendered it difficult to incorporate new matter, and especially new matter differing essentially from the written law. Glosses may have been made even later; such is the conclusion suggested by a comparison of MT with the versions, especially 𝔊.

6. Rabbinic Period.—As there had been laws before there was any legal literature (§ 7), so there was much legal activity after the legal literature collected in the Old Testament was complete. To some extent this later activity found a literary outlet in some of the Apocalyptic Literature (APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, §§ 2, 58).

22. Post-biblical period.

To a much larger extent it spent itself in the production of an oral tradition which had grown to great proportions by the first century A.D. But whereas the oral tradition that apparently lies behind the earliest collections of written law in the OT was a record based on actual practice and precedent, the later oral tradition (in its turn the source and indeed the contents of another great literature—the Rabbinic) was largely casuistical; it concerned cases that might arise at least as much as cases that had arisen. The law of God was no longer established custom; its principles were contained in the written law and were capable of being applied to the minutest circumstances of life. It is with this minute application, with this working out of the older law, that the 'traditions of the fathers' which constitute the Mishna are concerned.

23. Mishna, Talmud, etc.

As the first fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.) gave a stimulus to the fixing of much of previously existing law and to the consideration of the law of the future (§§ 14-16), so the second fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), and the final dispersion of the Jews from their religious centre, added zest to the pursuit of the law and to the systematisation of the legal discussions of the Rabbis. It is the discussions of the Rabbis who lived between 70 A.D. and about 200 A.D. that chiefly constitute the Mishna. Earlier Rabbis are mentioned comparatively speaking with extreme rarity. But when was this traditional discussion written down? It is generally assumed that it was about 200 A.D. Still, it is not certain, either that none of it had been written earlier, or that all of it was written then; by that date it had in any case assumed a fixed shape or arrangement whether as oral tradition or in writing; and thenceforward it became the subject of further discussion both in the Palestinian and the Babylonian schools. This discussion is known as the Gĕmārā.[1] Mishna and Gĕmārā together constitute the Talmud or rather the Talmuds. The result of the Palestinian discussions on the Mishna was the Palestinian or Jerusalem Talmud, completed towards the end of the fourth century or during the fifth century A.D.; the result of similar discussions in Babylon was the Babylonian Talmud completed about 500 A.D.

The Talmud is the chief literary product of late Jewish legal discussion; but it is by no means our only one. For example, under the title of Tōsephtā we still possess a collection of discussions of the Mishnic age which resembles the Mishna in being arranged according to topics, but never gained the same authoritative position. Another branch of this literature consists of commentaries (Midrāshīm) on the sacred text. Here of course the arrangement is not according to subject; from the nature of the case it follows the arrangement of the biblical text. The earliest works of this kind, belonging in their original form to the second century A.D. and thus closely related in time as well as in contents with the Mishna, are Mĕchiltā (on part of Exodus), Siphrā (on Leviticus), and Siphrē (on Numbers and Deut.). Any discussion of the Talmud and the Mishnic literature falls outside the limits of this article and must be sought for elsewhere.[1] It has been necessary, however, to refer to it. The movement begun by Deuteronomy does not close within the period of the OT; its goal is the Talmud; its course covers more than a thousand years. Deuteronomy does much to crystallise principles into rules and thereby partly strangles the free prophetic life, to which it so largely owed its existence. Still the principles survive in it: the appeal to motive is constant. The subsequent history of law-literature, however, is the history of the increasing supremacy of rules based on the past over the living spirit of the present. Ezekiel indeed questions and displaces deuteronomic laws; the Priestly Code amends Ezekiel; but thenceforward law always professedly adheres to the norm of scripture, the written word; the Mishna is the interpretation of the written law: the Gemara the interpretation of the Mishna. G. B. G.

[1] In addition to the discussions of the Amōrāim or post-Mishnic doctors which constitute the main body of the Gĕmārā and are written in Aramaic, the Gĕmārā contains also sayings of older doctors not contained in the Mishna, but written like the Mishna in Hebrew. These are named Bārāithā (בָּרַיְתָא).

LAWYER (νομικος), Mt. 22 35, etc., Tit. 3 13. See LAW AND JUSTICE, and cp SCRIBES.

'Lawyer' is also given in RVmg. as a rendering of the obscure word חפתיא in Dan. 3 2. See SHERIFF.

LAZAR HOUSE (בֵּית הַחָפְשִׁית), 2 K. 15 5 RVmg., EV 'several house.' See LEPROSY, col. 2767, n. 1.

LAZARUS (λαζαρος [Ti. WH]). The name, which is a contraction of ELEAZAR[2] (q.v.)—i.e. 'God has helped'—was specially appropriate for the central figure in any story illustrating the help of God.

1. Name.

For OT examples see Ex. 18 4 2 S. 23 9 f. In the period of Judaism we may expect to find the divine help more distinctly recognised. Cp Ps. 46 1 [2] 'a very present help in trouble'; 70 6 [5] 'I am poor and needy; make haste unto me, O God: thou art my help and my deliverer.' When poverty and piety were synonymous it was natural to favour such names as Eleazar and Eliezer. Eleazar is the name given to (2 Macc. 6 18-31) the scribe called by Chrysostom (1258) 'the foundation of martyrdom,' a type of those who (4 Macc. 7 19) 'believe that, to God, they do not die' (and see 3 Macc. 6 1 f.).

2. Unique story in Lk.

In Lk. 16 19-31 Lazarus is introduced thus: '. . . and he that marries one that is put away . . commits adultery. Now[3] there was a certain rich man . . . and a certain beggar named Lazarus was laid at his gate full of sores.'[4] It is not surprising that the context, and the giving of a name to the central figure of the story, induced early commentators to suppose that this was a narrative of facts.[5] Certainly if the story is one

[2] Hor. Hebr. on Lk. 16 20 (and cp ib. on Jn. 11 1) quotes Juchasin: 'Every R. Eleazar is written without an א'—i.e., R. Lazar.

[3] D and Syr. Sin. om. 'now.'

[4] The Arabic Diatess. (ed. Hogg) alters order and text thus (Lk. 16), '(15) Ye are they that justify yourselves . . . the thing that is lofty before men is base before God. (19) And he began to say, A [certain] man was rich . . .' This, besides indicating that a parable or discourse is commencing, gives it a logical connection with the charges just brought against the 'money-loving' Pharisees.

[5] Iren. iv. 2 4 (see Grabe's note on 'Græcorum et Latinorum Patrum mutuus consensus'). 'Non autem fabulam' might possibly mean 'not a mere tale but a tale with a lesson'; but see also the inferences deduced from the story in Iren. ii. 34 1, and Tertull. De Anim. 7. Tertullian, however, guards himself against the conclusion that nothing can be inferred from the story if it is imaginary.

LAZARUS

of Jesus' parables, it is difficult to see why, contrary to usage, the principal character in it receives a name. Taking this mention of a name together with other unique features of the story (the elaborate details about Hades, and the technical use of the phrase 'Abraham's bosom'), may we not conjecture that we have in Lk. 16 19-31, not the exact words of Jesus, but an evangelic discourse upon his words (placed just before it by the Arabic Diatessaron)—'that which is exalted among men is an abomination in the sight of God'? If so, the insertion of the name Lazarus (= Eliezer) will be parallel to the insertions of names (e.g., Longinus) in the Acta Pilati; the typical character of the name has been indicated already (see above, § 1). The final words of the story ('neither will they be persuaded' etc.) seem more like an evangelic comment after Christ's resurrection than like a prediction of Christ before it.

3. Unique narrative in Jn.

The narrative in Jn. 11 opens thus, 'Now (δέ) there was a certain man sick, Lazarus of (ἀπό) Bethany from (ἐκ) the village of Mary and Martha her sister.[1] Now (δέ) Mary was she that anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped his feet with her hair: and it was her brother that (ἧς ὁ ἀδελφός) was sick. The sisters, therefore, sent to him, saying, Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick.'[2] Lazarus is here referred to as one who required an introduction. This view is confirmed by the fact that his name is mentioned only in the unique narrative in Lk. 16 19-31, the historical character of which is very justly disputed. The sisters of Lazarus too are not named at all by the first two evangelists. Yet the name of this Lazarus, about whom the Synoptists are silent, is connected by Jn. with the greatest of the miracles; for it appears from Jn. 11 39 that Lazarus, when Jesus arrived, had been four days dead, a circumstance that differentiates this miracle from the parallel miracle at NAIN[3] (q.v.), and makes it the climax of Christ's wonderful works. The synoptic silence has never been explained.

To remark that for the Jews and for the evangelists alike 'it was one of "many signs" (11 47), and not essentially distinguished from them,'[4] is to ignore Jn.'s dramatic power in delineating character. For the blind Pharisees no doubt this stupendous wonder was but one of 'many signs'; but only in Jn. And this was because Jn. wishes to represent the Pharisees as being stupendously blind. It was plainly not one of 'many signs' for the multitudes in Jerusalem who flocked to meet Jesus (Jn. 12 18) 'because they heard that he had done this sign.' In the same way the Pharisees think nothing of the healing of a man born blind. The blind man, however, reminds them that such a sign was never worked* 'since the world began.' The Acta Pilati represents the Roman Governor as unmoved by all the other evidence of Jesus' miracles; but when he hears of the climax, the raising of Lazarus after he had been four days dead, he 'trembles.'[5]

The distinction drawn above between the Fourth Evangelist and the Synoptists unfairly discredits the latter. We must not maintain, without any evidence but their silence, that the Synoptists were as stupid or as perverse as Christ's most bigoted and vindictive adversaries.

The common-sense view of the Synoptic omission of this miracle is like the common-sense view of the omission in the book of Kings of the statement made in the parallel passages of Chronicles—that God answered David and Solomon by fire from heaven. The earlier author omitted the tradition because he did not accept it and probably had never heard it. It was a later development.[1]

4. On what traditions is the account based?

Is then the record of the Raising of Lazarus a fiction? Not a fiction, for it is a development. But it is non-historical, like the History of the Creation in Genesis, and like the records of the other miracles in the Fourth Gospel; all of which are poetic developments (attempts to summarise and symbolise the many 'mighty works' of Jesus recorded by the Synoptists in seven typical 'signs' expressing his work before the Resurrection). The words of Jesus the Fourth Evangelist has obviously not attempted to present in the form and style assigned to them by his predecessors, and the same statement applies to the Johannine account of the acts of Jesus. This, however, does not prevent us from discerning in many cases one original beneath the two differing representations. For example, we can see a connection between the healing of the man born blind and the Synoptic accounts of the healing of blindness; and in Jn.'s account of the miraculous draught of fishes after the Resurrection we perceive clear traces of Lk.'s account of a similar event placed at an early period. So in the present case, if we are to study the Raising of Lazarus, in which a very large part is assigned to the intercession of Martha and Mary, the first step must be to go back to traditions about the sisters, and to attempt to explain the origin of the belief that they had a brother called Lazarus and that he was raised from the dead.

5. Anointing in Bethany.

Before we proceed to this, however, it may be well to remind the reader of the influence exerted by names and sometimes by corruptions of names on the development of traditions.[2] The student of the evangelic traditions is repeatedly called upon to apply this key, and we shall have to do so in studying the parallel narratives of the anointing of Jesus in Bethany given by Mk., Mt., and Jn. respectively. Mk.'s preface is (Mk. 14 3) 'And while he was in Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, while he was sitting down to meat' (ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ Σίμωνος τοῦ λεπροῦ κατακειμένου αὐτοῦ). Mt. 26 6 has simply τοῦ δὲ Ἰησοῦ γενομένου ἐν B. ἐν οἰκίᾳ Σ. τοῦ λεπροῦ. Now, ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ in Mk. 9 33, 10 10 means 'in the house,'—i.e., 'indoors,' no name of owner being added. Hence Mk. is capable of being rendered, 'While he was in Bethany in the house, Simon the leper himself [also] sitting down.' The parallel in Jn. is (Jn. 12 1-2) 'Jesus therefore . . . came to Bethany where was (ὅπου ἦν) Lazarus . . . So they made him a supper there, and Martha was serving, but Lazarus was one of them that sat at meat with him (ὁ δὲ Λ. εἷς ἦν ἐκ τῶν ἀνακειμένων σὺν αὐτῷ),' which certainly suggests, though not definitely stating, that the house belonged to Lazarus. It has been pointed out elsewhere, however, (GOSPELS, § 10), that 'belonging to the leper' might easily have been confused with 'Lazarus,' so that the name may have sprung from a corruption of the phrase. As regards the dropping of the name 'Simon,' an analogy is afforded by Ecclus. 50 27*a*, where, according to the editors of the recovered Hebrew text,[3] it is prob-

[1] Cp the prepositions in Jn. 1 44 f. 46 7 42 52.

[2] Ἦν δὲ M. has an exact parallel in Jn. 18 14. Such 'clauses of characterisation' are frequent in Jn. (e.g., 7 50, and cp 19 39 'he that came to him before, or, by night'). They keep before the reader the personality of the person described and prepare him for a new manifestation of the personality.

[3] See Acta Pil. 8 and cp Hor. Hebr. on Jn. 11 39. 'For three days the spirit wanders about the sepulchre expecting if it may return into the body. But when it sees that the form or aspect of the face is changed then it hovers no more but leaves the body to itself.' Cp JOHN, § 20.

[4] Westcott on Jn. 11 1. On the argument from the silence of the Synoptists see further GOSPELS, §§ 58 f.

[5] Acta Pil. 8. 'And others said, "He raised Lazarus . . ."' Why does not Lazarus himself testify before Pilate, like the man who (Jn. 5 1) had been diseased thirty-eight years, and Bartimæus (not mentioned by name, though) and the woman with the issue, and others, 'a multitude both of men and women'? Was he supposed to be in hiding, or dead? A Lazarus is mentioned (ib. 2) as one of twelve Jews who testify that Jesus was 'not born of fornication.'

[1] See the writer's Diatessarica (287-9) for an explanation of the possible confusion between 'answering a sacrifice-by-fire' and 'answering a sacrifice by-fire.' The Hebrew 'sacrifice-by-fire' is almost identical in form with the word meaning 'fire.'

[2] For OT instances see the author's Diatessarica (46-54).

[3] See their note ad loc. It seems worth while, however, to add that 𝔊, while dropping 'for Simon' (לשמעון), adds Ἱεροσολυμείτης (א* has ἱερεὺς ὁ Σολυμείτης). May not the latter be a confused representation of the former? Owing to its similarity to other common words and phrases, "Simon," in Hebrew, might easily be inserted or omitted in translating from Hebrew. See note on Lk. 7 36 below.

able that the 'son of Sirach' was originally called 'Simon son of Jesus,' but that 'Simon son of' was dropped.

But at this point, if we are to understand the steps by which Jn. was led to his conclusions concerning Lazarus, it is necessary to realise the obscurity that he must have found hanging over the story of the anointing of Jesus in the house of 'Simon the Leper,' where Lazarus seemed to him to have been present.

6. 'The leper,' an error.

Such a surname as 'the leper' is antecedently improbable,[1] and it is omitted by Jn.; but its difficulty indicates that it was not an interpolation but a corruption, possibly a conflation of the name of the place commonly called Bethany. Jn. alone appears to call this (Jn. 11 1) 'a village'; and he places it (ib. 18) 15 furlongs, which is exactly two Talmudic miles[2]—i.e., a Sabbath day's journey with return—from Jerusalem. This fixed the position, of course, for the first Christian pilgrims, and subsequently for the Church. But it did not succeed in imposing the name on the natives, who call the spot defined by Jn., not Bethany, but el-'Āzarīyeh. This fact, and Lk.'s comparative silence,[3] and the total silence of Josephus (even in the details of the siege), and the Talmudic variations of spelling and of statement (connecting it with 'unripe figs' and 'shops'), and Mk.'s description of Bethany as apparently nearer to Jerusalem than Bethphage (Mk. 11 1, 'to Bethphage and Bethany')—all indicate that Bethany was not really a village, but simply (like Bethphage) a precinct of the city, a part of the great northern suburb minutely described by Josephus.

7. 'Bethany,' perhaps 'Bezetha.'

This suburb is casually mentioned as (Jos. BJ ii. 19 4) 'what is familiarly-called both Bezetha and The-New-City (τήν τε Βεζεθὰν προσαγορευομένην καὶ τὴν Καινόπολιν).'[4] Then, describing its gradual growth, and its subsequent enclosure in a wall by Agrippa, the historian speaks of (ib. v. 4 2) 'the hill (λόφον) that is called (καλεῖται) Bezethana (so Big. and Voss., but Ruf. Zebethana, Huds. Bezetha)'; and he goes on to say (ib.) 'But by the people of the place the new-built portion was called Bezetha (ἐκλήθη δ' ἐπιχωρίως Βεζεθὰ τὸ νεόκτιστον μέρος),' perhaps meaning that the citizens contracted 'Bezethana' to 'Bezetha,' but more probably that the name, in both forms, was vernacular and difficult to represent exactly in Greek. He does not directly and straightforwardly say that 'Bezetha' means 'new city,' but that (ib.) 'being interpreted, it would be called in the Greek tongue new city (Ἑλλάδι γλώσσῃ καινὴ λέγοιτ' ἂν πόλις).' This may well mean that 'new city' would be the way to express in Greek a Jewish name not capable of being at once literally and briefly translated:[1] and this view is confirmed by the fact that he never introduces the name without a sort of apology ('the people call it,' etc.).

That there was such a vernacular name appears from four parallel versions of a Jewish tradition given by Grätz (Gesch. 774 ff.), to the effect that Jerusalem had as a suburb 'two Slices,'[2] a lower (no doubt corresponding to the 'lower Kainopolis' of Josephus) and a higher. The higher was considered by common people, the lower even by strict Pharisees, as part of the Holy City, for the purpose of eating the meat of sacrifices, and so forth. The word for 'Slice' is 'Betze' or 'Beze,' which, with the addition of the word 'lower,' might easily correspond to Josephus' 'Bezethana.'[3] And having regard to the many variations and abbreviations probable in a vernacular name, and to those actually existent in Josephus, we can well understand how such a name may have been confused by some with the Mt. of Olives, and by others called 'Bethany.'[4] It is also similar to the Hebrew for 'leper.'[5] Lastly, it may throw light on the parallel tradition in Lk. (7 36) about a Pharisee asking Jesus to eat (bread).[6]

1 In 1 K. 11 26, Jeroboam's mother is certainly called 'Zeruah,' but this is either a deliberate insult or a corruption (see col. 2404, n. 2). Cp Levy, NHWB (חרם), on the recognised impropriety of giving people nick-names from personal blemishes (a custom common among the Romans, but not among the Jews).

2 Hor. Hebr. 1 262.

3 Lk. only mentions the exact Synoptic name once (Lk. 24 50) 'as far as to(wards) (ἕως πρός) Bethany,' in connection with the Ascension, the return from which is described as (Acts 1 12) 'from the mountain called the Place-of-Olives (Ἐλαιῶνος), which is near Jerusalem, a sabbath day's journey.' Lk. 19 29 has Βηθανιά, not Βηθανίαν.

4 The article before Καινόπολιν may be explained as a blending of the notions 'New Town' and 'the new town.' Strictly speaking, it ought to be τὴν Β. τε, not τὴν τε Β. But the irregularity might easily be paralleled from Thucydides. Moreover the text may be a condensation of τὴν τήν τε Β. καὶ τὴν Κ. προσαγ. 'which is called the Bezetha and the Kainopolis.' It seems clear from the next extract that Bezetha, or Bezethana, was the Jewish name for Kainopolis or New-town, and that the two names did not denote different places. If Josephus wrote in every case Βεζεθάν, it might easily be corrupted into Βεζεθά, being written Βεζεθᾶ. There is one previous mention, also casual, describing Roman soldiers forcing their way up to the temple (BJ ii. 15 5) 'through what is called Bezetha' διὰ τῆς Βεζεθὰ καλουμένης. As variants Niese's Index cites Βεζαθά, Βεζεθ., Βεθαζά, Βεθεζ., Ἀβισσάθη.

1 That Josephus never dreamed of identifying Bezetha with the Har-hazaithim—i.e., (Zech. 14 4) Mt. of Olives—is clear from many passages and especially from BJ v. 12 2, 'He (Titus) built the wall to the lower New-City (τὴν κατωτέρω Καινόπολιν) . . . and thence passing through Kedron, to the Mount of Olives.' Levy (Chald. Lex.) does not mention 'Beth-zaithim, House of Olives,' as one of the names by which the Mt. of Olives was called. It seems to have been regularly called the Mt., or Hill, of Olives, or the Mt. of Oil.

2 'Slice' is intended to express the vernacular use of the word, and also the fact that the word is especially applied, in New Heb., to the 'breaking of bread'; cp Levy (Chald. Lex. 1 108 b) ביצועין, 'Brotstücke.' Grätz renders it here 'Parcellen,' 'Terrainstücke.'

3 That Josephus should transliterate the Heb. צ (ṣ) by the Gk. ζ (z) can excite no surprise: He regularly does this in the name 'Zoar,' for example. Also the interchange of ז and צ (as in צעיר) is frequent (Buhl, 209 b). 'Lower' is, in Grätz's extracts, תחתונה, taḥtōnah. Levy (NHWB) gives בצע as synonymous with בזע, and with בצר. 'Be(t)zertha' (בצירתא, Levy, Chald. Lex. 1 109 a) is the late Heb. for 'the separate place' (Ezek. 41 12-15) in the temple; but as regards בזאתא (suggested in Hastings, 2 594) the forms of the root given by Levy (Chald. Lex.) are said by him to mean only 'division of booty,' 'plunder.' It is perhaps worth adding that the only place-name in OT beginning with בזי, Josh. 15 28, 'Biziothiah (בזיותיה),' is read by 𝔊 בנותה, lit. 'her daughters'—i.e., suburbs, and is conflated accordingly, αἱ κῶμαι αὐτῶν καὶ αἱ ἐπαύλεις αὐτῶν.

4 Cp Mk. 11 19, 'And when it was evening they used to go forth outside the city,' Mt. 21 17 'he came forth outside the city to Bethany,' Lk. 21 37 'coming forth he used to lodge in the mount that is called [the mount] of Olives.' The divergences can perhaps be best explained as springing from an original 'to Bezetha(na),' paraphrased by Mk., conflated by Mt. with Bethany, and taken by Lk. as 'Place of Olives.' It should be noted that two of the versions of Grätz's above-quoted tradition begin 'Two Slices were on the Mount of Oil,' the third has 'in (ב) Jerusalem,' and the fourth 'there.' The third seems likely to have preserved the original, which perhaps meant 'connected with Jerusalem.' As the suburbs were outside Jerusalem proper, 'in' was naturally altered.

5 Reading בצעין as מצעין (a corruption very frequent in 𝔊) we have a word very similar to מצרע, 'leper.'

6 Not only is בצע, 'slice,' or 'fragment,' the regular N. Heb. word for 'breaking bread,' but also צבועין was a name given (Levy 4 143 a-b) to a class of hypocrites that aped the practices of the stricter Pharisees. Space fails to indicate all the traces of Hebrew influence on the narratives of the Anointing of Jesus. But one may be given. Lk., without introducing the host by name, represents Jesus as addressing him by name, thus (Lk. 7 40) 'Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee.' This is unexampled in the gospels. Yet it is most improbable that Lk. inserted—in this extraordinary place instead of at the commencement—what was not in his original, merely because a Simon the Leper had been mentioned in the Synoptic narrative. More probably the original had 'Hearken (שמע־נא) or hearken-to me (שמעני),' and Lk. mistook this for שמעון, 'Simon.' It may also be of use to point out that in Jn. 12 1 'where was Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead,' Delitzsch expresses 'where was' by the Heb. 'place' or 'home,' מקום. But this differs so little from מקים, 'raise up,' that the two are repeatedly confused by the LXX, Nah. 1 8 'the place thereof,' 𝔊 'they that are raised up,' Jer. 10 20 'and to set up,' 𝔊 'place' (and see 2 S. 22 49,

It is essential for the reader to keep steadily in view the traces of obscurity in the earliest Christian traditions in order that he may understand Jn.'s attitude towards them. Jn. is to be regarded neither as a fallacious historian nor as a poet putting aside history, but as a believer, so penetrated with the sense of the power of Christ's spirit, and at the same time so conscious of the obscurity, uncertainty, and inadequacy of the extant historical records of Christ, that he felt impelled towards a new representation both of his words and of his deeds. To describe the latter, he remoulded the gospel, fusing old traditions and new, written and oral, inferring, amplifying, spiritualising, but not inventing.

8. First inferences.

If, therefore, Jn. was led to believe that a man named Lazarus owned the house in which the anointing occurred, what inferences would he naturally make in accordance with his principle of blending scattered traditions? He found in Lk. (10 40) an account of a supper made for Jesus where Martha 'was cumbered about much serving,' while Mary sat at his feet and heard his discourse; and this he might identify with the meal at which the anointing took place. Martha, however (without name of husband or father of the house), was mentioned by Lk. as the hostess.[1] It followed that the house must have belonged in some sense to her as well as to Lazarus, and consequently that Lazarus must have been a younger brother. Hence would arise Jn.'s description of Lazarus as the brother of Mary and Martha; for indeed it was in this inferential way that Jn. had reasoned out the existence of a Lazarus.

The next step was to connect the name with Lk.'s Lazarus who was raised from the dead. The last words of Lk.'s Lazarus-narrative are, 'Neither will they believe though one went to them from the dead,' which might become the basis of a tradition that 'the Lord said concerning a man named Lazarus, who died and was buried, that the Jews would not believe (i.e., refused to believe) though one went to them from the dead.' But if this Lazarus who sat at meat when Martha served and Mary anointed Jesus' feet, had been raised from the dead by Jesus,—and that, too, after he had been buried—it followed that such a sign was the climax of all the 'signs' and would naturally come last of all. It must have been wrought at Bethany, since Lazarus's house was there. Yet Jesus could not have been at Bethany when Lazarus died—so the Evangelist would argue—for how could he remain and look on, and permit the death and burial? Jesus must therefore have been at a distance. In that case, Martha and Mary must surely have sent to him. Yet he must have known even at a distance what was happening; and if he knew, why did he not come? And how would the sisters endure his not coming? Upon the basis of all these inferences and questions the Evangelist proceeds to describe how the two sisters sent, and what they said when Jesus came, and how he answered their intercession—the result being the raising of Lazarus, the climax of Jesus' 'signs.'

9. Developments.

Some commentators maintain that the graphic style of the evangelist proves that he had seen or heard the scenes or discourses he describes. Among his most graphic passages, however, are the dialogues with Nicodemus and with the Samaritan woman, at neither of which was he present.

10. The motive.

'rise up against me,' 𝔊 [L] 'my place'). By themselves, these facts would have no weight; but taken in conjunction with the instances of apparent Hebrew influence (see Diatessarica, ii. 334, containing Index to passages from Jn.) they suggest the possibility of a conflation in Jn.; and they are worth mentioning here in order to help the reader to realise that Jn., as well as Lk. (though in a manner different from Lk.'s), may have attempted to correct existing histories, not by inventing, but by giving shape and order to vague and floating traditions.

1 'Martha' in New Heb. means sometimes 'mistress' (Levy, NHWB 3 234 b), 'the mistress (מרתה) of the house who received us.'

LAZARUS

The fact is, that Jn. writes as a mystical poet, imbued with Jewish traditions from Egypt as well as from Palestine, with a keen eye for human characteristics, but with a still deeper insight into the unfathomable love and spiritual power of Jesus, and with a desire to subordinate every word of his Gospel to the purpose of manifesting that love and that power to mankind.[1]

(i.) The book called Sohar, Zôhar (Schöttgen on Mt. 2 18), represents the Messiah as weeping when Rachel wept for her children. By Justin Martyr (Tryph. 134) and Irenæus (4 21) Rachel was recognised as the type of the Christian Church, and Justin saw in Leah the type of the Synagogue. (ii.) The Apostolic Constitutions (7 8) mention Lazarus with Job, apparently recognising in the raising of Lazarus a fulfilment of the famous prediction found in the received text of Job 19 26.[2] Traditions about Rachel and Job, as well as the Philonian explanation of Eliezer,[3] may very well have been in the evangelist's mind when he described the intercession of the two sisters and put into the mouth of Martha the words 'by this time he stinketh.' Nor is it farfetched to see a contrast between Lazarus—leaving the tomb still bound with grave-clothes and with the napkin round his head—and Jesus who, when he rose, left 'the linen cloths lying' and 'the napkin . . . rolled up in a place by itself.'

11. Symbolical Allusions.

The Greek allusions are of a different kind.

(i.) 11 33, 'He rebuked in his spirit' (ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι); cp 11 38, 'again rebuking in himself.' In Mk. 1 43 Mt. 9 30 the word ἐμβριμάομαι is applied to Jesus addressing, severally, a leper and two blind men. Probably Jn. wishes to dispel the impression that the half-suppressed exclamation of anger that sometimes accompanied Jesus' acts of healing was directed against the sufferer, whereas it was directed against the suffering regarded as Evil.[4]

12. Greek allusions.

(ii.) 11 33, 'he troubled himself.' This is probably an allusion both to (a) the refrain in Ps. 42 (41) and 43 (42) (𝔊) 'Why art thou exceeding-sorrowful, my soul (περίλυπος, RV 'cast down'), and why dost thou trouble-me-with' [? myself] (συνταράσσεις, RV 'disquieted within me'), and (b) to the synoptic use of the passage. The Greek 'exceeding-sorrowful' (περίλυπος) is rare in the LXX (see Concord.). In NT the word occurs in four passages, including Mk. 14 34 Mt. 26 38, 'My soul is exceeding-sorrowful even unto death.' These words are not in Lk. But an early interpolation in Lk., or edition of Lk., substituted (Lk. 22 44) an account of Christ 'engaged in a conflict (or, agony).' The problem of avoiding a word that might be a stumbling block, because it signified 'grief to excess,' and yet of inserting a fulfilment of scripture, corresponding to that in Mk., is solved here by Jn.'s using the other half of the Psalmist's sentence, namely, 'trouble me with myself' in the form 'he troubled himself.' By this extraordinary expression he indirectly meets an objection that must have occurred to the many thousands of Greeks and Romans who were familiar with the fundamental doctrine of Epictetus, 'Be free from trouble.' Jn. teaches that the Father himself wills that his children, including the eternal Son, should be 'troubled'—for one another. But what he wills, he does; and what he does, the Logos does. Therefore the Logos, here, 'troubled himself.' Later the Logos will be (12 27) 'troubled in soul,' and last of all, by the treachery of Judas (13 21), 'troubled in spirit.'

1 Regarded as a narrative of fact this story, like others in Jn., is defective. Even such commentators as Lightfoot and Westcott have severally inferred that the journey from beyond Jordan to Bethany occupied 'three days' (Bibl. Essays), 'about a day' (Westc. ad loc.).

2 Orig. Comm. on Jn. 1 5 (ed. Huet, vol. ii., p. 4 E) ὀδωδότα νεκρὸν ἀνέστησεν, Anaphor. Pilat. 'he raised up one that had been dead four days. . . . when the dead man had his blood corrupted and when his body was destroyed by the worms produced in it and when it had the stink of a dog.'

3 'Being interpreted, Eliezer is God my Help. For the mass [of flesh] imbued with blood is by itself liable to speedy dissolution, being indeed a corpse; but it is kept compact and quickened with a vital spark by the providence of God' (Op. 1 481).

4 In a passage quoted by Eusebius (HE v. 1 60) from a letter from the churches of Lyons, ἐμβρ. seems to mean 'loudly cursing' (not 'muttering curses'). Lucian uses it to express the deep angry 'bellowing' of Hecate (vol. i., p. 484, Necyom. 20, ἐνεβριμήσατο ἡ Βριμώ). Cp Ecclus. 13 3, 'The rich man wrongs you and bellows at you besides (προσενεβριμήσατο).' Celsus (Orig. Cels. 2 76) complains that Jesus 'threatens and reviles' on light occasions, and complains of Jesus' saying 'woe unto you.' Jn. never uses the word 'woe.' It is hardly likely that the difficulty of Mk. 1 43 Mt. 9 30 would have escaped educated assailants of the Gospels at the beginning of the second century.

To enter fully into the allusions with which this narrative teems would be to write a commentary on it. Without some insight into a few of them, however, no reader can dispassionately judge what is meant by the Johannine name 'Lazarus' or the poem of which it is the centre. E. A. A.

LEACH. See HORSELEECH, LILITH.

LEAD (עֹפֶרֶת, 'ōphéreth [see note below]; μολιβος, μολυβος [μολιβδος, μολυβδος]; plumbum). Though lead was doubtless well-known to the Hebrews from an early period, its applications were comparatively unimportant, and the OT references to it are not many.

(a) Its weight is alluded to in Ex. 15 10 (cp Acts 27 28), and the mason's and carpenter's plummet was no doubt as often made of lead as of tin, though the latter happens to be the material mentioned in Zech. 4 10. Indeed, the distinction between lead and tin (see TIN) was in early days but imperfectly realised.

(b) Before the use of quicksilver became known, lead was employed for the purpose of purifying silver, and separating it from other mineral substances (Plin. HN 32 31). To this Jeremiah alludes where he figuratively describes the corrupt condition of the people: 'In their fire the lead is consumed (in the crucible); the smelting is in vain, for the evil is not separated' (Jer. 6 29). Ezekiel (22 18-22) refers to the same fact, and for the same purpose, but amplifies it with greater minuteness of detail. Compare also Mal. 3 2 f.

(c) On Job 19 23 f. see WRITING. For the use of leaden tablets as writing material cp Paus. ix. 31 4 (leaden tablet, very time-worn, with the Works of Hesiod engraved on it) and Plin. H.N. 13 11.

(d) Although the Hebrew weights were usually of stone, and are indeed called 'stones,' a leaden weight denominated ănāk[1] (אנך; cp the Arabic word for lead) occurs in Amos 7 7 f. See PLUMBLINE.

(e) The employment of lead for the conveyance of water—known to the Greeks (Paus. iv. 35 12) and very familiar to the Romans—may perhaps have been resorted to by the Israelites, but does not seem to be alluded to in OT.

LEAH (לֵאָה; λ[ε]ια [BADEFL]); some scholars compare Ar. la'y, 'wild cow'; so Del. Prol. 80, WRS Kin. 195, 219, and doubtfully Nö. ZDMG 40 167 [1886]; P. Haupt compares Ass. li'at, 'mistress'; but on the possible analogy of Rachel [see JACOB, § 3] we may still more plausibly suspect Leah [Leaḥ?] to be a fragment of Jeraḥme'el [Che.]). The mother of the non-Josephite tribes of Israel. It was in the house of Joseph that the truest stock of Israel historically lay; in fact it was, according to E, only by underhand dealings on the part of the Aramæan Laban that the Leah tribes ever really became Israelite. Still, even the Ephraimite traditions made the Leah tribe of Reuben Israel's firstborn, and did not even deny him a place in its account of the origin of Joseph (Gen. 30 14). See also RACHEL, TRIBE.

LEANNOTH (לְעַנּוֹת; του αποκριθηναι [BNA]) Ps. 88 title, RV^mg. 'for singing' (so Baethgen). Haupt (JBL, 1900, p. 70) explains, 'to cause to respond'—i.e., to cause God to grant the prayer—which is at any rate not unsuitable to the contents. The analogy of the corrupt לְהַזְכִּיר and לְלַמֵּד, however (38 70 60, in titles), suggests a different solution. לענות is an easy corruption of עלמת, which the scribe wrote as a correction of the corrupt מחלת. On 'Alamoth' see PSALMS, § 26 [1].

LEATHER. Although the word 'leather' (or 'leathern') occurs only three times in EV, once of the girdle of Elijah (2 K. 1 8 אֵזוֹר עוֹר, ζώνη δερματίνη) and twice of that of John the Baptist (Mk. 1 6 RV, AV 'a girdle of a skin'; Mt. 3 4), on both which see GIRDLE, 1, and the word 'tanner' is met with only in Acts 9 43 10 6 32, there can be no doubt that the Hebrews were familiar with the use of leather and the art of preparing it from the earliest times. Cp SKIN, PARCHMENT.

The 'leathern vessels' (כְּלֵי הָעוֹר), frequently referred to in Leviticus, may be supposed to have included shields and the like as well as belts and straps, 'bottles,' quivers and chariot-fittings, sandals and shoes (cp SHOES). The Egyptian monuments illustrate very graphically various stages in the working of leather (see, e.g., Wilk. Anc. Eg. 1 232 2 187 f.), though it would be hazardous to use this as an argument for the acquaintance of the Israelites with the higher branches of the art in the 'Mosaic age' (Ex. 25 5, P), of which we have no contemporary records.

[1] The Heb. words ănāk and 'ōphéreth find their analogies in the Ass. anaku and abāru, both of which are variously rendered 'lead' or 'tin' (see Muss-Arnolt who cites also 'antimony' for abāru). Both words are not unfrequently mentioned on Ass. inscriptions among articles of tribute, abāru in particular being sent from such districts as Commagene, Ḳue, Byblos, Melitene and Tabal; cp Del. Ass. HWB 9 b and reff.

LEAVEN is a general term for whatever is capable of generating the process of fermentation in a mass of dough (panary fermentation). Various substances were known in ancient times to possess this property.[1] The locus classicus for the leavens of NT times is Pliny, HN 18 26, according to which the most highly prized leaven was made in the vintage season by kneading millet or fine bran of wheat with must. In most cases, however, according to the same authority, the leaven employed was the same as that which alone is mentioned in OT or NT (see BREAD, § 1), namely a piece of fully fermented dough retained for the purpose from the previous day's baking ('tantum pridie adservata materie utuntur'). Such a piece might either be broken down in water in a basin before the fresh flour was added (Mĕnāḥōth 5 1 end) or it might be 'hid' in the flour (Mt. 13 33), and kneaded along with it. The Hebrews named this piece of fermented dough שְׂאֹר, ś'ōr—so always in MT, in the Mishna שְׂאוֹר, סְאוֹר, שִׂיאוֹר and סִיאוֹר—LXX and NT ζύμη (Ex. 12 15 19 13 7 Lev. 2 11 Dt. 16 4 Mt. 13 33, etc.).

1. Leaven explained.

שְׂאֹר is derived from an unused root שׂאר akin (according to Ges. Thes. 1318 b) to סִיר, and Arab. thāra (efferbuit); cp ζύμη from ζέω, and fermentum from ferveo; also leaven (mid. Lat. levamen) from levare. In RV ś'ōr is now consistently rendered throughout by leaven, AV having in Dt. 16 4 'leavened bread' (see below).

The mass of flour, water, and salt, in the kneading-trough, miš'éreth (מִשְׁאֶרֶת)[2]—with or without leaven—after being kneaded was termed bāṣēḳ (בָּצֵק), dough or 'sponge' (Ex. 12 34 39 2 S. 13 8 Hos. 7 4 Jer. 7 18); 𝔊 σταῖς, στέας, or στέαρ, NT φύραμα; in the Mishna most frequently עִיסָּה (from עסס to squeeze, knead [not as Levy from עֲרִיסָה]). If the dough contained no leaven and was baked before spontaneous fermentation had set in, the result was מַצָּה, maṣṣāh (for etymology see Ges.-Bu.(13), s.v. מצץ),—more fully לֶחֶם מַצָּה, unleavened bread (ἄζυμος [ἄρτος]), but most frequently in OT in the plur. מַצּוֹת, maṣṣōth, unleavened cakes. Dough that had thoroughly risen under the action of leaven or by spontaneous fermentation (Mĕnāḥōth 5 1) was termed חָמֵץ, ḥāmēṣ, 'leavened' (from חָמֵץ, Arab. ḥamuḍa, to be sharp or sour; cp Ger. 'Sauerteig,' Eng. 'sour dough'), and bread made therefrom, לֶחֶם חָמֵץ, leavened bread (Lev. 7 13). In all other passages, however, חָמֵץ is used substantively, as synonymous with מַחְמֶצֶת[3] (Ex. 12 19 f.), that which is leavened.[4] For the two words ś'ōr and ḥāmēṣ are not synonymous, as has been asserted, but related as

[2] This word should probably be pointed miś'éreth (מִשְׂאֶרֶת), from the same root שׂאר (see above), to 'rise,' that in which the dough rises. In Ex. 7 28 12 34 𝔊, followed by Vg. (conspersam farinam), has taken the word in an active sense, 'that which rises,' viz. dough (φύραμα).

[3] Mr. James Death has devoted a book, The Beer of the Bible, one of the unknown leavens of Exodus (1887), to an abortive attempt to prove that מחמצת is to be identified with an ancient Egyptian beer, similar to the modern būza.

[4] In half the passages ḥāmēṣ is correctly rendered by 𝔊 as ζυμωτόν (Ex. 13 7 Lev. 2 11), [ἄρτοι] ζυμῖται (Lev. 7 13 [3]), ἄ. ἐζυμωμένοι (Lev. 23 17), in the rest (Ex. 12 15 [cod. 72, ζυμωτόν] 13 3 23 18 34 25 Dt. 16 3) incorrectly by ζύμη.

cause and effect (cp the Vg. renderings fermentum and fermentatum). In the OT at least śᵉ'ōr is always leaven; the verb אָכַל, to eat, is never applied to it, but to ḥāmēṣ (hence we read, Talm. Pĕsāḥīm 5*a*, שאור שאינו ראוי לאכילה, leaven which is not fit for eating).

In the later Hebrew of the Mishna, however, this distinction is not always observed; hence we find śᵉ'ōr applied not only to leaven proper, but also to the dough in the process of leavening (usually עִסָּה). Thus, in the interesting passage, Pĕsāḥ. 3 5, in answer to the question how the beginning of the process of fermentation is to be recognised in the dough (שִׂיאוּר), two replies are given: 'When the surface of the dough shows small cracks, like the antennæ of locusts, running in different directions,' and again: 'When the surface has become pale, like (the face of) one whose hair stands on end (through fear)'!

The leaven of OT and NT, then, is exclusively a piece of sour dough. In the warm climate of Palestine, fermentation is more rapid than with us, and it is said that if flour is mixed with water, spontaneous fermentation will set in and be completed in twenty-four hours. It is often stated, and is not improbable, that the Jews also used the lees of wine as yeast; but the passages cited by Hamburger (viz., Pĕsāḥīm 3 1 and Ḥallah 1 7) do not bear this out.

The use of leaven being a later refinement in the preparation of bread (see BREAD, § 1), it may be regarded as certain that offerings of bread to the deity were from the first unleavened. The cakes of the shewbread, according to the unanimous testimony of Philo, Josephus, Talmud, and Midrash (see reff. under SHEWBREAD), remained unleavened to the end. In all cereal offerings, any portion of which was destined to be burnt on the altar, the use of leaven, as of honey, was excluded (Lev. 24 11 7 12 8 2 Nu. 6 15);[1] though where the offering was not to be placed upon the altar, but to be eaten by the priests, it might contain bread that was leavened (Lev. 7 13 23 17 [Pentecostal loaves]; cp Am. 4 5 [cakes of thank-offering],[2] also Mĕnāḥōth 5 1 ff.). The antiquity of this exclusion of ferment from the cultus of Yahwè is vouched for by the early enactment Ex. 34 25*a* (from J's decalogue), and its parallel 23 18 (Book of the Covenant). It is possible, however, that the former passage may refer only to the Passover, for which, as for the accompanying festival of Maṣṣōth, unleavened cakes (as the name denotes), elsewhere named the 'bread of affliction' (Dt. 16 3), were alone permitted. According to later enactment, still scrupulously and joyfully observed in Jewish households, search had to be made in every nook and cranny of the house with a lighted candle on the eve of the Passover for leaven, which when found was destroyed by burning (Pĕsāḥ. 1 1; for details see PASSOVER). It is important to note the precise ritual definition of the leaven (śᵉ'ōr) to be destroyed. Under śᵉ'ōr, for the purpose of this enactment, were included (1) pieces of leavened or sour dough of the meal of any one of the five cereals, wheat, barley, and the less common spelt, 'fox-ear' and shīphōn (see FOOD, § 3) which had been kneaded with cold water, and (2) certain articles of commerce, composed, in part at least, of the fermented grain of the above cereals. Such were Median spirits, Egyptian beer, Roman honey, paste, etc. Not included, on the other hand, were (1) the same cereals when mixed with any other liquid than cold water, as, e.g., the juice of the grape or other fruit (מֵי פֵּירוֹת; cp the passage from Geop. 2 33 quoted by Blümner, Technologie, etc., 1 59, n. 5, on the use of grape juice as a leaven), milk, wine, and even hot water, since these liquids were not held capable of setting up the prohibited fermentation, and (2) the meal of other plants, such as beans, lentils, millet, even when kneaded with cold water (see Pĕsāḥīm 3 1 ff., with the commentaries; Maimonides, הלכות חמץ ומצה).

2. Leaven in the cultus.

[1] The forms which such gifts of unleavened dough (maṣṣāh) might take were various. Besides the ordinary maṣṣōth or unleavened cakes kneaded with water, we find cakes of fine flour kneaded with oil, and wafers spread with oil, for which see BAKEMEATS, § 2 f.

[2] Some recent scholars of note have maintained, chiefly on the strength of this passage of Amos, which shows that leaven was admitted in the cultus of the Northern Kingdom, that the exclusion of leaven from the altar is not of great antiquity (see Now. HA 2 207 f.); but the view taken above certainly represents the better tradition of the cultus of the South.

The raison d'être of this exclusion of leaven from the cultus is not far to seek. In the view of all antiquity, Semitic and non-Semitic, panary fermentation represented a process of corruption and putrefaction in the mass of the dough. The fact that Ezekiel makes no provision for wine in his programme of the restored cultus (40 ff.) is probably due to his extending this conception to alcoholic fermentation as well. Plutarch's words (Quæst. Rom. 109) show very clearly this association of ideas: 'Now leaven is itself the offspring of corruption and corrupts the mass of dough with which it has been mixed' (ἡ δὲ ζύμη καὶ γέγονεν ἐκ φθορᾶς αὐτὴ καὶ φθείρει τὸ φύραμα μιγνυμένη). Further, as has been pointed out by Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem. (1)203, (2)220), the prohibition of leaven is closely associated with the rule that the fat and the flesh must not remain over till the morning (Ex. 23 18 34 25). He points also to certain Saracenic sacrifices, akin to the Passover, that had to be entirely consumed before the sun rose. The idea was that the efficacy lay in the living flesh and blood of the victim; everything of the nature of putrefaction was therefore to be avoided. The 'flamen dialis,' or chief priest of Jupiter at Rome, was forbidden the use of leaven (fermentata farina, Aul. Gell., 10 15) on the grounds suggested, no doubt rightly, by Plutarch (l.c.). At certain religious ceremonies of the phratria of the Lalyadæ, according to an inscription recently unearthed at Delphi, δαράται (unleavened cakes, according to Athenæus and Hesychius) played an important part.[1] The Roman satirist Persius, finally, employs the word fermentum (leaven) in the sense of moral corruption (1 24).

In the NT leaven supplies two sets of figures, one taken from the mode, the other from the result, of the process of fermentation. Thus Jesus likened the silent but effective growth of the 'kingdom' in the mass of humanity to the hidden but pervasive action of leaven in the midst of the dough (Mt. 13 33). The second figure, however, is the more frequent, and is based on the association, above elucidated, of panary fermentation with material and moral corruption (cp Bähr, Symbolik d. mos. Kultus, 2 322). Thus the disciples are warned against the leaven of the Pharisees (Mt. 16 6 ff. Mk. 8 15 Lk. 12 1 ff.), of the Sadducees (Mt. ib.), and of Herod (Mk. ib.). See HERODIANS. Paul, again, twice quotes the popular saying, 'a little leaven leavens the whole lump' (1 Cor. 5 6 Gal. 5 9), as a warning against moral corruption. The true followers of Christ are already 'unleavened' (ἄζυμοι 1 Cor. 5 7), and must therefore 'keep the feast,' that is, must live the Christian life 'in the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth' (5 8).

3. Figurative use of leaven.

In late Jewish literature, finally, we also meet with the figurative designation of the inherent corruption of human nature as leaven. Thus in Talm. Bĕrākhōth 17*a* it is said: 'Rabbi Alexander, when he had finished his prayers, said: Lord of the universe, it is clearly manifest before thee that it is our will to do thy will; what hinders that we do not thy will? The leaven which is in the dough' (שְׂאוֹר שֶׁבָּעִיסָּה, cp Gen. Rabba, § 34, cited by Levy, s.v. שְׂאוֹר), explained by a gloss as 'the evil impulse (יֵצֶר הָרַע) which is in the heart.' (For this Talmudic doctrine of 'original sin' see Hamburger, Realencycl. 2 1230 ff.; and in general the works of Lightfoot [on Mt. 16 6], Schoettgen [on 1 Cor. 5 6] and Meuschen.) A. R. S. K.

LEBANA (לְבָנָא, § 69; λαβανα [BℵA], λοβνα [L]), a family of NETHINIM (q.v.) in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii., § 9), Neh. 7 48 = Ezra 2 45

[1] MS note by Dr. J. G. Frazer.

Lebanah (לְבָנָה,[1] 'white'? ΛΑΒΑΝΩ [BA]) = 1 Esd. 5 29, LABANA.

LEBANON. The name (לְבָנוֹן, ΛΙΒΑΝΟΣ; once [Dt. 3 25] לְבָנֹן, ΑΝΤΙΛΙΒΑΝΟΣ [also in Deut. 1 7 3 25 11 24 Jos. 14 9 1, cp Judith 1 7]; Phœn. לבנן; Ass. labnāna. In prose the article is prefixed, except in 2 Ch. 2 7*b* [8*b*]; in poetry the usage varies), which comes from the Semitic root laban, 'to be white, or whitish,' probably refers, not to the perpetual snow, but to the bare white walls of chalk or limestone which form the characteristic feature of the whole range. Syria is traversed by a branch thrown off almost at right angles from Mt. Taurus in Asia Minor, and Lebanon is the name of the central mountain mass of Syria, extending for about 100 m. from NNE. to SSW. It is bounded W. by the sea, N. by the plain Jūn 'Akkār, beyond which rise the mountains of the Nuṣairīyeh, and E. by the inland plateau of Syria, mainly steppe-land. To the S. Lebanon ends about the point where the river Līṭānī bends westward, and at Bāniās. A valley narrowing towards its southern end, now called el-Buḳā', divides the mountainous mass into two great parts. That lying to the W. is still called Jebel Libnān; the greater part of the eastern mass now bears the name of the Eastern Mountain (el-Jebel esh-Sharḳi). In Greek the western range was called Libanos, the eastern Antilibanos. The southern extension of Antilibanus, Mt. Hermon, may be treated as a separate mountain (see HERMON, SENIR). For map see PHŒNICIA.

1. Name and position.

Lebanon and Antilibanus have many features in common; in both the southern portion is less arid and barren than the northern, the western valleys better wooded and more fertile than the eastern. In general the main elevations of the two ranges form pairs lying opposite one another; the forms of both ranges are monotonous, but the colouring splendid, especially when viewed from a distance; when seen close at hand, indeed, only a few valleys with perennial streams offer pictures of landscape beauty, their rich green contrasting pleasantly with the bare brown and yellow mountain sides.

2. Description.

The Lebanon strata are generally inclined, bent, and twisted, often vertical, seldom quite horizontal. Like all the rest of Syria, the Lebanon region also is traversed by faults, at which the different tracts of country have pressed against and crumpled one another. The buḳā' between Lebanon and Antilibanus came into existence in the place of a former trough or synclinal between two anticlinals, by a tearing up of the earth's crust and a stairlike subsidence of a succession of layers. The principal ranges of the Lebanon and Antilibanus along with the valley of the Buḳā' have the same trend as the faults, folds, and strata—viz., from SSW. to NNE.

3. Geology.

The range is made up of upper oolite, upper cretaceous, eocene, miocene, and diluvium.

The oldest strata in Lebanon itself, forming the deepest part of some of the valleys (Salīma, Ṣalīb), are of Glandaria limestone, 600 ft. in thickness, containing sponges, corals, echinoderms, etc. (the best-known fossils being Cidaris glandaria and Terebratula [diverse species], found in the Salīma valley near Beyrout). By its fossils this limestone belongs to the Oxford group. Under this limestone still older strata of the Kelloway are found only in the Antilibanus, on Mt. Hermon.

Above the upper oolite follow, in concordant order, strata of upper cretaceous. First, there is the Nubian sandstone of Cenomanian age, a yellow or brown sandstone distinguished by the presence of coal, dysodile, amberlike resin, and samoit (?), with impressions of plant leaves. To the period of the formation of this member of the system belong volcanic eruptions of basaltic rock and also copious eruptions of ashes, which are now met with as tufa in the neighbourhood of the igneous rocks. These eruptive rocks are everywhere again overlaid by the thick sandstone. The sandstone stratum (1300 to 1600 ft. thick) has a great influence upon the superficial aspect of the country, having become the centre of its life and fertility, inasmuch as here alone water can gather. In its upper beds the sandstone alternates with layers of limestone and contains (at the village of 'Abēh) many shells of gasteropods and bivalves and especially of Trigonia syriaca as typical fossils. The second subdivision of the cretaceous formation consists of beds of marl and limestone with numerous echinoderms, oysters, and ammonites (Buchiceras syriacum, von Buch), which show that these strata belong to the chalk marl (Cenomanian). The third subdivision is the 'Lebanon limestone'—a gray or white limestone, marble, or dolomite, about 3000 ft. in thickness, of which the great mass of the mountains of Lebanon is composed. Here is the zone of the Rudistes (Radiolites, Sphærulites). At several localities are also found thin limestone beds with fine fish remains. The last member of the cretaceous formation is the chalk, a white or yellowish-white soft chalky clay, which in its lower half shows the famous fish-bed of Sahel 'Almā, and in its upper half alternates with beds of flint. These most recent strata of all are met with only at the western and eastern foot of Lebanon (baths in the western half of the town of Beyrout) and in Antilibanus. On the Jebel eḍ-Ḍahr between the Līṭānī and Jordan valleys they contain many bitumen beds, and also asphalt.

The eocene (nummulitic formation) occurs only very sporadically in Lebanon, especially in the Buḳā', but predominates in the eastern offshoots of Antilibanus. It consists of nummulitic limestones and unstratified coral limestones. The miocene is represented in the form of marine limestone of upper miocene age, which is the material of which two mountains on the coast line are composed—the St. Dmitri hill at Beyrout, and the Jebel Ṭerbol near Ṭarābulus.

Of pliocene formation there are a few comparatively unimportant patches (near Zaḥleh) of fresh-water limestone, deposited from small lake basins and containing fresh-water snails (Hydrobia, Bithynia). To this pliocene period belong also considerable eruptions of basalt in the N. of Lebanon, near Homs. Not till after these terrestrial pliocenes had been deposited did the great movements to which the country owes its present configuration occur. The diluvial period was marked by no very noteworthy occurrences. On an old moraine stands the well-known cedar grove of Ḍahr el-Ḳaḍib.

The western versant has the common characteristics of the flora of the Mediterranean coast; but the eastern portion belongs to the poorer region of the steppes, and the Mediterranean species are met with only sporadically along the watercourses. Forest and pasture-land in our sense of the word are not found: the place of the forest is for the most part taken by a low brushwood; grass is not plentiful, and the higher ridges maintain a growth of alpine plants only so long as patches of snow continue to lie. The rock walls harbour some rock plants; but there are many absolutely barren wildernesses of stone.

4. Vegetation.

(1) On the western versant, as we ascend, we have first, to a height of 1600 ft., the coast region, similar to that of Syria in general and of the south of Asia Minor.

Characteristic trees are the locust tree and the stone pine; in Melia Azedarach and Ficus Sycomorus (Beyrout) we have an admixture of foreign and partially subtropical elements. The great mass of the vegetation, however, is of the low-growing type (maquis or garrigue of the western Mediterranean), with small and stiff leaves, frequently thorny and aromatic, as for example the ilex (Quercus coccifera), Smilax, Cistus, Lentiscus, Calycotome, etc.

(2) Next comes, from 1600 to 6500 ft., the mountain region, which may also be called the forest region, still exhibiting sparse woods and isolated trees wherever shelter, moisture, and the bad husbandry of the inhabitants have permitted their growth.

From 1600 to 3200 ft. is a zone of dwarf hard-leaved oaks, amongst which occur the Oriental forms Fontanesia phillyræoides, Acer syriacum, and the beautiful red-stemmed Arbutus Andrachne. Higher up, between 3700 ft. and 4200 ft., a tall pine, Pinus Brutia, Ten., is characteristic. Between 4200 and 6200 ft. is the region of the two most interesting forest trees of Lebanon, the cypress and the cedar. The cypress still grows thickly, especially in the valley of the Ḳadīsha; the horizontal is the prevailing variety. In the upper Ḳadīsha valley there is a cedar grove of about three hundred trees, amongst which five are of gigantic size; it is alleged that other specimens occur elsewhere in Lebanon. The Cedrus Libani is intermediate between the Cedrus Deodara and the C. atlantica (see CEDAR). The cypress and cedar zone exhibits a variety of other leaf-bearing and coniferous trees; of the first may be mentioned several oaks—Quercus Mellul, Q. subalpina (Kotschy), Q. Cerris, and the hop-hornbeam (Ostrya); of the second class the rare Cilician silver fir (Abies cilicica) may be noticed. Next come the junipers, sometimes attaining the size of trees (Juniperus excelsa, J. rufescens, and, with fruit as large as plums, J. drupacea). The chief ornament of Lebanon, however, is the Rhododendron ponticum, with its brilliant purple flower clusters; a peculiar evergreen, Vinca libanotica, also adds beauty to this zone.

[1] So with ה־ in Neh. acc. to Baer, Gi.

(3) Into the alpine region (6200 to 10,400 ft.) penetrate a few very stunted oaks (Quercus subalpina, Kotschy), the junipers already mentioned, and a barberry (Berberis cretica), which sometimes spreads into close thickets. Then follow the low, dense, prone, pillow-like dwarf bushes, thorny and gray, common to the Oriental highlands—Astragalus and the peculiar Acantholimon. They are found up to within 300 ft. of the highest summits. Upon the exposed mountain slopes rhubarb (Rheum Ribes) is noticeable, and also a vetch (Vicia canescens, Lab.) excellent for sheep. The spring vegetation, which lasts until July, appears to be rich, especially as regards corolla-bearing plants, such as Corydalis, Gagea, Bulbillaria, Colchicum, Puschkinia, Geranium, Ornithogalum, etc.

The alpine flora of Lebanon connects itself directly with the Oriental flora of lower altitudes, and is unrelated to the glacial flora of Europe and northern Asia.

The flora of the highest ridges, along the edges of the snow patches, exhibits no forms related to our northern alpine flora; but suggestions of such a flora are found in a Draba, an Androsace, an Alsine, and a violet, occurring, however, only in local species. Upon the highest summits are found Saponaria Pumilio (resembling our Silene acaulis) and varieties of Galium, Euphorbia, Astragalus, Veronica, Jurinea, Festuca, Scrophularia, Geranium, Asphodeline, Allium, Asperula; and, on the margins of the snow-fields, a Taraxacum and Ranunculus demissus.

5. Zoology. There is nothing of special interest about the fauna of Lebanon. Bears are no longer abundant; the panther and the ounce are met with; the wild hog, hyæna, wolf, and fox are by no means rare; jackals and gazelles are very common. The polecat and the hedgehog also occur. As a rule there are not many birds; but the eagle and the vulture may occasionally be seen; of eatable kinds partridges and wild pigeons are the most abundant. In some places the bat occasionally multiplies so as actually to become a plague.

6. Geography of Lebanon. The district to the W. of Lebanon, averaging about six hours in breadth, slopes in an intricate series of plateaus and terraces to the Mediterranean. The coast is for the most part abrupt and rocky, often leaving room for only a narrow path along the shore, and when viewed from the sea it does not lead one to have the least suspicion of the extent of country lying between its cliffs and the lofty summits behind. Most of the mountain spurs run from E. to W.; but in northern Lebanon the prevailing direction of the valleys is north-westerly, and in the S. some ridges also run parallel with the principal chain. The valleys have for the most part been deeply excavated by the rapid mountain streams which traverse them; the apparently inaccessible heights are crowned by villages, castles, or cloisters embosomed among trees.

Of the streams which are perennial, the most worthy of note, beginning from the N., are the Nahr 'Akkār, N. 'Arḳā, N. el-Bārid, N. Ḳadīsha, 'the holy river' (the valley of which begins far up in the immediate neighbourhood of the highest summits, and rapidly descends in a series of great bends till the river reaches the sea at Tripoli), Wādy el-Jōz (falling into the sea at Batrūn), Wādy Fidār, Nahr Ibrāhīm (the ancient Adonis, having its source in a recess of the great mountain amphitheatre where the famous sanctuary Apheca, the modern Afḳa, lay), Nahr el-Kelb (the ancient Lycus), Nahr Beirūt (the ancient Magoras, entering the sea at Beyrout), Nahr Dāmūr (ancient Tamyras), Nahr el-'Auwaly (the ancient Bostrenus, which in the upper part of its course is joined by the Nahr el-Bārūk). The 'Auwaly and the Nahr ez-Zaherāni, the only other streams that fall to be mentioned before we reach the Līṭānī, flow NE. to SW., in consequence of the interposition of a ridge subordinate and parallel to the central chain.

On the N., where the mountain bears the special name of Jebel 'Akkār, the main ridge of Lebanon rises gradually from the plain. Valleys run to the N. and NE., among which must be mentioned that of the Nahr el-Kebīr, the Eleutherus of the ancients, which takes its rise in the Jebel el-Abyaḍ on the eastern slope of Lebanon, and afterwards, skirting the district, flows westward to the sea. To the S. of Jebel el-Abyaḍ, beneath the main ridge, which as a rule falls away suddenly towards the E., occur several small elevated terraces having a southward slope; among these the Wādi en-Nusūr ('vale of eagles'), and the basin of the lake Yammūna, with its intermittent spring Neb' el-Arba'īn, deserve special mention. Of the streams which descend into the Buḳā', only the Berdōnī need be named; it rises in Jebel Ṣunnīn, and enters the plain by a deep and picturesque mountain cleft at Zaḥleh.

The most elevated summits occur in the N.; but even these are of very gentle gradient, and are ascended quite easily. The names and the elevations of the several peaks, which even in summer are covered with snow, have been very variously given by different explorers; according to the most accurate accounts the 'Cedar block' consists of a double line of four and three summits respectively, ranged from N. to S., with a deviation of about 35°. Those to the E. are 'Uyūn Urghush, Makmal, Muskīyā (or Neb' esh-Shemaila), and Rās Ḍahr el-Ḳaḍīb; fronting the sea are Ḳarn Saudā, Fumm el-Mīzāb, and Ḍahr el-Ḳandīl. The height of Makmal by the most recent barometric measurement is 10,207 ft.; that of the others is somewhat less. S. from them is the pass (8831 ft.) which leads from Ba'albek to Tripoli; the great mountain amphitheatre on the W. side of its summit is remarkable. Farther to the S. is a second group of lofty summits.

Chief among them is the snow-capped Ṣannīn, visible from Beyrout; its height is 8554 ft., or, according to other accounts, 8895 ft. Between this group and the more southerly Jebel Kuneiseh (about 6700 ft.) lies the pass (4700 ft.) now traversed by the French post road between Beyrout and Damascus. Among the other bare summits still farther S. are the long ridge of Jebel el-Bārūk (about 7000 ft.), the Jebel Nīḥā, with the Tōmāt Nīḥā (about 6100 ft.), near which is a pass to Sidon, and the Jebel Rīḥān (about 5400 ft.).

The Buḳā', the broad valley which separates Lebanon from Antilibanus, is watered by two rivers having their watershed near Ba'albek (at an elevation of about 3600 ft.) and their sources separated only by a short mile. The river flowing northwards, El-'Āṣy, is the ancient Orontes; the other is the Līṭānī. In the lower part of its course the Līṭānī has scooped out for itself a deep and narrow rocky bed; at Burghuz it is spanned by a great natural bridge. Not far from the point where it suddenly trends to the W. lie, immediately above the romantic valley, at an elevation of 1500 ft., the imposing ruins of the old castle Ḳal'at esh-Shaḳīf, near one of the passes to Sidon. In its lower part the Līṭānī bears the name of Nahr el-Ḳāsimīyeh. Neither the Orontes nor the Līṭāni has any important affluent.

The Buḳā' used to be known as CŒLESYRIA (q.v.); but that word as employed by the ancients had a much more extensive application.

At present the full name is Buḳā' el-'Azīz (the dear Buḳā'), and its northern portion is known as Sahlet Ba'albek (the plain of Baalbek). The valley is from 4 to 6 m. broad, with an undulating surface. It is said to contain a hundred and thirty-seven hamlets or settlements, the larger of which skirt the hills, whilst the smaller, consisting of mud hovels, stand upon dwarf mounds, the debris of ages. The whole valley could be much more richly cultivated than it is at present; but fever is frequent.

7. Geography of the Antilibanus. Antilibanus is mentioned only once, in Judith 1 7 (αντιλιβανος), where 'Libanus and Antilibanus' means the land between the parallel ranges—i.e., Cœlesyria. The Antilibanus chain has in many respects been much less fully explored than that of Lebanon. Apart from its southern offshoots it is 67 m. long, whilst its width varies from 16 to 13½ m. It rises from the plain of Ḥoms, and in its northern portion is very arid and barren. The range has not so many offshoots as occur on the W. side of Lebanon; under its precipitous slopes stretch table-lands and broad plateaus, which, especially on the E. side looking towards the steppe, steadily increase in width. Along the western side of northern Antilibanus stretches the Khashā'a, a rough red region lined with juniper trees—a succession of the hardest limestone crests and ridges, bristling with bare rock and crag that shelter tufts of vegetation, and are divided by a succession of grassy ravines. On the eastern side the parallel valley of 'Asāl el-Ward deserves special mention; the descent towards the plain eastwards, as seen for example at Ma'lūlā, is singular,—first a spacious amphitheatre and then two deep very narrow gorges. The perennial streams that take their rise in Antilibanus are not many.

One of the finest and best watered valleys is that of Ḥelbūn (see HELBON). The highest points of the range, reckoned from the N., are Ḥalimat el-Ḳabū (8247 ft.), which has a splendid view; the Fatly block, including Ṭal'at Mūsā (8755 ft.) and the adjoining Jebel Nebi Bārūḥ (7900 ft. [?]); and a third group near Blūdān, in which the most prominent names are Shuḳīf Akhyār, and Abu'l-Hīn (8330 ft. [?]).

Of the valleys descending westward the first to claim mention is the Wādy Yaḥfūfa; a little farther to the S., lying N. and S., is the rich upland valley of Zebedāni, where the Baradā has its highest sources. Pursuing an easterly course of several hours, this stream receives the waters of the romantic 'Ain Fijeh (which doubles its volume), and bursts out by a rocky gateway upon the plain of Damascus. It is the Amanah (RV^mg.) of 2 K. 5 12; the portion of Antilibanus traversed by it was also called by the same name (Cant. 4 8). See AMANA. The French post road after leaving the Buḳā' first enters a little valley running N. and S., where a projecting ridge of Antilibanus bears the ruins of the ancient cities Chalcis and Gerrha. It next traverses the gorge of Wādy el-Harīr, the level upland Sahlet Judeideh, the ravine of Wādy el-Ḳarn, the ridge of 'Aḳabat et-Tīn, the descent Daurat el-Billān, and finally the unpeopled plain of Dimās, from which it enters the valley of Baradā. This route marks the southern boundary of Antilibanus proper, where the Hermon group begins. From the point where this continuation of Antilibanus begins to take a more westerly direction, a low ridge shoots out towards the SW., trending farther and farther away from the eastern chain and narrowing the Buḳā'; upon the eastern side of this ridge lies the elevated valley or hilly stretch known as Wādy et-Teim. In the N., beside 'Ain Fālūj, it is connected by a low watershed with the Buḳā'; from the gorge of the Līṭānī it is separated by the ridge of Jebel eḍ-Ḍahr. At its southern end it contracts and merges into the plain of Bāniās, thus enclosing Mount Hermon on its NW. and W. sides; eastward from the Ḥāsbāny branch of the Jordan lies the meadow-land Merj 'Ayūn (see IJON).

The inhabitants of Lebanon have at no time played a conspicuous part in history. There are remains of prehistoric occupation; but we do not even know what races dwelt there in the historical period of antiquity. Probably they belonged partly to the Canaanite but chiefly to the Aramæan group of nationalities; editorial notices in the narrative books of the OT mention Ḥivites (Judg. 3 3, where, however, we should probably read 'Hittites') and Giblites (Josh. 13 5; see, however, GEBAL, 1). A portion of the western coast land was always, it may be assumed, in the hands of the Phœnician states, and it is possible that once and again their sovereignty may have extended even into the Buḳā'. Lebanon was also included within the ideal boundaries of the land of Israel (Josh. 13 5 [D₂]), and the whole region was well known to the Hebrews, by whose poets its many excellencies are often praised—see, e.g., Is. 37 24 60 13 Hos. 14 5-7 Ps. 72 16 Cant. 4 11; but note that the phrase 'the wine of Lebanon' (Hos. 14 8) is doubtful: see WINE. Jeremiah finds no better image for the honour put by Yahwè on the house of David than 'the top of Lebanon' (Jer. 22 6). The cedars of Lebanon supplied timber for Solomon's temple and palace (1 K. 5 6 2 Ch. 2 8), and at the rebuilding of the temple cedar timber was again brought from the Lebanon (Ezra 3 7; cp JOPPA). These noble trees were not less valued by the Assyrians; the inscriptions of the Assyrian kings repeatedly mention the felling of trees in Lebanon and Amanus. Cp CEDAR; also EGYPT, § 33.

8. Political history and population.

In the Roman period the district of Phœnice extended into Lebanon; in the second century Phœnice, along with the inland districts pertaining to it, constituted a subdivision of the province of Syria, having Emesa (Ḥoms) for its capital; from the time of Diocletian there was a Phœnice ad Libanum, with Emesa as capital, as well as a Phœnice Maritima of which Tyre was the chief city. Remains of the Roman period occur throughout Lebanon, and more especially in Hermon, in the shape of small temples in more or less perfect preservation; the splendid ruins of Baalbec are world-famous. Although Christianity early obtained a footing in Lebanon, the pagan worship, and even human sacrifice, survived for a long time, especially in remote valleys such as Afḳa. The present inhabitants are for the most part of Syrian (Aramæan) descent; Islam and the Arabs have at no time penetrated very deep into the mountain land.

LEBAOTH (לְבָאוֹת), Josh. 15 32. See BETH-LEBAOTH, and note that 'Lebaoth' and 'Bealoth' (Josh. 15 24) are probably the same name. Cp BAALATH-BEER.

LEBBÆUS (λεββαιος or λεβαιος [ℵL]) occurs in AV (cp TR) of Mt. 10 3 as the name of the apostle who was 'surnamed' (ο επικληθεις) THADDÆUS [q.v.]. The conflate reading of TR is from the 'Syrian' text; λεββ. is a strongly but insufficiently supported Western reading, adopted by Tischendorf in Mt. 10 3, but not in Mk. 3 18. If λεββαιος = לִבַּי, we may with Dalman (Pal. Gram. 142, n. 1; cp Worte Jesu, 40) compare the Phœn. לבא and Sin. לבאי. It is possible, however, according to WH, that the reading λεββ. is due to an early attempt to bring Levi (λευεις) the publican (Lk. 5 27) within the number of the Twelve. Cp LEVI. Older views (see Keim, Jesu von Nazara, 2 310; ET 3 380) are very improbable.

LEB-KAMAI (לֵב־קָמָי, 'the heart [i.e., centre] of my adversaries'; cp Aq. AV), usually taken to be a cypher-form of Kasdim (כַּשְׂדִּים), 'Chaldæa'; 𝔊^BℵAQ, however, has χαλδαιους or -δεους (Jer. 51 1), and Giesebrecht and Cornill place כשדים in the text. Certainly, Leb-kamai might be the trifling of a very late scribe, a specimen of the so-called Athbash-writing (on which see SHESHACH). It is possible, however, that it is a corruption of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel), and that Jer. 50 51 is directed against the much-hated Edomites or Jerahmeelites, as well as against the Chaldæans. So Cheyne in Crit. Bib. See MERATHAIM, PEKOD.

Other cyphers were known as אט'בח and אל'בם, on which see Buxt. de Abbrev. Heb. and Lexic. Chald. s.v.; (for an alleged example of the אל'בם species, see TABEEL).

LEBONAH (לְבֹנָה; της λεβωνα [B], του λιβανου της λεβ. [AL]), or (since lĕbōnah, 'frankincense,' was not a Jewish product) Lebanah or Libnah, a place to the N. of Shiloh (Judg. 21 19), identified by Maundrell (1697) with the modern el-Lubban, a poor village on the slope of a hill 3 m. WNW. from Seilūn (Shiloh), with many old rock tombs in the neighbourhood. The story in Judges mentions Lebonah in connection with a vintage-festival at Shiloh. This suggests to Neubauer (Géogr. 83) that 'Beth-laban in the mountains' (cp NAZARETH) from which wine of the second quality was brought for the drink offerings in the temple (Mĕnāḥōth 9 7) may be our Lebanah (Lebonah).

LECAH (לֵכָה; ληχα [B], -αδ [A], λαιχα [L]), apparently the name of a place in the territory of Judah, descended from Er b. Shelah, 1 Ch. 4 21. If so, it is perhaps an error for Lachish (Meyer, Entst. 164). More probably, however, אבי לכה ולעדה is a corruption (with some dittography) of ירחמאל, and the meaning is that MARESHAH (q.v.) was of mixed Judahite and Jerahmeelite origin. T. K. C.

LEEKS. The word חָצִיר, ḥāṣīr, which usually means 'grass' (see GRASS), is in Nu. 11 5 rendered 'leeks' by all the ancient versions. Although the correctness of this interpretation cannot be exactly proved, it has all tradition in its favour and harmonises well with the context. The leeks of ancient Egypt were renowned (Plin. HN, xix. 33 110); and חציר is used in this sense at least once in the Talmud (Löw, 228). The garden leek (Allium Porrum) is only a cultivated form of Allium Ampeloprasum, L., which is a native of Syria and Egypt. N. M.—W. T. T.-D.

LEHABIM (לְהָבִים), one of the 'sons' of Mizraim, Gen. 10 13 (λαβιειμ [AEL]) = 1 Ch. 1 11† (λαβειν [A], λαβιειμ [L]), either a by-form or a corruption of LUBIM (q.v.).

Another possible view is that להבים comes from בַּעֲלָ[ת]ִים = בַּלְהָ[ת]ִים. Baalah was in the S. of Judah towards Edom (Josh. 15 29). This stands in connection with a hypothesis respecting the name commonly read Mizraim which explains a group of difficult problems, but deals freely with MT. See MIZRAIM; Crit. Bib.

LEHI (לְחִי, i.e., 'jawbone'; in Judg. 15 9 λεχ[ε]ι [BA], λεχει [L], and in Judg. 15 19 εν τη σιαγονι [B], της σιαγονος [AL], in Judg. 15 14, σιαγονος [BAL]) or, more fully (v. 17), RAMATH-LEHI (רָמַת לְחִי, i.e., 'the hill of the jawbone,' 𝔊BAL, αναιρεσις σιαγονος; רמת is surely not an explanatory gloss [Doorninck]), the scene of one of Samson's exploits (Judg. 15 9 14 17 19). According to most scholars the place derived its name from something in its shape which resembled a jawbone (cp the peninsula Onugnathus in Laconia), upon which resemblance the popular wit based a legend. The explanation of Beer-lahai-roi proposed elsewhere (JERAHMEEL, § 4 [c]), however, suggests the conjecture that Lehi and Ramath-lehi are early corruptions of Jerahmeel. There were probably many places of this name. If so, the place derived its name from some ancient written source, the text of which had become corrupted.

Most scholars since Bochart (to Driver's list add now Bu. and H. P. Smith) have found a reference to the same place in 2 S. 23 11 (reading 'were gathered together to Lehi,' לֶחְיָה [ἐπὶ σιαγόνα, L; εἰς τόπον σιαγόνα, Jos. Ant. vii. 12 3] instead of לַחַיָּה [εἰς θηρία, BA]). The omission, however, in 1 Ch. 11 13 shows that the same words 'and the Philistines were gathered together to battle' occurred in the Chronicler's text of the narrative of 2 Sam., both in v. 9 and in v. 11. לחיה, therefore, must be a fragment of לַמִּלְחָמָה, 'to battle' (Klo.). The scene of the exploit was probably the valley of Rephaim (read with Chr. נֶאֶסְפוּ שָׁם, 'were gathered together there,' referring back to v. 9 [see PAS-DAMMIM]).

As to the site of the Lehi of Judges, we know from Judg. 15 8-13, that it lay above ETAM (q.v.), and Schick[1] identifies it with a hill (with ruins) called eṣ-Ṣiyyāgh (from σιαγών?), at the mouth of the Wādy en-Najīl, and mentions a fountain called 'Ain Naḳūra to the east. Conder (Tentwork, 1 276), has a still more far-fetched identification. See EN-HAKKORE, and, on the legend and its explanation, see, further, JAWBONE, ASS'S. T. K. C.

The following word maśśā can mean neither 'poem' nor a supposed Arabian kingdom; it should rather be māšāl (Grätz, Bickell). Bickell, however, thinks that למאל, in v. 4, has arisen out of למל in למלכים (written למלאכים, as in 2 S. 11 1).[2] למואל was then supposed to be a personal name, hence the repetition of אל־מלכים after it. From v. 4 'ל was copied into v. 1. This would require the rendering, 'The words of a [nameless] king, a wise poem which his mother taught him.' The former view seems preferable. The pottage [נָזִיד] which Esau obtained from Jacob he called 'dm (אדם). As lentil-pottage, which is one of the commonest among simple people at the present day, is of a peculiar brownish green,[3] MT must be wrong in vocalising 'dm in v. 30, ādōm, 'red.' Read ĕdōm = Arab. idām, 'a by-dish' (cp col. 1333, n. 2): 'Feed me with some of the ĕdōm, that ĕdōm.' The nutritive properties of lentils are well known. According to De Candolle (Origine, 257 f.) W. Asia was probably the earliest home of the lentil, and it has been cultivated in that region since the dawn of history. A wild beast, noted for its fierceness, its swiftness (Hab. 1 8), and its spotted skin (Jer. 13 23). Its name (nāmēr) also occurs in place-names (BETH-NIMRAH, NIMRIM [qq.v.]), which suggests an interesting enquiry (see below). On the expression 'the mountains of the leopards' (Cant. 4 8 ‖ 'the lions' dens') see CANTICLES, § 15, col. 693, top. Apart from the textual phenomena, it is true, we should not be suspicious at the mention of leopards in Lebanon and Hermon.

Felis pardus may be less common now than it probably was in OT times; but it is still found, according to Tristram, round the Dead Sea, in Gilead and Bashan, and in the wooded districts of the West. Bloodthirsty and ferocious in the extreme, it will even kill more victims than it requires, simply to satisfy its craving for blood. It is in the habit of concealing itself at wells and at the entrances of villages (Jer. 5 6), lying in wait for its prey, upon which it will spring from a great distance; it has an appetite for dogs, but men are seldom attacked. F. pardus has a wide distribution, extending almost throughout Africa, and from Palestine to China in S. Asia; it is also found in many of the larger East Indian islands. F. jubatus (the Cheeta) is scarcer; it can be found in the wooded hills of Galilee, and in the neighbourhood of Tabor. In disposition it is much less fierce than F. pardus and is comparatively easily tamed; in India it is trained for hunting antelopes, etc. (cp Thomson's statement respecting the panther in Palestine, LB [1860], p. 444). It has almost as wide a distribution as its congener; but does not reach so far E.

The Sinaitic Arabs relate that the leopard was once a man, but that afterwards he washed in milk and became a panther and an enemy of mankind (WRS, Kin. 204). The occurrence in Arabic of the tribal names namir, dimin. nomair, pl. anmar, and also the Sab. אנמרם, taken in connection with the above story, seems to point to a primitive belief in a supposed kinship with the panther, and it is probable that the clan which first called itself after the 'leopard' believed itself to be of one kin with it (cp also the leopard-skin worn, as is well known, by a certain class of priests in their official duties).[1] We may further compare the occurrence of the place-names BETH-NIMRAH, NIMRIM (qq.v.), and the fact that four similarly formed names are said to be found in the Ḥaurān (cp ZDMG 29 437). A place-name נמרן also occurs in Sabæan inscriptions. Finally, Jacob of Serūgh mentions bar nemrē, 'son of panthers,' as the name of a false deity of Haran (ZDMG 29 110; cp WRS, J. Phil. 9 93; Kin. 201).[2]

LEPROSY, LEPER. The word צָרַעַת, ṣārá'ath, occurs some twenty-eight times in Lev. 13 f., also in Dt. 24 8 2 K. 5 3 6 f. 27 2 Ch. 26 19, and is invariably translated λέπρα in 𝔊, lepra in Vg. The root is צרע, meaning originally (probably) 'to smite'; the participle צָרוּעַ, ṣārūa', is met with in Lev. 13 44 f. 14 3 22 4 Nu. 5 2 (λεπρός; leprosus), and מְצֹרָע, מְצוֹרָע, mĕṣōrā', in Ex. 4 6 Lev. 14 2 Nu. 12 10 2 S. 3 29 2 K. 5 1 11 27 7 3 8 15 5 2 Ch. 26 20 f. 23. NT has λέπρα in Mk. 1 42 Lk. 5 12 f., λεπρός in Mt. 8 2 10 8 11 5 26 6 Mk. 1 40 14 3 Lk. 4 27 7 22 17 12. In Is. 53 4 Vg. has 'et nos putavimus eum quasi leprosum,' where AV has 'stricken.'

1. Meaning in Greek and Latin.

The word λέπρα, in Hippocrates and others, meant some scaly disease of the skin, quite different from ἐλέφας or ἐλεφαντίασις; of the two lepra corresponds on the whole with psoriasis (scaliness), elepha(ntiasi)s with common or tubercular leprosy. It is probable that in 𝔊 the word lepra was meant to be generic, or to include more than the λέπρα of medical Greek; if so, it would have been a correct rendering of the generic Heb.[3] (= 'stroke,' plaga, plague). The lepra of the Vg., however, became specially joined in mediæval medical writings to what is technically known as leprosy, so that lepra Arabum meant exactly the same as elephantiasis Græcorum. Thenceforward, consequently, all that was said in the OT of ṣārá'ath was taken as said of leprosy, which thus derived its qualities, and more especially its contagiousness, not so much from clinical observation as from verbal interpretation. This confusion belongs not to the Hebrew text, but to translations and to mediæval and modern glosses.

2. Leprosy of (a) houses, (b) garments.

So generically is the Hebrew word used, that two of the varieties of ṣārá'ath are in inanimate things—viz., clothes or leather work (Lev. 13 47-59), and the walls of houses (14 33-53). The conjecture of some, that the leprosy of the garment was a defilement of garments worn by the leprous, is against the sense of the text, to say nothing of the silence of the context on so essential a point. Again, the suggestion of Michaelis that the leprosy of the walls of a house was the peculiar nitrous exudation or crust that sometimes appears, like a scabby state of the skin, on newly plastered walls, would imply that means of a very drastic kind were used against walls merely because they looked leprous, just as if one were to root out trees because of bolls and leprous-looking excrescences on their bark. The 'leprosies' of walls and garments were real troubles in those things, which required skill and energy to surmount; and the obvious meaning is that they were parasitic invasions of vegetable moulds or of the eggs of insects.

(a) The description of the house-leprosy (greenish or reddish patches, lower than, or penetrating beneath the surface of, the inner wall, Lev. 14 37) does not exactly identify the condition; but the steps taken to get rid of it—the removal of a part of the wall, the scraping of adjoining parts, the carrying of the dust so scraped off to an unclean place, the rebuilding, the replastering, and the resort to still more thorough demolition if the first means had not been radical enough and the plague had come again—are very much in the manner of dealing with dry rot; whoever has had occasion to eradicate that spreading fungus from some wall or partition, will see the general fitness of the steps to be taken, particularly of the precautions against leaving any spores lurking in the dust of neighbouring parts.

The mycelium of the dry-rot fungus (Polyporus destructor, or Merulius vastator, or M. lachrymans) not only eats into woodwork, but may form between the lath and plaster and the stone or brick, large sheets of felt-like texture, half an inch or more thick, the fresh broken surface of which will look greenish yellow or red. It is most apt to come in damp structures shut out from the circulation of air. Without contending that the plague, or the fretting leprosy (13 51, צרעת מַמְאֶרֶת, perhaps rather a malignant leprosy) of the walls of a house was precisely the dry-rot of northern countries, one must conclude that it was a parasitic mould of the same kind.

(b) The leprosy of the garment (Lev. 13 47-59) was in woollen, or linen, or in any work that is made of skin. This excludes the suggestion of Michaelis that it may have been a contagion of the sheep clinging to its wool. A greenish or reddish colour, and a tendency to spread, are the chief indications given as to its nature. If it changed colour with washing, it might be cured by rending out the affected piece; otherwise the garment or article made of skin was to be burned. Such marks are perhaps too general for scientific identification; but there are various moulds and mildews (such as Mucor and Penicillium), as well as deposits of the eggs of moths, which would produce the appearances and effects, and would call for the remedial measures of the text.

3. Leprosy in Lev. 13 f.

Such being the probable nature of two of the varieties of ṣārá'ath—namely, parasitic spreading moulds or fretting insects upon inanimate substances—we shall probably not err in discovering the same parasitic character in some, if not in the whole, of the human maladies in the same context. The most clearly identified of the parasitic skin-diseases are the plague upon the head or the beard, or the scall[1] (נֶתֶק, Lev. 13 29-37), and the leprosy causing baldness (v. 42). These are almost certainly the contagious and often inveterate ringworm, or scald-head, mentagra, or sycosis, of the hairy scalp and beard. To them also the name of 'leprosy' is given; and indeed the most striking part in the ritual of the leper, the rending of the clothes, the covering the lip, and the crying out 'unclean, unclean,' follows in the text immediately upon the description of an affection of the head which was probably tinea decalvans (ringworm), or favus, tinea favosa (scald-head), which are still comparatively common among poor Jews as well as Moslems (this, says Hirsch, is perhaps to be explained by their religious practice of always keeping the head covered). Pityriasis versicolor, which affects the trunk especially, and produces spots of brownish or reddish discoloration, is another parasitic skin disease common among the same classes [cp Schamberg[1] (commenting medically on Lev. 13)]. The white spots often referred to probably included leucoderma or vitiligo.

[1] See Wilk. Anc. Eg. 1 184, fig. 12, and cp DRESS, § 8; ESAU. The origin of the hanging of the leopard's skin in the house of Antenor (Paus. x. 27 3) is obscure.

[2] Among the idolatrous objects destroyed by Hezekiah (2 Ch. 31 1) and Josiah (ib., 34 34), the Pesh. enumerates nemrē (MT, אֲשֵׁרִים, פְּסִילִים). To the translators of the Pesh., at any rate, images of leopards were apparently not unknown.

Vitiligo is a disease not uncommon in the darker-skinned races, being characterised by white spots, bounded by dusky red, especially on the face, neck, and hands, and on hairy parts such as the scalp, armpits, and pubes. The disease begins as white dots, which spread slowly and may become large patches. In the negro they produce a piebald effect; they occur also in the horse and the elephant. The chief reason for discovering vitiligo among the varieties of ṣārá'ath is that the reiterated symptom of patchy whitening of the hair in Lev. 13 is more distinctive of that disease than of any other. On the other hand, vitiligo is not contagious, is not attended by rawness of the flesh, and admits of no cure. If it be the disease in which patches of hair turned white (as Kapori and other dermatologists suppose), the prominence given to it must have been superstitious (elephants with vitiligo are sacred). As a matter of practical concern, scabies or itch ought to have found a place; its best sign is the sinuous white line marking the track of the female acarus through the epidermis, but none of the references to a white spot is precise enough for that; however, scabies may have been diagnosed by its attendant eruptions (various) which would be included under 'rising' or 'eruption.'

The disease of 13 12-17, which was placed in the 'clean' class because it concerned all the body, may have been psoriasis ('English leprosy'), a scaly disease in which the characters of 'brightness' and 'whiteness' of the spots are most marked; when complicated with eczema, as it often is, the element of 'raw flesh' would come in, and therewith perhaps the priestly diagnosis of uncleanness. On the other hand, the dull white 'tetter' of vv. 38 and 39 is 'clean.' For none of these diseases are the written diagnostics at all clear; but within the meagre outline there may well have been a more minute knowledge preserved by tradition in the priesthood. It is only in P that the subject is handled at all; JE make no provision whatever for the diagnosis, isolation, etc., of diseases.

The chief question remains, whether true leprosy is anywhere pointed at by the diagnostics.

It may be doubted if any one would ever have discovered true leprosy in these chapters but for the translation of ṣārá'ath in 𝔊 and Vg. Even those (Hensler and others) who identify white or anæsthetic leprosy with the white spots, bright spots, white risings, or the like, do not profess to find any traces of tubercular leprosy, which is the kind that lends itself most obviously to popular superficial description, and is the most likely form of the disease to have received notice. The strongest argument of those who discover true leprosy in Lev. 13 is that it would have been important to detect the disease in its earliest stage, and that the beginnings of all cases of leprosy are dusky spots of the skin, or erythematous patches, which come and go at first, and then remain permanently, becoming the white anæsthetic spots of one form of the developed disease, and the seats of nodules (of the face, hands, and feet) in the other. This line of argument assumes, however, a scientific analysis of the stages of leprosy such as has been attained only in recent times (19th cent.).

It will be convenient to set forth briefly some characters of leprosy, as they are uniformly found at the present time in many parts of the globe.

4. True leprosy.

A case of leprosy that would be obvious to a passer-by is marked by a thickened or nodulated state of the features, especially of the eyebrows, the wings of the nose, the cheeks, the chin, and the lobes of the ears, giving the face sometimes a leonine look (leontiasis), or a hideous appearance (satyriasis). The same nodules occur, also, on the hands and the feet, or other exposed parts of the limbs, making a thickened, lumpy state of the skin, whence the name elephantiasis.[2] In some cases the nodules on the fingers or toes eat into the joints, so that portions of the digits fall off, the stump healing readily as in an amputation (lepra mutilans).[1] Nodules in exposed situations, or subject to friction and hurts, are very apt to become sores, yielding a foul sanies which may make a sordid crust. Besides the skin, certain mucous membranes become the seat of nodules or thickenings—the front of the eyeball (pannus leprosus), the tongue and mouth, and the larynx, the thickened and roughened state of which reduces the voice to a hoarse tone or husky whisper. These are the most superficially obvious of all the signs of leprosy, forming together an unmistakable picture.

A large part of all leprosy, however, perhaps the half, wants these more obvious characters. A person may be truly leprous, and have nothing to show for it in the face, or on the hands and feet—perhaps only a nodule here and there along the course of the nerves of the arms or other part. Many cases, again, have only a number of blanched or discoloured patches of the skin, in the same situations where other lepers have nodules or tubercles; these correspond to the variety of white leprosy, or macular leprosy (lepra albicans, maculosa, etc.). The macular and nodular characters may concur in the same person.

Underlying all these external marks, whether nodules or spots, is the most significant of all the morbid changes of leprosy—the loss of function in the nerves of the skin. Based upon that was one of the mediæval tests—to prick the skin along the course of the posterior tibial nerve behind the ankle on the inner side. In the modern pathology of the disease, the disorganisation or degeneration of the nerves is recognised as fundamental; it leads to loss of sensibility, to loss of structural integrity or of tissue-nutrition, and to a profound lowering of the whole vitality and efficiency of the organism, whereby leprosy becomes a much more serious affection than a mere chronic skin-disease. These more profound characters of the disease, it need hardly be said, are nowhere reflected in the biblical references.

The causes of this great and incurable constitutional disorder are believed by many to be something corrupt in the staple food. One of the most probable dietetic errors, known to prevail in many, if not in all, parts of the world where leprosy is now met with, is the eating of fish in a semi-putrid state—very often the more insipid and worthless kinds of fresh-water or salt-water fish which are preferred in a half-corrupt state of cure on account of the greater relish. The dietetic theory of the cause of leprosy does not exclude, of course, other corrupt articles of food besides fish, the mediæval writers enumerating several such. Also it is probable that various unwholesome conditions of living must work together with corrupt diet, and that there must be a certain susceptibility in the individual constitution or temperament, which would be handed down and intensified by descent and intermarriage. It should be said that the dietetic theory is not received by all, and is apt to be resisted by those bacteriologists who make the bacillus lepræ the sufficient cause. A primary dietetic cause does not conflict with a certain possibility of transmitting leprosy by infection. An acquired or inherited constitutional malady may develop an infective property; the one character does not necessarily exclude the other; but in experience it appears that leprosy is seldom produced by any other means than habitual errors of nutrition (or other endemic conditions) in the individual or his ancestry.

5. History of leprosy.

i. In antiquity this disease was specially, and indeed exclusively, associated with Egypt—'circum flumina Nili . . . neque præterea usquam,' says Lucretius (6 1113 f.). Perhaps the limitation was only because other countries were less familiar ground. Herodotus does not mention leprosy in Egypt; but he says enough (2 77) on the use of uncooked fish and on the ways of curing fish, fowl, and other animal food, to make leprosy probable according to the etiological theory. On the other hand, he mentions (1 138) a certain skin-disease of the Persians, λεύκη, sufferers from which were obliged to live outside the towns. In a passage of Hippocrates (Progn. 114) this white malady is one of a group of three skin-diseases —λειχῆνες καὶ λέπραι καὶ λεῦκαι. A high antiquity is assigned to leprosy in Egypt by certain legends of the Exodus, which are preserved by late Greek writers (especially the Egyptian priest Manetho) known to us from Josephus's elaborate reply to them in his apology for Judaism (Contr. Ap. 1 26 34; cp Ant. iii. 11 4). Cp EXODUS, § 7.

One form of the legend is that leprous and other impure persons, to the number of 80,000, were separated out and sent to work in the mines or quarries E. of the Nile, that they were afterwards assigned a city, and that Moses became their leader. Another form of it is that the Jews in Egypt were 'leprous and scabby and subject to certain other kinds of distempers,' that they begged at the temples in such numbers as to become a nuisance, and that they were eventually got rid of—the leprous by drowning, the others by being driven into the desert.

Behind these legends there is the probability that the enslaved population of Egypt, occupied with forced labour in the Delta, would have been specially subject to those endemic influences (including the dietetic) which gave the country an ancient repute for leprosy. Still, if one person in a hundred, whether of the enslaved foreign, or the free native, labourers, was leprous, it would have been a rather larger ratio than is found anywhere at present in the most wretched circumstances. Whilst it is thus probable that there were cases of true leprosy in the early history of Israel, no extra-biblical reference to it in Palestine occurs until the first century B.C. The army of Pompey was said to have brought leprosy to Italy, for the first time, on returning from the Syrian campaign of 63 B.C. (cp Plut. Symp. 7 9); which should mean, at least, that the disease was then prevalent in Syria, as it has probably so remained continuously to the present time (communities of lepers at Jerusalem, Nāblus, and other places).

ii. The individual cases of 'leprosy' in the OT, however, are not all clearly the true disease. Miriam's leprosy, Nu. 12 10 f., appears to have been, in the mind of the narrator, a transient thing. The four leprous men outside the gate of Samaria during the siege by Benhadad (2 K. 7 3) are sufficiently like the groups of lepers under a ban in mediæval and modern times. On the other hand, the leprosy ascribed to Naaman (2 K. 5), who had perfect freedom of intercourse with his people, looks like some more tractable skin-disease. Nor is it perhaps unlikely that the curative direction of the prophet, if we assume a generic truth in it, was dictated, not merely by a belief in the sanctity of the river Jordan, but also by an acquaintance with the medicinal properties of some spring in the Jordan valley. At any rate, the prophet's method of healing has strong pagan affinities. Thus Pausanias (v. 5 11, Frazer) tells us that 'in Samicum, not far from the river, there is a cave called the cave of the Anigrian nymphs. When a leper enters the cave he first prays to the nymphs and promises them a sacrifice, whatever it may be. Then he wipes the diseased parts of his body, and swimming through the river leaves his old uncleanness in the water and comes out whole and of one colour.' The other OT case is that of king Uzziah (or Azariah), who was a leper unto the day of his death, dwelling in a 'several house'[1] (2 K. 15 5 f.); he was stricken because he encroached upon the prerogative of the priesthood (2 Ch. 26 16-23). As regards Job's disease, the allusions to the symptoms may be illustrated by the authentic statements of careful Arabian physicians translated by Stickel in his Buch Hiob (1842), p. 169 f. One of these may help to justify the references to bad dreams and (perhaps) suffocation in Job 7 14 f. 'During sleep,' says Ibn Sina (Avicenna), 'frequent atrabilious dreams appear. Breathing becomes so difficult that asthma sets in, and the highest degree of hoarseness is reached. It is often necessary to open the jugular vein, if the hoarseness and the dread of suffocation increases.'

iii. In the NT there are only a few notices of leprosy; but from Mt. 10 8 it would seem that the cleansing of lepers was regarded as specially a work of Jesus' disciples. There is a striking description of the cleansing of a leper by Jesus himself in Mk. 1 40-44 (cp Mt. 8 2-4 Lk. 5 12-14). There he is said to have touched the leper, and to have spoken a word of power. The cleansed man is then told to fulfil the Levitical law of the leper (Lev. 14 4-10). There is no touch recorded in Lk. 17 12-19, however, where the ten lepers are told to show themselves to the priests, and are cleansed on the way. The Lazarus of Lk. 16 20 is only called εἱλκωμένος—i.e., 'ulcerated.' It became usual, however, to regard him as the representative of lepers; and in the mediæval church the 'parabolic' Lazarus of Lk. and the 'real' Lazarus of Jn. 11 were both alike (or perhaps conjointly) associated with leprosy. Hence lepers were called lazars, and the Lazarus of Jn. became a patron saint of leper-houses (as in the dedication of the great leper hospital at Sherburn, near Durham, in which Lazarus is joined with his sisters Mary and Martha). It was perhaps with reference to the Lazarus whom Jesus loved that lazares or leprosi were otherwise called pauperes Christi (12th and 13th cent.). C. C.

In 𝔊 five sons are assigned to Dedan: ραγουηλ ([AEL]—i.e., רְעוּאֵל, see REUEL; ρασου [ηλ] [D]), ναβδεηλ ([ADEL], i.e., אַדְבְּאֵל—ADBEEL), ασουριμ, λατουσιειμ, λοωμειμ. In 1 Ch. 1 32 the sons of Dedan are omitted in MT and 𝔊, except by 𝔊^{A} which enumerates five, as above. Criticism has not yet led to definite results as to any one of the three sons of Dedan. If, however, we are right in restoring the doubtful text of Gen. 10 6 thus:[1]—'And the sons of Jerahmeel; Cush, and Mizrim, and Zarephath, and Ḳain,' and if יָקְשָׁן, 'Jokshan' in Gen. 25 2 f. is miswritten for כּוּשָׁן, 'Cushan' = כּוּשׁ, Cush' (the N. Arabian Kuš), we may conjecture that אשורם is an expansion of שורם (Šūrām or Šūrīm)—i.e., גשורם (Gešūrām or Gešūrīm)—that לטושם comes from פלשתם, and ultimately from צרפתם = צלפתם (Ṣārephāthām or Ṣārephathīm), and that לאמ[י]ם comes from ירחמאלם (Jeraḥme'ēlām or Jeraḥme'ēlīm). Thus the main difficulties of the two Dedanite genealogies are removed. For another possible occurrence of the (corrupt) ethnic לְטֻשִׁ[י], see TUBAL-CAIN.

The Tgg. and Jer. (Quæst. and Onom.) assume the three names to be appellatives, indicating the occupations or modes of life of different branches of the Dedanites (similarly Hitz. and Steiner, see articles in BL, and cp Margoliouth, in Hastings, DB 3 99*b*). LEVI (לֵוִי; λευ[ε]ι, also λευ[ε]ις [AE], accus. λευειν, 4 Macc. 2 19), 1. Jacob's third son by Leah, Gen. 29 34 (J). The story in Genesis (l.c.) records a popular etymology connecting Levi with לָוָה, lāvāh, 'to be joined' (cp Eccles. 8 15); see also Nu. 18 2 4 (P), where it is said that the tribe of Levi will 'join itself' to Aaron. Some modern critics too support this connexion. Thus Lagarde (Or. 2 20; Mitth. 1 54 ff.) explains 'Levi' as 'one that attaches himself.' If so, the Levites were either 'those who attached themselves to the Semites who migrated back from the Delta, therefore Egyptians,' or perhaps 'those who escorted the ark'; the latter meaning is virtually adopted by Baudissin[2] (Priesterthum, 72, n. 1). Land, however (De Gids, Nov. 1871, p. 244, n.), explains bĕnē Levi as 'sons of conversion'—i.e., the party of a reaction to primitive nomad religion. But it appears impossible to treat לוי (Levi) as an adjective, against the analogy of all the other names of Israelitish tribes, and especially against that of Simeon and Reuben, and Gesenius's old-fashioned rendering of 'Levi' ('associatio') can hardly now be quoted in support of Land's theory. If 'Levi' is original it may be best regarded as the gentilic of Leah (so We. Prol. (3), 146; St. ZATW 1 116 [1881]); NAPHTALI (cp Crit. Bib.), if an ethnic, may be adduced as a parallel.

The present writer, however, thinks that 'Levi' is a corruption, and conjectures that LEAH [q.v.] and some at least of her sons, derived their names, not from animal totems, but from their ethnic affinities—i.e., that Levi comes from Jerahmeel (ירחמאל=רמאל=למין=לבין=לוין). See Crit. Bib. For other views see We. Heid. (1), 114, n. ((2)om.); Hommel, AHT 278*f.*; Aufsätze, 1 30 f. On the Levi-traditions see also MOSES, SHECHEM.

2. A name occurring twice in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk. 3 24 29†). See generally GENEALOGIES ii., § 3 f.

3. A disciple of Jesus, 'called' when at the toll-office (τελώνιον), son of Alphæus [Mk.], Mk. 2 14 Lk. 5 27† (λευειν, accus. [Ti. WH]; cp Mt. 9 9 [call of Matthew]). Three courses are open to us.

(1) We may suppose that this disciple had two names, one of which (Matthew) was given him by Jesus after he entered the apostolic circle, and consequently displaced the earlier name, as Peter superseded Simon. The supposition that he had two names might pass; but the view that one of them was bestowed by Jesus appears hazardous. There is no evidence that the name Matthew, the meaning of which is still disputed, was regarded in the evangelic traditions as having any special appropriateness to its bearer. It might be better to conjecture with Delitzsch (Riehm, HWB (2), 919 b) that the full name of the disciple who was called from the toll-office was Matthew, son of Alphæus, the Levite (הַלֵּוִי); cp Acts 4 36, 'Joses who was surnamed Barnabas, a Levite.' It is at any rate in favour of the identification of Levi and Matthew that the circumstances of the call of Levi agree exactly with those of the call of Matthew; 'Levi' and 'Matthew' are both in the Capernaum toll-office when the thrilling speech 'Follow me' is addressed to them. Must not the same person be intended? May not 'Levi' be an earlier name of 'Matthew'? So, among moderns, Meyer, Olshausen, Holtzmann.

(2) We may suppose that whilst the same fact is related both by Mk. and Lk., and by Mt., the name of the man who was called by Jesus was given by Mt. as Matthew by mistake, the author or redactor of our first gospel having identified the little-known Levi with the well-known apostle Matthew, who may very possibly have been a τελώνης (EV 'publican'), and was at any rate regarded by the evangelist as such (so Sieffert, Ew., Keim [Jesu von Nazara, 2 217]). We know how much the τελῶναι were attracted to Jesus (note Mt. 9 10 Mk. 2 15 Lk. 15 1 19 2 f.); it is very possible that more than one may have been found worthy to be admitted into his inner circle.

It has been pointed out by Lipsius (Apokr. Apostelgeschichten) that the fusion of Levi and Matthew is characteristic of later writers. In the Menologia Matthew is called a son of Alphæus and a brother of James, and in the Breviarium Apostolorum it is said of Matthew, 'Hic etiam ex tribu sua Levi sumpsit cognomentum.' On the other hand, Lipsius (1 24) mentions a Paris MS of the gospels (Cotelier, Patres Apost. 1 271) which identifies the Levi of Mk. with Thaddæus and Lebbæus, and Lk.'s Judas of James. In the Syriac Book of the Bee (Anecdota Oxon., Sem. ser., i., part ii., ed. and transl. by Budge) it is said (chap. 48, p. 112) that Levi was slain by Charmus while teaching in Paneas.

(3) It would be difficult to form a decided opinion if we could not regard the subject from another and a somewhat neglected point of view. It will be admitted that transcribers and translators of Hebrew or Aramaic names were liable to many mistakes. Now Ἀλφαῖος (cp ALPHÆUS and HELEPH) represents most probably אילפי (a derivative of אילפא, 'ship'?). Surely it is very possible that the initial letters אי may have become illegible in the document upon which Mt. 9 9 ff. is based. There remains לפי, which in Aramaic Hebrew characters might easily be mistaken for לוי—i.e., Levi. The original narrative very possibly had 'Ilphai the son of Ilphai' by a scribe's error for 'Mattai the son of Ilphai'; and it is open to us to hold that λεββαῖος = Sin. לבאי (Dalman) has also arisen by corruption out of אילפי. Cp LEBBÆUS.

That 'Levi' appears in the Talmud as a name of Rabbis does not make 'Levi' a probable name for a common man of Capernaum. The occurrences in Lk. 3 24 29 are also precarious supports for the 'Levi' in our text of Mk. and Lk.

LEVIATHAN. Leviāthān (see BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN; CROCODILE) is described in Job 41 [40 25-41]. The last two verses of the description (41 33 [25]) have been misread (cp LION) and therefore misunderstood.[1] 'Who is made without fear' is a very questionable rendering; read '. . . to be lord of the beasts,' changing לבלי־חת into לְבַעַל חַיּת. There is an exact parallel to this in Job 40 19, where Behemoth, if we adopt a necessary critical emendation, is described as 'he that was made to be a ruler of his fellows' (הֶעָשׂוּי לְנֹגֵשׂ חֲבֵרָיו). Among the other passages which refer to Leviathan is Ps. 104 26, where 'there go the ships' is unsuitable to the context. אניות, 'ships' should certainly be תנינים, 'dragons' (Ps. 74 13 148 7; א and ת confounded; cp Judg. 9 31), and at the close of the verse לשחק־בו should probably be לְנֹגֵשׂ־בּוֹ. The psalmist found this reading in his copy of Job (at 40 19), unless indeed we suppose that he read there יְשַׂחֶק־בּוֹ, and copied the phrase which the Hebrew text (MT and 𝔊) now gives in Ps. 104 26. The verse becomes 'There dragons move along; (yea), Leviathan whom thou didst appoint ruler therein'; בו refers to הַיָּם (v. 25). T. K. C.

LEVITES. The Levites (לְוִיִּם; ΛΕΥ[Ε]ΙΤΑΙ) are defined according to the usual methods of Hebrew genealogical history as the descendants of Levi (Gen. 29 34); hence their other name 'b'ne Levi' (בְּנֵי לֵוִי). In Hebrew genealogies, however, we are not necessarily entitled to look upon the eponym of a tribe as more than an ideal personality. Indeed, the only narrative in which, on a literal interpretation, Levi appears as a person (Gen. 34), bears internal evidence of the intention of the author to delineate under the form of personification events in the history of the tribes of Levi and Simeon which must have occurred after the arrival of Israel in Canaan.[2] The same events are alluded to in Gen. 49 5-7, where Simeon and Levi are plainly spoken of as communities with a communal assembly (Ḳāhāl, קָהָל); see ASSEMBLY, col. 345.

1. Secular tribe.

Simeon and Levi were allied tribes or 'brothers'; their onslaught on the Shechemites was condemned by the rest of Israel; and its results were disastrous to the actors, when their cause was disavowed by their brethren. The b'ne Hamor regained possession of Shechem, as we know from Judg. 9, and both the assailing tribes were scattered through Israel, and failed to secure an independent territorial position. Cp SHECHEM.

The details of this curious portion of the earliest Hebrew history must remain obscure (cp DINAH, SIMEON); Gen. 34 does not really place them in so clear a light as the briefer reference in Gen. 49; for the former chapter has been recast and largely added to by a late writer, who looks upon the action of the brethren in the light of the priestly legislation, and judges it much more favourably than is done in Gen. 49. In post-canonical Judaism the favourable view of the zeal of Levi and

[1] The critical emendations are due to Gunkel, Giesebrecht, and Cheyne.

[2] Jacob in 34 30 is not a personal, but a collective idea, for he says, 'I am a few men,' and the capture and total destruction of a considerable city is in the nature of things the work of two tribes rather than of two individuals.

Simeon becomes still more dominant (Judith, 9 2 f.; Bk. of Jubilees, chap. 30, and especially Theodotus, ap. Polyhistor, in Müller's Fragm. 3 217 f.), and the curse of Jacob on the ferocity of his sons is quite forgotten.[1] In the oldest history, however, the treachery of Levi and Simeon towards a community which had received the right of connubium with Israel is represented as a crime, which imperilled the position of the Hebrews and was fatal to the future of the tribes directly involved.

2. Priestly tribe. Whilst, however, the Levites were scattered throughout Israel, their name does not disappear from the roll of the tribes (cp Dt. 27 12). In the blessing of Moses (Dt. 33), where Simeon is passed over, Levi still appears, not as a territorial tribe, but as the collective name for the priesthood. The priesthood meant is that of the northern kingdom under the dynasty of Jehu (on the date of the chapter, see Deuteronomy, § 26); and in fact we know that the priests of the important northern sanctuary of Dan traced their origin to a Levite (Judg. 17 9), Jonathan the son of Gershom, the son of Moses (Judg. 18 30).[2] That the Judæan priesthood were also known as Levites in the later times of the kingdom appears from the book of Deuteronomy, especially from 10 8 f. 18 1 f.; and we learn from Ezek. 44 10 f. that the Judæan Levites were not confined to the service of the temple, but included the priests of the local high places abolished by Josiah.

It may even be conjectured, with some probability, that the Levites (like the remnants of the closely-related tribe of Simeon) had originally settled in Judah and only gradually afterwards spread themselves northwards. Micah's Levite, as we know, was from Bethlehem-Judah (Judg. 17 7).[3] But cp MICAH i., 2.

Alike in Judah and in the N. the priestly prerogative of Levi was traced back to the days of Moses (Dt. 10 8 33 8);[4] but in later times at least the Judæan priesthood did not acknowledge the Levitical status of their northern colleagues (1 K. 12 31). It must, however, be observed that the prophets Amos and Hosea never speak of the northern priesthood as illegitimate, and Hos. 4 certainly implies the opposite. Presumably it was only after the fall of Samaria, and the introduction of large foreign elements into the population of the N., that the southern priests began to disavow the ministers of the sanctuaries of Samaria, most of whom can no longer have been representatives of the old priesthood as it was before the northern captivity (2 K. 17 28 Judg. 18 30 2 K. 23 20, in contrast with v. 8 f.).

3. Levites and priests. In the most developed form of the hierarchical system the ministers of the sanctuary are divided into two grades. All are regarded as Levites by descent (cp, e.g., Ex. 6 25); but the mass of the Levites are mere subordinate ministers not entitled to approach the altar or perform any strictly priestly function, and the true priesthood is confined to the descendants of Aaron. In the documents which reveal to us the actual state of the priesthood in the northern and southern kingdoms before the exile, there is no trace of this distinction.

Perhaps, indeed, it must be conceded to Van Hoonacker (195 f.) and Baudissin (TLZ, 18[illegible], p. 362; cp also his Gesch. d. Alt. Priestertums, 113) that Ezekiel has taken over from the phraseology of the temple of Jerusalem the distinction between 'the priests, the keepers of the charge of the house,' and 'the priests, the keepers of the charge of the altar,' which he refers to as already existing; but as against Van Hoonacker, Baudissin observes with justice that we are not entitled to infer from this that Ezekiel is aware of a distinction between priests (sons of Zadok, or of Aaron) and Levites; on the contrary, in 40 45 he uses the designation 'priests' for those whom he elsewhere calls 'Levites' (44 10 f. 14 45 5). It is better to say that every Levite is a priest, or at least is qualified to become such (Dt. 10 8 18 7).

The subordinate and menial offices of the tabernacle are not assigned to members of a holy guild; in Jerusalem, at least, they were mainly discharged by members of the royal bodyguard (the Carians and footmen, 2 K. 11 4 RV; see CARITES, but also PELETHITES), or by bond slaves, the ancestors of the later Něthinim—in either case by men who might even be uncircumcised foreigners (Ezek. 44 7 f.). A Levitical priest was a legitimate priest. When the author of 1 K. 12 31 wishes to represent Jeroboam's priests as illegal he contents himself with saying that they were not taken from the sons of Levi. The first historical trace of a modification of this state of things is found in connection with the suppression of the local high places by Josiah, when their priests were brought to Jerusalem and received their support from the temple offerings, but were not permitted to minister at the altar (2 K. 23 9).[1]

4. Country priests. The priests of the temple, the sons of Zadok, were not prepared to concede to their provincial brethren all the privileges which Dt. 18 had proposed in compensation for the loss of their local ministry. Ezekiel, after the fall of the temple, in planning a scheme of ritual for the new temple, raises the practical exclusion from the altar to the rank of a principle. In the new temple the Levites who had ministered before the local altars shall be punished by exclusion from proper priestly work, and shall fill the subordinate offices of the sanctuary, in place of the foreigners who had hitherto occupied them, but shall not be permitted to pollute Yahwè's house in future by their presence (Ezek. 44 7 ff.). In the post-exilic period this principle was actually carried out; priests and Levites are distinguished in the list in Ezra 2, Neh. 7, 1 Esd. 5; but the priests, that is, the descendants of the pre-exilic priests of the royal temple, greatly outnumber the Levites or descendants of the priests of the high places (cp Ezra 8 15 ff.). Nor is this at all surprising, if it be remembered that the duties falling to Levites in the temple had little that was attractive about them, whilst as long as they remained in exile the inferiority of their position would be much less apparent.

5. Singers, etc. At this time other classes of temple servants, the singers, the porters, the NETHINIM and other slaves of the sanctuary (but cp SOLOMON'S SERVANTS, CHILDREN OF), whose hereditary service would, on Eastern principles, give them a pre-eminence over other slaves of the sanctuary, are also still distinguished from the Levites; but these distinctions lost their significance when the word Levite itself came to mean a subordinate minister. In the time of Nehemiah, Levites and singers, Levites and porters, are very much run into one (Neh. 11 ff., see PORTERS), and the absorption of the other classes of subordinate ministers into the hereditary guild of Levites is at last expressed in the shape of genealogies, deriving the singers, and even families whose heathenish and foreign names show them to have originally belonged to the Nethinim, from the ancient stock of Levi. Cp GENEALOGIES i., § 7 (ii.).

6. Priestly legislation. The new hierarchical system found its legal basis in the priestly legislation, first publicly accepted as an integral part of the Tōrāh under Ezra and Nehemiah (ISRAEL, § 59). Here the exclusion of the Levites from all share in the proper priesthood of the sons of Aaron is precisely formulated (Nu. 3 f.); their service is regulated from the point of view that they are essentially the servants and hereditary serfs of the priests (3 9), whilst, on the other hand, as has already found vivid expression in the arrangement of the camp in Nu. 2, they are recognised as possessing a higher

[1] According to Wellhausen's analysis (JDT 21 435 f.), the old narrative consisted of Gen. 34 3 7* 11 f. 19 25 *f. 30 f., the asterisk denoting that only parts of the verses marked by it are ancient. The most satisfactory discussion is that of Kuenen (Th.T 14 257 ff.=Abhandlungen [translated by Budde], 255 ff.), in which the opposite view of Dillmann (Genesis, ad loc.) is fully refuted. grade of holiness than the mass of the people. This superiority of position finds its justification in the artificial theory that they are a surrogate for the male first-born of Israel, who, belonging of right to Yahwè, are handed over by the nation to the priests (cp FIRST-BORN, col. 1526).

The Levites are endowed with the tithes, of which in turn they pay a tithe to the priests (Nu. 18 21 ff.). These regulations as to tithes were enforced by Nehemiah; but the subordinate position of the Levites was hardly consistent with their permanent enjoyment of revenues of such importance, and we learn from the Talmud that these were finally transferred to the priests. Cp TAXATION AND TRIBUTE.[1]

Another provision of the law—i.e., the assignment to the Levites of certain cities with a definite measure of inalienable pasture-ground (Nu. 35 Lev. 25 34)—was apparently never put in force after the exile. It cannot be reconciled with the prohibition against the holding of property in virtue of which the Levites in common with the other needy classes are commended to the compassion of the charitable.

This prohibition is clearly expressed in the same priestly legislation (Nu. 18 20 26 62), and particularly in D. See e.g., Dt. 10 9, 'Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren'; 18 1. From Dt. 18 6 we gather that the Levites were dispersed as sojourners in various Israelitish cities—i.e., they had no territorial possession (cp Gen. 49 7). In accordance with this Ezekiel propounds an idealistic reform according to which the Levites were to have a domain apportioned to them, where they were to live together. Josh. 21 (P), 1 Ch. 13 2 cannot of course be quoted in support of the prohibition. It should be observed too that many of the so-called Levitical cities did not become Israelitish till quite late, and that some of them were so near each other that the pasture-land assigned to one city would have overlapped that assigned to its neighbour (e.g., Hebron and Holon, Anathoth and Almon), whilst the pasture-land of Hammoth-dor would have included part of the Sea of Galilee. See Di. Num.-Deut.; Now. HA 2 129; Addis. Hex. 2 448 f.

As the priestly legislation carried its ordinances back into the time of Moses, so the later developments of the Levitical service as known in the time of the Chronicler (on the date, see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 157) are referred by that author to David (1 Ch. 15 16 23) or to Hezekiah (2 Ch. 29) and Josiah (2 Ch. 35); and by a similar projection of post-exilic conditions into pre-exilic times, we find, among other modifications of the original text (such as 1 S. 6 15 2 S. 15 24 1 K. 8 4), various individuals who had been prominent in connection with matters of worship invested with the character of Levites; this has been done not only in the case of Samuel (comp. 1 S. 1 1 with 1 Ch. 6 12 f. 18 ff.), but even in that of a foreigner like Obed-edom of Gath.[2] The chief point is the development of the musical service of the temple, which has no place in the Pentateuch, but afterwards came to be of the first importance (as we see from the Psalter) and attracted the special attention of Greek observers (Theophrastus, ap. Porph. De Abstin. ii. 26).

7. Post-exilic development.

For the reconstruction of the post-exilic history of the relation of Levites to priests, we are thrown for the most part on pure conjecture, which, accordingly, Vogelstein has used with conspicuous acuteness. He supposes that the period of prosperity enjoyed by the Levites under Ezra and Nehemiah was followed by one of threatening collapse against which they sought—and with success—to defend themselves by alliance with the singers and doorkeepers. The excessive pretensions of the party thus reinforced, however, led to renewed adversity (Nu. 16), after which they were ultimately able, by peaceful means (cp the work of the Chronicler), to establish a tolerable modus vivendi. Vogelstein's attempt is to be accepted at least to this extent: it has conclusively shown that the post-exilic history of the Levites did not proceed in a straight line, either upwards or—as Van Hoonacker has tried to make out—downwards.

The Levites appear, it is true, to have sunk to a position of complete insignificance at the close of the history, that is to say at the close of the OT period; to this Van Hoonacker has very appropriately called attention. In the NT they are mentioned only in Lk. 10 32 Jn. 1 19 and Acts 4 36. If, on the other hand, their position in Ezra-Nehemiah is only relatively a favourable one, that is far from justifying Hoonacker's conclusion that Chronicles, in which they are represented as enjoying a more favourable position (for the most part comparable to that of the priests), must be taken as representing the conditions of pre-exilic times. Baudissin (Rel.-gesch. 45) has shown that even within the priestly legislation it is possible to trace a growing respect for the Levites. In his judgment, accordingly, we cannot say that in the post-exilic time any considerable vicissitudes in the condition of the Levites are to be observed, and he adds the suggestion, well worthy of attention, that this fact, coupled with the ultimate subordination of the Levites to the singers and porters, points to the conclusion that the Levites strictly so-called were merely an artificial creation—a creation of the prophet Ezekiel.[1]

8. Traditional view. Secular and priestly tribe.

Whilst it is not difficult to trace the history of the Levites from the time of the blessing of Moses and Deuteronomy downwards, the links connecting the priestly tribe with the earlier fortunes of the tribe of Levi are hardly to be determined with any certainty.

According to the traditional view, the scheme of the Levitical legislation, with its double hierarchy of priests and Levites, was of Mosaic ordinance. There is too much evidence, however, that in the Pentateuch, as we possess it, divergent ordinances, dating from very different ages, are all carried back by means of a legal convention to the time of the wilderness journey (cp HEXATEUCH). If, too, the complete hierarchical theory as held in post-exilic times was really ancient, it is inexplicable that all trace of it was so completely lost in the time of the monarchy, that Ezekiel speaks of the degradation of the non-Zadokite Levites as a new thing and as a punishment for their share in the sin of the high places, and that no clear evidence of the existence of a distinction between priests and Levites has been found in any of the Hebrew writings that are demonstrably earlier than the exile.[2] It has indeed been argued that (1) the list of Levitical cities in Josh. 21, and (2) the narrative of the rebellion of Korah imply that the precepts of the post-exilic law were practically already recognized; but (1) it is certain that there was no such distribution as that spoken of in Josh. 21 at the time of the settlement, because many of the cities named were either not occupied by Israelites till long afterwards, or, if occupied, were not held by Levites.

The Levitical cities of Joshua are indeed largely identical with ancient holy cities (Hebron, Shechem, Mahanaim, etc.); but in ancient Israel a holy city was one which possessed a noted sanctuary (often of Canaanite origin), not one the inhabitants of which belonged to the holy tribe. These sanctuaries had, of course, their local priesthoods, which in the time of the monarchy were all called Levitical; and it is only in this sense, not in that of the priestly legislation, that a town like Shechem can ever have been Levitical.

(2) So again, the narrative of Korah has proved on critical examination to be of composite origin; the parts of it which represent Korah as a common Levite in rebellion against the priesthood of Aaron belong to a late date, and the original form of the history knows nothing of the later hierarchical system (see KORAH ii).

[2] [If the text is correct; on this, see OBED-EDOM: cp also GENEALOGIES i., § 7 [v.] end.]

[1] TLZ, 1899, p. 361.

[2] Defenders of the traditional view, the latest being Van Hoonacker, 92 f., have sought such evidence in 1 K. 8 4. There are many indications, however, that the text of this part of Kings has undergone considerable editing at a pretty late date. The LXX translators, 𝔊[BL], did not read the clause which speaks of 'priests and Levites,' and the Chronicler read 'the Levite priests' (but 𝔊 οἱ ἱερεῖς καὶ οἱ Λευεῖται)—the phrase characteristic of the deuteronomic identification of priestly and Levitical ministry.

It has thus become impossible to entertain the idea of carrying back the distinction of Levites and Aaronites in the later sense to an early date. We cannot use the priestly parts of the Pentateuch and Joshua as a source for the earliest history. It is probable, however (note the case of Micah's Levite in Judg. 17 f.),[1] that the kin of Moses had a certain hereditary prerogative in connection with the worship of Yahwè (cp Dt. 10 8). In the earliest times the ritual of Yahwè's sanctuary had not attained such a development as to occupy a whole tribe; but if, as appears probable, the mass of the tribe of Levi was almost annihilated at an early date, the name of Levite might very well continue to be known only in connection with those of the tribe who traced kin with Moses or remained by the sanctuary. Cp MOSES, § 5. The multiplication of Hebrew holy places was effected partly by syncretism with the Canaanites, partly in other ways that had nothing to do with a central sanctuary, and so arose a variety of priestly guilds which certainly cannot have been all of Levitical descent.

9. Alternative theory.

It is possible, perhaps, that in some cases where Canaanite sanctuaries were taken over by the Israelites certain Canaanite priestly families may have contrived to retain possession of the priestly office. Whether even Zadok himself, the ancestor of the Jerusalem priesthood, was of Levitical origin must remain an open question, the answer of Chronicles not being trustworthy enough to be decisive (see ZADOK, 1).

As the nation was consolidated and a uniform system of sacred law (referred to Moses as its originator) came to be administered all over the land, in the hands of the ministers of the greater sanctuaries, the various guilds may have been drawn together and have aimed at forming such a united body as we find described in Dt. 33.[2] This unity would find a natural expression in the extension of the name of Levites to all priesthoods recognized by the State—in Ex. 4 14 'Levite' is simply equivalent to a professional designation. If this was the course of things we can hardly suppose that the term came into large use till the Israelites were consolidated under the monarchy, and in fact the integrity of the text in 1 S. 6 15, 2 S. 15 24, as well as in 1 K. 8 4, is open to question (cp ARK). Down to the time of David and Jeroboam, as appears from the cases of Samuel, Zadok, Eleazer (1 S. 7 1), as well as from 1 K. 12 31, the priesthood was not essentially hereditary; but, like all occupations that required traditional knowledge, it must have tended to become so more and more, and thus all priests would appear as Levites by adoption if not by descent.

Thus also, doubtless, the great number of the priests at Nob, who are reckoned as of the family of Ahimelech, but can hardly all of them have been personally related to him, is to be taken as evidence of the effort to maintain the fiction of a priestly family as deriving its coherence from common descent.[3] The interesting parallel case of the Rechabites shows us how easy to the thinking of those early times was the transition from the idea of official relationship to that of relationship by blood.

Wellhausen (Prol. (5), 139 ff.) has argued from Dt. 33 9 that the northern priesthood was not an hereditary guild, but involved the surrender of all family connection; the words, however, are more naturally understood as praise of the judicial impartiality which refused to be influenced by family ties. Our data are too scanty to clear up the details of this interesting piece of history; but it can hardly be doubted that the development of a consolidated and hereditary priestly corporation in all the sanctuaries was closely bound up with the unification of the state and the absorption of tribal organisation in the monarchy. The reaction of [2] Cp Ex. 32 25-29, a related passage, doubtless secondary, which reads like a commentary to Dt. 33 9. In it the choice of Levi to the priesthood is carried back to a reminiscence of a (possibly historical) action of vigorous faith on the part of the fellow-tribesmen of Moses [cp MASSAH AND MERIBAH].

tribal feeling against the central Government, of which there are many traces in the history of Ephraim, has perhaps its counterpart in the opposition to the unified priesthood which is alluded to in Dt. 33 11.[1]

There have been many attempts on the part of recent writers from the time of Vatke downwards to deny that Levi was one of the original tribes of Israel; but they all break down before the testimony of Gen. 49. And with them break down the attempts at an appellative interpretation of the name Levi. See LEVI, and cp Kuenen's refutation of the theory of Land, *Theol. LEVITICAL CITIES. See LEVITES, §§ 6, 8.

LEVITICUS.

1. Name and contents.

The name comes through the Latin Leviticus (sc. liber) from the title in the Greek Bible, (τὸ) λευ[ε]ιτικόν (sc. βιβλίον),[2] 'the Levitical book'—i.e., the part of the Pentateuch treating of the functions of the Levites. 'Levitical' is here equivalent to 'sacerdotal,'—of the Levites in the narrower sense the book has nothing to say—and the name thus corresponds to the Hebrew tōrath kōhănīm (תּוֹרַת כֹּהֲנִים), 'the priests' law,' in the Talmud and Massorah.[3] In Jewish writings the book is more frequently cited by its first word, Wayyiḳrā (וַיִּקְרָא).[4]

The contents of the book are almost exclusively legislative; 8, 9, 10 in part, and 24 10 ff., though narrative in form, are to be regarded as precedents to which the ritual practice is to conform or on which the rule is founded. In the chronology of the Pentateuch the laws were revealed to Moses and the events narrated occurred at Sinai in the first month of the second year of the exodus (between the first of the first month, Ex. 40 2 17, and the first of the second month, Nu. 1 1); in Lev. itself there are no dates.

The book begins with the ritual for the several species of sacrifice, and defines cases in which certain sacrifices are prescribed (1-7); then follow: the consecration of Aaron and his sons; the punishment of Nadab and Abihu for a violation of ritual, with some consequent regulations (8-10); definition of various kinds and causes of uncleanness (11-15); ritual for the Day of Atonement (16); a collection of laws of more varied character, religious, moral, and ceremonial, closing with a hortatory address (17-26; see § 14); provisions for the commutation of vows and tithes (27). For more detailed analysis, see Driver, Introd. (6), 42 ff.; Kalisch, Leviticus, 1 12 ff.

2. Sources.

The immediate continuation of JE in Ex. 32-34 is found in Nu. 10 29-12,[5] nor are any displaced fragments of JE found in Leviticus. The book belongs as a whole to the priestly stratum of the Hexateuch. It is not, however, a unit. Chaps. 17-26 come from an originally independent body of laws having a very distinct character of its own; they have been redacted—probably by more than one hand—in the spirit of the priestly scribes, but not wholly conformed to P, much less made an integral part of it.[1] Nor is the remainder homogeneous: 8-10 belong to the history of the sacred institutions;[2] 8 is the fulfilment of the command to Moses in Ex. 40 12-14, and should immediately follow Ex. 40 17-38, from which it is now separated by the collection of sacrificial laws in Lev. 1-7; 16 is in like manner separated from its antecedents in 10 by the laws on uncleanness and purification in 11-15. Neither of these groups of laws is—even artificially—connected with the narrative; both give internal evidence of compilation from independent collections of tōrōth and of extensive and repeated supplementation and redaction. The critical problems in Leviticus are, therefore, not less difficult nor less important than those presented by other books of the Hexateuch.

We may best begin our investigation with 8-10. In Ex. 40 Moses is bidden to set up and dedicate the Tabernacle (1-11) and to consecrate Aaron and his sons to the priesthood (12-15).

3. P in Lev. 8-10.

The execution of the former part of this command is related in Ex. 40 17-38; of the latter in Lev. 8. It can scarcely be doubted that the author of Ex. 40 17 ff. meant Lev. 8 to follow immediately, and, consequently, that Lev. 1-7, which now interrupt this connection, were inserted here by a subsequent redactor. Lev. 8 describes the performance of the rites for the consecration and installation of priests prescribed in Ex. 29 1-35, and is related to that chapter exactly as Ex. 35 ff. to 25 ff. Ex. 35 ff. have been found, however, to be a later expansion of the—probably very brief—account of the execution of the directions given to Moses in 25 ff.[3] It follows that Lev. 8, also, belongs to the secondary stratum, and this inference is confirmed by internal evidence;[4] but, since Lev. 8 knows only one altar, it seems to represent one of the earlier stages in the formation of this stratum.[5] Vv. 10*b* 11 and 30 are perhaps later glosses.

Chap. 9, the inaugural sacrifices, is the original sequel of Ex. 25-29 in the history of Israel's sacred institutions. It was probably separated from those chapters only by a short statement that, after receiving these instructions (and the tables of the testimony), Moses descended from the mount and did as Yahwè had bidden him; this was superseded by the elaborate secondary narrative in Ex. 35-40 Lev. 8.[6] The hand of a redactor may be recognised in v. 1 ('the eighth day,' 'the elders of Israel') and in the last verses (23 f.); some minor glosses may also be suspected.

The death of Nadab and Abihu, 10 1-5, is the continuation of 9 and from the same source. The injunction forbidding Aaron and his surviving sons to defile themselves by mourning (6 f.) is appropriately introduced in this place, and such a prohibition may have originally stood here; but the present form of the verses is late (cp 21 10-12). Verses 8 f. (cp Ezek. 44 21) and 10 f. (cp 11 47 20 25 Ezek. 44 23 f.) have no connection with their present surroundings; the former would properly have its place in 21; the latter is a fragment, the beginning of which has been lost. Verses 12-15 are a supplement to 9 17*a* 21, and would naturally stand after 9 22; 16-20 is a very late passage of midrashic character,[7] suggested by the conflict between the procedure in 9 15 and the rule in 6 24-30.

The chapters which precede the above (1-7) contain a collection of laws on the subject of sacrifice.

LEVITICUS

These comprise: burnt offering (1); meal offering (2); peace offering (3); sin offering (4); sin (trespass) offering (5 1-13); trespass offering (5 14-6 7 [5 14-26]).

4. Chaps. 1-7: Sacrificial laws.[1]

Tōrāh of burnt offering (6 8-13 [1-6]); meal offering (6 14-18 [7-11]); priests' meal offering (6 19-23 [12-16]); sin offering (6 24-30 [17-23]); trespass offering (7 1-7); certain perquisites of the priests (8 9 f.); peace offering (7 11-15); prohibition of eating fat or blood (7 22-27); the priests' portion of peace offering (7 28-34); subscriptions, 35 f. 37 f.

In this collection of laws it will be observed that 1-6 7 [1-5] are addressed to the people; 6 8 [1]-7 21 to the priests. To this difference in the titles corresponds in general the character of the laws: 1-6 7 [1-5] prescribe what sacrifices and offerings the Israelite may bring, or under certain circumstances must bring; 6 8 ff. [1 ff.] deal with the same classes of sacrifice, but with more reference to the priests' functions and perquisites. Chaps. 1-7 are not, however, a unitary code of sacrificial laws in two parts containing directions for the worshippers and the priests respectively. The different order of the laws (the peace offering in the first part precedes, in the second follows, the sin and trespass offering), consistent differences in formulation (note in the second 'This is the law of,' etc.), and, finally, the subscription, 7 37, which belongs to the second part only, show that 6 8 [1]-7 21 formed a collection by themselves.

Further examination shows that neither part of 1-7 is entirely homogeneous. Chaps. 1 (burnt offerings) and 3 (peace offerings) are substantially intact, and are good examples of relatively old sacrificial tōrōth.

5. Chap. 1-6 7.

Slight changes have been made to adjust the laws to the historical theory of P: for 'the priest,' which seems to have been originally used throughout (cp 1 9 12 f. 15 17 3 11 16), the redactor has sometimes substituted 'the sons of Aaron' (3 5 8), more frequently 'Aaron's sons, the priests' (1 5 8 11 8 2; cp 1 7); the reference to the 'tent of meeting' (1 3 5 3 2 8 13) is also editorial, 1 14-17 is a supplement (cp 2).

Chap. 2 1-3 (meal offering) has some resemblance to 1 3, but is at least out of place where it stands—3 should immediately follow 1 (cp 1 2 f. 3 1); the rest of the chapter is differently formulated (2nd sing.; note also 'Aaron and his sons') and must be ascribed to a different hand.

Chap. 4 (sin offering),[2] with its scale of victims and rites graduated according to the rank of the offerer, belongs to a class of laws which seems to be the product of artificial elaboration in priestly schools rather than to represent the natural development of the ceremonial. The altar of incense (7, cp 18) is a late addition to the furniture of the tabernacle;[3] the ritual of the high priests' sin offering (3-12) is much more solemn than that of Ex. 29 10-14 Lev. 9 8-11 (cp also 8 14-17); the sin offering of the congregation, which is elsewhere a goat (9 15 Nu. 15 24, and even Lev. 16), is here a bullock;[4] the same heightening of the propitiatory rites is noticed here as in the offering of the high priest.

Although 5 1-13 has no title, it is not the continuation of 4; it knows nothing of the distinction of persons which is characteristic of 4, and differs both in formulation and in terminology—the very precise author of 4 would not have spoken of the victim as an 'āšām (5 6 f.; cp 14 ff.). The same reasons prevent us from regarding 5 1-13 as an appendix to 4 by a still later hand.[5] In 5 1-6 much difficulty is created by the apparent confusion of ḥaṭṭāth and 'āšām ('sin offering' and 'trespass offering'), two species of sacrifice which are elsewhere quite distinct.[6] The verses seem also not to be a unit; 2 f. is not an analogous case to 1 4, with which 5 f. are connected. Verses 1 4 5 f. are in matter and form cognate to 15 f. 6 2-7 [5 21-26].

The most probable explanation is that in 5 1 ff. a law prescribing a 'trespass offering' has been altered so as to require a 'sin offering' (5*b*). The insertion of 2 f. is more difficult to account for; for these defilements no sacrifice is elsewhere prescribed (see 11 24 ff. 15 5 ff. etc. Nu. 19 11 ff.). If 2 f. are derived from an old tōrāh, it must be supposed that a specific case, like that in Nu. 6 12 or in Lev. 7 20 f., was originally contemplated.[1]

The mitigations in 5 7-10, 11-13 are later, and perhaps successive, additions (cp 1 14-17). The laws in 5 15 f. 6 2-7 [5 22-26] are from a group defining the cases in which a 'trespass offering' is required (cp 5 1 4-6), and make clear the true character of this sacrifice; if 17-19 is of the same origin, the general phrases of 17*a* (cp 4 2 13 22 27) have probably supplanted a more specific 'trespass.'

These laws, though probably introduced here at a comparatively late stage in the redaction and not without some alteration, are substantially genuine priestly tōrōth; certain resemblances, especially in 6 2-7 [5 22-26], to H in Lev. 17-26 point to proximity, if not to identity of origin (see below, § 25).

6. Chaps. 6 8-7.[2]

Chaps. 6 8 [1]-7 21 contain a series of rules, chiefly for the guidance of the priests, and, in the introductions prefixed by the redactor (6 8 f. [1 f.] 24 f. [17 f.]), addressed to 'Aaron and his sons.' Each paragraph begins, 'This is the tōrāh of' [the burnt offering, etc.); and the resumptive subscription, 7 37, is in corresponding form.

Here, as in 1 3, 'Aaron and his sons' or 'the sons of Aaron' has sometimes been substituted in the text for the original 'the priest'; 'the court of the tent of meeting' (6 16 26 [9 19]) is editorial, as in 1 3 5 etc., and other glosses may be noted, especially in 6 17 f. [10 f.].

The rule for the priests' meal offering, 6 20-23 [13-16], has a different superscription, and is clearly secondary; the exegetical difficulties are due to subsequent glosses; 6 30 [23] depends upon 4 (cp 10 16-20); 7 8-10, perquisites of the officiating priest (cp 29-34), are introduced here in connection with 7; 10 is perhaps later than 9, as the offering of uncooked flour is later than that of bread and cakes.

The priestly tōrōth in these chapters, also, are relatively old,[3] and there is no reason to doubt that they represent actual practice; they have been preserved with little material change.[4]

Chap. 7 22-27, prohibition to the Israelites (2nd pl.) to eat the fat of sacrifices and the blood of animals (cp 3 16*b* 17 17 10-14), stands not inappropriately after 11-21, but is not from the same source. Substantially the same thing may be said of 28-34, which, again, are formulated differently from 22-27. A later hand may be recognised in 32 (2nd pl.), which is a doublet to 33; 34 (1st sing.) is added by the redactor; 35 f. (cp Nu. 18 8) is the subscription to an enumeration of the priests' dues (35*b* doublet to 36*a*), and undoubtedly late; observe the anointing of all the priests, 36*a* (see EXODUS ii., § 5, i.); 37 is the original subscription to the tōrōth in 6 8 [1]-7 21 (the 'installation' is a gloss referring to 6 19-23 [12-16]); 38 is added by a redactor.

7. Chaps. 11-15: Clean and unclean.[5]

Chaps. 11-15 are naturally connected by their dealing with the subject of cleanness and uncleanness (a), and by certain phraseological characteristics (b).

(a) The chapters deal with: clean and unclean animals—i.e., kinds allowed or forbidden for food (11 1-23); defilement by contact with unclean animals, alive or dead, and the necessary purifications (24-38); defilement by contact with the carcasses of clean animals (39 f.); unclean reptiles and vermin (41-44); subscriptions (44 f. 46 f.). Uncleanness and purification after childbirth (12). Skin diseases; discrimination of 'unclean' kinds from innocent eruptions; precautions to be taken in suspected cases; the isolation of the 'leper' (13 1-46); similar appearances in cloth and leather (47-59); purification of the leper, offerings (14 1-32); 'leprous' spots on the walls of houses and their treatment (33-53); general subscription (54-57). Uncleanness from sexual secretions and discharges in health and disease, in man (15 1-18) and woman (19-31); general subscription (32 f.).

(b) A unity of redaction is indicated also by the recurrence of the phrase, 'This is the tōrāh of,' etc., in the subscriptions (11 46 12 7 13 59 14 32 54 57 15 32 f.; cp Nu. 5 29); in 14 2 the words appear in a title, as they do repeatedly in 6 8 [1]-7 21 (see above, § 6).

The distinctions embodied in these laws originate in a low stage of culture and are there of fundamental importance.[1] A high degree of elaboration, even of a kind which appears to us artificial, is not of itself proof of late development; savage taboos frequently form a most complicated system. We have no reason to doubt that the tōrōth in Lev. 11-15 are based upon ancient Israelite, and even prehistoric, custom. As they lie before us, however, the chapters give evidence of having been formulated in different schools, and of repeated literary supplementation and redaction.

8. Chap. 11: Unclean animals.

The close of chap. 11 (45, cp 44*a*) exhibits the characteristic phraseology and motive of H ('I am Yahwè,' 'ye shall be holy for I am holy');[2] the tōrōth, especially in 2*b*-8 9-11* 20 *f. 41 f., are similar to many which are embodied in H (see, e.g., Lev. 18). It is inferred with much probability that the food laws in Lev. 11 were included in the 'holiness' code;[3] Lev. 20 25 implies that H contained such rules. Laws on the same subject in closely similar form are found in Dt. 14,[4] probably taken from the same priestly collection from which H derived them.[5] The food laws of H have been preserved, however, only with many additions and alterations; 11 1 2*a* 8 10*aβ b* 11 (except לא תאכלו), 12 13-19 in their present form, and much in 20-23 41-42 and 46 f., are to be ascribed to successive, and in part very late, redactors. Laws on a different subject—viz., defilement by contact with unclean animals (24-38) or the carcasses of clean animals (39 f.)—have also been introduced,[6] and these again are apparently not all of the same age; 32-38, in particular, seems to be more recent than the rest.

9. Chap. 12: Childbirth.[7]

The rules defining uncleanness after the birth of a male (12 2*b*-4) or female (5) child, and the requisite purifications in the two cases respectively (6-8), are formulated in the same way as the rules in chap. 15 (cp 15 2*b* 16 19 25), with which chapter they are closely connected by their subject; 12 2 fixes the duration of uncleanness by a reference to 15 19. There can be little doubt that 12 1-7 originally stood after 15 30; what led the redactor to transpose the chapter it is difficult to imagine. The title (1 2*a*) is editorial; 'the door of the tent of meeting' (6, contrast 'the sanctuary,' 4) is also secondary; 8, which follows the subscription, like the corresponding mitigations in other cases, is a later modification of the law.

10. Chap. 13 f.: 'Leprosy.'

The marks by which the priest is to distinguish the skin diseases which render the subject unclean, from innocent eruptions (13 2-44) are carefully defined, and are manifestly the result of close observation.[8] The subject was an important part of the tōrāh of the priests (Dt. 24 8), and one which from its nature is likely to have been relatively early fixed in writing; the minute discrimination of symptoms is not to be taken as evidence of recent origin, whilst the rites of purification in 14 2-8*a* are of a strikingly primitive character.[1] The chapters are not, however, entirely of the same age. The original law contained only 13 2-46*a* 14 2-8*aa*, with the subscription 14 57*b*. The ritual of purification in 14 10-20 is obviously a later substitute for 2-8*a*.

[2] On the relation of these chapters to 1-6 7 [1-5] see above, § 4.
[3] Chap. 6 9 [2] has been understood to speak of the daily evening burnt offering, and it is hence inferred that the rule is very late (after Ezra); but the text—which is manifestly corrupt—does not warrant so large a conclusion.
[4] In addition to the verses mentioned above, 7 12 may reasonably be suspected.

In 8*a* the leper is already clean, in 10 he is still to be cleansed (cp 20*b*); the connection in 8*b* (9) is manifestly artificial. The ceremonies in 10 ff. are patterned after the consecration of priests in Lev. 8 (cp 14 14-18 with 8 23 f. 30 Ex. 29 20 f.); the extravagant number of sacrifices, the exact prescription of the quantity of flour, etc., are other marks of late date and probably of the factitious character of the whole law (see above, on chap. 4 [§ 5]).

The reduction of the number and costliness of the victims in the case of the poor (14 21-31), with its independent subscription (32), is presumably still more recent. The purification of the leper (14 2-8) is separated from the law for his seclusion (13 45 f.) by a passage of some length on spots of mould in stuffs and leather (13 47-58) having its own subscription (59), which would stand more properly in connection with the rules concerning patches of mould on the walls of houses (14 33-53). The association of these fungus growths with eruptive skin diseases ('leprosy') is not unnatural, and would lead to similar regulations for inspection by a priest, and for the destruction or purification of the materials affected. Chap. 13 47-59 closely follows the formulation of 13 2 ff., and may be a comparatively early supplement to the law on 'leprosy,' if not of approximately the same age. Chap. 14 33-53 is not improbably younger.

The introduction (34), with its reference to the future settlement in Canaan, is unlike that of any other of the laws in this group:[2] and the adaptation of the ritual for the purification of the leper to the cleansing of the house (49-53) seems artificial; these verses may, however, be a still later addition, since in 48 the house is already pronounced clean (cp 13 58, where no further ceremony is prescribed). The subscription, 54-57, has been expanded in successive stages.

11. Chap. 15: Issues.

In chap. 15 a basis of old tōrāh in characteristic formulation is recognisable, most readily at the beginning and the end of the several paragraphs; this basis seems to have been enlarged, especially by the multiplication of cases of derivative pollution, and some of these additions seem to be very late. It is not possible, however, to discriminate sharply between the original rules and the subsequent accretions. Verse 31, seemingly addressed to the priests (read 'warn' [והזהרתם] for 'separate'), is an appropriate close to a collection of laws on various forms of uncleanness, and does not suggest the priestly editor; the subscription, 32-34, has grown by repeated glosses, 32*a* only is by the first hand.

12. Chap. 16: Day of Atonement.[3]

The beginning of chap. 16 is connected with 10 1-5 not only by v. 1 (R_P) but also by its contents. Nadab and Abihu lost their lives by presumptuously intruding into the presence of Yahwè carrying unhallowed fire (cp 16 12 f.) in their censers; the fate of these priests is the occasion of a revelation setting forth the rites with which Aaron may enter the sanctuary without incurring the like destruction.[4] In the history of the sacred institutions, 16 2 ff. must, therefore, have immediately followed the death of Nadab and Abihu in 10 1 ff. Not all of 16, however, is from this source; in 2-28 a singular piacular ritual, including the bringing of the blood of the victim into the inner sanctuary and the sending away into the wilderness of a scape-goat laden with the sins of the people (see AZAZEL), has been united with the prescriptions for Aaron's entering the holy place; in 29-34*a* is ordained an annual general fast day (cp 23 26-32), on which the priest performs rites—not further specified—for the purification of the people and the sanctuary (cp Ezek. 45 18-20). Benzinger, in his analysis of the chapter,[1] ascribes the last-named law to the author of 2-4 6 12 f.; it stood in close connection with 9. The elaborate expiatory ceremonies in 16 5 7-10 14-28 represent a much later development (ATONEMENT, DAY OF, § 2); the fusion of the two elements had its basis in the praxis itself; the younger ritual probably never had an independent literary existence (ZATW 9 88 f.).

As regards the last point, various indications in the text (e.g., the repetition of 6 in 11) seem to point to the union of two written sources by a redactor, whilst the complex ritual itself, with its repeated entrances and exits,[2] is explained more easily as the result of such a combination than as an evolution in praxis. It is comparatively easy to separate the expiatory ceremonies of the Day of Atonement (disregarding some minor glosses—5*aβ* 7-10 15*abβ* 16*a* 18-22*a* 26-29*a).

The introduction, which doubtless directed that these rites should be performed annually on a certain day, is missing; remnants of it may perhaps be preserved in 29*b*-34*a*, which verses are not an old law of P (Benzinger), but give evidence of contamination from Lev. 23 26-32, and of various glosses. It is more difficult to determine just what was contained in the original directions for Aaron's entrance into the holy place; for in converting this act into a periodical ceremony and incorporating it in the ritual of the Day of Atonement the redactor has made much greater changes in this part of his material. The essential features appear to be: the ablution, the vestments (4), the sacrifice of a young bullock as a sin offering (6), the incense burnt in a censer on coals taken from the altar (12-14); a more detailed restoration cannot be attempted here.

13. Chap. 17-26: The Holiness Law-Book.[3]

Chap. 26 3-45 is a solemn address of Yahwè (1 pers.) to the Israelites (pl.), setting before them the blessings he will bestow upon them if they walk in his statutes and observe his commandments, and the calamities with which he will visit them if they will not hearken unto him and keep these commandments. Even apart from the subscription (46)—'these are the statutes and the judgments and the laws (ḥuḳḳīm, mišpāṭīm, tōrōth) which Yahwè made between him and the Israelites at Mt. Sinai through Moses'—the character of the discourse and its resemblance to Dt. 28 conclusively prove that Lev. 26 originally stood at the end of a body of legislation. The distinctive motives and phraseology of 26 recur in the preceding chapters in numerous exhortations to observe the statutes and judgments therein contained (cp 18 1-5 24-30 19 2 36*b* 37 20 7 f. 22-26 22 31-33); briefer words of similar tenor are interspersed in other places; note also the occurrence of the characteristic phrase, 'I am Yahwè' (with various complements), throughout these chapters from 18 2 to 26 45.

It is plain, therefore, that 18-25, or at least considerable parts of these chapters, come from the law-book of which 26 is the conclusion. From the prominence given in it to the motive of holiness, this book has been called the Holiness Law;[4] it is usually designated by the symbol H.[5] The characteristic formulas of H appear first in the introduction to 18 (2*b*-5), and earlier critics regarded this as the beginning of the extracts from that book.[6] More recent scholars are generally of the opinion that 17 is derived from the same source.[7]

A reading of Lev. 17-25 discloses a twofold aspect: on the one hand unmistakable affinity, in parts, to the priestly legislation; on the other hand, much that is at variance with the usual manner of that legislation, or lies outside the circle of its predominant interests. Both in contents and in form 19, for example, resembles Ex. 20-23 and Dt. (cp especially Dt. 23 ff.) much more closely than P; the hortatory setting of the laws and the emphasis on the motives to obedience, not only in 26 but also in the preceding chapters, has no parallel in P, in which the divine imperative is its own all-sufficient motive; the phraseology of H is peculiar, and strikingly different from that of P;[1] finally, there are actual conflicts between the laws in H and those of P, particularly in regard to the feasts.[2] The priestly element appears in many cases to be superimposed, or to supplement the other. The hypothesis which first suggested itself was, therefore, that older laws were revised and incorporated by P,[3] sometimes, as in 18-20, in large masses having a coherence of their own; the hypothesis was subsequently extended to 17-26 (or 18-26) as a whole (see below § 30).

The parænetic framework in which the laws are set (see, e.g., 18) is of the same character throughout, and is somewhat sharply distinguished in style from the laws themselves, as the example just cited shows. Hence it seems, further, that the author of the collection H, whom we may designate as R_H, embodied in his work, without radical change, older titles of tōrāh which had already acquired a fixed formulation. A comparison of 18 20, on the same subject, is peculiarly instructive in this regard. The result of this preliminary examination is, therefore, that in Lev. 17-26 we have a collection of laws, not all of the same origin, which have been subjected to at least two successive redactions, first by R_H, and second by R_P.[4]

14. Contents of chaps. 17-26.

The subjects dealt with in Lev. 17-26 are the following:—domestic animals slaughtered to be offered to Yahwè; blood not to be eaten (17); incest defined and prohibited (18); various short commandments, chiefly moral and social (19); Molech worship; another law against incest (20); rules for priests: restrictions on mourning and marriage; priests to be physically perfect; regulations concerning the eating of consecrated food; victims to be without blemish; other rules about victims (21 f.); calendar of sacred seasons (23); the oil for the lamps in the tabernacle, and the shew-bread; blasphemy; manslaughter and torts (24); Sabbatical year and Jubilee (25); hortatory discourse (26).

The order of these chapters is in general a natural one;[5] difficulty is made only by the position of 19, by the repetition of the same subject in 18 and 20, and by 24, which in both its parts seems to be foreign to its present surroundings. It is clear that Lev. 17-25 do not contain a complete law-book, such as H presumably was; many topics which would have a necessary place in such a code are lacking. These subjects may have been omitted by the redactor because they were sufficiently treated elsewhere, or may have been transposed to other connections; some such displaced fragments may be recognised in Ex.-Num. (see below, § 24).

Chap. 17 contains a nucleus of old tōrōth in brief and consistent formulation, which has been much expanded and altered by later hands. A considerable part of this expansion is plainly the work of R_P (e.g., 11 f. 14); but there is a lower stratum of editor's work which is recognised as R_H (e.g., 5*aa b* 7*a* 10 b). The most interesting case of this double redaction is found in 3-7.

15. Chap. 17: Slaughter of Animals.[1]

The original law seems to have run: 'Any Israelite who slaughters a bullock or a sheep or a goat and does not bring it into the presence of Yahwè, blood shall be imputed to that person' (i.e., he shall be regarded as having eaten flesh with the blood; cp 1 S. 14 32-34); a redactor introduced the words 'the dwelling of' (miškan) before 'Yahwè';[2] the references to the camp and 'the door of the tent of meeting' are additions of R_P, adapting the situation to P's tabernacle; similar additions are 'to offer it as an offering to Yahwè,' and 'he has shed blood; that person shall be cut off from his people' (4); cp the variations of Sam. and 𝔊, as indications of continued and late manipulation of the text. Verse 8 f. may be a fragment of a law, corresponding to Ex. 22 20 [19], sacrifice shall be offered to Yahwè only; 9 is R_P. With 15 f. cp 11 40 and 22 8 (Ezek. 44 31); for a stricter rule see Ex. 22 31 Dt. 14 21.

Chap. 18 contains laws on incest and some kindred subjects (6-23), preceded by an introduction (2*b*-5), and concluding with admonitions and warnings (24-30). This setting is in the main the work of R_H.

16. Chap. 18: Incest.

Verse 5 is a doublet to 4; 29 is from R_P; 24-28 30, are probably amplified by later scribes imitating R_H, or by contamination from 20 22-24. Verse 6 is the general rule (perhaps editorial), the cases follow in a stereotyped scheme (7-17*a*); 17*b*-24 are differently formulated, probably a supplement from another collection of tōrōth on the same subject; 21 (Molech) is introduced through a merely verbal association by R_H who wrote 21*b*. A few glosses mar the symmetry of 7 ff.

Chap. 19 contains a brief manual of moral instruction, perhaps the best representative of the ethics of ancient Israel, opening and closing with the formulas of R_H (2*b* 36*b* 37); observe also the frequent recurrence of the phrase 'I am Yahwè,' or 'I am Yahwè your God,' after groups of commandments (3 4 10 12 14 16, etc.). Two passages are obviously out of place in this chapter: 5-8, by its subject and formulation is plainly connected with 22 29 f.; 20, also, is foreign to the context; it has been thought that its appropriate place would be after 20 10 (Dillm.), but the case is clearly one of tort, and the formulation corresponds rather to 24 15-21—another misplaced fragment; 21 f. is a late addition to 20 (cp 6 6 f.). The rest of the chapter is made up of old tōrōth, probably compiled, or at least supplemented, from more than one source, with occasional clauses introduced by R_H (9*aa* 10*b* 12*b* 18*b* 23*aa* 29 30 [=26 2] 31*b* 32*b* 33 f.), and probably the repeated 'I am Yahwè'—though in this R_H may have been anticipated by the tōrōth themselves.

17. Chap. 19: Moral precepts.

The first group of commandments (3 f.) is in some sort a counterpart to the first table of the decalogue; 11-18 similarly remind us of the second table.[3] In general the chapter is to be compared with Ex. 20 2 ff. 22 18-22 28 ff. 23 1-19, and parts of Dt. 22-25, in which many parallels will be found. These do not justify us, however, in regarding Lev. 19 as based upon the Decalogue, the Covenant Book, and Deuteronomy;[4] actual coincidences in formulation or in order are singularly few, and appear to be sometimes the result of textual contamination. Rather Lev. 19 is another of the epitomes of good morals, of which there were doubtless many in ancient Israel.

The original law against the sacrifice of children in the Molech cult (20 2*a*)[5] has received repeated additions, 3 disclosing the hand of R_H (additions of R_P in 3*b*), 2*b* a gloss, and 4 f. a variation on 2*b* 3 intended to supplant 3.

LEVITICUS

The law against witchcraft (6) seems to have displaced the more original tōrāh which is preserved in 27.

Verses 7 f. belong to the parænetic framework of R_H, perhaps only accidentally brought together in subsequent redaction; the corresponding close is 22-24.

Verse 9 has nothing to do with the subject of the following laws; it seems rather to be connected with 24 15-22 (cp 20 9 with 24 15); it is not improbable that 24 15-22, which are altogether out of place where they stand, with 20 9 (? 10) 27, and perhaps 2, are scattered fragments of a chapter on capital offences the greater part of which was omitted by the final redactor.

In 11-21 follow laws against incest, sodomy, and commerce with a woman during menstruation, against all of which the death penalty is denounced. These laws are from a collection independent of 18 (Graf, Wellh., Dillm. etc.).[1] There has been some contamination from 18 (sec, e.g., 20 19), and the clauses prescribing the penalty have been glossed and recast.

22-24 is the work of R_H. Verses 25 f. deal not with the subject of 20 but with clean and unclean animals (11), and 25*ba* 26*a* are actually found in 11 43*aa* 45*b*. It is possible that fragments of the missing introduction to 11 are also preserved in 20 25 f., and that the latter verses mark the place where 11 once stood in H (see § 24).

Chaps. 21 f. present the same phenomena which we have observed in 17 ff.; old tōrōth concerning the priesthood have been glossed, revised, and supplemented by successive editors. Some of the glosses were probably made upon the tōrōth themselves before they were incorporated in H; many additions were made by R_H or by later editors in imitation of him; others, finally, by R_P and scribes of that school. It is not possible in all cases exactly to distinguish these various hands; but in considerable part it can be done.

19. Chaps. 21 f.: Rules for priests.

In 21 1-9 the original rules are found in 1*bβ* (beginning lost), 2*a* (2*b* 3 have more exact definition), 5 7*a*;[2] R_H in 6 7*b* 8; R_P 'the fire-offerings of Yahwè,' in 6; 9 is not strictly in place. In 10-15 the old law is 10*aa* ('the priest who is greater than his brethren'), b 11 13 14*; R_H 12 15; R_P 1*aβ*. In 16-24 part of the tōrāh is repeated in slightly variant forms (17 21) with glosses by R_P; to the old rule belong, further, 22*b* 23*a* (also glossed by R_P); 18*b*-20 is an (? old) specification of blemishes (cp 22 22-24); R_H in 23*b*; 24 (R_P) is a fragment.

The beginning of 22 1-16 is in disorder: 2*aβb* is R_H, but lacking its antecedents, showing traces of more than one hand, and separating the first words of 1 (R_P) from their sequel (3); 4*a* is the old rule ('of the seed of Aaron,' R_P), and fragments of a following rule may be recognised in parts of 6 f., the rest being supplanted by R_P, to whom most of 4*b*-7 are to be ascribed; 8 may have been included in H, though it is not in a very appropriate place; 9 is R_H, perhaps more than one hand (cp 19 30 and 21 8); 10-13 are substantially old tōrōth with some glosses; 14 (cp 5 15) may be a later addition; 15 f. R_H. In 17-25 the old rules in 18*b* 19 21 have received many glosses (R_P), as also the following catalogue of defects (22-24, cp 21 17-20); 25 is R_H ('because their corruption is in them,' R_P). Verses 27-30, again, are old laws, followed by the closing exhortations of R_H (31-33), in which 32 seems to intrude between 31 and 33.

Chap. 23 contains the annual round of sacred seasons, derived in part from a priestly calendar, in part from H. The former element is easily recognised by its rigid scheme (see, e.g., 5-8 34*b*-36), the exact regulation of the date and duration of the festival, the days of 'holy convocation' (Nu. 28 f.) observed as the strictest of sabbaths, and the 'fire-offerings' to Yahwè. The characteristics of H are equally unmistakable in other parts of the chapter, though, as elsewhere, the original text of H has been heavily glossed by priestly editors and scribes. To the calendar of P belong 4-8 (Passover and Unleavened Bread; 2 f., R_P), 21 (fragment of the law for Pentecost), 24 f. (Feast of Trumpets), 27-32 (Day of Atonement), 34*b*-36 (Tabernacles); 37 f., is the subscription, which 44 was meant to follow. The law for the Day of Atonement shows some repetitions, and has perhaps been amplified by later editors; cp 16 29-34.

20. Chap. 23: Feasts.[3]

P's law for Pentecost has been supplanted by a long passage from H (9-20), in which the old tōrāh, the setting of R_H, and the additions of R_P, may be distinguished. It begins with the waving of the first sheaf of barley from the new harvest. The introduction is by R_H (10*a*); the law probably began, 'When ye reap your harvest.' To the original law belong 10*b* 11*a 14*a; the various offerings come from R_P (not all from one hand). This is followed by the prescription of two wave loaves at Pentecost (15-20), 15*a*, 'fifty days' in 16*b*, in 17 'Ye shall bring as wave loaves two cakes; ye shall bake it leavened as first fruits for Yahwè,' 20*; the rest is R_P. V. 22 is out of place here; cp 19 9 f.

The laws from H for the observance of Tabernacles stand in 39-43, as a supplement to those of P in 34*b*-36, with a brief introduction by R_P (39*aa*); 39*aβ* and 42*a* unquestionably belong to the original tōrāh; perhaps 40*a also (cp Neh. 8 14 ff.); the rest must be attributed to various stages of the redaction (42*b* 43 ?40*b*, R_H).

Chap. 24, vv. 1-4, on the lamps in the tabernacle, and 5-9, on the shew-bread, are supplements respectively to Ex. 25 31-40 (cp 27 20 f. Nu. 8 1-4), and Ex. 25 30, and belong to the secondary stratum of P; how they got into this place it is not easy to guess.[2] The rest of the chapter deals with the punishment of blasphemy, and with manslaughter, mayhem, and killing or maiming cattle. The nucleus is a group of old tōrōth, with a closing formula of R_H (15*b*-22), and glosses by R_P, especially in 16; on the original position of these laws see above, § 17 (on 20 9). The punishment of blasphemy is illustrated by an example, 10-14 23, by a late priestly hand; cp. Nu. 15 32-36.

21. Chap. 24.[1]

In chap. 25 the law of the sabbatical year (1-7) is from H. 3-5*a* is the old tōrāh (with glosses emphasising the sabbatical character of the year); cp Ex. 23 10 f.; the introduction (2) and 6* 7 are the work of R_H. The sequel to this appears to be 18 f. 20-22, also R_H. Verses 8-17 23-34 have to do with the reversion of alienated land to its owners in the fiftieth year and with the right of redemption in land and houses.[3] The greater part of 8-17 is from H; 11-13 is an addition of R_P conforming the jubilee year to the septennial land sabbath; 9 also seems to be late; clauses from an older law are incorporated in 10*a* ('ye shall proclaim an emancipation'; cp Ezek. 46 16 f.) and b ('and shall return, every man to his estate'); 14*a* 15 are of the same origin; 16 f., of which 23 is the sequel, together with the introduction (8 10*aa*) and several clauses in the intervening verses, are by R_P. The following 24-34 is all from the school of P, but probably not all of the same age; 24-28 is an addition of R_P to the preceding law; 29-31 apparently a novel to 24-28; the exception in favour of the Levites (32-34)[4] depends on Nu. 35 1-8, itself among the youngest additions to P; the language of 24-34 is late.

22. Chap. 25: Sabbatical year and Jubilee.

The prohibition of usury (35-38) is from H; cp Ezek. 18 8 13 17 22 12. In the following laws on the treatment of slaves (39-46) the charitable motives of H have probably been amplified by imitative hands, and there are extensive interpolations by R_P, especially in 44-46 (perhaps all R_P) and in 49-52.

Chap. 26 1 f., laws forbidding various species of idolatry and commanding the observance of the sabbath, set in phrases of R_H, are strangely out of place here; 1 is parallel to 19 4, 2 identical with 19 30 (cp 19 3), and the verses are fragments from a collection similar to 19.

Chap. 26 contains promises of prosperity to obedience

(3-13) and threatened judgments on disobedience (14-45), with a subscription to the Holiness Law-Book (46). The whole is spoken in the person of Yahwè to the Israelites (plural, throughout), and corresponds in character and in its relation to the preceding laws to Ex. 23 20 ff. and Dt. 28. To the last mentioned chapter Lev. 26 has much resemblance, not only in its general tenor but also in particular turns of thought and expression; but these coincidences are not of such a nature as to imply literary dependence; the total impression, on the contrary, is distinctly of originality on both sides.

23. Chap. 26 3-46: Promise and warning.

The disposition is different: Dt. 28 has an antithetic series of blessings and curses (2-14 15 ff.) to which there is no counterpart in Lev. 26; Lev. 26 is climactic (14-17 18-20 21 f. 23-26 27 ff.); note also that in Lev. Yahwè himself speaks (1), in Dt. the divine promises and warnings are in the third person (Yahwè); in Lev. the address to the Israelites is plural (ye, you), in Dt. singular (thou, thee).

Innumerable threads connect Lev. 26 with those parts of the foregoing chapters which are ascribed to RH;[1] there is every reason to believe that it is by the same author who compiled the law-book H and attached to the tōrōth which he incorporated his characteristic motives.[2] The difference in situation, which Baentsch urges as the strongest argument for attributing 26 to a different author, is easily exaggerated (in 18-25 the entrance into Canaan is still future—18 3 24 19 23 20 22-24, cp 23 10 25 2—whilst in 26 it is an accomplished fact); it would be more just to say that the situation is not consistently maintained (see on the one hand 18 25 27, on the other 26 11). The relation is in this respect the same as that of Dt. 28 to Dt. 12-26; in the prophetic peroration the author's real present almost inevitably shows through.

Dillmann and Baentsch have rightly observed that Lev. 26, like Ex. 23 20 ff. and Dt. 28, has not escaped additions and glosses by later hands, which the resemblance of some parts to Ezekiel peculiarly invited: 8 is a later doublet to 7; 10 is perhaps a gloss to 4 f.; 17 would be in place rather with 23-26; 30 is probably a gloss to 31 derived from Ezek. 6 3-5; 34 f. a late interpolation (RP) cognate to 2 Ch. 36 21; 37 is also questioned; 39-43 is a late addition, 39 sets in at the same point as 36, the phraseology reminds us of Ezek. (cp 4 17 24 23 33 10); the following verses (40-43, 3rd pers. throughout) are very clumsily written; 44 f., also, are secondary.

It has been observed above (§ 14) that Lev. 17-26 is not a complete law-book; some laws may have been omitted by the redactor because the subject was treated elsewhere; others may have been removed to a new connection. The question thus arises whether any portions of H can be recognised in other parts of the Pentateuch. One such has been noticed above (§ 8), the food laws in Lev. 11, with the characteristic colophon of RH (45); cp 20 25 (§ 17 end). A considerable number of other passages in Ex., Lev., Nu. have been thought by different critics to be derived from H—some in their present form, others much altered by later redaction.[4] It is obvious that the characteristic expressions and motives of RH are the only criterion by which we can recognise fragments of H; resemblance in the subject or formulation of laws to tōrōth incorporated in H may point to a relation to the sources of H, but is not evidence that these laws were ever included in that collection.[5] Further, the test of diction must not be applied mechanically; not all the sections in which the words 'I am Yahwè' occur are, on that ground alone, to be ascribed to H: familiarity with H and Ezekiel may have suggested the formula to later authors or editors; or, on the other hand, it may have been used by others before RH. In the greater part of the passages which have been claimed for H, the evidence is for one or the other of the reasons indicated insufficient; Nu. 15 37-41 is perhaps the only one about which there is no dispute, though in some other cases a probability may be admitted.

The analysis of Lev. 17-26 shows that the laws in H were not conceived and expressed by the author of that book, but were taken by him from preceding collections in a form already fixed; even where the share of RH is largest, as in the provisions for the jubilee year (25 8 ff.), there is a basis of older law. It would be too much to affirm that RH made no material changes in these laws; but in general his work was selection and redaction, putting the existing laws under his own point of view and attaching to them certain distinctive motives. The differences of formulation in the laws themselves, especially in the laws on the same or kindred subjects (as in 18 and 20), prove that they are not all of the same origin; the presumption is that they were taken from more than one collection, made at different times or places, or in different priestly families or guilds. In other parts of Lev. and Num. we find groups of laws, not belonging to the main stem of P, which are cognate in subject and formulation to those in H, but show no traces of the hand of RH; it is probable that these are derived from the same collections on which RH drew.[1] The laws in these collections, like those in H, bear, in general, all the marks of genuine tōrōth, representing and regulating the actual practice of the period of the kingdom.[2] They know nothing of a central sanctuary or of a sacerdotal caste; the priest is simply 'the priest,' Levites are not mentioned, 'the priest who is greater than his brethren,' upon whom greater restrictions are laid (21 10), is a very different thing from the Aaronite high priest of P (see § 30); the occasional references to Aaron and his sons, the tabernacle, and the camp are demonstrably interpolations by a redactor (RP), who thus superficially accommodated the old laws to the History of the Sacred Institutions (HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 9).

25. Sources of H.

The representation of the author (RH) of the history agrees with that of the older historians and the prophets: the Israelites dwelt in Egypt (18 3); thence Yahwè has brought them out to give them the land of Canaan (25 38); he is going to expel the peoples of the land before Israel (18 24 20 22 f.);[4] the laws are given to the Israelites before their entrance into the land;[5] they are to go into operation after the settlement (18 3 24 19 23 20 22-24 23 10 25 2). There is no archaistic attempt to simulate the situation in the desert (the camp, etc.); the place of worship is not the Tent of Meeting, but simply the Sanctuary (miḳdāš, 'holy place,' 20 3 21 12)[6] or the abode of Yahwè (miškān, 'dwelling-place,' 17 4—if the word is really from RH—26 11, cp Ezek. 37 27).[7]

26. Character of H.[3]

The readers are repeatedly exhorted to observe (šāmar, 18 4 5 26 30 19 19 37 20 8 22 22 31 25 18 26 3, etc.) the laws of Yahwè (ḥuḳḳōth ūmišpāṭīm, 'statutes and judgments,' 18 5 26 19 37 20 22 25 18; miṣwōth, 'commandments,' 22 31 26 3 14 15, etc.; never tōrāh); they shall not conform to the customs or rites of the Egyptians or Canaanites (18 3 20 23); Yahwè has sepa-

[4] The verses in which it appears that this has already been accomplished (18 25 27 f.), if not simply a lapse of the writer, may be secondary.

[5] The subscription, 26 46, according to which the laws were revealed on Mt. Sinai, is probably not by RH; 25 1 certainly is not.

rated Israel from the nations (20 24 26*b*). Many offences are condemned as defilement (ṭāmê, ṭom'āh, 18 20 23 f. 19 31 22 8 21 1, etc.; cp 18 25 27 20 3);[1] the synonymous expressions in 18 20 are in part, at least, from later hands.

Israelites are warned not to profane (ḥillēl) holy things, such as the name of God (18 21 19 12 21 6 20 3 22 2 32), sacrifices (19 8 22 2 f. 15), the sanctuary (21 12 23), priesthood (22 9 19 29 21 15). The people of Yahwè must hallow themselves, and be holy, because he is holy (19 2 20 7 26, cp 11 44 f.); his holiness is to be revered (19 30 26 2); Yahwè hallows his people (20 8 22 32); priests, particularly, are holy (21 6, cp 8); the sacrifices of the Israelites are their 'holy things' (22 2 15, cp 19 8).

Holiness is thus the dominant element in the author's idea of religion; sin is profanation and pollution, loathsome and abominable; and he uses these conceptions as religious motives.

Besides the explicit appeals to this motive, we find an implicit appeal in the recurring 'I am Yahwè,' or 'I am Yahwè your God,' often strengthened by a reminder of the great deliverance, 'who brought you forth out of the land of Egypt' (19 36, cp 25 38 42 55 26 13), 'to be a God to you' (22 33 26 45, cp 25 38). The Israelites shall fear Yahwè their God (19 32 25 17), or his holiness—i.e., his Godhead (19 30 26 2—read so!).

Motives of humanity and charity are represented not only by particular injunctions such as 19 16 f. 19 10 (= 23 22), 25 6, but also by such institutions as the sabbatical and jubilee years, and the mitigation of slavery, on which the author lays especial emphasis. These precepts of humanity include the foreign resident (gēr), who is not to be oppressed (19 33), but to share the charity shown the Israelite poor (19 10 = 23 22 25 6), and to be treated like a native—'thou shalt love him as thyself' (19 34); he is subject to the same civil law (24 22), and worships at the same altars (17 8 10 13).[2] Part of these commandments come from the old laws; but R_H has emphasised them strongly.

In some places the admonitory motives of R_H seem to be overloaded (see 20 7 f. 22 31 33); in a few there is an apparent conflict (esp. 18 24 with 25-28). It would be strange if these exhortations had not, like those of the deuteronomistic writers, been expanded and heightened by succeeding editors; in other cases contamination of parallel passages is probable. These phenomena do not overcome the impression of unity which the redaction of the whole produces,[3] nor sustain the hypothesis of Baentsch that the chapters come from three or more different hands.[4]

The question has to do, not with the age of the tōrōth,[5] but with the date of the redaction of the Holiness Law-Book. The whole character of this work discloses affinity to the literature of the close of the seventh and the sixth century—Deuteronomy,[6] Jeremiah, and especially Ezekiel. The first question that is likely to be asked about a writing of this period is its relation to the deuteronomic reform suppressing sacrifice at all altars save that in Jerusalem (621 B.C.).[7] The only passage in H which appears to restrict sacrifice to a single sanctuary is 17 4;[8] any Israelite who slaughters a bullock, sheep, or goat, and does not bring it before the abode (miškān) of Yahwè, shall be regarded as having eaten blood. It is generally agreed that the word miškān was inserted by a redactor; the old law said merely 'before Yahwè'—i.e., to a local altar or standing stone.

If this redactor was R_H, then H would appear to represent the extreme consequence of the deuteronomic reform,[1] leaving no place for the slaughter of animals for food without sacrificial rites, for which Dt. makes express provision (12 15 f. 20-25).[2] It is possible, however, that the word was introduced by a priestly editor later than R_H (of course not the same as the editor who brought in the 'tent of meeting');[3] cp Nu. 3 38. It may reasonably be urged that if R_H adopted the principle of centralisation here so uncompromisingly, he would hardly have failed to show elsewhere some symptom of zeal for the reform or hostility to the local cults—contrast Dt., Jer., Ezek.[4]

It is unsafe, therefore, to use 17 4 to fix the date of H.

It has been argued that H is younger than Dt. because some of its laws indicate a more advanced development, especially those relating to the priesthood (Lev. 21), the feasts (23 9-20 39-43), and the sabbatical year (25 1-7 18-22; cp Dt. 15 1-6), also Lev. 18 16 20 21 as compared with Dt. 25 5-10 (levirate marriage);[5] but the argument is not conclusive. Even less convincing is Baentsch's effort to prove that H abounds in reminiscences and even direct borrowings from Dt.[6]

In H and Dt., both of which drew their material largely from older collections of tōrōth, there are many laws on the same subject, in which the same terms naturally occur; but such coincidences cannot prove the dependence of H on Dt. The mutual independence of the two is rather to be argued from the absence of laws identically formulated, the lack of agreement in order either in the whole or in smaller portions, and the fact that of the peculiar motives and phrases of R_D there is no trace in H (Lev. 23 40 is almost solitary).[7] It is an unwarranted assumption that all the fragments of Israelite legislation which have been preserved lie in one serial development.

If a literary connection between H and Dt. is not demonstrable, the case is otherwise with Ezekiel. The coincidences are here so many and so striking as to have led some critics to regard the prophet as the author of H;[9] and although even more decisive differences make this hypothesis untenable,[10] a direct connection between the two is indubitable. In the chapters in which Ezekiel writes the indictment of his people, reciting the sins which brought calamity upon it, he judges it by the standard of a law similar in contents to H and having in common with H many peculiar words and phrases.[11] Of greater weight than these coincidences with the laws in H—which might of themselves prove only that Ezekiel was familiar with some of the older collections from which H was compiled—is the agreement in the distinctive point of view: 'holiness' is in Ezek. as in H the signature of religion; 'defilement' and 'profanation' is the prevailing thought of sin;[12] characteristic phrases such as 'I am Yahwè that sanctify them (you),' also link them together (Lev. 20 8 21 8 15 23 22 9 16 32 Ezek. 20 12 37 28).[13]

29. H and Ezekiel.[8]

[1] See Dr. Introd.(6) 51, where the different views are recorded.
[2] These provisions in Dt. are regarded by some critics as an afterthought.
[3] It may be observed that the phrases לפני המשכן (Nu. 7 3) and לפני פתח המשכן (Ex. 35 15 40 6) occur only in later strata of P, and that משכן יהוה is also late.
[4] Baentsch, indeed, argues from this that the conflict was long since over; H assumes the unity of sanctuary as uncontested (76 103 116 f.).

LEVITICUS

The question thus arises: Was Ezekiel acquainted with H,[1] or did the author of H (R_H) write under the influence of the thought and language of Ezekiel? The grounds on which the acquaintance of R_H with Ezekiel has been held by many critics[2] are not conclusive. The strongest argument is the fact that Lev. 26 supposes full experience of exile and dispersion, and closes with promises of restoration. We have seen above (§ 23), however, that, like Dt. 28, Lev. 26 has been interpolated, especially towards the end; and all the passages which assume the situation in the exile are on other grounds ascribed to later hands (30 34 f. 39-45).[3]

In the remainder of Lev. 26 there is nothing which goes beyond the prophets of the last generation before the fall of Judah. The striking parallels to Ezek.[4] in this prophetic discourse are, as usual in such cases, susceptible of two interpretations; but on the whole Lev. 26 by its terseness and vigour makes an impression of originality which a cento of reminiscences picked up from all parts of Ezek. could hardly produce.[5]

The parallels in Ezek. to Lev. 17-25 are found in masses in certain chapters (above, col. 2790, n. 11), and include not only the laws in H, but also their parænetic setting; the most natural hypothesis is that Ezek. derived both from the same source.

This presumption is confirmed by the fact that the common hortatory motives sometimes appear in Ezek. with a rhetorical amplification. The alternative, that R_H selected from the greater variety in Ezek. precisely these motives with which to enforce the laws, is extremely improbable.[6]

For the posteriority of H to Ezek. it has been thought decisive that H prescribes certain stricter rules for the 'priest who is greater than his brethren' (21 10), whilst in Ezekiel's restoration programme (40 ff.) no such distinction is made. But as there was a chief priest under the kings (2 K. 11 9 ff. 16 10 f. 22 10 ff. 25 18; cp Am. 7 10 ff.), to whose station stricter taboos would almost necessarily attach, it cannot reasonably be inferred that H here represents a stage of development beyond Ezek. On the other hand, the distinction between priests and Levites in Ezek. (44 9 ff.) is an avowed innovation unknown to H; we may note also in Ezek. 40 ff. the fixed date of the feasts and their less close connection with agriculture, and the minuter classification of sacrifices, in which, as in many other points, Ezekiel stands nearer to the later priestly law.[7]

We may, therefore, with some confidence ascribe H to the half-century before Ezekiel. Many other questions which suggest themselves, as to the more exact time, the place, and the circumstances, in which the Holiness Law-Book was written, we have no means of answering.

30. H and P.

It is commonly said that H belongs to the priestly stratum of the Hexateuch, representing an earlier stage in the labours of the priestly schools from which P as a whole proceeded;[8] and it is, accordingly, sometimes designated by the symbol P_1, in distinction from P_2 (the main stem of P), and later additions (P_3, etc.). But when those passages, especially in 23 and 24, which manifestly belong to late strata of P, together with the many interpolations and glosses of R_P, have been set aside, neither the laws in H nor their setting (R_H) disclose any marked resemblance to the priestly history and legislation; their affinities are altogether with JE and Dt. The parænetic character of H is foreign to all ages and stages of P; the language is quite distinct, as the facility with which the additions of R_P can be stripped off shows; the fictitious elements in P's representation of the Mosaic age—the camp, the tabernacle of the wilderness, Aaron and his sons, the Levite ministers—are conspicuously absent; the calendar conflicts with P's; the refined distinction between 'holy' and 'most holy' things is unknown.

Doubtless the laws in H represent and regulate priestly praxis, and were formulated and codified by local priesthoods or priestly guilds; the priests were the custodians and expositors of the tōrāh. The parts of H which have been preserved,[1] moreover, deal largely with subjects in which the priesthood had a peculiar interest,—the physical qualifications of priests, restrictions on mourning and on marriage, conditions which prevent their eating sacrificial food, the examination of animals for sacrifice, the celebration of the feasts,—but it was not first in the priestly schools of Babylonia that these things became of importance and were regulated by fixed rules, or even by written tōrōth (Hos. 8 12 Jer. 8 8).

31. Chap. 27.

Chaps. 17-26 are followed by a chapter on the commutation of vows and tithes; a late chapter of priestly law, introduced here, perhaps, through association with the laws on the jubilee year and rights of redemption in 25 8 ff. The tithe of cattle is not elsewhere mentioned in the Pentateuch.

32. Composition of Leviticus.

In conclusion, the Book of Leviticus is the work not of the author of the History of the Sacred Institutions, usually regarded as the main stem of P, but of a later redactor R_P. In particular, H was not incorporated in that History, as was formerly maintained.[2] The redactor's sources were the history above-named, from which he took 9 10 1-5 16 2-4 6 12 f.; H (in 11 17-26); and collections of laws on sacrifices (in 1-7), and on clean and unclean (in 12-15);[3] a priestly calendar of feasts (in 23); an account of the consecration of Aaron and his sons (8); and some other materials of less obvious provenience, such as the fragments in 24. The sacrificial rules are introduced, not inappropriately, before the description of the first sacrifices at the tabernacle (8 f.), though they interrupt the immediate connection of 8 with Ex. 29 (40); the laws of clean and unclean (including 11) stand before H, which deals in part with similar subjects; the calendar of feasts from P is combined with that of H in 23, both being mutilated; a motive for the position of 27 has been suggested above (§ 31). Of the position of 24 no satisfactory explanation has been given. The analysis has shown that many changes in the text of the sources, and many more or less considerable additions and interpolations, were made by the editor, or by subsequent redactors and scribes, before the book attained its present form; perhaps the scape-goat ritual in 16 is one of these later additions.

That the constructive redactor of Leviticus was the same who edited Ex. and Nu. there is no reason to doubt.

LIBERTINES. 'Certain of the synagogue, which is called (the synagogue) of the Libertines (λιβερτινων [Ti.WH], λειβερτεινων [D]), and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians' (so AV), are mentioned in Acts 6 9. There has been much diversity in the interpretation of this word. If 'Libertines' is the right reading, it can only mean 'freedmen.' The Jewish population in Rome consisted largely of the descendants of freedmen (cp. Tac. Ann. 2 85, 'quatuor millia libertini generis ea superstitione infecta'; Philo, Leg. ad Caium, 1014, οἱ πλεῖους ἀπελευθερωθέντες). It is plain, however, that the synagogue referred to belonged equally to the Libertini, the Cyrenians, and the Alexandrians. It is difficult, therefore, to avoid supposing that the first of the three names, as well as the other two, denotes the inhabitants of some city or district.

Hence 'Libertini' has been connected with Libertum, the name of a town whose existence is inferred from the title 'Episcopus Libertinensis' which occurs in connection with the Synod of Carthage, A.D. 411. There is no reason, however, to suppose that this obscure town would have sent up to Jerusalem Jews enough to justify the prominent place given to the Libertini in Acts. Blass in 1895 (Acta ap., ed. philologica) tried to justify disjoining the words καὶ Κυρηναίων καὶ Ἀλεξανδρέων from Λιβερτινων, and bringing them into connection with καὶ τῶν ἀπὸ Κιλικίας καὶ Ἀσίας. There is no probability, however, in this solution.

It is best, therefore, to follow certain Armenian versions and Syriac commentaries recently brought to light, which presuppose either Λιβύων or Λιβυστίνων. Several scholars, not knowing of these authorities, had already tried conjectural emendation. Schulthess proposed Λιβύων τῶν κατὰ Κυρήνην (cp Acts 2 10); Beza, Clericus, and Valckenär Λιβυστίνων. Λιβυστίνων involves the least amount of change, and was adopted, with cognizance of the new authorities, in 1898 by Blass (Philology of the Gospels, 69 f.), who is of opinion that the Greek towns lying westward of Cyrene would quite appropriately be designated Libyan (cp LIBYA).

That Λιβυστῖνοι was a current form of the adjective from Λίβυς is plain from the montibus Libystinis of Catullus (60 1), and from the geographical lexicon of Stephanus Byzantinus. Josephus (c. Ap. 2 4) tells us that many Jews were removed by Ptolemy Lagi and placed in the cities of Libya. This statement, however, is of doubtful authority (see Willrich, Juden u. Griechen, 31).

A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15 42), originally Canaanite (Josh. 10 29 f. 12 15), afterwards a priestly city (Josh. 21 13 [P]; 1 Ch. 6 57 [42] must be incorrect). It joined the Edomites in a revolt against Joram (2 K. 8 22 2 Ch. 21 10; cp 2 Ch. 21 16), and was besieged by Sennacherib in the reign of Hezekiah (2 K. 19 8 Is. 37 8). Josiah's wife came from Libnah (2 K. 23 31 24 18). Sayce finds it mentioned in the list of Rameses III. before Aphekah (RP(2) 6 39; Pat. Pal. 239); but this is disputable (see WMM, As. u. Eur. 160). Eusebius and Jerome (OS 274 13 135 28) describe it as a village in the region of Eleutheropolis, called in their day Lobana or Lobna. Hence Stanley identified it with Tell es-Ṣāfiyeh, which is only two hours from Eleutheropolis; but see MIZPEH (in Judah). Libnah must, at any rate, have lain not very far from Lachish, on the SW. border of Judah, and on the edge of the Philistian plain.

Conder's identification of Libnah with el-Benāwy ('a possible corruption of Libnah')—a ruin about 10 m. SE. of Tell el-Ḥesy or Lachish—(PEF Qu. St., 1897, p. 69) will hardly stand.

LIBRARY. A library (βιβλιοθηκη) founded by Nehemiah is referred to in 2 Macc. 2 13. On the supposed 'book-town' in the hill-country of Judah, see KIRJATH-SEPHER (col. 2681).

The word βιβλ. also occurs in Ezra 6 1, 𝔊 (ἐν βιβλιοθήκαις [BL], ἐν ταῖς β. [A] = בית ספריא), and in Esth. 2 23, 𝔊 (ἐν τῇ βασιλικῇ βιβλιοθήκῃ = בספר דברי הימים).

LIBYA (ἡ λιβυη, Acts 2 10, λιβυες in 𝔊 [cp Vg. Libyes]; AV Libyans, as translation of LUBIM in 2 Ch. 12 3 16 8 Nah. 3 9 Dan. 11 43), the name applied by the Greeks to Africa generally, the portion first known and most familiar to them being that on which Dorian colonists settled and founded Cyrene.

On the unique NT reference to 'Libya' (Acts 2 10) see CYRENE, and on the doubtful 'Libertines' of Acts 6 9 see LIBERTINES. The name 'Libya' also occurs in AV of Ezek. 30 5 and 38 5 (mg. 'Phut') and 'Libyans' in Jer. 46 9 (mg. 'Put'). See RV.

The ancients underestimated the size of Libya: Strabo (p. 824) surmised that it was less than Europe, and that Europe and Libya together would not be equal to Asia. Libya did not properly include Egypt—i.e., the Nile valley (Herod. 2 15 f.):[1] Ptolemy (ii. 1 6 iv. 5 1) first assigned Egypt to Africa, making the Red Sea and the Isthmus of Suez the boundary between Africa and Asia. Only the northern littoral of the continent enters into view during Greek and Roman times. Under the Empire, North Africa fell into three sections.

(1) The Original Province of Africa, constituted by the remnant of the possessions of Carthage after the destruction of that city in 146 B.C. (Sallust, BJ 19): to this, in 25 B.C., Augustus added Numidia, which first became a province, under the name Africa Nova, in 46 B.C. (Pliny, HN 5 25 Dio Cass. 43 9). This central portion constituted the senatorial Province of Africa, which, like the Province of Asia, was governed by a proconsul of consular rank.

(2) The western portion of North Africa, Mauretania, was made a province by Claudius in 40 A.D.

(3) The eastern section, the Cyrenaica, was combined with Crete in 27 B.C. to form a single province. The old name Libya was officially revived by Diocletian, who separated Crete from Cyrene, and divided the latter into an eastern part (Libya Inferior), and a western part including the old Cyrenaic Pentapolis (Libya Superior). LICE (כִּנִּים and כִּנָּם;[1] σκνιφες, σκνιπες). Mentioned in EV in connection with the plagues of Egypt (Ex. 8 16-18 [12 ff.], Ps. 105 31 †), where RVmg. suggests the alternatives of FLEA (Pulex) or sand-fly (Simulium). If we lay stress on the usage of the Mishna (כנא, כינא, 'louse,' but also 'vermin'; cp Tg. Pesh., and see below, n. 2), we may be inclined to defend the explanation of Josephus (Ant. ii. 14 13), Bochart, and EV 'lice.'[2] On a point like this, however, the Egyptian-Greek version (𝔊) has a claim to be deferred to. Its rendering is σκνίφες (cp Wisd. 19 10), and this is in truth a very appropriate rendering (see GNATS). Lice are no doubt common in Egypt, though there are but two or possibly three species of louse which attack man. Mosquitoes (Egypt, ḫnmś; cp Heb. kinnim?) and other worse kinds of flies, however, are still more to be dreaded there. Besides, the enormous quantities of lice of which EV speaks must soon have perished when exposed to the dry heat of Egypt.

The singular כֵּן has been thought to occur in Is. 51 6, where 'in like manner' can hardly be correct. It is less improbable to suppose that the plural ending dropped out (the next word begins with ים, which would facilitate this; so first Weir). This gives the sense 'shall die like gnats.' As Muhammad says, God may 'set forth a parable (even) of a gnat' (Koran, Sur. 13 24), and in the Babylonian Deluge-Story the gods 'gather like flies about the sacrificer' (cp Del. Ass. HWB, s.v. 'Zumbu'). This, however, is not a full solution. Nor is the conjecture offered in Che. Proph. Is. (on Is. 51 6), that כִּנִּים should be read in Nu. 13 33 more than plausible. On both passages see LOCUST, § 2 (4). T. K. C.—A. E. S.

LIGHT. The true God says, according to the great prophetic teacher of the Exile, 'I am Yahwè—and there is none else—who formed light, and created darkness' (Is. 45 6 f.). So the Word of God, in the Fourth Gospel, says, 'I am the light of the world: he that follows me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life' (Jn. 8 12). Between these two sayings lies the development of a new conception of life, the germs of which, however, are partly to be found in the work of the exilic teacher. The statement that Yahwè produced light is no part of the traditional Hebrew cosmogony.

1. Early conceptions.

[1] The theory that כִּנָּם is a collective is needless; we should doubtless read כִּנִּים (with Sam.).

[2] Sir S. Baker (Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia, 1868) supposed a reference to the ticks or mites (Acarina) which abound in the sand and dust, and fix themselves on the host, whose blood they suck by means of powerful mouth organs. It is a most improbable view; but the Talmudic use of כנא for 'vermin' may perhaps justify it.

Indeed, it was too much a matter of course to need express statement that light was of prior existence to the creative works; for how should life come into being without light, and how could God be conceived except as an intensely luminous form (see Ex. 3 2 13 21 19 18 24 17; 1 K. 19 12; Ezek. 1 27 8 2; and cp FIRE)? Hence in Is. 10 17 (in a probably late passage) Yahwè is called the 'Light of Israel' (‖ 'his Holy One'). When he reveals himself, created light must fail (Is. 24 23 60 19; cp Rev. 21 23 22 5); according to a late writing (The Secrets of Enoch, 14) the sun is without his crown for seven full hours of the night, during which he appears before God.

To the Babylonians, too, the divine Creator (Marduk) was the god of light; creation indeed is mythically represented as a battle between the Light Being and the Dark (Tiāmat). See CREATION, § 3. It is the Priestly Writer's reflective turn of mind that leads him to prefix to his adaptation of the old cosmogony the statement, 'God said, Let there be light' (Gen. 1 3). To the not less reflective minds of Egyptian priests a different idea presented itself. Hidden in the dark bosom of Chaos the eternal light was impelled by longing to give itself existence; manifold and sometimes grotesque imagery was employed to describe the process of emergence. Creation itself is described thus,—'He hath made all that the world contains and hath given it light, when all was darkness, and there was as yet no sun.'[1] So too a hymn in the Rig Veda represents creation as a ray entering the realm of darkness from the realm of light,[2] and similar ideas are presupposed in the theological statements of the Avesta. In the Book of Job, which preserves so many mythical forms of expression, we find light described as a mysterious physical essence, dwelling in a secret place (Job 38 19 f.). That God is robed in light, is said in Ps. 104 2 (cp Ex. 3 2 etc., cited above), and just as in the Avesta the heaven where Ahura Mazda dwells is called 'Endless Lights,' so God in James 1 17 is called 'the father of the lights'—i.e., the father who dwells in perfect and never darkened light (though the view that τὰ φῶτα = 'the stars' is also possible; cp Ps. 136 7, Jer. 4 23). Hence the 'light' of God's 'countenance' is a symbol of God's favour (Nu. 6 25 f.).

Those who are in trouble feel themselves to be in darkness. The return of prosperity is the return of the divine light (cp Is. 8 22 9 2 60 1-3). The Psalms are full of this idea (Ps. 4 6 [7] 27 1 36 10 [9] 97 11 112 4). In Ps. 43 3 we find the further development that God's 'light' is the companion of his 'faithfulness,' and that these two, like guardian angels, lead the true Israelite (or rather the true Israel). God's revelation is, like himself, essential light (Ps. 119 105, 130), and in Is. 49 6 the Israel within Israel (the servant of Yahwè) is said to be 'a light to the nations,' as being the bearer to them of God's law. In Enoch 48 4 the same phrase is applied to the Messiah.

It was natural that the vague expressions of the Psalter relative to 'light' should be interpreted by later Jews under the influence of the prevalent eschatology. 'Light' and 'life' were virtually synonymous, and these profound expressions received a fuller content through the developed belief in a kingdom of light and life to be supernaturally set up on the earth. The Fourth Gospel, however, and kindred NT writings (with which we may to some extent group the Wisdom of Solomon; cp § 3) fill the word 'light' with a larger meaning than any of the Jewish writings, and give a more special prominence to the antithesis between the kingdoms of light and of darkness, not perhaps uninfluenced by Oriental and especially Zoroastrian dualism (as the great Herder long ago pointed out), and not without a connection with Gnosticism. The aim of Christian disciples is 'to become sons of light' (Jn. 12 36; cp Eph. 5 8 1 Thess. 5 5) = 'to become sons of God' (Jn. 1 12), through 'faith' in Christ (cp FAITH), who is the 'light of the world' (Jn. 8 12 9 5, cp 1 4 12 46), and to be ever 'coming to the light' (Jn. 3 21) to expose themselves to this beneficial test of their inward 'truth' or reality (see TRUTH). The expression 'the generation of light' (Enoch 108 11) gives merely an external point of contact; the fourth evangelist himself is, we may presume, the virtual originator of those beautiful symbolic phrases, relative to light, into which he condenses the essence of the mind of Jesus as known to him.

Next to the Fourth Gospel the Epistle to the Ephesians is a storehouse of references to the symbolic light. The satellites of the 'ruler of this world' (Jn. 12 31 14 30 16 11) or the 'ruler of the power of the air' (Eph. 2 2) are called 'the world-rulers of this darkness' (Eph. 6 12, RV).[1] Those who 'walk in the light' (Eph. 5 8; cp Jn. 12 35) are under a moral obligation to bring to light the works of darkness, and to 'convict' those who do them (Eph. 5 11 13;[2] cp Jn. 3 20 f.). In Colossians we have the classical passage, Col. 1 12 f. ('the inheritance of the saints in light,' and 'the power of darkness'), with which a striking passage in 1 Peter (2 9 f.) may be compared. The designation of Christ in Heb. 1 3 as 'the effulgence of his (God's) glory' is a development of the more elaborate description in Wisd. 7 26, 'an effulgence from everlasting light, and an unspotted mirror of the working of God' (cp MIRROR). The symbolism of 1 Thess. 5 4 f., Rev. 21 11 23 is too simple to need any subtle explanation.

3. References in Col., Eph., etc.

A hard passage in Is. 26 19 may be here referred to. 'Dew of lights' (few now defend 'dew of herbs') is evidently wrong; the true reading is preserved by 𝔊, 'thy dew is a healing to them' (אֲרֻכָתָם, for אוֹרֹת); cp Ecclus. 43 22, 'a mist (|| dew) coming speedily is the healing of all things.' See HERBS.

LILITH (RV$^{mg.}$), or NIGHT-MONSTER (RV; AV$^{mg.}$), or (AV wrongly) SCREECH-OWL (לִילִית; ονοκενταυροι [BℵAQΓ]; λιλιθ [Aq. in Q$^{mg.}$]; λιλιτ [Aq.]; λαμια [Symm.]; ܠܠܝܬܐ [Pesh.]; lamia); and Vampire (RV$^{mg.}$), or HORSELEACH (so EV) (עֲלוּקָה; see HORSELEECH). Apparently two demons of similar characteristics, both mentioned in post-exilic passages (cp ISAIAH ii., § 14; PROVERBS, § 8).

1. Lilith. Desolated Edom, according to Is. 34 14, will be haunted by the SATYRS (q.v.) and by Lilith.

The name, as Schrader long ago pointed out, is connected with the Bab.-Ass. lilu, fem. lilitu, the designation of two demons, who, together with ardat lilē ('the handmaid of lilu'), form a triad of demons often mentioned in Babylonian spells (Del., Ass. HWB 377; Calwer Bib.-Lex.(2) 532; Sayce, Hibb. Lects. 502; Hommel, Die sem. Völker, 1 367).

Lilu, Lilitu, and ardat Lilē were not specially demons of the night—a view which is peculiar to the related Jewish superstition. The darkness which they loved was that of the storms which raged in the wilderness. Potent charms were used to keep them from the haunts of men, where they would otherwise enter, bringing fell disease into the human organism. A corrupted form of the myth of Lilith, strengthened by Persian elements, spread widely among the Jews in post-exilic times as a part of the popular demonology.

The details of this myth can only be glanced at here. Lilith was a hairy night-monster (the name being perhaps popularly derived from layil, 'night'), and specially dangerous to infants (cp the Greek Lamia). Under her was a large class of similar monsters called Lilin (plur. of Lilith; cp Apoc. Bar. 10 8), of whom not only children but also men had to beware. Hence, in Talm. Bab. (Shabbāth, 151 b), a man is warned not to sleep alone in a house, and in Targ. Jer., Nu. 6 25, a passage in the priestly blessing becomes 'The Lord bless thee in all thy business, and guard thee from the Lilin.'

2. The Vampire. The vampire is, according to some, another of the mazzikin, or harmful beings, of which the world is full (see DEMONS, and cp Pirḳē Ābōth, 5 9). The 'Alūḳāh (mentioned in Prov. 30 15) is properly 'the horseleech' (see HORSELEECH), but surely not the ordinary horseleech, if it was the mother of Shĕōl and the womb.

The most satisfying view of Prov., l.c., is perhaps that given at the end of this article; but a less bold explanation is that of Bickell, who arranges thus (הַב being omitted as a gloss):—

The 'Alūḳāh's two daughters, Give, Give—Shĕōl and the Womb, and the passage, which is an expression of wonder at the mysteries of death and birth, means that the underworld and the maternal womb (cp the commentators on Ps. 139 13 15) are as insatiable ('Give, Give' expresses their character) as the 'Alūḳāh—a mythological demon, which the people and its poets imagined as resembling a leech, and which is possibly referred to in the Targum of Ps. 12 8[9]; see HORSELEECH. The Arabic 'alūḳ is explained in the Ḳāmūs by ġūl, 'a female blood-sucking monster' (Ges. Thes. 1038), the ghoul of the Arabian Nights, and Sayce finds 'the vampire' in Babylonian spells (see § 1).

In fact, according to Babylonian animism, wasting disease could not but be accounted for by terrible spiritual agencies such as 'vampires' (cp Tylor, Prim. Cult. 1 175). For an Iranian parallel, cp the sleep-demon called Būshyanṣta (Spiegel, Eran. Alt. 2 137; cp Kohut, Jüd. Angelologie, 86).

Most probably, however, לעלוקה is miswritten for לְקֹהֶלֶת, which is a title ascribing the following saying to Haḳḳōhéleth (see KOHELETH). The words rendered 'two daughters, Give, give,' have sprung out of תשבענה הנה, which were written in the wrong place. See Che. PSBA, June 1901.

LILY (שׁוּשַׁן, 1 K. 7 19, שׁוֹשַׁנָּה, 2 Ch. 4 5 Cant. 2 1 f.[1] Hos. 14 5[6]; pl. שׁוֹשַׁנִּים, Cant. 2 16 4 5 5 13 6 2 f. 7 2[3] Ecclus. 39 14 50 8 Mt. 6 28 Lk. 12 27; 𝔊^{BNA}, κρίνον and κρίνα).

The Hebrew word šūšan, like its Greek[2] and English equivalents, seems to have applied to a large number of different species. Its origin is most probably Egyptian, from a word whose consonants were s-sh-n, denoting the lotus flower, Nymphæa Lotus, L., blue or white (see Lagarde, Mitth. 2 15 ff., who quotes a description of the flower from Burckhardt's Arabic Proverbs, 267 f.); and as Lagarde points out, it is not improbably the lotus flower that was present to the mind of the writer of 1 K. 7 19 22 26, as this was frequently used in Egyptian decoration and would best provide forms for the capitals of the pillars and for the rim of the sea in Solomon's temple. The references in Canticles and Hosea, however, show that the name must have been used for flowers quite different from the lotus. From Cant. 5 13 it is usually inferred that the 'lilies' mentioned were not white, but red or purple; and this view is supported by the implied comparison with royal robes in Mt. 6 28 Lk. 12 27. These and the other references suggest a fragrant flower of bright hue which gave colour to the fields of Palestine. According to Boissier, the only lilium occurring in Palestine is L. album; so that Heb. šūšan has almost certainly a wider application. Tristram (NHB 462 ff.) discusses the different possibilities. The most plausible claimant for the name is the scarlet anemone, Anemone coronaria, L. Wetzstein again (in Zt. f. allgem. Erdk. [1859] 7 148) speaks of a dusky violet plant somewhat like a crocus as exceedingly

[2] According to Irenæus (i. 28 2), Eph. 5 13 was a passage to which the Valentinian Gnostics were wont to appeal.

[1] According to a recent emendation, 'lilies' (שׁוֹשַׁנּוֹת) and 'apples' are parallel in the well-known passage, Cant. 2 5. See FRUIT, § 5 [2].

plentiful in the fields of Haurān—most probably Gladiolus atroviolaceus, Boiss. If, as Tristram reports, the Arab peasantry now apply the name sūsan 'to any brilliantly coloured flower at all resembling a lily, as to the tulip, anemone, ranunculus,' it seems reasonable to conclude that the biblical name had an equally wide application. See also SHOSHANNIM.

[See H. Christ, 'Nochmals d. Lilie d. Bibel' in ZDPV 25 65-80 (1899), who remarks that there is not sufficient evidence to decide what kind of lily is meant, and that the flower intended in Mt. 6 28 Lk. 12 27 is most probably the iris; see also L. Fonck, 'Streifzüge durch die Biblische Flora' in Biblische Studien, Bd. v. Hft. i. 53-76 (Freiburg i. B., 1900). Post (in Hastings, DB 3 123 a) remarks that the irises are plants of pasture-grounds and swamps, seldom found in grain-fields. But the point of this is not clear. 'Lilies of the field' simply means 'wild lilies.']

LIME. Assyrians and Babylonians alike were familiar with the use of lime (carbonate of lime) and gypsum (sulphate of lime), whether as a plaster or a wash, alike for preservative and for decorative purposes; and the same remark applies to the Egyptians, by whom this form of mural decoration was carried to a high pitch of excellence, and from whom it was taken by the Etruscans, the Greeks, and other ancient peoples. See Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. 1 362, cp pl. viii.; also EB(9), s.v. 'Mural Decoration'; and, for biblical references, see PLAISTER, and cp MORTAR. According to Rev. W. Carslaw of Beirūt, mortar made with lime is used now more often than formerly (Hastings, DB 3 438 a).

The phenomena of lime-pounding and of calcination seem to be referred to (a) in Is. 27 9 and also (b) in Am. 2 1 Is. 33 12; and in the last two instances it is the burning of bones (phosphate of lime) that is spoken of. But all these passages may be greatly improved by methodical emendation.

The words are (a) גִּר gir (√גיר, to boil, boil up?[1] cp Aram. גִּיר, 'wave,' NH גִּיר, 'foam,' Arab. ǵayyārun, 'quicklime'), used in the obscure passage (see Crit. Bib.), בְּשׂוּמוֹ כָּל־אַבְנֵי מִזְבֵּחַ כְּאַבְנֵי־גִר מְנֻפָּצוֹת, Is. 27 9, ὅταν θῶσιν (θῶ, A) πάντας τοὺς λίθους τῶν βωμῶν κατακεκομμένους ὡς κονίαν λεπτήν [BℵAQΓ], cum posuerit omnes lapides altaris sicut lapides cineris allisos; EV 'when he maketh all the stones of the altar as chalkstones that are beaten in sunder'; Pesh. renders גִּר by kelšā—i.e., χάλιξ, calx. (b) שִׂיד, śīd, in the expressions שָׂרַף לַשִּׂיד, κατέκαυσαν εἰς κονίαν, ad cinerem (Am. 2 1), and מִשְׂרְפוֹת שִׂיד κατακεκαυμένα ὡς ἄκανθα (i.e., שַׂיִת), de incendio cinis (Is. 33 12).

The wood-carver stretched a line or cord over the block of wood to lay out the course which his work would have to take. The builder used it too for his first measurements (Job 38 5 Zech. 1 16 [Kre]). In Ps. 19 4(5) read קוֹלָם, ḳōlām, with Ols., Ges., We. SBOT, etc.

LINEN, FINE LINEN, and LINEN GARMENTS occur as renderings of the following words:—

1. 'ēṭūn, אֵטוּן, Prov. 7 16† (defining חֲטֻבוֹת, dark-hued stuffs)—taken for a verb in 𝔊 and strangely rendered ζωγραφία by Theod.—occurs in Tgg. in the sense of 'rope.' If MT is correct (see below) it is probably the same as Gr. ὀθόνη, 'fine linen cloth,' and may denote either linen 'yarn' (as RV) or 'woven linen cloth.' No satisfactory etymology of the word has been found in the Semitic languages (against Del. ad loc.). [Frankenb. and Che., however, think the text very doubtful. The latter reads thus: 'I have stretched cords on my bedstead; I have spread carpets on my couch.'][2]

2. bad, בַּד (Ex. 28 42 39 28 [not in 𝔊] Lev. 6 10 [3] 16 4 23 32 1 S. 2 18 22 18 2 S. 6 14 1 Ch. 15 27; plur. Ezek. 9 2 f. 11 10 2 6 f. Dan. 10 5 12 6 f.†), is rendered by 𝔊 in the Pentateuch λίνεος, but elsewhere variously.[3]

[2] See Crit. Bib. (חטבות אטון, a corruption of הִטֵּיתִי בְּעַבֹתַ[ים]; מצרים, read מַצָּעַי).

[3] 1 S. 2 18 βαρ L om.; 22 18 BL om., and A has λίνον (which elsewhere represents פִּשְׁתָּה [flax], see below); 2 S. 6 14, ἔξαλλος; 1 Ch. 15 27, βυσσίνη. The plural is rendered in Ezek. 9, ποδήρης; in Ezek. 10 στολή and στολὴ ἁγία; in Dan. βύσσινα (Aq. ἐξαίρετα, Symm. λινᾶ, Th. βαδδ[ε]ιν). The usual rendering of Tg. and Pesh. is בוּצָא, 'byssus.'

The etymology of the word bad is unknown; but there is no reason for rejecting the unanimous tradition which declares it to mean 'linen.'

Whilst on the one hand we learn from Ex. 39 28 that שֵׁשׁ (i.e., byssus, see below, 3) is either the same as bad, or a particular species of it, on the other hand it is pretty certain from Ezek. 44 17 f. that linen would be the clothing prescribed for the priests in the Levitical law. Still, it is just possible, as Dillmann suggests (on Ex. 28 42), that bad in itself meant only 'white stuff,' whether linen or cotton.

3. būṣ, בּוּץ (βύσσος or βύσσινος, EV 'fine linen,' 1 Ch. 4 21 [αβακ, B; αββους, A; αβους, L] 15 27 2 Ch. 2 14 [13] 3 14 5 12 Esth. 1 6 8 15 Ezek. 27 16†), is a late word in Hebrew, as, apart from the highly doubtful mention in Ezekiel,[1] it is found only in Ch. and Esth. Būṣ is almost certainly equivalent to the older term šēš (שֵׁשׁ, cp 1 Ch. 15 27 with Gen. 41 42; and especially 2 Ch. 2 14 [13] 3 14 5 12 with Ex. 28 42 etc.), and both denote the substance which the Greeks called βύσσος, as to the exact nature of which there has been enormous controversy. As šēš is probably an Egyptian word, being mentioned in connection with Egypt (Gen. 41 42 and esp. Ezek. 27 7), and as according to Ex. 39 28 it is either identical with or a species of bad (see above), the evidence favours the view that βύσσος was a sort of linen, that being a particularly Egyptian product.

The etymology of the word būṣ is quite unknown; a possible connection with Syr. būṣīnā (the plant 'verbascum'), which may be an Indo-European word (Lag. Sem. 1 52 ff.) throws no light upon its meaning; nor is anything gained by comparing Ar. baz = βύσσος.

Philology being of no assistance, we are thrown back upon the statements of Greek and Latin writers about byssus; and from a careful examination of these, Braun (De vestitu sacerdotum Hebr. I., chap. 6), Celsius (Hierob. II., 169 ff.), and more recently Yates (Textrinum antiquorum, Lond., 1843, I., 252 ff.), have deduced with fair certainty the conclusion that byssus was 'fine linen.' On the other hand, Forster (De bysso antiquorum (Lond., 1776) argued that byssus was cotton, and has been followed by many modern scholars. On the one main point, however, his argument is now entirely overthrown. The statement of Herodotus (2 86) that the embalmed bodies of the dead were swathed in cloths of byssus (σινδόνος βυσσίνης τελαμῶσι) was taken to prove that byssus meant cotton, because it was long held that cotton was the material of the mummy cloths. However, the microscopic examination by Thomson (whose results were first published in the Phil. Mag., Nov. 1834) and later investigations have clearly shown that these wrappings are linen, at least in the vast majority of cases.[2] Indeed, linen is often spoken of by ancient writers as a characteristic product of Egypt, and their statements are confirmed by such monuments as the pictures of the flax-workers in the grotto of el-Kāb (cp also Budge, Mummy, 189 ff.).

It is true that at least two late Greek writers, Philostratus (71) and Pollux (7 76) appear to have extended the term βύσσος to cotton; but such confusions are natural with unscientific authors, and a far larger number of quotations can be given where a flaxen product is plainly meant (see Yates, op. cit. 267-273).

There is reason for distinguishing βύσσος as a finer sort of linen from λίνον; thus Pausanias and others speak of them as distinct; and Pliny (xix. 1 4. of the byssus of Elis, quaternis denariis scripula eius permutata quondam ut auri reperio) and many others refer to byssus as among the most costly of materials. We may therefore be satisfied with the EV rendering of [1] See Cornill, ad loc. The word is absent in 𝔊, unless Θαρσεις represents it; it may have been dragged into MT on account of its association with אַרְגָּמָן.

[2] Of the remains of ancient Egyptian linen and the representations of linen manufacture on the monuments, an interesting account is given by Wilkinson (Anc. Eg. chap. 9; cp Schegg, Bibl. Arch. 1 162 ff.).

'fine linen.' The mention of 'the families of the house of those that wrought fine linen' (הַבֻּץ) in 1 Ch. 4 21 (if correct) reminds us of other references to the growth and spinning of flax in Palestine (Josh. 2 6 Prov. 31 13 Hos. 2 5 9 [7 11]). See also FLAX.

4. miḳwēh, מִקְוֵה, in 1 K. 10 28 and מִקְוֵא twice in 2 Ch. 1 16 ('linen yarn' AV), is considered under CHARIOT and MIZRAIM.

5. sādīn, סָדִין, 'fine linen' (Prov. 31 24 AV, Is. 3 23 EV), 'linen garments' (Judg. 14 12 RV;[1] AV 'sheets,' mg. 'shirts'), an article of domestic manufacture (Pr. l.c.), which was considered a luxury (Is. l.c.). According to Jer. Kil. 24 13 there were three varieties (a sleeping-cloth, a garden-dress, and a sampler), and in Mĕnāch. 37 b it is spoken of as a summer garment as opposed to the סרבלא for winter use. In Yōmā 3 4 it is used of a curtain, and in Kil. 19 32*b* of a shroud. From these passages it may be concluded that sādīn denotes either in general a piece of linen cloth, such as a sheet, or more specifically a linen shirt worn next the skin (cp Moore, Judg., ad loc.).

The identification of sādīn with Syr. seddōna and Gr. σινδών (by which it is rendered in 𝔊—save in Is. 3 23, where the rendering is loose) has been doubted (cp Fränkel, 48); it may, however, be connected with the Ass. sudinnu (Am. Tab. satinnu), 'garment' (cp Del. Ass. HWB; Wi. Am. Thontaf. 'Glossar').

6. pištīm, פִּשְׁתִּים, is rendered 'linen' in Lev. 13 47 f. 52 59 Dt. 22 11 Ezek. 44 17 f. Jer. 13 1; see FLAX.

7. šēš, שֵׁשׁ (Gen. 41 42 Ex. 25 4 26 1 31 36 27 9 [𝔊ᴮ om.] 16 18 28 5 f. 8 15 39 35 6 23 25 35 36 8 35 37 38 9 16 18 23 39 2 f. 5 8 27-29 Prov. 31 22 Ezek. 16 10 27 7; once שֶׁשִׁי [Kt., י follows], Ezek. 16 13†), rendered βύσσος or βύσσινος in 𝔊, is, as we have seen above (3), the older equivalent of būṣ. Šēš is not improbably of Egyptian origin, being identical with Coptic shens = byssus, and so apparently connected with Coptic shent, 'to weave.' Like the βύσσινοι πέπλοι of Greek writers, robes of šēš formed an honourable dress (Gen. 41 42). It was a chief constituent in the more ornamental of the tabernacle hangings and of the priestly robes, along with dyed stuffs[2]—blue, purple, and scarlet. The 'fine twined linen' (שֵׁשׁ מָשְׁזָר) of Ex. 26-28 36-39 was probably woven of threads spun from a still finer flax than that which produced the ordinary šēš; we may compare what Pliny (19 1, § 2) says of the specially fine Cuman flax: nec id maxime mirum, singula earum stamina centeno quinquageno filo constare, adding that in the still more wonderful case of the famous linen cuirass of Amasis each thread was made up of 365 minute threads. We know from existing remains to what perfection the arts of spinning and weaving were carried in ancient Egypt.

8. ḥōrāi, חוֹרָי (Is. 19 9,† 𝔊 βύσσος, AV NET-WORKS, mg. WHITE WORKS, RV WHITE CLOTH, mg. cotton), which is a peculiar form[3] from חוּר, Esth. 1 6 8 15, and is most naturally referred to the byssus or 'fine linen' for which Egypt was famous. We need not emend the word to חֻוָּר or יֶחֱוָרוּ (Koppe, etc.).

9. βύσσος, Lk. 16 19 Rev. 18 12†, cp βύσσινος, Rev. 18 12 16 19 8 14†. See (3). 10. λίνον, used for 'flax' in Mt. 12 20, and, according to some MSS, for 'linen clothing' in Rev. 15 6—where, however, WH followed by RV read λίθον. For the 'linen frock' in Ecclus. 40 4 (𝔊 ὠμολίνον) see FROCK. 11. ὀθόνια, 'linen clothes' (Lk. 24 12 Jn. 19 40 20 5 ff.†), plur. dimin. of ὀθόνη (rendered 'sheet,' Acts 10 11 11 5†), on which see (1). So far as we can gather from classical references 9-11 refer to the finer sort of linen cloth, as opposed to the coarser φώσων or 'canvas' (see Yates, op. cit. 265).

12. σινδών (Mt. 27 59 Mk. 14 51 f. 15 46 Lk. 23 53†; RV 'linen cloth' consistently); cp Egypt. shent (see 7) is synonymous with ὀθόνιον; cp Mt. 27 59 Mk. 15 46 Lk. 24 12 Jn. 20 5 f., and, in 𝔊, Judg. 14 13, ὀθόνια [BL], σινδόνας [A].

[1] So, too, RV in Prov. 31 24.

[2] According to Jewish tradition (Mishna, Kil. 9 1) the garments of the priests were woollen—being an exception to the law against ša'aṭnēz, שַׁעַטְנֵז, Lev. 19 19 ('garment of linen and woollen,' AV), Dt. 22 11 (. . . 'woollen and linen together,' AV). Dillmann (on Ex. 25 4), however, thinks they may have been cotton. 'שׁ is explained from the Coptic to mean 'false cloth,' saht, 'woven,' and nudj, 'false' (cp Kn. ad loc.). 𝔊's word κίβδηλος occurs again in Wisd. 2 16 (AV 'counterfeit,' RV 'base metal') and 15 9 ('counterfeit[s],' EV). Cp DRESS, § 7, col. 1140.

[3] Cp גּוֹבַי in Am. 7 1 Nah. 3 17 (Stade, Gr., § 301 a).

LINTEL. On the sacredness of the lintel see THRESHOLD. The only true Hebrew word for 'lintel' is מַשְׁקוֹף, mašḳōph (cp Ass. askuppu), Ex. 12 7 22 f.

For אַיִל, 'áyil (1 K. 6 31) RVmg. gives 'posts'; and for כַּפְתּוֹר, kaphtōr (Am. 9 1), AVmg. and RV give 'chapiter(s).' See CHAPITER (4).

LINUS (ΛΙΝΟϹ [Ti. WH]) unites with Eubulus and others in a greeting to Timothy (2 Tim. 4 21). According to Irenæus (Adv. haer., iii. 3 3) Linus received the bishopric of Rome, not from Peter as first bishop, but from 'the apostles' (cp Eus. HE 3 2; and the lists of the seventy disciples compiled by Pseudo-Dorotheus and Pseudo-Hippolytus).

In the Syriac Teaching of Simon Cephas, where he is called Ansus or Isus (the l of his name having been taken as the sign of the accusative, which might be omitted), he is a disciple of Peter, a deacon, whom the apostle makes bishop in his stead, with the injunction that nothing else besides the NT and the OT be read before the people; he is also represented as taking up the bodies of Peter and Paul by night and burying them. One of the three recensions of the Acts of Peter and Paul is traditionally attributed to Linus. He is commemorated in the Roman Church on 23rd Sept. According to the Roman Breviary he was an Etrurian, native of Volaterræ, and was bishop of Rome in succession to Peter for eleven years, two months, twenty-three days, and is buried in the Vatican. Schultze (Arch. Stud. 228), however, has shown that there was no Christian burying-place in the Vatican before the reign of Constantine. Harnack dates the episcopate of Linus A.D. 64-76. See his Chronologie der alt-christl. Lit., and cp Lightfoot, St. Clement of Rome, Zahn, Einleit. 2 23.

LION. Few animals are mentioned more frequently in the OT than the lion (Felis leo), and familiar acquaintance with its habits is shown by the many similes employed. There are five Hebrew words for lion, which, it so happens, are collected together in a single passage (Job 4 10 f.).

1. Terms.

1. 'ărī, 'aryēh, אֲרִי, אַרְיֵה, the common word for a full-grown lion. The cognate word in Eth. is applied to any wild beast, and in Arab. arwā denotes mountain-goats.

2. lābi, לָבִיא (√'to eat,' cp Ar. labiya, but see Hommel, Säugeth. 288 f.), used especially of the lioness, Gen. 49 9 Nu. 23 24 Joel 1 6 (‖ ארי, אריה), and lĕbiyyā, לְבִיָּא, Ezek. 19 2, and cp also the place-name BETH-LEBAOTH (לְבָאוֹת [בֵּית]). [In Ps. 22 17*a* [16*a*] 21*b* [20*b*] the lābī or 'greedy lion' takes the place of the dog in Che.'s text; cp DOG, § 3, begin.]

3. kĕphīr, כְּפִיר ('covered'—i.e., with hair?), a young and strong lion; cp Ezek. 19 2 f. 5 Ps. 17 12 (‖ אריה), Ezek. 38 13 etc. The place-name כְּפִירָה may have the same meaning; see CHEPHIRAH.

4. láyiš, לַיִשׁ (√'to be strong'), Job 4 11 Is. 30 6 (‖ לביא), Prov. 30 30; cp perhaps the place-name LAISH.

5. šáḥal, שַׁחַל (√'to cry out'), Job 4 10 10 16 (‖ ארי) 28 8*b* Hos. 5 14 and Ps. 91 13 (‖ כפיר). Identified by Boch. with the black Syrian lion (cp Pliny 8 17). On Ps. 91 13 see SERPENT.

AV in Job 28 8 renders בְּנֵי שַׁחַץ, 'lion's whelps,' RV, however, 'the proud beasts' (cp Talm. שַׁחַץ, 'pride'); cp RV's rendering of 41 34 [26]; Vg. filii superbiæ; Ges.-Buhl, 'noble beasts of prey'—e.g., 'the lion.' Šáḥaṣ, however, seems to be insufficiently attested. In Job 28 the context shows that some definite animal is meant. See OSSIFRAGE. In Job 41 34 שחץ should probably be שֶׁרֶץ (𝔊 v. 25 [26] τῶν ἐν τοῖς ὕδασιν, so Pesh., Michaelis, etc.).

A study of the parallelism in the different passages will show that the above words for lion were more or less interchangeable. The Rabbinical writers did not see this; they sought to assign each name to a particular part of the lion's life. For instance, most unreasonably, לַיִשׁ (no. 4) was said to mean an old, decrepit lion. In reality ליש means the precise opposite—a lion 'which turneth not away for any' (Prov. 30 30)—i.e., one in its full strength.

It is plain enough that lions were a source of danger in ancient Palestine. The reedy swamps of the Jordan (Jer. 49 19 50 44 Zech. 11 3, cp Rel. Pal. 274), the recesses of Mts. Hermon and Senir (Cant. 4 8), and the desert S. of Judah (Is. 30 6), were their favourite haunts. They are no longer found in Palestine, though they are mentioned as late as the twelfth century (Reland), but are still met with in the jungles of the Euphrates and the Tigris. They have probably disappeared from Arabia,[1] but abound, according to Layard,[2] in Khuzistan. In a few parts of India they are not unknown ;[3] but everywhere, even in Africa, they show a tendency to disappear before the encroachments of man. In historical times the lion ranged over Syria, Arabia, Asia Minor, and the country S. of the Balkans, besides the whole of Africa and the greater part of northern and central Hindustan.

2. Haunts.

3. Habits.

In its habits the lion is monogamous. The number of young produced at a birth varies from two to four, but is commonly three ; the male helps to rear the whelps by providing food for them, and he also takes part in teaching them to provide for themselves (cp Ezek. 19 2 ff. Nah. 2 12 [13]). Lions do not entirely depend on the food they kill, but will eat dead bodies even in an advanced state of decomposition. As a rule they are nocturnal in their habits, though occasionally seen by daylight, and their habit of lurking in secret places is often referred to by the OT writers (Ps. 10 9 17 12 Job 38 39 f. Lam. 3 10 Jer. 4 7 and Dt. 33 22). The lion was the shepherd's terror (cp Mic. 5 8 [7]) ; more than once, as David told Saul, he had to rescue a lamb from a lion's jaws[4] (1 S. 17 34 RV ; cp Am. 3 12). Ordinary shepherds had to band themselves together to drive off the enemy (Is. 31 4, and see Am. 3 12). Not unfrequently men were attacked (1 K. 13 24 ff. 20 36).

It seems as if the diminished population of Samaria after the captivity were much plagued by lions (2 K. 17 24 ff.). This is represented as a judgment ; a similar story is told of Decius (see Rel. Pal. 96 f.). Generally 'man-eaters' are the old lions who, with diminished activity and broken teeth, find it difficult to capture big game. On Benaiah's exploit (2 S. 23 20) see SNOW.

4. Poetical allusions.

The lion's roar is a favourite figure applied to enemies (Ps. 22 13 [14] Prov. 28 15 Zeph. 3 3), to false prophets (Ezek. 22 25), to the wrath of an earthly monarch (Prov. 19 12 20 2), to the wrath of God (Jer. 25 30 Joel 3 [4] 16), and to the fury of the devil (1 Pet. 5 8). Other references are made to his open mouth ready to rend the helpless (Ps. 22 21 [22] 2 Tim. 4 17), to his chasing his victims (Ps. 7 2 [3] Job 10 16), and to his powerful teeth, symbols of strength (Joel 1 6 Ecclus. 21 2 Rev. 9 8). In Gen. 49 9 the tribe of Judah is compared to a lion ; hence the Messianic title in Rev. 5 5. The same title is given to Dan in Dt. 33 22, and to all Israel in Nu. 23 24 24 9 ; also to Saul and Jonathan in 2 S. 1 23, and to Judas the Maccabee in 1 Macc. 3 4 2 Macc. 11 11. David's Gadite guard are called 'lion-faced' (1 Ch. 12 8) ; see also ARIEL.

5. Lion-hunting.

To hunt lions was the sport of kings.[5] Amenḥotep III. boasts of having slain 102 lions during the first ten years of his reign ; 'two sōss of lions (i.e., 120) I slew,' says Tiglath-pileser. Ašur-bāni-pal claims to have attacked a lion single-handed, and this exploit was not uncommon among his predecessors. Under the later kings lions were sought out in jungles, caught in snares, and preserved for the royal sport. Bow and arrows, or a sword, daggers, and spears were the weapons of the hunters.[6] In Palestine, as we gather from Ezek. 19 4 8, a pit would be dug, or a net prepared, by which the lion might be caught and then confined in a cage (סוּגַר, v. 9†, AV 'ward,' κημός).

6. In mythology, etc.

The great brazen laver of Solomon's temple was adorned with lions (1 K. 7 29), as well as with oxen and cherubim. All these figures were of Babylonian and Phœnician origin, and represented the strength of the victorious and terrible God of heaven. In Babylonian mythology the lion is the symbol of summer-heat. NERGAL [q.v.], the god of summer-heat, is represented as a lion-god. It is not, however, a probable view that the opening exploit in the career of Samson (Judg. 14 5) is to be directly explained by this symbolism (Steinthal). More probably, like Gilgameš[1] and the Phœnician god Melkart,[2] the hero Samson was represented as freeing his land from dangerous animals, which in turn may have been suggested by the conflict of the solar god Marduk with the dragon Tiāmat. In Egypt the lion-headed goddess (Sekhet) was the patron of Bubastis, Leontopolis, and other cities ; and at Baalbek, according to Damascius (Vit. Isid. 203), the protecting deity was worshipped under the form of a lion.

More famous, however, is the great Arabian lion-god Yaghūth, i.e., 'protector' (cp Kor. Sur. 71 23). Such names as 'Abd- and 'Obaid-Yaghūth among the Ḳoreish suggest that he was worshipped by Mohammed's own tribe. Yaghūth[3] is of Yemenite origin, and the name has been identified by Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem.(2) 43 ; cp Wellhausen, Heid.(2) 22) with the Edomite JEUSH (q.v.). Labwān (cp לביא) and Laith (cp ליש) occur as tribal names, and asad, the common word for a lion in Arabic, is frequently found not only in Arabia but also in the Sinaitic inscriptions. For evidence of an apparent connection between a lion-god and lion-clans, cp Kin. 192-194 ; Rel. Sem.(2) 43 ; We. Heid.(2) 19 ff. A. E. S.—S. A. C.—T. K. C.

LITTER. That litters were in use in Palestine before the Greek period is clear, not only from the pathetic allusion in Dt. 28 56, but also from Gen. 31 34 (E), where Rachel is said to have hidden her teraphim in the 'camel's furniture,' which should probably rather be 'camel's litter.'

In the phrase כַּר הַגָּמָל (𝔊 τὰ σάγματα τῆς καμήλου) כַּר is so called from the round shape of the litter. In Is. 66 20 𝔊 renders כרכרות by σκιάδια, thinking of כַּר (see, however, DROMEDARY). The camel-litters are, in fact, 'shaded' by an awning stretched on the wooden framework.

Usually, one may suppose, the litters were not borne by men, but were of a size to swing on the back of a mule. 'The Damascus litter,' says Doughty (Ar. Des. 1 61), 'is commonly a cradle-like frame with its tilt for one person, two such being laid in balance upon a mule's back ; others are pairs housed in together like a bedstead under one gay canvass awning.' The Arabian litters, which were 'charged as a houdah on a camel's back,' seemed to this traveller (2 484) more comfortable. Burckhardt describes these as sometimes five feet long (see Knobel-Dillm., on Gen. 31 34). A representation of an old Egyptian litter is given by Wilkinson (Anc. Eg. 1 421, no. 199) ; on the Greek φορεῖον and the Roman lectica, Smith's Dict. Class. Ant. (s.v. 'Lectica') may be consulted.

The word φορεῖον has been supposed by many to occur in a Hebraised form in Cant. 3 7. If true, this has an obvious bearing on the important question whether there are any books in the OT belonging to the Greek period, and directly influenced by the Greek language and even Greek ideas. No word for 'litter' occurs in Ecclesiastes, but in Cant. 3 7 RV rightly renders מִטָּה (miṭṭah ; see BED, § 2) 'litter,'—'Behold it is the litter of Solomon' (κλίνη, lectulus). The bridegroom (honoured by the extravagant title 'Solomon') is supposed to be borne in the centre of a procession, sitting in a litter or palanquin (cp 2 S. 3 31, where the same word means 'bier'—κλίνη, feretrum). According to the generally received view, this 'litter' or 'palanquin' is called in v. 9 by another term[1] (אַפִּרְיוֹן; 𝔊 φορ[ε]ῖον), which Robertson Smith inclined to explain from Sanskrit (see PALANQUIN), but most scholars (so e.g., Bu. and Siegfr., but not Del.) regard as a Greek loan-word = φορεῖον. (In the Midrash on Cant. אפריון is explained by פריוכא = φόρημα). The Greek derivation is supported by a partial parallelism between the account of Solomon's litter in Cant. 3 10 and that of the φορεῖα in a festal procession of Antiochus Epiphanes (Athen. 5 5; cp CANTICLES, § 15). To this view three objections may be raised. (1) The φορεῖον was borrowed by the Greeks from Asia. (2) If a Greek (or Sanskrit) loan-word were used at all, it would be in v. 7, not in v. 9. The native word miṭṭah would be appropriately used to explain the foreign word; but after the litter has been brought before us as a miṭṭah, we do not expect to be told that 'king Solomon made himself a φορεῖον.'

3 The proper name ιεγουθος has been found on an inscription from Memphis (We.).

The surrounding context is full of difficulties which suggest corruption of the text. We cannot, therefore, consider appiryōn apart from the rest of the passage. We may suppose that אפריון is a dittogram of לבנון, and as the result of a series of critical emendations (notably that of המלאכה for המלך, אלמגים for ארגמן [see PURPLE], and הבנים for אהבה [see EBONY]), the description of the bridegroom's litter in Cant. 3 6-11 assumes this form (see Che. JQR 11 562 ff. [1899]),—

What is it that comes up from the wilderness
  Like pillars of smoke;
Perfumed with myrrh and frankincense,
  With all spices of the merchant?

See, it is Solomon's litter,
  Surrounded by warriors;
They are all wearers of swords,
  Expert in war.
Every one has his sword on his thigh
  For fear of lions.

Solomon made himself this artful work
  Of timber of Lebanon;
Its pillars he made of silver,
  Its back of gold,
Its seat—almug-wood in the centre,
  Inlaid with ebony.

Come forth, ye maidens of Zion,
  And behold the king,
In the crown with which his mother crowned him
  On the day of his marriage,
And in the day of the joy of his heart,
* * * * *

Thus, besides כַּר הַגָּמָל, (a) מִטָּה, miṭṭah, but not appiryōn (which is really non-existent, except in MH), means litter. So also (b) does צָב, ṣāb, in Is. 66 20, unless 'cars (for mules)' be preferred as a rendering. See WAGON. (c) φορεῖον (see above) occurs in 2 Macc. 3 27 (Heliodorus; sella gestatoria), and 9 8 (Antiochus; gestatorium); RV 'litter,' AV 'horselitter.' (d) δίφραξ [A], or δίφρος [V], 2 Macc. 14 21; RV 'and a litter was brought forward from each army' (προῆλθεν παρ' ἑκάστου δίφραξ). Hence the denom. διφρεύω, properly 'to drive a chariot'; Bar. 6 31 [30] οἱ ἱερεῖς διφρεύουσι ([B]; but οἱ ἱ. διαφθείρουσιν [A], καθίζουσιν οἱ ἱ. [Q]). RVmg. by a doubtful extension of the sense, 'the priests bear the litter' (RV 'sit on seats'; AV 'sit in their temples'). The Greek text seems to be corrupt. T. K. C.

LITTLE OWL (כּוֹס), Lev. 11 17. See OWL.

LITURGY. See PSALMS, HYMNS, SACRIFICE.

LIVER (כָּבֵד, 'heavy,' with reference to the weight of the liver; ΗΠΑΡ). It is important to begin by noticing the sacredness of the liver. Repeatedly in P 'the yōthéreth of (or, upon) the liver' is directed to be burned upon the sacrificial altar.

The Heb. phrases are יֹתֶרֶת הַכָּבֵד,[2] Ex. 29 22 Lev. 8 16 25 9 19; הַיֹּתֶ׳ עַל־הַכָּבֵד, Lev. 3 4 10 15 4 9 7 4; and הַיֹּתֶ׳ מִן־הַכָּבֵד, Lev. 9 10. 𝔊BAFL also reads one of these phrases in Lev. 7 30. According to Driver-White (SBOT on Lev. 3 4), yōthéreth denotes probably the fatty mass at the opening of the liver which reaches the kidneys and becomes visible upon the removal of the 'lesser omentum.' This latter is only a thin transparent sheet and cannot well be reckoned among the fat parts of the animal. At all events the old interpretation 'lobe of the liver' (𝔊, Jos. Ant. iii. 9 2, etc.) has nothing in its favour.

[1] Cp Mishna, Sōṭā 9 4 (49 a), for the late use of אפריון for the bridal palanquin.

[2] Pesh. ḥĕṣār kabdā, lit. 'the court (?) of the liver,' cp Levy, Targ. HWB, s.v חֲצָרָא. The same term in MH, e.g., Yōmā 8 6, where it is prohibited on the day of Atonement to give to a man who has been bitten by a mad dog the animal's חצר כבד. This homœopathic mode of treatment was evidently customary.

In Tob. 6 4-16 8 2, there is a reference to the use of the liver of a fish in exorcisms; its employment in divination has been already referred to in connection with Ezek. 21 21 [26]. See DIVINATION, § 2 (3),[1] and cp Oefele, ZATW 20 [1900], 311 ff.

But why was this part of the viscera so especially sacred? Because the liver contested with the heart the honour of being the central organ of life. Wounds in the liver were therefore thought to be mortal[2]; e.g., Prov. 7 23, 'a dart through his liver,' and Lam. 2 11, 'my liver' (‖ 'my bowels,' but 𝔊 and Pesh. כְּבֹדִי) is poured out upon the earth,' are each of them a periphrasis for death. Being therefore so sacred, the liver was not to be eaten, but to be returned to the giver of life (see REINS).

We can now understand the Assyrian usage by which kabittu (= כָּבֵד) became equivalent to libbu, 'heart,'[3] and are not surprised to find a group of passages in OT, in which כָּבֵד has to be restored for the faulty כָּבֹד (כָּבוֹד) of MT. In Ps. 7 6 [5] the keen-witted Oratorian Houbigant long ago read 'and pour out my liver on the dust' (וּכְבֵדִי לֶעָפָר יִשְׁפֹּךְ; cp Lam. 2 11), and in Ps. 16 9 [8], 'Therefore my heart is glad, my mind exults' (וַיָּגֶל כְּבֵדִי), remarking that 'in the Scriptures the liver is the seat of joy and sorrow'; and in Gen. 49 6 he follows 𝔊 (τὰ ἥπατά μου) in reading כְּבֵדִי 'my liver' for כְּבֹדִי 'my glory.' In Ps. 30 13 [12] 57 9 [8] 108 2 [1] similar corrections are necessary; perhaps also in Is. 16 11 (כבדי for קרבי; cp Lam. 2 11).[4] T. K. C.—S. A. C.

LIVING CREATURES. See CHERUB i., § 1.

LIZARD. Tristram has described forty-four species and twenty-eight genera of the group Lacertilia found at the present day in Palestine. They live in great numbers in the sandy desert and generally in the wilderness, and are among the commonest animals the traveller meets with. Amongst those most frequently found he mentions the Lacerta viridis and L. lævis and the wall lizards belonging to the genus Zootoca. Another not unimportant species, called the Monitor niloticus, was held in high esteem by the ancient Egyptians as destroying the eggs and the young of the crocodile. Although the lizard is mentioned only once in AV, there can be but little doubt that this is the animal referred to in the following Heb. words:—

1. צָב, ṣāb (Lev. 11 29,[5] AV TORTOISE, RV GREAT LIZARD). Its Ar. equivalent ḍabb denotes a non-poisonous lizard which is eaten by some Arabian Bedouins.[6] It is identified with the Uromastix spinipes—a lizard with a powerful tail covered with strong spines. It is mentioned among the unclean creeping things (Lev. l.c.), and since it is followed by לְמִינֵהוּ ('after its kind') is probably a generic term, in which case the following names in v. 30 are, as RVmg. suggests, those of different kinds of lizards.

2. אֲנָקָה, 'ănāḳāh (Lev. 11 30, RV GECKO), AV FERRET [q.v.].

[1] Cp Frazer, Paus. 4 5; Wellh. Heid.(2) 133 f.; WRS Rel. Sem.(2) 379, n. 4.

[2] Cp Æsch. Agam. 432, θιγγάνει πρὸς ἧπαρ, of a heart-wound.

[3] For the parallelism of these words see Del. Ass. HWB 317. Del. renders kabittu only 'Gemüth.' But Jensen (Kosmol. 11 n.) gives (1) liver (2) inward part = centre; and Muss-Arnolt (1) liver, (2) disposition.

[4] One may hope that, as Schleusner suggests (Lex., s.v.) the ἧπαρ of 𝔊 in 1 S. 19 13 16 a is a corruption of a Greek transliteration of כביר. Theod. has χοβερ; but Aq. τὸ πᾶν πλῆθος; cp 2 K. 8 15 𝔊 (Klo.). See BED, §§ 3, 4 (d).

[5] Hitzig on Nah. 2 7 reads הַצָּב, 'the lizard' (i.e., Nineveh) for הֻצַּב; against this cp Hi.-Steiner(4), ad loc.

[6] According to Doughty (Ar. Des. 1 70) the ṭhób [i.e., ḍabb] is an edible sprawling lizard, fullest length a yard with tail, and is considered a delicacy. The colour is blackish and green-specked above the pale yellowish and dull belly, and its skin is used for the nomad's milk-bottles.

3. כֹּחַ, kōăḥ (ib., RV LAND-CROCODILE), AV CHAMELEON [q.v.].

4. לְטָאָה, lĕṭāʾāh (ib., EV LIZARD; καλαβώτης; stellio), in the Talmud is the general term for a lizard; cp Lewysohn, Zool. 221.

5. חֹמֶט, ḥōmeṭ (ib., AV SNAIL; σαῦρα, lacerta; cp Sam. Rashi, Kim.), RV SAND-LIZARD, so Boch., who identifies it with the Ar. ḥulasa. Probably a sand-lizard of which there are many species to be found in the Sinaitic peninsula, and which, from the fact that its feet are almost invisible, is often called by the Arabs the 'Sand-fish.'

6. תִּנְשֶׁמֶת, tinšĕmeth (ib., from נשם, 'to breathe, blow,' AV MOLE; [α]σπαλαξ; talpa), explained as the 'mole' (which ill accords with the description in v. 29, see Di.), or as the 'centipede' (cp Pesh.). It is very commonly taken to be the CHAMELEON (q.v.); but the genuineness of the word is open to question; see MOLE 2, OWL.

7. שְׂמָמִית,[1] śĕmāmīth, reckoned among the 'little things which are clever' (Prov. 30 28, AV SPIDER; καλαβώτης; stellio; ܣܡܡܐ [Pesh.]),[2] is rather the lizard (so RV), the reference being to the fact that a harmless lizard may be held in the hands with impunity. שממית is the rendering of the Targ. Jer., for לְטָאָה (above), and that of the Sam. for אֲנָקָה. The mod. Gr. σαμιάμινθος is probably derived from it (cp Del. Prov., ad loc.).

The lizard, though eaten sometimes by Arabian tribes, was forbidden among the Jews; and a curious old tradition relates that Mohammed forbade it as food, because he thought the lizard was the offspring of an Israelite clan which had been transformed into reptiles (RS 88; Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 326). This has a suggestion of totemism, and that the lizard was a sacred animal seems to be borne out by the occurrence of the Ar. ḍabb (צב) as the eponym of a widespread tribe (Kin. 198), and also by the recollection of the important part the flesh, bones, and skin of the lizard have played in magical and medicinal preparations.[3]

LOCUST. The biblical references to the locust are of much interest, though the Hebrew text may perhaps sometimes invite criticism. The species that is intended is usually supposed to be the Schistocerca peregrina, formerly known as Acridium peregrinum. This species, like all the locusts of ordinary language, belongs to the Orthoptera and to the family Acridiidæ, not to the Locustidæ, a name which has produced much confusion. The species at the present day extends from North-West India to the west coast of Northern Africa; it is the only Old-World species of the genus, all other forms being American.

To illustrate the great distances that can be traversed by these insects it may be mentioned that in 1865 a vessel bound from Bordeaux to Boston was invaded by S. peregrina when 1200 miles from the nearest land, after which for two days the air was full of locusts which settled all over the ship. In 1889 there passed over the Red Sea a swarm which was estimated to extend over 2000 square miles, and, each locust being assumed to weigh 1/16 oz., the weight of the swarm was calculated to be 42,850 millions of tons; a second and even larger swarm passed on the following day. That these numbers are no exaggeration is shown by the Government Reports on the destruction of locusts in Cyprus. In 1881 over 1300 tons of locust eggs had been destroyed, but in spite of this it was calculated that over 5000 egg cases, each containing many eggs, were deposited in the island in 1883.

The eggs are laid in the ground by means of the powerful ovipositor of the female, the deposition usually being in remote and uncultivated lands. On leaving the egg the young immediately cast their skin, an operation repeated about the 6th, 13th, 21st, 31st and 50th day. Although the wings attain their perfect development and the locust becomes capable of flight and of forming swarms only at the 6th and last moult, much harm may be done by the young, which hop[1] over the land in great armies devouring every blade of grass and every leaf of plants and shrubs (cp Joel 1 4 7). The most striking effects, however, are caused by the swarms of migratory locusts (see above); these, coming out of a clear sky, darken the sun (Ex. 10 15) and in a short time devour every green thing, the coming together of their mouth appendages even producing a perceptible noise as they eat their way through the country (cp Joel 2 5). They are therefore an apt figure for swarming hordes (Judg. 6 5 7 12 Jer. 46 23 Judith 2 20, and cp Jerome on Joel 1 6: quid enim locustis innumerabilius et fortius; quibus humana industria resistere non potest). Their habit of banding together led a proverb-writer to class them among the little things of this earth which are wise (Pr. 30 27). The likeness they bear to horses was also noticed (Joel 2 4 Rev. 9 7, and cp the Italian name cavaletta), also the suddenness of their disappearance. When the hot sun beats powerfully upon them, they literally 'flee away, and the place is not known where they are'[2] (Nah. 3 17). Fortunately the visits of the swarms are, as a rule, not annual, but recur only after a lapse of some years, though the period is uncertain; the cause of the immense destruction of locust life which this indicates, and still more the cause of the sudden recrudescence of activity, are at present unknown.

Locusts are frequently mentioned by the ancients as an article of food. They are much eaten in the East, and, when the legs and wings are removed and the body fried in butter or oil, are said to be not unpalatable. On Mt. 3 4 see at end of article.

There are nine words in the OT taken to mean the locust, and although, according to the Talmud, there were some 800[3] species in Palestine (cp Lewysohn, Zool. d. Talm. 286 ff.), we cannot, with any degree of certainty, apportion a distinct species to each Hebrew word.

2. Names.

1. אַרְבֶּה, arbeh (prop. 'multiplier'; ἀκρίς, βροῦχος [Lev. 11 22 1 K. 8 37], ἀττέλεβος [Nah. 3 17]), is the usual word for locust, and appears to be the generic term. It is the locust of the Egyptian plague (Ex. 10 1-19, see EXODUS ii., § 3; ii., col. 1442). In Judg. 6 5 7 12 Jer. 46 23 Job 39 20 AV renders GRASSHOPPER. [In Ps. 109 23, 'I am tossed up and down as the locust' (EV) is hardly correct; Kau. HS gives 'I am shaken out.' נִנְעַרְתִּי is corrupt; read נֶאֱרֵתִי, 'I am gathered (for removal) like locusts, cp Is. 33 4. So Che. Ps.(2); cp § 3.]

2. סָלְעָם, solʿām (ἀττάκης [BAFL]), in EV the BALD-LOCUST (Lev. 11 22), cp Aram. סַלְעַם, 'to consume,' which in the Targ. represents בלע. Perhaps a Tryxalis with its long smooth head and projecting antennæ is meant.

3. חַרְגֹּל, ḥargōl (Lev. 11 22); see BEETLE.

4. חָגָב, ḥāgāb (√ 'to hide, or conceal'? ἀκρίς, but in Lev. 11 22

[1] Cp Job 39 20 RV: 'Hast thou made him to leap as the locust?'; and Is. 33 4. [In Ecclus. 43 17 [19] the fall of snow is likened to the flying down of birds and to the lighting of the locust—ὡς ἀκρὶς καταλύουσα (marg. כארבה ישכון רדתו (רדתו).]

[3] Eight of these at most could be locusts.

ὀφιομάχης) usually rendered GRASSHOPPER (cp Lev. l.c., Nu. 13 33 Is. 40 22 Eccles. 12 5) but in 2 Ch. 7 13, 'locust.' It is referred to in Nu. 13 33 (see n. 1), Is. 40 22 [also in Is. 51 6,[1] see Che. 'Is.' SBOT (Heb.); and in Ps. 37 20 90 9,[2] see Che. Ps.(2)] as an emblem of feebleness and insignificance. In Talm. חָגָב is the generic term for locusts (cp Lewysohn, l.c.). Cp the proper names HAGAB, HAGABAH.

5. גָּזָם, gāzām; see PALMER-WORM.

6. יֶלֶק, yéleḳ ('licker'; βροῦχος; ἀκρίς in Jer. 51 14 27), usually CANKERWORM (so RV regularly) or CATERPILLER.[3] Some kind of locust is meant, or possibly a young locust. In Jer. 51 27 yéleḳ sāmār (ילק סמר), 'rough caterpiller' (or 'cankerworm'), denotes some special kind. The Vg. has bruchum aculeatum.[4]

7. צְלָצַל, ṣĕlāṣal (probably 'tinkler,' ἐρυσίβη), may be some species of insect noted for its strident noise, such as, in Dt. 28 42 (see also HORNET), the cicada, or, in Is. 18 1, according to some (see Che. Proph. Is., ad loc.), the formidable tsetse-fly, the 'tsaltsalya' of the Gallas.[5] But other views of צלצל כנפים in Is. l.c. are possible. See below § 3 and cp e.g., SBOT, 'Isaiah,' Heb. pp. 80 (lines 36-46), 108 (lines 40-46); note, also, AV's rendering 'shadowing with wings,' and RV's 'the rustling of wings.'

8. גֵּבִים, גּוֹבַי, gēbīm (plur.), gōbay (collective)—i.e., 'swarm'? —(ἀκρίς), usually rendered GRASSHOPPER (cp Nah. 3 17,[6] ‖ ארבה); but in Am. 7 1, in AVmg., 'green worms.'

9. חָסִיל, ḥāsīl ('consumer,' cp the verb חסל Dt. 28 38; ἐρυσίβη; and βροῦχος 2 Ch. 6 28), in 1 K. 8 37 2 Ch. 6 28 Ps. 78 46 ‖ אַרְבֶּה; some kind of locust must be meant.

Of the above, nos. 1-4 were classed among clean winged things and were allowed to be eaten (Lev. 11 21 f., P; cp CLEAN, § 11); they are described as having 'legs above their feet' (כְּרָעַיִם מִמַּעַל לְרַגְלָיו), whence it would appear that a distinction was made between leaping locusts, saltatoria, and those which run, cursoria. A similar distinction is made by the Arabs between the fāris (riding) and the rājil (going); cp also 2 Ch. 6 28, Pesh. ḳamṣā pārĕḥā wĕ-zāḥĕlā. In the vivid account of the locust plague in Joel 1 f. (see JOEL ii., § 5, and cp Driver's Comm.) four of the above are mentioned in the order 5 1 6 9 (Joel 1 4). The fact that the order in 2 25 is different (1 6 9 5) makes it improbable that these words can be taken to refer to locusts in different stages of growth.

3. Difficult references. There are a few passages which have not yet been discussed. In Is. 18 1 the land 'that sends ambassadors by the sea' is neither 'the land of the rustlings of wings' nor 'the land of strident creatures with wings' (see above, § 2 [8]). The most probable reading is 'Ha Cush! land of the streams of Gihon'; Gihon is the name of the upper, or Ethiopian, course of the Nile (see Haupt, SBOT, 'Isaiah' [Heb.] 109); the right words have a twofold representation in the Heb. text, though both times in a corrupt form. The difficult clause at the end of Am. 7 1, following the reference to the 'formation' of certain locusts, evidently needs criticism. EV gives, 'and lo, it was the latter growth after the king's mowings,' a somewhat obscure explanation (see MOWINGS). But 'latter growth' (לקש) surely required no explanation. On the other hand, something more might well have been expected about the locusts. 𝔊 gives καὶ ἰδοὺ βροῦχος εἷς γωγ ὁ βασιλεύς. The true reading probably is וְהִנֵּה יֶלֶק וְאַרְבֶּה וְגָזָם וְחָסִיל, 'and behold the cankerworm, and the locust, and the palmerworm, and the caterpiller' (cp Joel 1 4). The sense gains greatly; we also obtain a fresh point of contact between the Books of Amos and Joel.

Ḥāsīl.—In two passages ḥāsīl seems to have been corrupted into ṣēl, 'shadow.' One of these (Ps. 109 23), in an emended text, gives a striking parallel to Nah. 3 17; the other (Job 13 28 = 14 2), to Joel 1 7 12. The renderings respectively are—

1. 'Like caterpillers (כחסיל) on the fences I am taken away,
   I am gathered (for removal) like locusts.'
2. 'Like a blossom which appeareth and fadeth,
   Like a palm-tree (13 28, like a vine) which caterpillers have eaten.'

Two kinds of locusts (חָסִיל and אַרְבֶּה) are apparently referred to in Ps. 49 11 and (אַרְבֶּה and חַרְגֹּל) in Ecclus. 14 15; in both cases according to critical emendation. Ben Sira's fondness for interweaving biblical expressions with his proverbs has helped in this case to the restoration of the text.

The NT references to locusts (ἀκρίδες) occur in Mt. 3 4 (Mk. 1 6) Rev. 9 3-11. The Mt.-Mk. passage states that locusts formed the chief food of John the Baptist; it is pointed out, however, elsewhere that there may here be an early misunderstanding (see HUSKS, 4, JOHN THE BAPTIST, § 2). The locusts of the Rev. passage belong to the supernatural imagery of the Apocalypse. Contrary to what is said in Prov. 30 27 the locusts are said to have had a king. There may, however, be a confusion between מֶלֶךְ, 'king,' and מַלְאָךְ, 'angel,' ABADDON [q.v.] (note Ἑβραϊστί, Rev. 9 11) being variously represented as the 'king' and the 'angel' of the abyss.

LODDEUS (λολδαιος [B in v. 46]), 1 Esd. 8 45 f., RV = Ezra 8 17, IDDO [1].

LO-DEBAR (לוֹ דְבָר; 2 S. 9 4 f., λαδαβαρ [BAL]; λαβαδαρι [A in v. 4]; לֹא דְבָר; 17 27 λωδαβαρ [BA]; λαδ. [L]), a place in Gilead in which Mephibosheth, Jonathan's son, lay for a time, with Machir son of Ammiel, who also befriended David on his flight to the E. of Jordan. Probably the same place is meant by the Lidebir which Josh. 13 26 places in the territory of Gad. Grätz has discovered the name in Am. 6 13, as, along with Karnaim, captured by Israel from Aram. Here MT (לֹא דָבָר) and all the Versions take it as a common noun, 'nothing'; and probably Amos, out of all the conquests of Israel E. of Jordan, chose these two for the possible play upon their names (see AMOS, § 5). Lo-debar has not been identified; but 7 m. E. of M'kēs or Gadara, near the great road eastward, and on a southern branch of the W. Samar, is a village Ibdar, which must have been an important site on the back of the most northerly ridge of Gilead. There are a good spring and ancient remains with caves (Schumacher, N. Ajlun 101). The houses cluster on the steep edge of a plateau which commands a view across Ḥaurān as far N. as Hermon. Strategically it is suitable; no other OT name has been identified along this ridge, which must certainly have been contested by Israel and Aram; and it is apparently on this N. border of Gilead that Lidebir is placed by Josh. 13 26 (cp review of Buhl, Pal. in Expositor, Dec. 1896, p. 411). [The reading 'Lo-debar' in 2 S. 9 4 f. has been doubted: see SAUL, § 6, and cp MEPHIBOSHETH. Wellhausen and Nowack adopt the above emendation of Am. 6 13; Driver, however (Joel and Amos, 199), finds a difficulty in it. Cp MAHANAIM.]

LOGOS. Except in the prologue to the Fourth Gospel (Jn. 1 1-18) the biblical usage of λογος shows no peculiarity; it means a complex of words (ρηματα), presented in the unity of a sentence or thought. The entire gospel can be called 'the logos of God,' or even, simply the logos (κατ' ἐξοχήν)—see, e.g., Mt. 13 19-23 Gal. 6 6 2 Cor. 2 17 Rev. 1 2-9—as being a declaration of the divine plan of salvation.

1. Biblical references.

Such passages as Jn. 8 31 37 Acts 6 7 1 Cor. 14 36 border upon poetical personification, but do not cross the line; neither also does Ps. 33 [32] 4 ff., nor yet Wisd. 16 12 18 15 f.

In Jn. 1 1 the Logos comes before us as a person, who was 'in the beginning'—i.e., before the creation—in communion with God, and himself was God. The description proceeds in vv. 2 ff.; but the name Logos is used only once again—in v. 14, 'the Logos became flesh'; from this point onward its place is taken by such names as 'Jesus Christ,' 'the Only-begotten,' 'the Son,' 'the Christ.' 1 14 makes it clear that for the writer the identity of the Logos with the bearer of the gospel, Jesus Christ, is a fact as important as it is indubitable; for him the redeemer is in his heavenly pre-existence the Logos, after his incarnation Jesus Christ. In 1 4 ff. it is a very difficult matter to distinguish clearly which predicates refer to the pre-existent 'Son,' and which to the Son in his earthly manifestation; probably the writer did not intend that a distinction should be made, but wishes from the outset to habituate his readers to thinking of the man Jesus who died on the cross as being one with the eternal Logos and so denying none of the qualities of the one to the other; the full Godhead of the Saviour is a pledge of the absolute divineness of the salvation he brings. In any case so much is certainly claimed for the Logos in 1 4-14:—(1) An existence that transcends humanity (it is as incarnate that he 'took up his abode among men'), and indeed creation itself—the highest conceivable glory (that of the Father being excepted); (2) an infinite fulness of grace and truth; and (3) the most intimate possible relation to God, even the title of God not being withheld (the article, it is true, is not prefixed). Moreover, according to v. 3 it is through the Logos that the universe is created; nothing has come into being without his intervention, and mankind owe also to him the highest good they know—light and life. Thus from Jn. 1 1 ff. we may define the Logos as a divine being, yet still sharply distinguished from God, so that monotheism is not directly denied—not equal to the Father (cp Jn. 14 28), yet endowed with all divine powers whereby to bring to pass the will of God concerning the universe.

Apart from the prologue the Logos as thus defined is not again named in the Fourth Gospel; in 1 Jn. 5 7 he has been introduced only by a late interpolation, and in 1 Jn. 1 1 'the Logos of Life' admits of another interpretation than that demanded by the prologue. So also does 'the logos of God' in Heb. 4 12, and in the mysterious announcement in Rev. 19 13 that the name of the conquering Messiah, unknown to all save to himself alone, is 'the Logos of God,' it is only the prologue to the gospel that renders it probable that by the expression a heavenly person of the highest rank is intended.

There remains the question: From what source did the conception of the Logos come into the Johannine sphere of thought?

2. Origin of Johannine conception.

It cannot have been the creation of the Evangelist himself, for the very order of the words in 1 1*ac* shows that he has no need to teach that there is a Logos, but only to declare what ought to be believed concerning the Logos. Neither can he have derived it from the OT, though the divine 'words' are conceived of in the Hebrew Scriptures as objectively existing, and as having a creative power[1] (Jn. 1 2 is evidently related to Gen. 1 3 6, etc.), for the Logos is nowhere a fixed member of the supernatural world. Nor would it at all help us to understand the genesis of the Johannine Logos to adduce the phrase 'the Memra' (מימרא דיי) by which the Targums denote the Divine Being in self-manifestation, though the same hypostatising tendency which produced this Jewish phrase also found expression in the like-sounding phrase of the Fourth Gospel.

[1] Che. OPs. 321 f.

It was from Greek philosophy that the Evangelist derived the expression through the medium of Philo of Alexandria; but this need not be equivalent to saying that he was the first to put forward the connection between the Philonian Logos and the Jesus Christ of NT believers. Nor yet has he slavishly transcribed Philo; rather with a free hand and with great skill has he borrowed and adapted from the Philonian account of the Logos those features which seemed serviceable towards the great end he had in view—the Christianising of the Logos conception. In spite, however, of the majestic originality of the verses in question (1 1-5 9 ff.), suggestions of Philo have been traced in almost every word.

Among Greek philosophers it was Heraclitus who first put forward the Logos—i.e., Reason—as the principle underlying the universe; with the Stoics the Logos became the world-soul which shapes the world in conformity with a purpose, and is the uniting principle of all the rational forces which are at work in the world. This conception was combined by Philo with the Platonic doctrine of Logoi as supersensual primal images or patterns of visible things, and, this done, he read into the OT—and so also into Jewish theology—a Logos which was the intermediary being between the universe in its overwhelming manifoldness and Him who is (ὁ ὤν) God, who was ever being presented in a more and more abstract way, and being relegated to a sphere where religion could find no stay.

As the Wisdom of Solomon (cp also Ecclesiasticus) introduces wisdom as God's representative in his relations with the world, and, if a few passages be left out of account, almost compels a personal separation of this wisdom from God, so does Philo, approaching the view of Hellenism, with the Logos, which he already in so many words designates as 'Son' and 'Only-begotten.' The theological position which had gained partial acceptance in Palestinian Judaism also, had manifestly found its advocates from an early period in Christian circles as well; but it was the author of the Fourth Gospel who first had the skill to take it up and to give it unambiguous expression in the formulæ of the then current metaphysic in such a way as to make it subservient to the deepest interests of Christianity. His representation of Christ is not, however, to be taken as a mere product of his study of Philo, whether we take it that in his prologue he was minded merely to give by means of his Logos-speculation an introduction that should suitably appeal to his educated Gentile Christian readers, or whether we assume that his design was to set forth the ultimate conclusions he had reached as a constructive religious philosopher. The church, unfortunately, even so early as in the second century, began to give greater attention to this philosophical element in the gospel of 'the divine' (τοῦ θεολόγου) than to the historical features of the narrative, and the employment of the idea of the Logos in this manner, occasioned by this author, though he is not to be held responsible for it, became a source of danger to Christianity.

LORD. On LORD as representing יהוה (Yahwè) and on 'Lord' as representing אֲדֹנָי (Adōnai) see NAMES, §§ 109, 119.

'Lord' in OT stands for one Aramaic and eight Hebrew words.

(1) אָדוֹן, 'ādōn, 'master.' Gen. 45 8 lord = ruler; Gen. 24 14 27 of the master (so EV) of a slave. 'My lord,' of a father, Gen. 31 35; of a husband, Gen. 18 12; of a governor, Gen. 42 10; of Moses, Nu. 11 28; of Elijah, 1 K. 18 7.

(2) בַּעַל, bá'al, 'owner,' cp EV Ex. 21 28, 'the owner (בעל) of the ox'; Job 31 39, 'the owners thereof' (i.e., of a piece of land); cp WRS, Rel. Sem.(2), 94. Cp BAAL, § 1.

(3) רַב, rab. See RAB, RABBI.

(4) שַׂר, śar, Ezra 8 25. See KING, PRINCE, 3.

(5) שָׁלִישׁ, šālīš, 2 K. 7 2 17; either = τριστάτης (𝔊), see ARMY, § 4; CHARIOT, § 10, or a modification of סריס ii., Ass. ša-riš, 'high officer, captain.' See EUNUCH.

(6) סְרָנִים (σατράπαι, σατραπίαι, ἄρχοντες), only in plur., of the five 'lords of the Philistines,' Josh. 13 3 Judg. 3 3 1 S. 5 8 11, etc. According to Hoffmann, a dialectic plur. of שַׂר. More probably a corruption of רֹזְנִים, a word which has elsewhere, too, undergone corruption. The harmonising hand of an early editor may be assumed (Che.).

(7) גְּבִיר, gĕbīr, Gen. 27 29 37, of Esau.

(8) מָרֵא, mārē, Aram. in Dan. 2 47 4 19 24 5 23; cp the Syriac mār'yā, 'Lord,' and mār, 'lord.'

(9) κύριος, Mt. 9 38 10 24 13 27, etc. (δεσπότης is rendered 'master,' except where it is used of God or of Christ).

(10) ραββωνι. See RABBI.

(11) μεγιστάν, in pl. Mk. 6 21, kingly associates. In Rev. 6 15 18 23 RV, AV, 'great men.' EV 'great man' in Ecclus. 4 7, Heb. שלטון (cp Eccles. 8 4 8), 32 9 Heb. זקנים, 38 3 Heb. נדיבים (mg. מלכים).

LORD'S DAY (ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα; dies dominica). We cannot say with certainty how far back the practice of marking the first day of the week by acts of worship is traceable. This at least is probable: 'that in the post-apostolic ordinance we have a continuation of apostolic custom;'[1] but the time when the Christian Sunday began to be observed in Palestine, where the observance of the Sabbath does not seem to have been at first superseded by it, remains utterly obscure.[2]

1. NT references.

1 Cor. 16 2 bids each person, κατὰ μίαν σαββάτου (EV 'on the first [day] of the week'), lay by him in store as he may prosper (for the 'saints' in Jerusalem), that no collections be made when the writer comes (1 Cor. 16 2). It is often possible and sometimes inevitable to infer from the practice of a later time that of an earlier. This has been done in the present case by Zahn,[3] who finds clear though faint traces of Sunday observance. It must not be overlooked, however, that the contribution of each one is to be laid up 'by him' (παρ' ἑαυτῷ), i.e., in his own home—not in an assembly for worship.

This suggests an alternative explanation to that of Zahn. The church of Corinth consisted for the most part of poor, obscure people (1 Cor. 1 26 ff.); possibly for many of them the last or the first day of the week was pay-day, the first day therefore, was the day on which they could most easily lay aside something.[4] 1 Cor. 16 therefore does not supply us with any assured facts as to an observance of Sunday in the Pauline churches.

On the other hand, the 'we-sections' in Acts contain a valuable indication. On his way to Jerusalem, Paul stayed at Troas seven days (Acts 20 6), the last of which is called μία τῶν σαββάτων (EV 'the first [day] of the week'), the following day—Monday of our reckoning—being fixed for his departure (v. 7). On this last day there was a 'breaking of bread' and Paul prolonged his discourse with the congregation till midnight (v. 7). Even here, however, we must be careful not to infer too much. The passage furnishes no conclusive proof that the first day of the week was the regular day for celebrating the Lord's Supper, or that a universal Christian custom is here referred to. We may venture to conclude, however, with a fair measure of probability, that the first day of the week was at the time the day on which the Lord's Supper was observed in Troas.

If, on the other hand, the narrator had wished it to be understood that the 'breaking of bread' which he is mentioning was merely ad hoc, and in connection with the apostle's approaching departure, he would hardly have expressed himself as he does. It is much more likely that Paul fixed Monday for his departure in order that he might observe the Sunday communion once more with his beloved brethren of Troas. This passage being from the pen of an eye-witness, we are justified in regarding it as affording the first faint yet unmistakable trace of a setting apart of the first day of the week for purposes of public worship by Christians.

Whether Rev. 1 10 ought also to be cited in this connection depends on our exegesis of the passage, on which see below, § 2.

2. Light from other sources.

The younger Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan (about 112 A.D.) does not state directly that the 'fixed day' among the Bithynian Christians for religious worship was Sunday, though this is certainly probable (cp Acts 20 7). Its indistinctness is compensated for by the fulness of the information in Justin Martyr's First Apology (chap. 67), written about 150 A.D.[1]

The evidence given before Pliny was to the effect 'quod essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere secum invicem, seque sacramento non in scelus aliquod obstringere, sed ne furta, ne latrocinia, ne adulteria committerent, ne fidem fallerent, ne depositum appellati abnegarent; quibus peractis morem sibi discedendi fuisse rursusque [coëundi] ad capiendum cibum, promiscuum tamen et innoxium' (Plin. Epp. 10 96 [97], ed. Keil, 307 f.).

Justin Martyr's words are as follows:—'And on the day called Sunday (τῇ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένῃ ἡμέρᾳ) there is an assembly (συνέλευσις) in one place of all who live in cities or in the country, and the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets (cp CANON, § 69) are read as long as time permits (μέχρις ἐγχωρεῖ); then, when the reader has ceased, the president (ὁ προεστώς) gives his exhortation to the imitation of these good things (πρόκλησιν τῆς τῶν καλῶν τούτων μιμήσεως). Then we all stand up together and offer prayers (εὐχὰς πέμπομεν) and, as we before said [chap. 66], when our prayer is ended (παυσαμένων ἡμῶν τῆς εὐχῆς), bread is brought (προσφέρεται) and wine and water, and the president in like manner sends up (ἀναπέμπει) prayers and thanksgivings according to his ability (ὅση δύναμις αὐτῷ) and the congregation assents (ὁ λαὸς ἐπευφημεῖ) saying the Amen. And the participation of the things over which thanks have been given is to each one (ἡ μετάληψις ἀπὸ τῶν εὐχαριστηθέντων ἑκάστῳ, γίνεται), and to those who are absent a portion is sent by the hands of the deacons (καὶ τοῖς οὐ παροῦσιν διὰ τῶν διακόνων πέμπεται). And they who are well-to-do and willing give each one as he wills, according to his discretion (κατὰ προαίρεσιν ἕκαστος τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ὃ βούλεται δίδωσι), and what is collected is deposited with the president, and he himself succours (ἐπικουρεῖ) the orphans and widows and those who are in want (λειπομένοις) through sickness or other cause, and those who are in bonds, and the strangers who are sojourning (τοῖς παρεπιδήμοις οὖσι ξένοις); and in a word he takes care of all who are in need. And we all have our common meeting (κοινῇ πάντες τὴν συνέλευσιν ποιούμεθα) on the Sunday because it is the First Day, on which God, having changed darkness and matter (τὸ σκότος καὶ τὴν ὕλην τρέψας) made the world, and Jesus Christ our Saviour on the same day rose from the dead. For they crucified him on the day before Saturday (τῇ πρὸ τῆς κρονικῆς) and on the day after Saturday, which is Sunday (ἥτις ἐστὶν ἡλίου ἡμέρα), having appeared to his apostles and disciples, he taught [them] those things which we have submitted to you also for your consideration.'

Besides this passage, we have those cited in § 2, which are some of them older than Justin's date.

3. "Sunday."

In the Græco-Roman world of the Empire, the day which was reckoned the first in the Jewish week was called Sunday, just as the other days of the week were named after the other planets; the nomenclature is of Babylonian origin (see WEEK). Sunday, too, is the name employed by two ancient Christian writers—in works, it is true, addressed

[1] Weizsäcker, Ap. Zeitalt.(2) 549.

[2] Cp Zahn, Gesch. des Sonntags, 179, who supposes that at least as early as the third decade of the second century the Sunday was marked by public worship at Jerusalem.

[3] Zahn, op. cit. 177.

[4] Before finally accepting or rejecting this conjecture, it will have to be considered whether weekly payments of wages were usual, and also which day of the week was reckoned as its first in the civil life of Corinth. Plainly Paul is reckoning by the Jewish week—from Sunday to Saturday; but Gentile astrologers began the week with Saturday (Zahn, 182, 358).

[1] Cp Harnack, TLZ 22 [1897] 77.

to non-Christians[1]—viz. by Justin (ut supr.), twice, and by Tertullian (Apol. 16, Ad nat. 1 13). Its naturalisation was made easier by the consideration that the first day of the week was the day on which light was created; and, moreover, the comparison of Christ to the sun was felt to be apposite.[2]

In the early church the name 'First day' (of Jewish origin, as we have seen) and also—since the day followed the Sabbath, or seventh day of the week—'Eighth day' is of frequent occurrence. The two names are often combined: 'The eighth day which is also the first.'[3]

4. 'First day,' 'Eighth day.'

Most characteristic of all, however, is the name 'Lord's day' (ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα; also simply, ἡ κυριακή[4] or ἡ κυριακὴ κυρίου). Usually[5] Rev. 1 10 (ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ) is cited as the earliest instance; but the presence of the article before κυριακῇ and the connection in which the phrase occurs both favour the other interpretation (supported by a weighty minority of scholars), according to which 'the day of the Lord' here stands for 'the day of Yahwè,' the day of judgment—in LXX ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ κυρίου (as also in Paul, and elsewhere), called elsewhere in Rev. 'the great day' (ἡ ἡμέρα ἡ μεγάλη: 6 17 16 14).

5. 'Lord's day.'

The following early passages, however, are undisputed; Didache 14, κατὰ κυριακὴν δὲ κυρίου συναχθέντες κλάσατε ἄρτον; Ev. Pet. 35, ἐπέφωσκεν ἡ κυριακή, and ib. 50, ὄρθρου δὲ τῆς κυριακῆς; Ign. ad. Magnes., 9 1, μηκέτι σαββατίζοντες ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακὴν ζῶντες, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ἡ ζωὴ ἡμῶν ἀνέτειλεν; and the title of the writing of Melito of Sardis (περὶ κυριακῆς) mentioned by Eusebius (HE iv. 26 2). Here 'Lord's Day' has become a technical name for Sunday. The word κυριακός, however, is not a new coinage of the Christians (more particularly of Paul), as used formerly to be supposed. It comes from the official language of the imperial period; frequent examples of its occurrence in the sense of 'imperial' are to be found in Egyptian inscriptions and papyri, and in inscriptions of Asia Minor.[6]

The question as to the reason why Christians called the first day of the week the Lord's day is not adequately answered by the remark of Holtzmann[7] that 'the expression is framed after the analogy of δεῖπνον κυριακόν.' The old Christian answer was that it was the Lord's Day as being the day of his resurrection; cp Ign. ad Magn. 9 1, as above, Justin, Apol. 1 67, as above, and Barnabas 15 9: 'Wherefore also we keep the eighth day with joyfulness, on which also Jesus rose from the dead, and, having been manifested, ascended into the heavens.'[8] This answer has much to be said for it. The Lord's day is the weekly recurring commemoration of the Lord's resurrection.

How it was that Christians came to celebrate this day weekly, not only yearly, has still to be explained. Apart from the established habit of observing the weekly Sabbath festival, the ancient practice of honouring particular days by feasts of monthly recurrence may very probably have contributed to this result. In Egypt, under Ptolemy Euergetes, according to an inscription coming from the Egyptian Ptolemais,[9] the twenty-fifth day of each month was called 'the king's day' (ἡ τοῦ βασιλέως ἡμέρα) because the twenty-fifth of Dios was the day 'on which he succeeded his father on the throne' (ἐν ᾗ παρέλαβεν τὴν βασιλείαν παρὰ τοῦ πατρός: Decree of Canopus, 1 5). The Christians might have held the same language in speaking of the first day of the week with reference to Christ.

6. Origin of a 'weekly celebration.'

[1] Zahn, Gesch. des Sonntags, 357. To make a distinction as Zahn does in the use of the name Sunday before and after Constantine is to go too far. The Christian inscriptions show that the 'pagan' names for the days of the week were already current among Christians before Constantine. Cp for example De Rossi, 1 615 (twice), and V. Schultze, Die Katakomben, 246, 1882.

Of like nature is the custom, widely diffused throughout the kingdoms of the successors of Alexander, of celebrating the birthday of the sovereign, not year by year only, but also month by month; the existence of the custom can be clearly made out from recent discoveries in epigraphy, and it is implied in the tradition—often assailed, but manifestly quite trustworthy—of 2 Macc. 6 7. Cp BIRTHDAY.[1]

Like so many other features in the kingdoms of the Diadochi, these birthday customs seem to have had an abiding influence within the imperial period.[2] The word 'Augustan' (Σεβαστή) as a name of a day in Asia Minor and Egypt is at least a reminiscence of the custom in question; the name, which first became known through inscriptions, has been discussed by H. Usener,[3] and after him by J. B. Lightfoot[4] and Th. Mommsen.[5] According to these scholars, in Asia Minor and Egypt the first day of each month was called Σεβαστή. Lightfoot regards this as at least 'probable in itself,' but finds that 'some of the facts are still unexplained.' Recently K. Buresch,[6] without reference to the scholars already mentioned, has revived an old conjecture of Waddington, that Σεβαστή is a day of the week, not a day of the month.

For this Buresch adduces two inscriptions from Ephesus and Kabala, and makes reference (in the opposite method to that of the present article) to the analogy of the Christian κυριακή. To his two inscriptions we may here add the Oxyrhynchus papyrus, 46, dating from 100 A.D. (ἔτους) γ Αὐτοκράτορος καίσαρος Νέρουα Τραιανοῦ Σεβαστοῦ Γερμανικοῦ Μεχειρ δ Σεβαστῇ: 'on the day of Sebaste, 4th Mechir of the third year of the . . . emperor Trajan.'

Without venturing on a confident judgment on a very difficult question, we might, on the evidence before us conjecture that Σεβαστή in some cases denotes a definite day of the month (the first ?), and in others, as for example in the inscriptions from Ephesus and Kabala as also in the Oxyrhynchus papyrus,[7] a week-day—viz. Thursday (dies Jovis).

If this conjecture is correct, then in the dies Jovis metamorphosed into a 'day of Augustus' we should have an analogy to the change of the dies Solis into the 'Lord's day.' As a name for a day of the month also Σεβαστή would have a value not to be overlooked as an analogy for κυριακή.[8]

At what date the name 'Lord's day' arose we do not know. Even if we assume Rev. 1 10 to refer to the Sunday, it would be rash to conclude[9] that κυριακή was not used before the time of Domitian.

LORD'S PRAYER. The Lord's Prayer is a significant example of the scantiness and incompleteness of Christian tradition. It is not to be found in the second gospel—i.e., in the oldest, as most scholars are agreed—(unless there is a trace of it in Mk. 11 25) nor in the fourth; and the two gospels which contain it, refer it to different occasions, and give it in varying forms. In Mt. it stands

LORD'S PRAYER

(6 9-13) as part of the 'Sermon on the Mount'; according to Lk. (11 2-4) it was given by Jesus at the request of a disciple, 'as he was praying in a certain place.' From the context in Lk. (10 38) it has been concluded that the locality was near or at Bethany or near Jerusalem, more precisely the garden of Gethsemane.[1] (Not far from the traditional site of Gethsemane on the slope of the Mount of Olives stands to-day the church of the Pater-noster, showing in the quadrangle the Lord's Prayer engraved on marble tablets in thirty-two languages.) Older harmonists used to combine the two reports by the suggestion that the disciple, who, if he was one of the twelve, must have been acquainted with the prayer as taught on the former occasion, expected some fuller or more particular form of prayer; or supposed that he was not of the Twelve, but one of the Seventy (τις τῶν μαθητῶν). Before this, Origen had explained the fact that in Lk. a shorter form is given than on the Mount by the remark εἰκός γε πρὸς μὲν τὸν μαθητὴν, ἅτε δὴ ὠφελημένον, εἰρηκέναι τὸν κύριον τὸ ἐπιτομώτερον, πρὸς δὲ τοὺς πλείονας, δεομένους τρανοτέρας διδασκαλίας, τὸ σαφέστερον (De Orat. 30 1; ed. Koetschau, 2 393). Modern exegesis finds in this difference a proof of twofold tradition, and is on the whole inclined to see in the place to which Lk. refers the prayer, the better tradition, the 'Sermon on the Mount' having received a later insertion. So, e.g., Arthur Wright (Some NT Problems, 26; The Composition of the Four Gospels, 75), who insists that in Mt. it breaks the parallelism of the context; and Geo. Heinrici.[2] According to Baljon (Comm. on Mt., Utrecht, 1900), Mt. seized the opportunity to bring the Lord's Prayer 'which he found in the Logia' into the 'Sermon on the Mount,' because Jesus was speaking there of praying. But it is quite impossible to say anything definite on the source or sources from which Lk. and Mt. took the piece. Even the hapax legomenon ἐπιούσιος, which is common to both texts, does not prove unity of source, or that Greek was the language of that source. It is just as possible that Mt. had the Lord's Prayer before him (written or oral) in Aramaic or Hebrew, and gave it himself in one of these Semitic dialects, and that only the Greek wording of the First Gospel was influenced by the language of the Third Gospel.[3]

According to Lk., the disciple asked 'Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples.' That the disciples of John were addicted not only to much fasting (Mt. 9 14 Mk. 2 18), but to much praying,[4] Lk. alone tells us (5 33). To add fresh petitions on particular subjects to received forms of prayer, is but natural in all times; certain rabbis (R. Eliezer and R. Johanan) are specially mentioned as having done this.[5] In this way the Baptist may have added to the prayers then in use among the Jews some special prayer, and may have taught it his disciples. Such an apocryphal prayer is found in Syriac MSS, whether also in Greek and Latin the present writer does not know.[6]

[6] The prayer 'which John taught his disciples' reads thus in the Syriac Bodleian MS, Pococke, 10:

'God make us (or me) worthy of thy kingdom and to rejoice in it;
God show me the baptism of thy Son.'

Zotenberg's catalogues of the Syriac MSS in Paris mention a prayer of John (whether identical with the preceding or not) in MS 13 [20] (after the canticle of Zacharias, Lk. 2 19-32) and iii. [3], among some prayers for the canonical hours (232 [5 b] in Syriac or Carshuni).

2. Wording.

Not only as to the occasion but also as to the text of the Lord's Prayer, there is a twofold tradition. That of Mt. became the form which passed into general use; that of Lk. suffered alteration even in the MSS of this Gospel.

(a) In Mt. the modern critical editions offer hardly any variation. The form ἐλθέτω of TR instead of ἐλθάτω is retained by Alford and Weiss, by Weiss also the article τῆς before γῆς; but ἀφίεμεν of the TR is generally given up for ἀφήκαμεν. On the doxology, see the revisers' marginal note, and the notes of WH, pp. 8-10. WH gave it a place among the 'Noteworthy Rejected Readings,' Weiss at the foot of his page.

The critical apparatus may be supplemented by the following remarks:—

(1) In the Apostolic Constitutions the Bodl. MS misc. græc. 204 (= Auct. T. 2 4—on its recovery see TLZ, 1899, col. 207) has 3 18, παραπτώματα, καθώς, omits ἀφίεμεν, and closes: ὅτι σοῦ ἐστιν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος νῦν καὶ ἀεὶ καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων· ἀμήν. See on this form of the doxology the embolism of the extant Greek liturgies (Brightman, 60, 446, 460).

(2) For ἐπὶ γῆς or ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, cp E. Miller's Textual Commentary on the Gospels, I., for Clement, Barnard (TS 5 5); the new edition of Origen is divided: τῆς is found ii. 340 16, where the Lord's Prayer is quoted in full, 360 18 363 8; in other passages it is omitted. The Curetonian Syriac has the plural for 'thy will.'

(3) The Sinai codices of the Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum (ed. Lewis-Gibson) witness to καὶ ἐλθ.; so does the Lewis-Palimpsest of syr[vt], which breaks off after this word. Cp the additional note of Burkitt in WH (impression of 1896), who refers to the Syriac Acts of Thomas (ed. W. Wright, 313), where the Lord's Prayer is given in full from syr[vt] without doxology. That the copyist of k (Codex Bobiensis) was so little acquainted with Christianity that he was able to write veni ad regnum tuum is justly pointed out by Burkitt (Cambridge University Reporter, 5th March, 1900).

(4) In the Syriac MS Pococke, 10 (see above [§ 1 n. 64]), on the margin is written ܘܚܛܗܝܢ 'and our sins,' as to be inserted after 'our debts.' This is also the reading in the Acts of Thomas, 313.

(5) Special mention has to be made of the Didachè, which offers at the opening ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ (ἐλθέτω), τὴν ὀφειλὴν ἡμῶν, (ἀφίεμεν), ὅτι σοῦ ἐστιν ἡ δύναμις καὶ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας. On the word ὀφειλή, cp G. A. Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, 48 (= Bible Studies, 1901), and compare with this singular, the similar singular 'unsere Schuld' for 'unsere Schulden' in certain recensions of Luther's Catechism, and in Dutch, where 'Schulden' are money-debts (Baljon, Comm. 94).

(b) In Lk. the text suffered much in MSS and editions by assimilation to that of Mt. In TR it differed from Mt. only by δίδου ἡμῖν τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν, τὰς ἁμαρτίας, καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ ἀφίεμεν παντὶ ὀφείλοντι ἡμῖν, and the omission of the doxology. The critical editions have shown that the invocation in Lk. is only πάτερ, and that the third and seventh petitions are totally absent. In the rest, there is full agreement, though Weiss again writes ἐλθέτω with TR. All prefer ἀφίομεν to the ἀφίεμεν of the TR.

There is one very interesting variant treated at length in the apparatus of WH: ἐλθέτω τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμά σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς καὶ καθαρισάτω ἡμᾶς. To supplement the remark of WH (repeated in 1896) that no other record of this singular reading is extant (besides the explicit testimony of Greg. Nyss., Maximus Confessor, and Tertullian), it should be noted that cod. evang. min. 604 (= 700 in the list of Gregory = Egerton 2610, in the British Museum) has this very reading in the text of Lk. (see H. A. C. Hoskier, A full account and collation of the Greek Cursive Codex Evangelium, 604 [1890], who gives a photographic reproduction of the passage, and Chase, 24). Whether in the reading ἐφ' ἡμᾶς which is added in cod. D and various forms of the second petition,[1] a trace of this Marcionitic reading is extant, may be doubted. Marcion wrote further τὸν ἄρτον σου τὸν ἐπιούσιον, perhaps τὰς ἁμαρτίας instead of τὰ ὀφειλήματα (on the second clause there is no testimony extant), and put μὴ ἄφες ἡμᾶς εἰσενεχθῆναι, a dogmatic alteration, which (independently, it would seem) appears also in Latin in Cyprian (De Or. c. 25), in Latin MSS of the Gospels (see Chase, p. 62 ff.), and in several settings of the Liturgy, as 'suffer us not to be led' or 'let us not be led into temptation.'[2]

[1] In German, 'zu uns komme dein Reich,' or 'zukomme uns dein Reich.' In the so-called Bishops' Book, 'thy kingdom come unto us.'

[2] See Chase, who quotes the so-called King's Book of 1593, and W. H. Frere, 'Edwardine Vernacular Services,' in Journ. Th. Studies, Jan. 1900, p. 242.

In a passage like the Lord's Prayer, every minute detail such as numbering and arrangement and even orthography deserves careful attention.

3. Numbering and arrangement.

Augustine (Enchirid. 116) remarks 'Lucas in oratione dominica petitiones non septem sed quinque complexus est.' The number seven became thenceforth traditional in the Roman Catholic and the Lutheran Church. But the same Augustine argued: 'quod ille (Mt.) in ultima posuit: libera nos a malo, iste (Lk.) non posuit, ut intelligeremus ad illud superius quod de tentatione dictum est pertinere.' In accordance with this view, Origen and Chrysostom counted six petitions; they are followed by the reformed churches. WH print the Lord's Prayer in Mt. in 2×3 stichi, in Lk. without strophic arrangement. Wordsworth-White make, in their Latin NT, of Pater-nomen tuum one stichus, of et ne inducas and sed libera two. Hetzenauer's reprint of the Vulgate puts a full stop after every petition, therefore also: 'tentationem. Sed.' In the Greek text Weiss places a colon only after γῆς, WH after γῆς, σήμερον, and ἡμῶν, while Brightman (Liturgies) omits all punctuations in the second half, and separates the first half by commas. AV, RV, and Prayerbook need hardly be quoted. The division and arrangement of WH prove the best.

No attempt can be made here to give an exhaustive explanation of this 'Breviarium totius evangelii' as Tertullian styled it, or 'Cœlestis doctrinæ compendium,' as Cyprian called it.

4. Meaning.

'Oratio hæc,' said Tertullian, 'quantum substringitur verbis, tantum diffunditur sensibus.' Some philological remarks, however, are necessary.

(1) The exordium.—'The abrupt πάτερ,' says A. Wright (Gospel of Luke [1900], 103), 'is softened down in St. Matthew by an editorial addition which in identical or equivalent terms occurs in Mt. 5 16 45 etc. (19 times); only once in St. Mark (11 25); not at all in St. Luke'; but see Lk. 11 13. 'In the West there is evidence that the abruptness was eased by prefixing the original Aramaic abba (not abbun, 'our father'). So Rom. 8 15 Gal. 4 6 (Mk. 14 36).' It is better to say that the Aramaic original 'Abba' was preserved even in Greek surroundings, but explained by the addition of the translation ὁ πατήρ (as in Mk. 5 41, ταλιθα through τὸ κοράσιον).

That not only the isolated πάτερ of Lk., but also πάτερ ἡμῶν of Mt. can correspond to אַבָּא is sufficiently shown by Dalman, Worte Jesu, 157, though for a prayer the more solemn אָבִינוּ (in Hebrew), אֲבוּנָא (Aramaic), אֲבוּנַן (Galilean), seems to Dalman more probable. For the isolated πάτερ or ὁ πατήρ cp Mt. 11 26 Mk. 14 36 Lk. 22 42 with Mt. 26 39 42 Lk. (15 12 18 21) 23 34 46 Jn. 11 41 12 27 f. 17 1 5 21 24 (with 10 25) or Clem. i. ad Cor. 8 3: ἐὰν ἐπιστράφητε πρὸς μὲ ἐξ ὅλης τῆς καρδίας καὶ εἴπητε Πάτερ, ἐπακούσομαι ὑμῶν, the Syriac translation has here אבון (our father).

That the imperative forms ἁγιασθήτω and γενηθήτω may be used for the optative, εὐκτικῶς not strictly προστακτικῶς, is shown by Origen (De Or. 24 5, ed. Koetschau, 2 355 f.) with reference to some remarks of Tatian on γενηθήτω in Gen. 1 3.

On the use of the passive aorist of this verb instead of the middle see Blass, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch, § 20, 1). (In Gen. 1 3 γενηθήτω of LXX gives place in Aquila and Longinus (de Sublimi) to γενέσθω, in Symmachus to ἔστω, in the Oracula Sibyllina, 1, 9, to γεινάσθω.) On the Semitic original presupposed by γενηθήτω, see below, § 5 [4].

(2) ἐπιούσιος. The remark of Origen,[1] that the word is not found elsewhere in Greek, is still true despite the recent increase of Greek literature through the newly discovered papyri; on its meaning, therefore, tradition must be heard, and the question settled, if possible, by philological reasons.

(a) The oldest tradition seems to be that represented in syr^{vt} (cur., sin. and Acts of Thomas) by לחמא (or לחמן) אמינא, (our) constant, continual bread.

[1] The passage is important, and deserves study (De Orat. 27 7 = Koetschau, 2 366 f.).

LORD'S PRAYER

This אמין is, in the Pesh. of the OT, the regular rendering for Heb. תָּמִיד; see especially Nu. 4 7, לֶחֶם הַתָּמִיד ('continual bread' EV), and it is a strange coincidence, that not only the Armenian version of 2 Macc. translated 1 8 (προεθήκαμεν τοὺς ἄρτους) by the same word as in NT τὸν ἄρτον ἡμῶν τὸν ἐπιούσιον[1] but also the mediæval Jew, Shemtob ben Shaphrut, to whom is due the Hebrew translation of the Gospel of Matthew, published in the 16th century by Münster and Mercier, and republished in 1879 by Ad. Herbst,[2] hit upon the corresponding Hebrew word תמיד, translating את לחמנו תמידי תן לנו היום. He even formed from תמיד an adjective תמידי, which in biblical Hebrew is as unheard of as ἐπιούσιος in Greek from ἐπιοῦσα. T. R. Crowfoot, Observations on . . . Cureton Syriac Fragments (1872, p. 10), and C. Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers (1877, p. 141), seem to have had no knowledge of this mediæval predecessor when they proposed תָּמִיד as original for ἐπιούσιον.

(b) The same tradition seems represented in the West by the old Latin 'cotidianus' and the Gothic 'hlaif unsarana thana sinteinan' (cp the same word in 2 Cor. 11 28 = καθ' ἡμέραν and the adv., sinteino for διὰ παντός, πάντοτε, ἀεί) and the Old German emissigaz (Vaterunser of Weissenburg).

(c) With the 'venientem' of the Sahidic version is to be compared Cyril (Luc. 265), οἱ μὲν εἶναί φασι τὸν ἥξοντά τε καὶ δοθησόμενον κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τὸν μέλλοντα, while he himself explained: ὅτι τῆς ἐφημέρου τροφῆς ποιοῦνται τὴν αἴτησιν ὡς ἀκτήμονες δηλονότι· ἐπιούσιον τὸν αὐτάρκη διανοεῖσθαι χρή. The Coptic has crastinum.

(d) The Peshitta has 'the bread of our need,' and is followed by the later Syriac translation of Polycarp and Thomas of Heraclea, who formed the rare adjective ܡܣܢܩܢܝܐ 'our needy bread.' The Palestinian, translating 'our bread of richness,' took ἐπιούσιος in the sense of περιούσιος.

(e) Jerome tried the word supersubstantialis, 'substantivus' or 'superventurus'; Victorinus, 'consubstantialis.' [Hence J. B. Jona in his Hebrew version of the Gospels (Romae, MDCLXVIII) even gives לַחְמֵנוּ עַל־הַקִּיּוּם.]

(f) It would be of the highest importance to be assured of the accuracy of Jerome's repeated statement that the 'Gospel of the Hebrews,' which he identified at times with the Semitic original of Matthew, had māḥār (מָחָר). Two views are possible. The one is that this māḥār is a translation from the Greek, resting on etymology; if this be so, the explanation has no more value than any other. The other is that this māḥār represents the Jewish-Christian form of prayer of 400 A.D. (or thereabouts), which was also known about 60-65 A.D. in Jerusalem, Kokaba, Berœa.

For the latter view strong reasons are given, especially by Th. Zahn, Geschichte des Kanons, 2 693 709; Einl. 2 312; for the former see R. H. Kennett in A. Wright's Gospel of S. Luke, 102. It is true, לַחְמֵנוּ (לְ)מָחָר sounds a little strange in Hebrew, and so indeed does the Aramaic לַחְמָנָא דִי מְחָר; but it is so in other languages also, and there are philological reasons which strengthen this tradition.[3]

On this side of the question see Winer-Schmiedel, Gramm. § 16 n. 23, and the literature there mentioned. Origen's view that the word comes from ἐπί and οὐσία, or from ἐπί and εἶναι, is less likely than the other, that it is derived from ἐπ-ιέναι, more especially from ἡ ἐπιοῦσα, sc. ἡμέρα, the following day. If we compare James 2 15, τῆς ἐφημέρου τροφῆς, the way of the RV seems the best,—to leave 'our daily bread' in the text and to remark that literally it means 'our bread for the coming day.'

Comparing Prov. 30 8 לֶחֶם חֻקִּי (AV 'food convenient for me,' mg. 'of my allowance'; RV 'food that is needful for me,' mg. 'Heb. the bread of my portion'), Del., Salk.-Gi., Resch translate לֶחֶם חֻקֵּנוּ; Rönsch (like the Palestinian version), לֶחֶם סְגֻלָּתֵנוּ; Taylor (like the old

[1] This is the origin of the statement in H-P, on 2 Macc. 1 8, 'tres codices Sergii' ἄρτους ἐπιουσίους, to which Deissmann (Neue Bibelstudien, 41) and Hilgenfeld (ZWT, '99, p. 157) called attention.

[2] On this edition see the present writer's review, Lit. Centralblatt, 1880, no. 11.

[3] See also Jerome's Comm. on Mt. 6 (Vallarsi, 7 34), the Anecdota Maredsolana, ed. Morin, III. 2 (1896) 262, where the most definite statement occurs:—'In Hebraico evangelio secundum Matthæum ita habet: Panem nostrum crastinum da nobis hodie.'

Syriac and Shemtob), לחמא חרירא or לחם חמיר. Arnold Meyer (Muttersprache Jesu, 1896) thinks of Aramaic מִסַּת, 'sufficient.' Chase's conclusion is that the original may simply have been 'Give us our (or 'the') bread of the day.' M. Schultze (Gramm. der aram. Muttersprache Jesu, 1899, § 113) gives laḥma di ṣork-ána and צָרְכֵּנוּ is given by 'the last reviser of the last version of the Hebrew NT' quoted by M. Margoliouth, who finds this 'utterly inconceivable,' proceeding 'from a sheer mania for alteration.' That it refers to the needs of common life and must not be taken allegorically (as Marcion and many since his time have taken it) is now almost universally admitted.

(3) πονηροῦ; malo. Whether this be masculine or neuter, cannot in Hebrew, Aramaic, or Syriac be decided from the form alone. For the Greek NT see the exhaustive investigation of Chase. Shemtob translated מכל רע (changed in the edition of S. Münster). There is an early allusion to this meaning in the Didaché (10 5), μνήσθητι, κύριε, τῆς ἐκκλησίας σου, ῥύσασθαι αὐτὴν ἀπὸ παντὸς πονηροῦ. The Ethiopic, too (see Brightman, Liturgies, 234), has 'Deliver us and rescue us from all evil.' The same combination of the two verbs by which in the Peshitta ῥῦσαι is rendered (Mt.) ܦܪܘܩ and (Lk.) ܦܨܐ, is found in the Nestorian Liturgy (Brightman, 296), 'Save and deliver us from the evil one and his hosts.' Taylor (Sayings, 142 ff.) writes 'The original form of the petition can scarcely have been ותצילנו מן הרע'; but may it not have been ותצילנו מיצר הרע? On the יצר רע or י׳ הרע, see Taylor's note. It seems on the whole the most probable view to take it as masculine. The Arabic text published by Mrs. M. D. Gibson (Studia Sinaitica, 7 14, has 'from the Satan' and adds κύριε after 'temptation'; cp on the latter addition, Brightman, Liturgies, 469, l. 54.

(4) For the doxology, cp not only 1 Ch. 29 11, but also Dan. 2 37 1 Esd. 4 38 40 and the Prayer of Manasseh (end). The earliest quotations are in Polycarp, ad Philipp. 6 and 7.

In former times Grotius (especially), and, later, Wetstein expressed the view that the Lord's Prayer was a combination of Jewish prayers 'ex formulis Hebræorum concinnata.' Others went further, and maintained that the Lord's Prayer consisted of the beginnings of prayers, singled out by Jesus as suitable for his followers. Still more extravagant statements, as that Jesus had gathered the Lord's Prayer out of the Zendavesta, need not detain us (see PRE(2) 4 768). On the other hand, Dr. M. Margoliouth in 1876 endeavoured to show that the Jewish Liturgy never contained anything so glorious, so august, and so comprehensive. His work, entitled The Lord's Prayer no Adaptation of existing Jewish Prayers, is, however, rather rhetorical than historical and critical in character. The truth is that we may say of the Lord's Prayer—applying what Theodore Zahn lately wrote (Forschungen, 6 [1900] 153) of the teaching of Jesus as a whole—that Jesus uttered things which were said almost literally by Jewish teachers before and after him. On the other hand, 'duo si faciunt idem, non est idem'; and even if for the separate parts, words, thoughts of the Lord's Prayer parallels can be adduced from Jewish sources, as a whole this prayer remains unique. Moreover, it is difficult to be certain of the exact age of the parallels adduced. The Jewish Liturgy has had a complicated history, if we mention only the most famous pieces of it,[1] the Shĕma', the Shĕmōnēh 'Eśrēh, the Ḳaddīsh, the Ābīnū Malkēnū,

5. Connection with Jewish Prayers.

[1] On the Shĕma' and Shĕmōnēh 'Eśrēh see Schürer, GVI 3 2 459 ff.; Dalman, Worte Jesu, 299 (for literature, see p. 301); Hamburger (Real Encycl. 2 11; 'Abendgebet,' 11; 'Kaddisch,' 603 ff.; 'Morgengebet,' 802 ff.; 'Mussafgebet,' 815 f.; 'Schema,' 1087 ff.; 'Schemone-Esre,' 1092 ff.; 'Abinu Malkenu,' in Suppl. II. ['91, pp. 1 ff.]); Schechter, 'Some Rabbinic Parallels to the NT,' in JQR, Apr. 1900, p. 429.

and since Christian scholars are (apart from Dalman) behindhand in thorough and critical study of documents (cp PRAYER), it seems best to restrict ourselves to some of the most remarkable and indisputable Jewish parallels.

For OT parallels see the Bible (RV) with marginal references, Dittmar, Vetus Testamentum in Novo (1899), and Hühn, Die alttestamentlichen Citate und Reminiscenzen im Neuen Testamente [1900] (Part II. of 'Die Messianischen Weissagungen').

(1) Exordium: πάτερ, or πάτερ ἡμῶν ὁ ἐν οὐρανοῖς. It is the Jewish custom to add שֶׁ(בַּ)שָּׁמַיִם, דְּבִשְׁמַיָּא, '(who) is in heaven' to אב where it is used of God; but in prayer, even among Jews the isolated אבינו is not unusual. The fundamental passage for the designation of God as Father is Ex. 4 22. (Cp FATHER.)

For Shĕmōnēh 'Eśrēh, cp 4 and 6 in both recensions (the Palestinian detected by Schechter among the MSS from the Gĕnīzah of Cairo and published in JQR 10 [1898], pp. 654-9; reprinted at the end of Dalman's Die Worte Jesu, I., 299, and, in the Babylonian, Dalman, 301 ff.), חָנֵּנוּ אָבִינוּ דֵּעָה מֵאִתָּךְ and סְלַח לָנוּ אָבִינוּ, and in the Babylonian form הֲשִׁיבֵנוּ אָבִינוּ לְתוֹרָתֶךָ, where the Palestinian has השיבנו י׳ אֵלֶיךָ. On the אָבִינוּ מַלְכֵּנוּ (the prayer for New Year and Day of Atonement) see Hamburger, l.c. Suppl. II. 1; on אַב הָרַחֲמִים, 'Father of mercies' (2 Cor. 1 3; Bĕrākhōth 8) and אָבִינוּ אַב הָרַחֲמִים (in the prayer before the Shema), Hamburger, I. 8. In the Ḳaddīsh קֳדָם אֲבוּנָא דְבִשְׁמַיָּא, for which the Ḳaddīsh de Rabbanan has ק׳ מֵימְרָא דִשְׁמַיָּא וְאַרְעָא, 'before the word of heaven and earth,' and another recension, מָרֵא שׁ׳ וא׳, 'the Lord of heaven and earth,' Dalman, 305. In Aramaic, אֲבוּנַן דְבִשְׁמַיָּא occurs as introduction to the recital of Ex. 15; see ZDMG 54 116.

(2) ἁγιασθήτω, comp. in Shĕmōnēh 'Eśrēh, 3, קָדוֹשׁ אַתָּא וְנוֹרָא שְׁמֶךָ, in the Babyl. recension with transposition אַתָּה קָדוֹשׁ וְשִׁמְךָ קָדוֹשׁ and the sequel וּקְדוֹשִׁים בְּכָל־יוֹם יְהַלְלוּךָ סֶלָה for וְאֵין אֱלוֹהַּ מִבַּלְעָדֶיךָ; further Bab. 18, יְהַלְלוּ אֶת־שִׁמְךָ הַגָּדוֹל.

The divine name occurs further in Bab. 1 (למען שמו, 'for his name's sake') 13 הבוטחים בשמך, 'that trust in thy name'; in thy name we trust. The Ḳaddīsh begins: יִתְגַּדַּל וְיִתְקַדַּשׁ שְׁמֵיהּ רַבָּא בְּעָלְמָא, 'magnified and hallowed be his great name in the world'; afterwards, eight more such verbs are placed together referring to 'the name of holiness, blessed be he (or it)': יתברך ישתבח ויתפאר ויתרומם ויתעלה ויתהלל ויתנשא שמיה דקדשא בריך הוא, 'blessed, praised, and beautified, and extolled, and elevated, and glorified, and lifted up, be the name of holiness, blessed be he.' 'Any benediction which is without mention of haššēm (i.e., יהוה) is no benediction at all'; b. Bĕrākhōth, 40*b*.

(3) ἐλθάτω. Any benediction (cp the preceding) which is without Malkūth is no benediction at all: b. Bĕrākhōth, 40*b*.

Shĕmōnēh 11 [Bab. adds מְהֵרָה] וּמְלוֹךְ עָלֵינוּ אַתָּא לְבַדֶּךָ, 'and be king over us (quickly)—thou alone' (opposed to [12] מַלְכוּת זָדוֹן, 'the kingdom of pride'); cp no. 14, מלכות בית דוד משיח צדקך, 17 (variant כי מלך אל טוב ומטיב אתא).

Ḳaddīsh, יַמְלִיךְ מַלְכוּתֵיהּ, 'may his kingdom reign'; but read with Dalman יִמְלֹךְ, 'may he make it reign'; the Ḳaddīsh de-Rabbanan adds (in one recension, ביקריה), 'in his glory,' and connects it with the kingdom of his Messiah.

(4) γενηθήτω. Whether in Hebrew יֵעָשֶׂה or יְהִי be the better translation, can be doubted. Shemtob, Del., Salk.-Gi., and Resch adopted יֵעָשֶׂה; M. Margoliouth preferred יְהִי, the reading of the previous Hebrew version which comes to us from Dr. M. S. Alexander (the first Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem), Dr. S. M'Caul, and Stanislaus Hoga; the Syrian versions have הוא, with the exception of the Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum, which, in accordance with its usual diction, has יתעבר.

In Jewish prayers there seems to be no exact parallel; but cp Bĕrākhōth, 29*b*, where Rabbi Eliezer answers the request for a short prayer by saying עשה רצונך בשמים ממעל וג׳, 'Do thy will in heaven above' (Taylor, Sayings, 139, Hamburger, 1098 n. 6), and Bĕrākhōth, 16*b*, יהי רצון מלפניך י׳ אלהינו שתשים שלום, 'May it be thy will, O Lord, our God, to make peace in the family above and in the family below.' In Shĕmōnēh 'Eśrēh, cp 13, עם עושי רצונך, 'with those who do thy will' and 16, רְצֵה י' אלהינו, 'be pleased O Lord our God'; in the Babyl. recension 16 תקבל ברצון ותהיה לרצון תמיד עברת ישראל עמך ותְרַצֵּינוּ. In the Kaddīsh תתקבל צלותכון ותתעביד בעותכון, 'may your prayer be accepted and may your petition be done.'

(5) τὸν ἄρτον. No exact parallel in Jewish prayers. There is a petition for blessing of the year in Shĕmōnēh 'Esreh 9, in Hăbīnēnū and elsewhere, and the saying of R. Eliezer haggādōl (circa 40-120 A.D.), 'Whosoever has a bit of bread in his basket and says, What shall I eat to-morrow? must be reckoned among those of little faith' (Sōṭā, 48*b*).

On the different translations of ἐπιούσιος, see above, § 4 (2).

(6) καὶ ἄφες. Shĕmōnēh 6, סְלַח לָנוּ אָבִינוּ כִּי חָטָאנוּ לָךְ מְחֵה [וְהַעֲבֵר] פְּשָׁעֵינוּ, in the Babyl. recens. 16 [חוּס] וְרַחֵם עָלֵינוּ; also in Hăbīnēnū. τὰ ὀφειλήματα (expression from business-life) is more = חובותֵינוּ (Del., Marg.; also Shemtob, who renders ὀφειλέταις ἡμῶν, לבעלי חובותינו) than = אַשְׁמָתֵנוּ (Salkinson-Ginsburg, Resch).

(7) εἰς πειρασμόν. Shemtob, Del., לִידֵי נִסָּיוֹן; Salk.-Gi., Resch, לִידֵי מַסָּה; the reviser, rightly challenged by M. Margoliouth (p. 95), לְמַסָּה; Münster, בְּנִסָּיוֹן for Shemtob's לידי נ'.

The expression ואל תביאנו . . . לידי נסיון occurs in the Jewish morning prayer (cp Bĕrākhōth, 60*b*, Margoliouth, 98, Taylor, 142 f.); but this prayer seems to betray a later origin than the Lord's Prayer: ויהי רצון מלפניך . . . ואל תביאנו לא לידי חטא ולא לידי עברה ולא לידי נסיון ולא לידי בזיון ואל תשלט בנו יצר הרע.

(8) ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ. In the prayer which Rabbi used to say after the usual prayer according to Bĕrākhōth, 16*b*, he mentions, among the evils from which he desires to be delivered, after אדם רע ומפגע רע מיצר רע מחבר רע משכן רע, also ומשטן המשחית, 'and from Satan the Destroyer' (Taylor, 142 f.).

(9) All the expressions of the Doxology occur in Jewish prayers גְּבוּרָה, עֹז, שָׁלְטָן, יְקָר, זִיו.

6. Literature. Among early commentaries, see those of Origen (vol. ii., ed. by Koetschau) and Cyprian; among modern treatises that of Kamphausen (1866), F. H. Chase's The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church (Texts and Studies, 3 [1891]), where too the literature is duly noted, C. W. Stubbs, The Social Teaching of the Lord's Prayer (1900).

A portion of the Lord's Prayer, from a clay tablet of about the fourth century, A.D. found at Megara and now in the National Museum at Athens, has been published lately by R. Knopf (Mittheil. des Kais. Deutsch. Arch. Instituts: Athenische Abtheilung, xxv. 4 [1900] 313-324). The tablet is broken, but ends ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ. Then follows κύριε and the monogram of Christ ⳩. LORD'S SUPPER. See EUCHARIST.

LO-RUHAMAH (לֹא רֻחָמָה, § 23, 'unpitied'; ΟΥΚ ΗΛΕΗΜΕΝΗ [BAQ], cp לֹא נֻחָמָה, Is. 54 11), and LO-AMMI (לֹא עַמִּי, 'not my people'; ΟΥ ΛΑΟϹ ΜΟΥ [BAQ]), symbolical names given to Hosea's daughter and son, to signify that Yahwè would cease to have mercy upon the house of Israel, and that they were no more his people, nor he their God (Hos. 1 6-9; see Rom. 9 25 1 Pet. 2 10). Cp HOSEA, § 6, JEZREEL, § 1, col. 2459.

The antithesis comes at the close of the prophecy in chap. 2 21 ff. [23 ff.] (to which probably 1 10-2 1 [2 1-3] is to be appended), 'In that day . . . I will pity (רִחַמְתִּי) Lo-ruhamah, and to Lo-ammi I will say "Thou art my people"' (2 23 [25]) . . . 'Say ye unto your brethren Ammi (my people) and to your sisters Ruhamah (pitied)' 2 1 [3]. Zech. 13 9 is not the only parallel. If 'Ariel' in Is. 29 1 2 7 should rather be 'Jerahmeel' (cp 2 S. 5 6 8, where the true text, the present writer thinks, spoke of Jebusites and Jerahmeelites as the inhabitants of old Jerusalem), we get a close parallel to Hosea; for v. 2*b*β should in this case run, 'and it shall become Lo-jerahmeel—i.e., 'on whom God hath no pity.' See Crit. Bib. T. K. C.

LOT (גּוֹרָל), Josh. 18 6. See DIVINATION, § 2 (iv.), EPHOD, URIM AND THUMMIM.

LOT (לוֹט, λωτ), a righteous man, who by the divine favour escaped from the catastrophe which befel the wicked city of Sodom (Gen. 19 1-29); he is also said to have been brother's son to Abraham, whom he accompanied from his fatherland (12 4 f.), but from whom he parted at length owing to disputes between their shepherds, and to have been allowed by his generous uncle to choose the Jordan valley for himself and his flocks (13 5-12); a later tradition says that Abraham made a successful expedition to rescue Lot who had been taken captive by Chedorlaomer and the allied kings (14 12 14 16). It should be noticed here that the story in 12 10-20 is probably one of the later insertions in J; hence the otherwise surprising circumstance that no mention is made in it of Lot. The words 'and Lot with him' are an editorial correction (cp Oxf. Hex.). The Moabites and Ammonites are called by two writers the b'ne Lot (EV 'children of Lot'), Dt. 2 9 19 Ps. 83 9 [8]; a legendary account of their origin is given in Gen. 19 30-38 (cp AMMON, MOAB).

1. Double tradition.

In the latter story the progenitor of Ammon and Moab appears as dwelling 'in the cave'; or, more precisely, two parallel statements are made in vv. 30*a* and 30*b*, 'he dwelt in the mountain (בָּהָר) and 'he dwelt in the cave' (בַּמְּעָרָה). Hence the question arises whether 'in the cave' may not be a gloss on 'in the mountain' (so Di.), or rather perhaps on בְּחֹר, 'in a cave,' הר being altered into חר to suit a change in the context.

It would be somewhat hard to deny that the story in Gen. 19 30-38 was interwoven with the story of the destruction of Sodom by a later hand. It was not one of the really popular Hebrew legends, and contrasts as strongly with the previous honourable mention of Lot as the story of Noah's drunkenness (Gen. 9 21 ff.) contrasts with that of the reward of his righteousness.

2. Identification. The primary Lot (Gen. 19 30-38) was presumably represented as a Horite; he is identical with Lotan, who was the eldest of the sons of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36 20), and was himself the father of a son called Hori (v. 22). The secondary Lot (the kinsman of Abraham) may, or rather must, once have had another name, and very possibly (cp the probable supersession of ENOCH [q.v.] in the Hebrew Deluge-story by Noah) an error of a very early scribe lies at the foundation of the change. In Gen. 11 27 (P) the father of Lot is said to have been Haran (הָרָן). Now HARAN [q.v.] can only be explained as a variation of Ḥaran (חָרָן), or rather Ḥauran (חורן). See JACOB, § 3. The narrative of J in its original form possibly spoke of Hauran as accompanying Abraham from their common fatherland; חורן would easily be miswritten חורי, Hori, and חורי be considered a synonym for Lotan, or Lot, the Horite. It would then become natural to attach the story of the origin of Moab and Ammon to the person of the righteous survivor of Sodom and kinsman of Abraham. But the real ancestor, according to legend, of Moab and Ammon was, not Hauran the Hebrew, but Lot the Horite. (Of course, the story in Gen. 19 30-38 is neither of Moabitish and Ammonitish nor of primitive Hebrew origin; it is an artificial product, except in the one point of the tracing of the Moabites and Ammonites to Lot the Horite, which is due to misunderstanding.)

3. Origin of name. The secondary Lot is but a double of Abraham. Doubtless he shows differences from Abraham, which mar the portrait; but these are due to the unfavourable circumstances in which the biographer places Lot, and only prove that the narrator could not triumph over such great obstacles. Lot has therefore made but a slight mark on Hebrew literature (Dt. 2 9 19 and Ps. 83 9 [8] are both late). A reference is made in Lk. 17 29 32 both to Lot and to his wife, which remains morally effective even if the 'pillar of salt' (Gen. 19 26) is an accretion on the original story (see SODOM). His function is to confirm the belief that the ancestors of the Hebrews were not wild, self-seeking warriors, but men of piety and righteousness (cp 2 Pet. 2 7 f.). Of the character of the primary Lot, who alone has a right to the name, we have no trustworthy information. His name, however, is significant; it comes from 'to take a stranger into the family' (Ar. lāṭa in viii.).

Winckler supports this by a quotation from Ibn Hišām (63 f.) relative to a man who was belated on a certain occasion, provided with a wife by his friend, and adopted into the friend's family (iltāṭa-hu); in this way he became his friend's brother. Applying this key to the Lot of Gen. 19 30-38, and the Lotan of Gen. 36 20 29, we may suppose that a pre-Edomitish tribe was admitted into union with the Edomites. The name of Lotan's sister is TIMNA [q.v.], and in 36 12 Timna is the name of the concubine of Eliphaz, son of Esau or Edom. The cases appear to be analogous. On Gen. 14 12 cp SODOM AND GOMORRAH, and on 13 10 f. PARADISE, § 6, end.

LOTUS TREES (צֶאֱלִים), mentioned in Job 40 21 f., RV, as a favourite covert of the BEHEMOTH or HIPPOPOTAMUS (AV 'shady trees'; cp Ges. Thes.; παντοδαπα δενδρα and δενδρα μεγαλα [BℵA]). RV's rendering is doubtless correct. The cognate Arabic ḍāl[1] is the dōm-tree, a thorny shrub, sometimes attaining considerable height, a wild species of the sidr (Rhamnus spina Christi [Linn.], cp Lane, s.v. ḍāl, sidr). This prickly lotus (according to Volck, the L. silvestris) is the L. Zizyphus, a native of N. Africa and S. Europe, and is to be kept distinct from the water-lilies, L. Nymphæa (of Egypt) and L. Nelumbo (of India and China), which repeatedly occur as a motif in Egyptian and oriental mythology and art.[2] See Wetz. ap. Del. ad loc.

LOVE FEASTS (αγαπαι), Jude v. 12 RV; AV 'feasts of charity.' See EUCHARIST, § 3.

LOVINGKINDNESS (חֶסֶד, ḥésed), a characteristic term of OT religion, applicable both to Yahwè and to man.

1. Rendering. This rendering of ḥésed may be inadequate, but is certainly preferable to 'mercy' (or 'mercies,' which alternates with it in EV). 'Mercy' is an inheritance from the Wycliffite Bible; Vg. gives misericordia, and 𝔊 ἔλεος, ἐλεημοσύνη, ἐλεήμων (but also nine times δικαιοσύνη, and once δίκαιος). It might have been better to limit the use of 'mercy' to the phrase 'have mercy' (חָנַּנִי), Ps. 4 1 [2] 6 2 [3] 9 13 [14], etc. Other renderings of ḥésed in EV are 'favour' (Esth. 2 17 Job 10 12), 'goodness' (Hos. 6 4). The root meaning may be 'mildness' (so Ges.(13)), but, in actual use, ḥésed is not mere 'mildness' or 'gentleness.' A few classical passages from the OT will prove this statement.

3. Applications. In all these passages it is not mere 'mildness' that is meant, but active kindness, and not necessarily that form of active kindness which Portia calls 'mercy,' but, when men solely are concerned, any form of helpfulness. It is in fact the φιλαδελφία of the NT, which means a helpfulness born of sympathy.[5] Sympathy in the ancient world was narrow in its range. It existed, properly speaking, only among those who were natural or reputed kinsmen. Israelitish prophets and legislators sought to widen it; but the task was hard. Certainly it was a bold act on the part of the servants of Benhadad (see 5) to appeal to the ḥésed of an Israelitish king. The earlier Israelitish kings, however, were, by comparison with other kings, distinguished by their ḥésed; it is a gratifying proof of the reality of the higher religion in Israel. Ahab responds to the appeal, and recognises Benhadad as a 'brother.' Perhaps, however, he would not have responded thus to the appeal of a Hittite; the Aramæans and the Israelites had, after all, some degree of kinship. In this case the 'merciful' of EV is not misleading; but even EV does not say that the Kenites 'showed mercy' to the children of Israel; it was a sense of kinship that animated them, and their services were not such as could be called deeds of mercy. In (2) and (3) Jonathan appeals to the real though adoptive brotherhood which united him to David. In (4), if historical, David shows his generosity of feeling; Ittai, whom he addresses, is 'a foreigner and an exile'; but he has fought by David's side and eaten his bread; he is a brother, and receives an Israelite's blessing. (6) and (9) should be grouped. Hosea complains that the social feeling (ḥésed) which once distinguished Israel has disappeared; a nameless prophet of a later day makes the cultivation of this feeling one of the three duties of an Israelite. (7) and (8) must also be taken together. From the latter we see what the 'lovingkindness of God' is; it is neither more nor less than paternal affection. Hosea has nothing to say of a formal 'covenant' between Yahwè and his people; the only bĕrīth he knows of is the natural one between a father and his son. In return Yahwè looks for filial affection: loyal himself, he expects loyalty from Israel. Jeremiah (see 10) has a similar conception; it is, however, out of the marriage relation, religiously, according to him, that ḥésed grows; he calls the forgiving husband of Israel חסיד, 'loyally affectionate' (EV 'merciful'), Jer. 3 12.

In (11), however, a remarkable modification of ḥésed appears. That Yahwè from the first loved Israel D does not doubt; but in order that his love may take effect, Israel must give punctual obedience to the prescribed laws. As D puts it, Yahwè will 'keep his covenant and his loving-kindness' for Israel—i.e., will show love to Israel—upon a certain legal condition. Henceforth the same idea of the divine ḥésed as limited by the covenant dominates religious writers, and even human ḥésed ceases to be purely spontaneous: it is still 'active love'; but it is dictated, and its channels are prescribed, by a written code.[1]

4. Later modifications.

The adjective חֲסִידִים, ḥăsīdīm (=אַנְשֵׁי חֶסֶד, Is. 57 1 Ecclus. 44 1; see ASSIDEANS), late in use, means not simply 'men of filial devotion to God and brotherly kindness towards their fellows,' but 'men who perform the pious deeds (חֲסָדִים) required by the law,' and it is nearly='righteous' (cp Is. 57 1 𝔊, ἄνδρες δίκαιοι); see CLEAN, PURE, etc. (for 𝔊 and Pesh., whose renderings are historically significant). Still, though this sense predominates, we find חסיד used once (Ps. 43 1, but the text is doubtful) in the sense of 'gentle,' without any reference to the law, or at most, with an underlying reference to the 'covenant with Noah,' which the heathen were held responsible for neglecting[2] (מִגּוֹי לֹא חָסִיד, EV 'against an ungodly nation'). In the last passage on our list (14) we find Job, in a sad retrospect, referring to the elaborate provisions made for his creatures by the Creator as ḥésed, 'loyal affection.' It is a sign of the strong universalistic tendency of the movement known as Ḥokmāh or WISDOM (q.v.).

This tendency never ceased. Mt. 5 45 implies that the divine love is universal. Whilst some Rabbis explained חסד לאומים חטאת (Prov. 14 34)[3] in the sense of Augustine's saying that the virtues of the heathen are only splendida vitia, the famous R. Joḥanan b. Zakkai gave the charitable interpretation, The beneficence of the heathen is (as) a sin-offering (for them) (Bābā bathrā, 10*b*).[4] R. Johanan flourished about 70 A.D.; under the forms of legalism he expresses the spirit of the gospel; but the true spiritual kinsman of Jesus is Hosea.

Everywhere, except Nah. 3 9 (where read probably LUDIM, with Wi. AOF 1 513), 'Lubim' probably represents 'Libyans' (Egypt. Labu, Lebu); in Dan., l.c., EV actually gives 'Libyans.' On the three Libyan invasions of Egypt see Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 434, 461, 471 f. After the third invasion Egypt became 'slowly flooded by Libyans.' They supplied the Pharaohs with a highly paid militia, and at length a Libyan by descent (Šošenḳ) actually ascended the throne. See EGYPT, § 63.

Stade, Cornill, and Ginsburg would read 'Lubim' for 'Ludim' in Jer. 46 9 (cp LUD, § 2). It should be noted, however, that the Assyrian inscriptions expressly refer to Lydian troops in the service of Egypt. Cp further, CHUB, LEHABIM.

LUCAS (λουκας [Ti. WH]), Philem. v. 24, RV LUKE.

LUCIFER, AV$^{mg.}$ and RV DAY STAR (הֵילֵל), the epithet applied to the king of Babylon who in his pride boasts that he will ascend to the heavens and make himself God's equal; his fate is to be cast down to Shĕōl to the uttermost recesses of the pit (Is. 14 12-15). By Jerome and other Fathers the passage was applied to Satan (cp Lk. 10 18).

הֵילֵל, Hēlēl, according to the vowel-points (but cp König, Lehrgeb. 2*a* 106) is an imperative ('howl'), so Pesh. Aq. Jer.; but the above rendering, which follows 𝔊 (ὁ ἑωσφόρος;[1] cp 2 Pet. 1 19, φωσφόρος), Targ. Vg. Rabb. is the only natural one; it requires us to point Hēlāl—i.e., 'brilliant' (so Hi. Ew. Kn. Di.; cp הֵידָד).

The description of the doings and of the fate of Hēlāl is so peculiar (note the expressions 'son of the dawn,' 'stars of God,' 'mount of assembly' [see CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF], 'recesses of the north'), that Gunkel (Schöpf. u. Chaos, 132 ff.) recognises an allusion to a Hebrew nature-myth, analogous to the Greek legend of Phaethōn. The overpowering of the temporary brilliance of the morning-star by the rays of the sun is compared to a struggle between Elyon and the giant Hēlāl. References to a mythic tradition of 'warfare in heaven' are abundant (see DRAGON, LEVIATHAN, STARS, ORION). But if so, why is there no Babylonian equivalent of Hēlāl? It seems better to read either מְהֻלָּל, 'thou famous one' (מ fell out after the preceding מ), or, with a reference to a theory for which much evidence is accumulating through textual criticism, יְרַחְמְאֵל, 'Jerahmeel,' i.e., 'Jerahmeelite oppressor of Israel.' See 'Isaiah,' SBOT, Heb., 199, PARADISE, § 4, OBADIAH (BOOK), §§ 5 ff. and cp Crit. Bib.

According to Winckler (GI 2 24), however, Hēlāl is the Arabian Hilāl, 'the new moon,' and שחר, 'dawn,' in Is. 14 12 is a distortion of שהר (cp שַׂהֲרֹן, ORNAMENTS), 'moon.' He refers to a S. Arabian deity Saḥar (שׂחר), of whom a certain priest describes himself as the liegeman. Whether Saḥar is a deity of the moon or of the dawn is undecided. But are we justified in isolating Is. 14 12 from other passages in which שחר is, from the point of view of textual criticism, doubtful? The key which fits one lock will probably fit another of the same character. Read, not 'son of the morning,' but 'child of the sun' (חֶרֶס).

LUCIUS (λουκιος [Ti. WH]). 1. Roman consul, contemporary with Simon the Maccabee, Antiochus VII. Sidetes, and Ptolemy II. Physcon, 1 Macc. 15 16 (λευκιος [AℵV]). He is mentioned in connection with the embassy of NUMENIUS (q.v.) to Rome. Probably Lucius Calpurnius Piso, who was consul with M. Popilius Lænas in 139 B.C. is meant. That Lucius, not Cneius, was the true surname of Piso has been shown by Ritschl. See Schür., Hist. i. 1 267 f., and cp MACCABEES, FIRST, § 9 (c).

2. A certain Lucius joins Paul, who is writing from Corinth, in saluting the Christians of Rome, to whom therefore he seems to have been known (Rom. 16 21); cp ROMANS, §§ 4, 10. Along with Jason and Sosipater Lucius is there alluded to by Paul as his 'kinsman'; evidently he was a Jew.

The Pseudo-Hippolytus makes him bishop of Laodicea in Syria, as also does the Pseudo-Dorotheus, giving his name, however, as Λουκᾶς. In the Apostolical Constitutions (7 46) he is said to have been ordained bishop of Cenchreæ by Paul.

He is possibly the same as

LUD, LUDIM (לוּד). 1. (λογδ [AEL]), Gen. 10 22 (Sam. לד) = 1 Ch. 1 17 (B om.). Lud was the fourth son of Shem, according to P. Most scholars since Bochart have followed Josephus (Ant. i. 6 4), who makes Lud the founder (ἔκτισε) of the Lydians. A sudden spring to Asia Minor, however, does not seem very probable; or was P really entirely ignorant of the situation of Lydia? Historically, too, there are grave objections to making Lud the brother of Asshur. Lydia was never conquered by the Assyrians in spite of the boastful assertion of Ašur-bani-pal (Smith, Assurb. 65 15) that Gugu, king of Lud (Lud-di), 'took the yoke of his kingdom.' Did P really transfer the circumstances of the Persian age (for Cyrus did conquer and annex Lydia) to the Assyrian period (cp GEOGRAPHY, § 21)?

It would really be less bold, when we remember the enormous amount of corruption among the OT proper names, to infer the need of textual emendation. It is probable that עילם (Elam) in Gen. 14 1 (see SODOM) and also ארם (Aram) in Gen. 22 21 (see KEMUEL) have arisen out of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel), and perhaps still more probable that in Ps. 83 9 [8] אשור (Asshur) should be גשור (Geshur). May not these emendations be applicable in Gen. 10 22? In this case we shall do best to suppose that in the original text of P's list neither לוד nor ארם appeared, but ירחמאל (לוד may have come from ראל, and be, equally with ארם, a fragment of ירחמאל). Verse 22 will then run, 'The sons of Shem: Geshur, and Arpachshad, and Jerahmeel,' and ארפכשד (EV Arpachshad) will be best explained as עֲרַב קָדֵשׁ (Arāb-Kadesh = the N. Arabian Kadesh). But cp ARPACHSHAD.

The view of Lud here proposed accords with the explanation given elsewhere (NIMROD) of Gen. 10 10 f. It will then be natural to emend the traditional text of vv. 13 f. as proposed under MIZRAIM, changing 'Ludim' into כַּרְמְלִים, Carmĕlim—i.e., the people of Carmel (cp MAON).

2. Elsewhere, where the name appears, Lud is taken by some to refer to the Lydians (see PUT); but perhaps it rather means a N. African people.

The passages are Is. 66 19 (λουδ [BAQ], λουθ [א], λυδους [Symm. in Q^mg.]) Ezek. 27 10 30 5 ([but here AV LYDIA], λυδοι [BAQ]), see GEOGRAPHY, § 22. לוּדִים, LUDIM, the plur. form, is the name of a son of Mizraim (EGYPT) in Gen. 10 13 (J) = 1 Ch. 1 11 [Ḳr.], לודיים [Kt.] (λουδιειμ [AL], -ιν [E], λωδιειμ [A in 1 Ch. 1 11, B om.]), and recurs in Jer. 46 9 (λυδοι [BאAQ], AV LYDIANS). The singular form (Lud) occurs in Ezek. 27 10 30 5 Is. 66 19.

In Jeremiah the Ludim appear with Egypt, Cush, and Put (Libya); so also in Ezek. 30 5; and in Isaiah with Tarshish, Put (by a probable text emendation; Che., Di., Du., etc., after 𝔊), Tubal, and Javan. We know nothing more. Hence the hypothesis of Stade (De Pop. Javan, 5 ff. = Akad. Reden [1899], 139 ff.) that we have in Gen. 10 13 (so also Del. Par. 310) and in Jer. 46 9 (so also Co. and Gies.) a textual error for לובים, LUBIM [q.v.], whilst Lud in Ezek. and Is. is the same as Lud in Gen. 10 22, and is used loosely as a distant people, on account of the assonance with Phut (פוט) has some plausibility (see also WMM, As. u. Eur. 115). See, however, above (1, end) and PUT, § 2, and note Dillmann's adverse judgment on these alterations. It is at any rate difficult to explain Ezek. 30 5 in this way, and the motive, and also indeed the possibility, of the corruption of Lubim into Ludim in at least two of the passages are by no means clear.

LUHITH, ASCENT OF (מַעֲלֵה הַלּוּחִית; in Jer. Kt. הַלֻּחוֹת), a locality in Moab mentioned between Zoar and Horonaim, Is. 15 5 (αναβασις [της] λουειθ [BאAQΓ]); Jer. 48 5 (επλησθη [as if from מלא 'to fill'] αλωθ [Bא^{c.a.(?)}] αλεθ [א*], αλαωθ [AQ]). Some have identified it with Ṣarfa, N. of the Wady Kerak, where there are ruins described by de Saulcy. This, however, is premature. The most probable reading of the text, the present writer thinks, is מַעֲלֵה עֲגָלִים, 'the ascent of EGLAIM' [q.v.], the same place as that referred to in Is. 15 8; it lay near the S. border of Moab.

What authority (if any) Eusebius had for his statement that the city Lueitha was situated between Areopolis and Ṣoar (OS(2) 276, 43), we know not. Nor can we listen to the editors of the CIS (2 196; cp J. As. mai-juin, 1891, p. 538; ZA 5 289 ff. 6 149 ff.) when they point out the [ה]לחית of Is. in a Nabatean inscription found in Moab.

The words of the inscr. are איתיבל רב משריתא די בלחיתו. Lagrange and Nö., however, read, not בלחיתו, but בחיתו. Right method, moreover, requires us to begin by examining the text of Is. 15 5. Such an examination discloses to us a double reading, עגלת שלשיה (transposition has taken place) and מעלה הלוחית. מעלה is of course preferable to שלשיה, but עגל is more correct than הלוח [Jer. הלח]; ת, or rather ית, should no doubt be ים. Thus we get מעלה עגלים. See EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH.

LUKE[1] is named only three times in NT. According to Philem. 24 he was a 'fellow-labourer' with Paul; 1. In NT. according to Col. 4 14, a physician who was specially dear (ὁ ἀγαπητός) to the apostle.[2] Both letters, which according to Philem. 1 11 f. Col. 4 3 7-9 18 were despatched simultaneously by Paul in his captivity, contain a salutation from Luke to the recipients. Luke, however, is in neither case named as a fellow-prisoner with Paul; in the one case (Philem. 23) it is EPAPHRAS, in the other (Col. 4 10) it is ARISTARCHUS who is so designated. In 2 Tim. 4 11 it is said that 'only Luke is with' the apostle; whether as a fellow-prisoner is not stated. In any case the situation is quite different from that disclosed in the other two epistles in so far as we are here in the present instance informed that all the apostle's other companions have forsaken him. According to 1 8 16 2 9, 2 Tim. also was written from a captivity. Even where the Epistle is not held to be genuine, it is often supposed that 4 9-18 along with 4 19-22*a* are a genuine note (or two notes) written by the apostle, and from captivity. From what captivity—whether or not the same as that referred to in Col. and Philem.—cannot be discussed here (cp PAUL, § 30).

In Col. 4 10-14, a classification is made of the companions of Paul. Aristarchus, Mark, and Jesus Justus are grouped together as being 'of the circumcision' (οἱ ὄντες ἐκ περιτομῆς); then 2. Jew or Gentile. comes Epaphras with the words added, 'who is one of you' (ὁ ἐξ ὑμῶν), in other words a Gentile Christian; finally are named Luke and Demas. The inference is that these two also are Gentile Christians. This holds good also if Aristarchus proves to be a Gentile Christian. According to Acts 20 4 he belongs to Thessalonica, and according to a very probable conjecture (GALATIA, § 22) he is selected to be representative of the essentially Gentile Christian community there in conveying to Jerusalem their contribution on behalf of the poor there.

To the words 'who are of the circumcision' (οἱ ὄντες ἐκ περιτομῆς) in Col. 4 11 is added the expression 'these only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God' (οὗτοι μόνοι συνεργοὶ εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ). If this be taken literally Epaphras Luke, and Demas were no fellow-workers of Paul—as in Col. 4 12 f. (Epaphras), Philem. 24 (Luke and Demas), they are said to have been. To obviate this contradiction it has been proposed to delete the mark of punctuation after 'circumcision,' with the supposed result of making the persons named (with or without Aristarchus) to be the sole fellow-workers of Paul who were of Jewish birth, though besides these there were others of Gentile origin. To delete the mark of punctuation, however,—whether period or comma,—is impossible, unless 'these' (οὗτοι) also be deleted, and this no one has ventured to do. If 'these' is left, we have a manner of expression which must, to say the least, be described as exceedingly careless. If it be borne in mind that the genuineness of the Epistle to the Colossians is by no means free from doubt, the expression can even rouse a suspicion that vv. 10-14 were not written by a single author at one writing, but that either vv. 12-14 are an addition, or that v. 11 (with or without οἱ ὄντες ἐκ περιτομῆς) is an interpolation. At the same time, even where the Epistle to the Colossians

1 On the name see § 6.

2 In Marcion's NT (Zahn, Einl. 1 647 2 528) the words ὁ ἰατρὸς ὁ ἀγαπητός were wanting; cp § 3.

is not regarded as genuine as a whole, there is a disposition for the most part to regard the personal notices in 4 7-15 as a genuine fragment; and finally it is not too difficult to suppose that v. 11 is to be supplemented thus: 'these alone—that is to say among those of Jewish birth—are fellow-workers.' In any case this course is an easier one than that of bracketing 'of the circumcision these only' (ἐκ περιτομῆς οὗτοι μόνοι) so as to make 'fellow-workers' (συνεργοί) the immediate continuation of 'who are' (οἱ ὄντες).

Luke thus remains in any case a Gentile Christian unless we regard the whole passage as too insecure to allow of our founding anything upon it.

3. Authorship of Third Gospel and Acts.

The interest which Luke has for students of the NT turns almost entirely on the belief that he was the author of the Third Gospel and of Acts. This 'tradition,' however, cannot be traced farther back than towards the end of the second century (Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and the Muratorian fragment);[1] there is no sound basis for the contention of Zahn (2 175) that the existence of the tradition can also be found as early as in Marcion because that writer, from his aversion to the Third Gospel (which nevertheless was the only one he admitted into his collection—with alterations it is true) omitted the expression of honour applied to Luke in Col. 4 14. In ACTS, §§ 1, 9, 15 f., and GOSPELS, § 153, it has been shown that it is impossible to regard Luke with any certainty as the writer even of the 'we' sections of Acts, not to speak of the whole book of Acts, or of the Third Gospel.

4. Inferences, the authorship being assumed.

The assumption, however, that as an evangelist Luke must have been an eye-witness of the events of the earthly life of Jesus, and as the author of Acts, a companion of Paul, led to certain inferences. (a) From the fourth century onwards[2] he was held to have been one of the 'seventy' (Lk. 10 1), although this is excluded not only by the fact of the gentile origin of the historical Luke but also by what the Third Evangelist says of himself (1 2). (b) It can proceed only from a misunderstanding of the words (παρηκολουθηκότι πᾶσιν) of Lk. 1 3 (cp col. 1790), as if 'all' (πᾶσιν) were masculine, when Irenæus (iii. 11 1 [10 1] 14 2) with express citation of this text mentions Luke as having been a disciple of several apostles, not only of Paul. (c) In like manner, from the fourth century onwards (Lipsius, 360, 362, 367) Luke was identified with the unnamed disciple at Emmaus (Lk. 24 18); being assumed to be the author of the gospel, he was believed to have withheld his name out of modesty. (d) The assumption that he was the author of Acts led to the further belief that he was the companion of Paul not only in his captivity, but also during his journeys, either during those portions only which are spoken of in the first person, or throughout the whole of them. In the nineteenth century this also led to his being identified with Silas = Silvanus, because it was thought easier to attribute the 'we' portions to Silas (see ACTS, § 9). So, for example, van Vloten, ZWT, 1867, p. 223 f., 1871, pp. 431-434. The identification was thought permissible on the ground that lucus and silva are synonymous. (e) On the assumption that Luke was author of the Acts Clement of Alexandria[3] held him to be also the translator of Paul's epistle to the Hebrews, written in Hebrew, the linguistic character of the Greek text being similar to that of Acts. (f) 'A medical language' was discovered in the Third Gospel and in Acts (so Hobart, 1882), and also in Hebrews (so Franz Delitzsch in his Commentary, 1857 [ET, 1868-70], condensed in the introduction to the 2nd ed. of the commentary of Meyer-Lünemann). (g) According to Zahn (§ 58, 6) it is possible that even the legend which represents Luke as a painter and attributes to him various pictures of the mother of Jesus (the legend is first met with in Theodorus Lector, Hist. Eccl. 1 1, dating from the first half of the 6th cent.) may rest upon misunderstanding of the word (καθ-) ἱστορεῖν, which in the Byzantine period meant 'to paint' and which is used in the passage of Theod. Lector just cited. (h) Apart from the same presupposition which regarded Luke as an author, Origen (Hom. 1 in Lucam, 3 933 b F, ed. de la Rue), or rather his unnamed predecessors, would not have identified Luke with the anonymous 'brother' of 2 Cor. 8 18 'whose praise in the Gospel (i.e., in the oral preaching of the gospel) was spread through all the churches.' (i) Ramsay, we may presume, apart from this presupposition, would hardly have extended this last theory still farther, so as to hold that this Luke was the full brother of Titus who is mentioned immediately before, and that he was a native of Philippi (St. Paul, 203, 213, 219, 248 f., 286, 389 f., etc.). There are, for instance, some small touches in Acts which Ramsay thinks he is able to explain by taking their author to be a native of Philippi. (k) On the other hand, from the uncanonical text of Acts 11 28 where 'we' is used, others have sought to make out that Antioch in Syria is indicated as the home of Luke. The form of the text, however, may, on the contrary, rest on a previously existing tradition regarding Antioch (ACTS, § 17, m); it has no attestation earlier than the time of Augustine.[1]

5. Birthplace.

In substance the Antioch tradition is met with at a considerably earlier date.

Ramsay (see above, § 4, i) lays stress (op. cit. 389) upon the fact that Eusebius (HE iii. 4 6), whom he regards as the earliest authority for it 'does not say that Luke was an Antiochian; he merely speaks of him as "being according to birth of those from Antioch" (τὸ μὲν γένος ὢν τῶν ἀπ' Ἀντιοχείας). This curious and awkward expression is obviously chosen in order to avoid the statement that Luke was an Antiochian.' Eusebius was aware, according to Ramsay, that Luke 'belonged to a family that had a connection with Antioch,' namely, to a family that had emigrated from Philippi to Antioch. Even should this interpretation be correct it would be deprived of all its value by the circumstance that Eusebius himself in the Quæstiones Evangelicæ ad Stephanum (of which Mai, as early as 1847, published fragments from a Catena of Nicetas in Nova patrum Bibliotheca [4 1]) writes: ὁ δὲ Λουκᾶς τὸ μὲν γένος ἀπὸ τῆς βοωμένης Ἀντιοχείας ἦν (p. 270: 'Luke was by birth a native of the renowned Antioch'). Should it be held doubtful whether the words just quoted actually come from Eusebius inasmuch as certain statements in their vicinity are irreconcilable with the views of Eusebius known to us from other sources, Spitta (Der Brief des Julius Africanus an Aristides, 1877, p. 70-73, 111) has rendered it probable that they were written by Julius Africanus and thus as early as in the first half of the third century. Of equal antiquity is the Latin prologue to the Third Gospel (in Wordsworth, NT latine, 1 269) which has been thoroughly discussed by Corssen (Monarchianische Prologe zu den 4 Evangelien in Texte u. Untersuch. 15 1, 1896); its words are: 'Lucas Syrus natione Antiochensis.'

This does not, however, prove that Antioch was really the home of Luke. It is very questionable whether those of the third century were in possession of a correct tradition on the subject, and on the other hand it is very conceivable that a mere conjecture may have been adopted. Many critics think that there has been a confusion of Luke with Lucius who is mentioned in Acts 13 1 as present in Antioch. He belonged, however, to Cyrene.

6. Name.

We need not, however, question the possibility of the name Lucas having given rise to confusion with this Lucius. The termination -ᾶς was employed as an abbreviation for a great variety of longer terminations (see NAMES, § 86) and in Patrobas (Rom. 16 14) we have a name which in all probability arose out of Patrobius. Besides Lucius, such various names as Lucilius, Lucillus, Lucinus, Lucinius, Lucianus, Lucanus, could all produce the abbreviation Lucas. In any case the name is of Latin origin.

[1] Since the art. ACTS was printed, Harnack also has elaborately controverted the genuineness of the reading in question (SBAW, 1899, pp. 316-327).

Lucanus is given for Lucas as the name of the Evangelist in several MSS. of the Vetus Itala (e.g., Old Latin Biblical Texts, 2 85, etc.). Cp Ἀπολλώνιος in D for Ἀπολλῶς (supr. col. 262, n.). In CIG, apart from Christian inscriptions, the name Λουκᾶς occurs only twice—in both cases in Egypt (3 4759, and Add. 4700 k). The identification of Luke with the Lucius mentioned by Paul in Rom. 16 21—an identification that is mentioned even by Origen (4 686a DE, ed. de la Rue)—cannot be maintained, Lucius having been a Jew. In the form of the Prologue already mentioned, which is to be found in the Opera Hieronymi, ed. Vallarsi, xi. 3, 42, there is added immediately after the name of Luke the expression 'ipse consurgens.' In the Liber interpretationis hebr. nominum (Vallarsi, 3 113 116; see also OS 77 14 79 16) Jerome explains the name as meaning 'ipse consurgens aut [sive] ipse elevans.' In a Greek codex of similar contents (see OS 174 80) we read Λουκᾶς αὐτὸς ἀνιστῶν; in a Vatican collection printed in Wiener Studien, 1895, p. 157, we find 'iste consurgens.' Professor Nestle in a private letter to the present writer explains that here as in New Greek and in the Romance languages the accusative (Lucam) is taken as the basis and explained as equivalent to לוֹ קָם. Thus it will be only by a misunderstanding that in the Sermo in natali S. Lucæ attributed to Abbot Bertharius of Monte Cassino (856-884) the original language of the name is called Æolic. In fact in the Homiliæ præstantissimorum eccles. cathol. doctorum ab Alcuino collectæ (Cologne, 1576, p. 953 b, middle), cited by Lipsius (p. 366), the passage runs: 'Lucas siquidem Æolice; in nostra autem lingua interpretatur consurgens sive elevans.'

7. Other later traditions.[1] The oldest of the traditions regarding Luke that do not depend on the assumption of his authorship of the Third Gospel and of Acts is met with in the Prologue already referred to: 'serviens deo sine crimine; nam neque uxorem umquam habens neque filios 74 annorum obiit in Bithynia plenus spiritu sancto.' The years of his life are sometimes also given as 73, 78, 80, 83 or 84 (Lipsius, 359, 365, 367). The last-named figure coincides with the age of Anna (Lk. 2 37). As fields of his activity Achaia and Bœotia are sometimes mentioned instead of Bithynia; also Alexandria or Dalmatia, Gaul, Italy, and Macedonia or the region of the Danube. Down to the fifth century tradition was unanimous in attributing to him a natural death; the place generally named being Thebes in Bœotia, but occasionally Thebes in Egypt, or Ephesus. It was only at a later date that the opinion arose that he had suffered martyrdom —by crucifixion on an olive tree like Andrew, and, according to one account, even along with that apostle at Patras in Achaia. This plainly rests upon the fact that in 357 his relics were transported along with those of Andrew to Constantinople. According to other accounts he was beheaded,—either in Rome, or in Alexandria.

LUNATIC (σεληνιαζομενοι [Ti. WH]). This term occurs only twice in the NT, viz., Mt. 4 24 and 17 15. The revisers deliberately rendered 'epileptic,' on the ground that a Greek medical authority of the seventh century expressly states that ἐπιληπτικός was the scientific term, and that δαιμονιζόμενοι and σεληνιαζόμενοι were popular terms for the same disease. See passage quoted from Leo in Ermerin's Anecdota medica by G. Marshall in Guardian, March 9, 1892. It is a mistake to suppose that in Mt. 4 24 the σεληνιαζόμενοι are distinguished from the δαιμονιζόμενοι; it is plain from a comparison of passages that 'lunatics' are mentioned as examples of the class of demoniacs, and 'paralytics' of those tormented with pain. As the periodicity of the attacks of epilepsy was supposed to be determined by the changes of the moon (see Wetstein in loc.), those thus afflicted were called σεληνιαζόμενοι, lunatic or moonstruck. LUZ (לוּז, λουζα [BADEL]). 1. Another name of BETHEL [q.v.], Gen. 28 19[1] 35 6 48 3 Josh. 16 2 (see below), 18 13 Judg. 1 23. Of these passages the oldest come from P; but the identification of Bethel and Luz must be much older than P; it is implied, indeed, in Judg. 1 22-26 (v. 23 b is a late gloss). Whence did Luz derive its name? The lexicons say, from לוּז, 'an almond tree'; but Lagarde is probably right in rejecting this view. The almond scarcely grows at Bethel. The rugged hills on the side of which BETHEL stands may, thinks Lagarde (Uebers. 157 f., n.), have been likened to an os sacrum (לוּז). Winckler (GI 265), however, more plausibly explains it by Ar. lauḏ as an appellative = 'asylum,' a suitable name for a sanctuary. According to him, the two oldest and most important temples of the land of Israel—that at Bethel and that at Dan— were both called Luz (see LAISH) in the sense of 'asylum.'[2] Still more probably may we take לוּ[ה] (cp 𝔊) to be shortened and corrupted from חֲלֻצָה, 'strong (city).' Whether the story has a historical basis, we know not. The Josephites may perhaps originally have been specified as the conquerors of Luz (?) in the land of the Hittites (?). See 2.

In Josh. 16 2 RV gives, 'and it went out from Bethel to Luz,' which seems to distinguish Bethel from Luz. Dillmann, Bennett, and others omit לוּזָה ('Luzah') as a gloss. Grätz, however, thinks, comparing 1 S. 12 f., that, for בית־אל at the end of v. 1 we should probably read בֵּית־אָוֶן, and for מבית־אל we should read מִבֵּית־אָוֶן, rendering '. . . to Beth-aven, and it went out from Beth-aven to Luz.'
T. K. C.

2. A city said to have been founded 'in the land of the Hittites' by a family which had had to migrate from Bethel or Luz, Judg. 1 26. Some suppose that 'Hittites' in this phrase is used vaguely (like 'Canaanites'), or that we have here a redactional insertion referring to a NE. Syrian empire. See HITTITES (§ 4). But should not 'Hittites' be 'Rehobothites' and 'Luz' be Ḥalūṣah (see REHOBOTH, SHECHEM, ZIKLAG)? There is a strong plausibility in the emendations elsewhere which support this view. There was probably a southern Beth-el containing the sanctuary of Ḥalūṣah, otherwise called Dan (where Jeroboam placed his 'golden calf'). Another tradition (Judg. 18) assigned the conquest of Laish (= Luz = Ḥalūṣah) to the Danites (cp MICAH, 2).

LYCAONIA (λυκαονια [Ti. WH]), twice mentioned in Acts 14. In v. 6 Lystra and Derbe are 'cities of

1. Position. Lycaonia' (πόλεις τῆς Λυκαονίας); in v. 11 the people speak 'in the speech of Lycaonia' (Λυκαονιστί). In its original extent, Lycaonia, the country of the Lycaones, was the vast, treeless region which like a broad band runs athwart the plateau constituting the interior of Asia Minor, from Galatia proper, the zone of undulating country on the northern edge of the plateau, to the offshoots of Mt. Taurus and the confines of Pisidia and Isauria (Cilicia Tracheia).[3] The boundaries varied at different times.

[1] (Subjoined is what may be called the authorised ecclesiastical tradition as contained in the Breviarium Romanum (18th Oct.).

'Lucas medicus Antiochensis, ut ejus scripta indicant, Græci sermonis non ignarus, fuit sectator Apostoli Pauli, et omnis peregrinationis ejus comes. Scripsit Evangelium, de quo idem Paulus: Misimus, inquit, cum illo fratrem, cujus laus est in Evangelio per omnes ecclesias. Et ad Colossenses: Salutat vos Lucas, medicus carissimus. Et ad Timotheum; Lucas est mecum solus. Aliud quoque edidit volumen egregium, quod titulo, Acta Apostolorum, prænotatur: cujus historia usque ad biennium Romæ commorantis Pauli pervenit, id est, usque ad quartum Neronis annum. Ex quo intelligimus, in eadem urbe librum esse compositum.'

'Igitur periodos Pauli et Theclæ, et totam baptizati Leonis fabulam, inter apocryphas scripturas computamus. Quale enim est, ut individuus comes Apostoli inter ceteras ejus res hoc solum ignoraverit? Sed et Tertullianus vicinus eorum temporum refert Presbyterum quemdam in Asia amatorem Apostoli Pauli, convictum a Joanne, quod auctor esset libri, et confessum se hoc Pauli amore fecisse, et ob id loco excidisse. Quidam suspicantur, quotiescumque in epistolis suis Paulus dicit, Juxta Evangelium meum, de Lucæ significare volumine.'

'Lucam autem non solum ab Apostolo Paulo didicisse Evangelium, qui cum Domino in carne non fuerat, sed a ceteris Apostolis: quod ipse quoque in principio sui voluminis declarat, dicens: Sicut tradiderunt nobis, qui a principio ipsi viderunt et ministri fuerunt sermonis. Igitur Evangelium, sicut audierat, scripsit: Acta vero Apostolorum, sicut viderat ipse, composuit. Vixit octoginta et quatuor annos, uxorem non habens: sepultus est Constantinopoli: ad quam urbem vigesimo Constantini anno ossa ejus cum reliquiis Andreæ Apostoli translata sunt de Achaia.']

[3] Isauria (Isaurica; Strabo, Ἰσαυρική) is the hill-country extending from Lystra to the town Isaura, in Strabo and Ptolemy,

LYCAONIA

The fact that Iconium was the last city of Phrygia (Xen. Anab. i. 2 19) gives us a fixed point on the original boundary, which must have fallen between Iconium and Lystra; consequently, the apostles, being driven out of Iconium, crossed the frontier from Phrygia into Lycaonia (Acts 14 6). Nevertheless, Iconium was generally reckoned a Lycaonian town, in defiance of history and local feeling. N. of Iconium, Laodiceia Combusta (Katakekaumene) was on the frontier, being reckoned to Lycaonia (Strabo, 663), so that the line must have run between that town and Tyriaeum. On the east Lake Tatta divided Lycaonia from Cappadocia; and, farther south, the range called Karadja-Dagh and the lake Ak Geul were on the line. The frontier on the north and south is indeterminate. Lycaonia was thus largely co-extensive with the plain called Axylon ('Treeless,' see above) by the Greeks, which is thus described by Hogarth (A Wandering Scholar in the Levant, 85):—

'Cartographers write this tract a Desert, and therefore that term must include an undulating treeless plain which sends up corn breast-high for the scratching of a Homeric plough. Fresh water is found everywhere at less than twenty feet, and deep grass grows in the marshy hollows through which streams creep to the central lake.'[1]

Nor is it very level, being broken by the Boz-Dagh and other hills. The wells which supply the drinking water must be very ancient (Strabo, 568). The plain afforded excellent pasturage for sheep, and gave opportunity for making large fortunes by the trade in wool. It was on the Lycaonian downs that Amyntas grazed his 300 flocks (Strabo, l.c.).

2. History. Lycaonia had no history as a separate independent country. Until 190 B.C. it was included within the Syrian (Seleucid) Empire. At some time between 189 and 133 B.C., probably about 160 B.C., the entire tract W. of Lake Tatta, southwards as far as Iconium and Lystra inclusive, was added as a tetrarchy to Galatia proper, making one of the twelve tetrarchies into which Galatia was divided (Plin. HN 5 95). This Lycaonian tetrarchy included fourteen cities, of which Iconium was the chief. The rest of Lycaonia from Derbe eastwards to Castabala on Mt. Amanus, was given, in 129 B.C., to the sons of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, in reward for their father's loyalty (Justin, 37 1, Strabo, 534 f.). This was called the Eleventh Strategia of Cappadocia (τὴν ἐπίκτητον, sc. στρατηγίαν, Strabo, 537). Thus Lycaonia fell into two parts, the 'added tetrarchy,' and the 'Eleventh Strategia.' In 64 B.C. Pompeius reorganised the country after the defeat of Mithradates.

The northern part of the tetrarchy was permanently attached to Galatia proper and it retained its name of 'Added Land' (προσειλημμένη, Ptol. v. 4 10); the southern and most valuable part of the old tetrarchy was detached.[2] Similarly, it was only the eastern part of the old Eleventh Strategia that was allowed to continue to belong to Cappadocia; the frontier was drawn W. of Cybistra. The southern part of the tetrarchy, and the western part of the Strategia—i.e., the entire south-western section of Lycaonia—was attached as the Lycaonian Diœcesis to the Province of Cilicia. The district of Derbe and Laranda was administered by Antipater of Derbe under the supervision of the Roman governor of Cilicia, who also retained the right of way through eastern Lycaonia (i.e., the Cappadocian part of the Strategia: cp Cic. Ad Fam. 13 73; 15 1, cum exercitum in Ciliciam ducerem, in finibus Lycaoniæ et Cappadociæ. Id. Ad Att. v. 21 9; Plin. HN 5 25).

In 40 B.C., when Antonius regulated Asia Minor, the south-western portion of Lycaonia was formed into a kingdom for Polemon, son of Zeno, a rhetorician of Laodiceia on the Lycus, along with Isauria (Appian, BC 5 75: cp Strabo, 569, 577). Iconium was his capital (Strabo, 568). In 36 B.C. the kingdom of Polemon was given to Amyntas, who ruled over Pisidic Phrygia and Pisidia proper: at the time Galatia proper (including, of course, the Added Land) was given to him. Antipater of Derbe had taken advantage of the Civil Wars to make himself completely independent; consequently Amyntas, who was a loyal agent of Rome, was allowed to destroy him, and to annex his territory. Lycaonia was thus, with the exception of the eastern part of the old Strategia, wholly within the realm of Amyntas; and when Amyntas was slain in 25 B.C. it became part and parcel of the vast Province of Galatia.[1] Subsequently, in 37 A.D., eastern Lycaonia (i.e., the Cappadocian part of the old Eleventh Strategia), having been placed under Antiochus IV., king of Commagene, became known as Lycaonia Antiochiana (Ἀντιοχιανή, sc. χώρα—Ptol. v. 6 17; CIL 10 8660). In 41 A.D. this arrangement was confirmed by Claudius, who also detached from Galatia the extreme south-eastern corner of Lycaonia—viz., Laranda and its territory—and transferred it to Antiochus.

The reason for this lay in the fact that Antiochus was king of Cilicia Tracheiotis, and Laranda was the centre from which radiated the roads running through Tracheiotis to the coast (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM 361). Coins with the legend ΛΥΚΑΟΝΩΝ were struck by Antiochus, probably at Laranda.

3. In Paul's time. This state of things lasted until 72 A.D., when Vespasian considered the Romanisation of the Tracheiotis complete, and incorporated the kingdom of Antiochus in the provincial system (Suet. Vesp. 8). From this it is clear that at the time of Paul's visit (about 50 A.D.) Derbe was the frontier city of Galatia Provincia in this quarter, and therefore he went no farther eastwards (Acts 14 21). It is also clear that the bulk of the Lycaonians were, from the Roman point of view, 'Galatians,' men of the Province Galatia (Gal. 3 1 1 Cor. 16 1); for in Paul's time Lycaonia, always fated to be divided, fell into two parts—Galatic Territory (Γαλατικὴ χώρα, Acts 18 23) or Lycaonia Galatica,[2] and Antiochian Territory or Lycaonia Antiochiana. The former, or the Roman part of Lycaonia, the only part in which Paul worked, is mentioned three times in Acts—Acts 14 6 (where it is defined by the enumeration of its cities, as Paul entered from Phrygia Galatica), Acts 16 1 (defined again by the enumeration of the cities, as Paul entered from Lycaonia Antiochiana), and Acts 18 23 (defined by reference to the Province, as Paul entered from the non-Roman part).[3]

4. Culture, etc. The Lycaonians were probably the aboriginal race conquered by the immigrant Phrygians about the tenth century B.C. For their religion and character see Ramsay's Hist. Comm. on Galatians, 19 ff. The cities were probably mostly the foundations of Greek kings (especially of the Seleucids), which accounts, among other things, for the influence and numbers of the Jews therein (Acts 14 19). Lycaonia or South Galatia possessed, long before the advent of the Romans, some Hellenised cities on the great commercial route. Greek was the language of commerce, and these cities were foci of Græco-Roman influence. The villages and rustic districts were the last to be Hellenised; but those of southern Lycaonia felt the movement a full century before those of Galatia proper.

The governing (Latin) race was confined to the garrison towns or colonies; and to the towns in general the commercial element, Hellenic or Jewish, would also be confined in the main. In the country and the remoter towns the native element survived (see LYSTRA). Of the Lycaonian language nothing is known (for three inscriptions in this obscure dialect, cp Journ. of Hell. Studies, 11 157).

There was thus an essential contrast between the society and civilisation of Lycaonia, or South Galatia, and the northern part of the province (i.e., Galatia proper). Greek civilisation did not establish itself in North Galatia until very late; not earlier than 150 A.D.

and was part of Cilicia Tracheia. Subsequently, the name Isauria was extended to include all the districts of Cilicia Tracheia (see Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM 450).

[1] See Murray's Handb. to AM 161. Ramsay, on the other hand, describes it less favourably.

[2] The line of demarcation passed, probably, just N. of Savatra or Soatra on the eastern highway.

[1] Dio Cass. 53 26: τοῦ Ἀμύντου τελευτήσαντος, ἡ Γαλατία μετὰ τῆς Λυκαονίας Ῥωμαῖον ἄρχοντα ἔσχε.

[2] This title is not indeed actually found as yet, but is proved by the analogy of Pontus Galaticus as distinguished from Pontus Polemoniacus, and Phrygia Galatica (=τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν of Acts 16 6) as distinguished from Phrygia Asiana.

[3] [See, however, GALATIA, §§ 9-14.]

was it dominant even in the cities (Ramsay develops and proves this at great length in Hist. Comm. on Galatians, 1 341; cp Momms. Prov. of R. Emp. 128 f.).

This phenomenon resulted from the fact that the Lycaonian plain was traversed by two main arteries of communication—(1) the trade-route from the Euphrates to Ephesus, crossing Lycaonia from E. to W. by Laodiceia Combusta (Strabo, 663); (2) from the Cilician Gates and Laranda, through Derbe, Iconium, and Antioch, uniting with the first-named road at Metropolis in Phrygia.[1]

Hence the diffusion of Christianity, being strictly conditioned by the geographical and historical relations of the various districts, started from Iconium as centre for the whole of Lycaonia, and the ecclesiastical system of Lycaonia was highly developed at an early period. In northern Galatia the centre was Ancyra, and the line along which the movement travelled was that leading from Bithynia through Juliopolis (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM 197 240)—a route which came largely into use only when the centre of the Roman world was moved to the shores of the Bosphorus. See further, GALATIA.

LYCIA (λυκια, Acts 27 5), the SW. part of Asia Minor between Caria and Pamphylia, where the Taurus range descends in masses to the sea, forming a rugged coast with several good harbours (Strabo, 664). The inhabitants, who called themselves Tramele (Τερμίλαι), were apparently the descendants of a conquering tribe allied to the Greeks, which crossed the Hellespont from Europe and established itself among the original Semitic population.

[The Lycians, though not mentioned in Gen. 10, were well known as a maritime people, not only to the Greeks, but also to the Egyptians, who called them Ruku or Lûk (WMM As. u. Eur. 354 362). They are also mentioned in one of the Amarna Letters (28 10-12) as plundering Alašiya (Cyprus? Crete?).]

In course of time the conquerors were themselves absorbed into the body of the conquered race. Throughout western Asia Minor from the very dawn of history development turns upon this conflict between European and Oriental elements (see Rams. Hist. Phryg. 1 7 f.). A relic of the latter was the Lycian custom of tracing descent through the mother (Herod. 1 173; cp Sayce, Emp. of the East, 99); cp KINSHIP, § 4. The Lycians were absorbed into the Persian empire after a brave defence. After their victory over Antiochus at Magnesia (190 B.C.) the Romans handed over Lycia and the greater part of Caria to the Rhodians; but twenty-three years later independence was restored to the Lycian cities (Pol. 30 5). Then followed the golden period of Lycian history.

The country formed a league (τὸ Λυκιακὸν σύστημα) of twenty-three cities,[2] organised on a federal basis (Strabo, 664); this was only a development of an earlier Κοινὸν τῶν Λυκίων (cp CIG 4677). At any rate, the Lycian League has been justly called the 'fairest product of that Hellenism, that mastery of the barbarian mind by Greek political thought, which took such strong root in Asia Minor' (Greenidge, Handbk. of Grk. Const. Hist. 241, where see details). The cities were arranged in three classes, with three, two, or one vote at the annual assembly of the nation (τὸ κοινὸν συνέδριον), at which the head of the league (Lyciarch) was elected. In the same proportion the public burdens were assigned to the cities. To the first group belonged Patara and Myra, both mentioned in the NT, Acts 21 1 (Πάταρα καὶ Μύρα [D]), 27 5 (cp Strabo, 665). There was no federal capital.

During this period, Lycia is heard of, in 1 Macc. 15 23, as one of the states to which the consul L. Calpurnius Piso sent letters in favour of the Jewish settlers (139 B.C.); PHASELIS (q.v.), a Lycian town, is mentioned separately in the list. For loyalty to the Romans, the freedom of the Lycians was confirmed, first by Sulla, and afterwards by Antonius. In 43 A.D. internal dissensions afforded the Emperor Claudius a pretext for taking the territory of the Federation into the Empire (Suet. Claud. 25, Lyciis ob exitiabiles inter se discordias libertatem ademit). As a province, Lycia seems to have been combined at first with Pamphylia (Dio Cass. 60 17). Two prætorian governors of this period are known—Eprius Marcellus (Tac. Ann. 13 33 in 54-56 A.D.), and Licinius Mutianus (Lyciæ legatus, Plin. HN 12 9). As, however, under Galba, and perhaps under Nero, Pamphylia was united with the Province Galatia (cp Tac. Hist. 2 9), it has been conjectured that freedom was restored to the Lycians by Nero or Galba; at all events, information fails as regards Lycia during the reigns of Nero and his successors.

In 74 A.D. Vespasian took Lycia once more within the provincial system, and united it with Pamphylia to form the double province Lycia-Pamphylia, precisely like Pontus-Bithynia (Suet. Vesp. 8. See Momms. in CIL iii., Suppl. no. 6737). As an imperial province, it was governed by a prætorian Legatus Augusti proprætore; but in 135 A.D. Hadrian handed it over to the Senate in exchange for Bithynia (Dio Cass. 69 14). When absorbed by the Empire the old Federal union still persisted as the Κοινὸν Λυκίων for the imperial cultus, under the presidency of the Lyciarch.

Lycia has no importance in the early history of Christianity; in this respect it is like PAMPHYLIA (q.v.). Its name does not occur in 1 Pet. 1 1 (cp Hort, First Ep. of Peter, 163 f.). For its later conection with Christianity see Mommsen in Arch. epigr. Mittheil. aus Oestr., 1893, p. 93 f.

LYDDA, or LOD (לֹד; λοδ [BℵA]; but λυδδα in Neh. 11 35 [ℵ^c.a inf. mg. Mariette, Brugsch, and others find it mentioned (as Lu-ṭ-n) immediately before Ono in the Karnak list of Thotmes III.; but W. M. Müller (As. u. Eur. 140) will not admit this. Cp HADID and BENJAMIN, § 8, b, 3; but see ONO, where the doubtfulness of this identification is pointed out (see also Crit. Bib.). Confusions of names are not unfrequent in lists. There is at any rate no doubt about Lydda.

In 1 Macc. 11 34 Lydda is named as one of the three 'governments' (νομοί) that were added to Judæa from Samaria, in the reign of Jonathan the high priest, by King Demetrius II., Ephraim and Ramathaim being the other two. It is mentioned by Josephus and Pliny as giving its name to one of the ten or eleven toparchies (κληρουχίαι τοπαρχίαι) into which Judæa was in their time divided (Jos. BJ iii. 3 5; Plin. HN v. 14 70). Shortly after the death of Julius Cæsar in 44 B.C. the inhabitants of Lydda and certain other towns were sold into slavery by Cassius owing to the failure of these places to pay the heavy contributions he had demanded; they were afterwards set free by Antony. Lydda is mentioned in Acts 9 32 ff. in connection with a visit of the apostle Peter. It was burned by Cestius Gallus in Nero's reign, was taken by Vespasian in 68 A.D., and, after the fall of Jerusalem, for some time shared with Jabneh the honour of being one of the chief seats of rabbinical learning.

In a Totius Orbis Descriptio of the fourth century Lydda is mentioned with Sarepta, Cæsarea, and Neapolis as a centre of the purple trade. Its classical name was Diospolis (when first given is not known); but it continued also to be known, especially in Christian circles, as Lydda, as appears from episcopal lists in which its name occurs. Pelagius was condemned here at a synod held in 415. After varying fortunes the city was destroyed by Saladin in 1191; but it was rebuilt, only, however, to be sacked by the Mongols in 1271. From this last blow it never recovered, and it is now an unimportant village, the only feature of interest which it possesses being the Church of St. George, partly dating from the twelfth century, which reminds us that Lydda was in Christian times the centre of a cultus closely connected with the dragon-myths of Egypt and Babylon. It would even seem to have obtained a place in some forms of the antichrist legend, for a ḥadith, ascribed to Mohammed by ancient commentators on the Korān, says that 'Isa (Jesus) will slay ed-dajjāl ('the impostor'=Antichrist) at Lydda, or even at the gate of the church of Lydda (Clermont-Ganneau, Horus et Saint Georges, 1877, p. 10). Antichrist is, in fact, a descendant of the mythic dragon. See ANTICHRIST.

[1] An alternative route ran from the Cilician Gates, through Cybistra, and north-westwards across the plain through Iconium, and then hit the trade route at Laodiceia Combusta (Rams. Hist. Comm. on Gal. 184).

[2] These twenty-three cities were not the sum total of Lycian cities, for more than a hundred places are known to have struck coins, and Pliny HN 5 28 says that Lycia formerly possessed seventy cities, though in his own time there were only thirty-six.

LYDIA, RV LUD (לוּד; Ezek. 30 5) and LYDIANS, RV LUDIM (לוּדִים; Jer. 46 9). See LUD, 2.

LYDIA (λγδιδ, 1 Macc. 8 8 Ezek. 30 5 AV, RV LUD [q.v.], cp id. 27 10), the central member of the triad of districts fringing on the W. the great interior plateau of Asia Minor. On the N. came Mysia, on the S. Caria, on the E. Phrygia. Lydia thus included the basins of the Hermus and its tributaries, and that of the Cayster, and extended southwards over the range of Messogis as far as the Mæander[1] (Strabo, 577). Eastwards, in the direction of Phrygia, the boundary was uncertain, even to the ancients, and it was disputed whether the Katakekaumene, the inland volcanic region on the upper Hermus, was to be reckoned as Lydian or Mysian (Strabo, 628). This confusion was due partly to the presence of both Lydian states and Mysian states in the same district (Strabo, 579); partly also it was the result of disregard of ethnical facts by the Romans in their organisation of the provincial divisions, as Strabo himself says (629).

1. Situation.

Whether the Lydians are referred to in the OT is considered elsewhere (see LUD, LUDIM, PUT); our chief object here is to illustrate the history of NT times. Lydia had long been a great trading state, owing to its natural wealth (cp Herod. 1 93 5 49; Tac. Ann. 4 55), though its trade was inland, not maritime. It was in fact the policy of the Mermnadæ (who, about 585 B.C., extended their rule over Phrygia to the confines of the Median empire) to make their state an industrial centre. Sardis, the capital, was a meeting-place of the caravan trade across Asia Minor by the old north, or royal road, and that which ran through Lycaonia.

The Lydians were the first to coin money, and were the earliest traders (Herod. 1 94). This statement of Herodotus has been explained by Radet by pointing out that the old Phœnician trade was conducted by barter, and that the Lydians first put this traffic on a new basis by stamping pieces of electrum of guaranteed weight and fineness with a symbol. The story of Pythius (Herod. 7 27 f.) shows that commerce on a great scale was thus rendered possible in Lydia. The coast had early been occupied by Hellenic colonies (Strabo, 647), and their subjugation gave Lydia also the Ægean trade: her history became interwoven with that of Greece, and Lydia became 'the link that binds together the geography and history of Asia and Europe' (Sayce, Empires of the East, 423).

The victory of the Romans at Magnesia, in the valley of the Hermus (190 B.C.), resulted in the transference of Lydia from Antiochus of Syria to Eumenes II. of Pergamus Pol. 21 45; Livy, 37 56). To this change reference is made in 1 Macc. 8 8. In 133 B.C., by the will of Attalus III., the Pergamene kingdom passed to the Romans, and Lydia henceforth formed part of the Roman province of Asia. After this date, the name Lydia possessed no political significance, though still valid in the domain of ethnology or geography. For Romans, or for those who adopted the Roman and imperial point of view, 'Asia' was the sole permissible term. Hence, in the NT the name Lydia does not occur, in spite of the fact that so much is said, for example, of Ephesus. Paul names only 'Asia' and 'Galatia' [cp GALATIA, §§ 5, 15 f.]: the writer of the Apocalypse sums up five Lydian cities, together with the Mysian Pergamus and the Phrygian Laodicea, as 'the seven churches which are in Asia' (Rev. 1 4).

2. History.

Here must be noticed the view maintained by Blass (Act. Apost. 176) and Zahn (Einl. 1 132 f.) as to the practice of Lk. in using non-provincial terms (Lycaonia, Pisidia, Mysia, etc.), and giving to the term 'Asia' a more restricted application than it had in official usage [cp GALATIA, § 15]. According to Zahn, 'Asia,' as used by Lk., means simply Lydia: Blass includes also Mysia and Caria, and excludes only Phrygia—this being, in fact, the extent of the Roman province of Asia from 133 to 84 B.C. The enumeration in Acts 2 9 seems to give colour to this view, and in this passage Ramsay (Church in R. Emp.(5) 150) admits that 'Asia' is 'pointedly used in the popular sense, excluding Phrygia' (see ASIA; but cp PHRYGIA for another explanation). No support for Zahn's view can be derived from Strabo (627, τάχα γὰρ ἡ Μῃονία 'Ασία ἐλέγετο), for he is quoting a mere theory. In fact, all attempts to prove a use of the term Asia in a narrower sense than the Roman province at its greatest extent fail: it was not until the end of the third cent. A.D. that Asia was restricted as Zahn suggests (cp Ramsay, Stud. Bibl. 4 30 f.).

3. Blass and Zahn on 'Lydia' and 'Asia.'

The Lydia (see LYDIA, ii.) who befriended Paul at Philippi, came from Thyatira (Acts 16 14). Trade guilds, united in the worship of some deity, were characteristic of Lydia (cp Rams., Cities and Bish. of Phrygia, 2 417), and the woman may have acted as agent for a guild of dyers. Possibly 'Lydia' was not her true name, but a popular designation (cp Zahn, Einl. 1 375).

The fact that five of the seven churches of Asia lay in Lydia makes that country important in the history of Christianity. See the special articles EPHESUS, PHILADELPHIA, SARDIS, SMYRNA, THYATIRA.

LYDIA (λγδιδ [Ti.WH]), a woman of Thyatira, dealer in purple stuffs (πορφγροπωλις), and a 'worshipper of God' (ςεβομενη τον θεον; see PROSELYTE, § 5); Paul's first convert, and his hostess, at Philippi (Acts 16 14 f. 40). See LYDIA i., § 3.

LYE occurs once in RV (Jer. 2 22), where it represents Heb. נֶתֶר, nēther, AV NITRE, and twice in RVmg. (Is. 1 25: 'I will purge as with lye thy dross'; Job 9 30 'if . . . I cleanse my hands with lye'), where it represents Heb. בֹּר בּוֹר,[1] bōr. Cp SOAP.

The English word lye is now used for solutions of the hydroxides of potassium or sodium in water, which, when added to certain oils or fats, produce soap, but was formerly applied to a mixture of water and the ashes of wood and plants generally, the water dissolving the alkaline salts of the ash.

LYSANIAS (λγςανιογ, Ti.WH) is mentioned in the NT only in Lk. 3 1, where he appears as tetrarch of ABILENE [q.v.] at the beginning of the Baptist's ministry. Outside of the NT we know of only one man of this name who ruled over this region; his rule commenced about 40 B.C., and in 36 B.C. he was executed by the triumvir Mark Antony at the instigation of Cleopatra (Jos. Ant. xv. 4 1, § 92; BJ i. 22 3, § 440; Schürer, GJV(2) 1 296, ET 1 402)—thus a difference of more than sixty years. The question arises, accordingly, whether perhaps Lk. may not intend a younger Lysanias with regard to whom we possess no direct information, and whether it is possible to suppose that what is said in Lk. may be applicable to him though inapplicable to the older Lysanias.

The Lysanias of whom we know from secular history succeeded his father Ptolemy, who was the son of a certain Mennæus; this Ptolemy, according to Strabo (xvi. 2 10, p. 753), was lord of the 'hill country of the Ituræans'—by which we are to understand probably the southern Antilibanus (see ISHMAEL, § 4 [7]) along with Abila (west from Damascus)—and also of the plain of Massyas or Marsyas, which stretched between the Lebanon and Antilibanus ranges from Laodicea in the N. to Chalcis (Ptolemy's capital) in the S.; and indeed it is probable that his territory came farther S. still, to the region of Paneas N. of Lake Merom or Semechonitis.

1. Extent of territory of Lysanias.

(a) The apologists are not alone in maintaining the impossibility of this kingdom being designated as the tetrarchy of Abilene. Schürer (596 f., 602; ET i. 2 326 ff.) takes the same view, and assumes therefore a younger Lysanias, who in the Baptist's time was tetrarch of Abilene only. Schürer himself affirms that 'Pompey destroyed the fortified places in Lebanon (Strabo xvi. 2 18, p. 755) and undoubtedly also curtailed the territory of Ptolemy in a way similar to that in which he dealt with the Jewish territory.' That the kingdom of Ptolemy was thereby reduced to the limits of Abilene alone must not, however, be assumed, for Ptolemy purchased immunity for his incursions from Pompey by the payment of a thousand talents (Jos. Ant. xiv. 3 2, § 39).

In particular it is not probable that precisely Ptolemy's capital (Chalcis) was taken from him. Josephus, however (BJ ii. 12 8, § 247), expressly distinguishes this Chalcis from the 'kingdom of Lysanias' when he says that in 53 A.D. Chalcis was taken from Agrippa II., in compensation for which he received a greater kingdom which included the kingdom of Lysanias.

A notice in Josephus (Ant. xv. 10 1 3, §§ 343-345, 360; BJ i. 20 4, §§ 398-400) leads to the same result. Zenodorus had received, on payment of tribute, the former domain of Lysanias (ἐμεμίσθωτο τὸν οἶκον τοῦ Λυσανίου); after Zenodorus' death (20 B.C.) Augustus bestowed his territory upon Herod the Great—Ulatha and Paneas to the N. of Lake Merom. These districts, therefore, would seem to have previously belonged to the dominion of Lysanias (Schürer, 1 599).

(b) If accordingly it is impossible to assign Abilene alone to the Lysanias vouched for by profane history we must put some other meaning upon the expression of Lk. unless we are to postulate a younger Lysanias. Krenkel (Josephus u. Lucas, 1894, p. 96 f.) seeks to explain the expression from Josephus.

It is stated by Josephus (Ant. xv. 10 1, §§ 343-345; BJ i. 20 4, § 398 f.) that Augustus gave to Herod, while Zenodorus was still alive, Trachon, Batanæa, and Auranitis. After the death of Herod in 4 B.C. these three territories along with a portion of the domain of Zenodorus fell to Herod's son Philip (Ant. xvii. 11 4, § 319; BJ ii. 6 3, § 95). This tetrarchy of Philip was, after his death in 34 A.D., incorporated with the province of Syria; but in 37 it was given to Agrippa I. along with the 'tetrarchy of Lysanias' (Jos. Ant. xviii. 6 10, § 237). In BJ (ii. 11 5, § 215) Josephus makes the same statement, only with the expression 'the so-called kingdom of Lysanias' (βασιλείαν τὴν Λυσανίου καλουμένην). After the death of Agrippa I. in 44 A.D. his territory passed under Roman control. But in 53 A.D., according to Josephus (BJ ii. 12 8, § 247), his son Agrippa II. obtained the former tetrarchy of Philip—i.e., Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Gaulanitis—with, in addition, the 'kingdom of Lysanias' along with what had formerly been the domain of a certain Varus. In Ant. xx. 7 1, § 138, Josephus states it thus: he received the tetrarchy of Philip and Batanæa, and also Trachonitis with Abila. At this point Josephus adds that this last had formerly been the tetrarchy of Lysanias (Λυσανίου δ' αὕτη ἐγεγόνει τετραρχία). That this holds good of Abila only, not also of Trachonitis, follows from xix. 5 1, § 275 ('Αβίλαν τὴν Λυσανίου).

Upon these data Krenkel bases the conjecture that Josephus does not mean to speak of Abila as the only possession of Lysanias, that he calls it the tetrarchy or kingdom of Lysanias simply and solely because it was the only part of the former dominions of Lysanias, which, instead of being assigned to another lord such as Herod the Great, Philip, or Agrippa I. and receiving a name from the new master, had since the death of Lysanias continued to be directly under Roman rule. This interpretation fits best the 'Abila of Lysanias' ('Αβίλαν τὴν Λυσανίου); in the other passages it is not the most obvious one. It would be more natural to interpret in another sense—that Abila alone had constituted the territory of Lysanias,—in that case, then, of a younger Lysanias. But Josephus never gives any indication of a younger Lysanias being known to him. His readers were bound to suppose him to mean the Lysanias who was executed in 36 B.C. When we look at the question from this point of view, accordingly, the simplest course would seem to be to conclude that Josephus intends this same Lysanias throughout, and that there was no younger Lysanias; therefore, that Krenkel's interpretation is not to be set aside as inadmissible.

(c) Coming now to Lk., Krenkel supposes him to have borrowed his expression from Josephus, but on the erroneous impression that Lysanias had survived and ruled to a period shortly before the granting of his tetrarchy to Agrippa I. and thus to the Baptist's time. As to Lk.'s acquaintance with the writings of Josephus, see ACTS, § 16, and THEUDAS. Even if Lk. was not acquainted with Josephus, however, it is still possible that he may be in error; he may have found and misunderstood the expression 'tetrarchy of Lysanias,' meaning the former tetrarchy of Lysanias, in some other source.

(d) In any case we need some explanation of Lk.'s mentioning Lysanias at all. Clearly his wish is to be as complete as possible at this important point of his narrative; but Abilene was a very unimportant territory and Lysanias was not a Jewish ruler at all; if Lysanias was to be mentioned other neighbouring princes deserved equally well to be so also. The most likely suggestion is that Lk. starts from the condition of matters which subsisted down to the year 100 A.D., and thus approximately to the time when he was composing his book; Agrippa II., the last of the Jewish princes, possessed in addition to other territories Abilene also, and Lk. thus found himself called upon to say who it was that held it in the Baptist's time.[1] Whether he is indeed correct in giving a tetrarch Lysanias for this period must remain an open question. That he was mistaken cannot possibly be shown or even assumed without difficulty; but neither can it be disproved. In no case can it be held to be impossible, on the alleged ground that such a mistake on his part were inconceivable. Not to speak of the mistake regarding Philip in this very verse (cp ITUREA), the undeniable error in v. 2—that there were two high priests at the same time—is so serious that, in comparison with it, that regarding Lysanias would seem quite natural, especially if Lk. was depending on the unprecise mode of expression he found in Josephus or some other authority.

2. Titles.

Dio Cassius calls the pre-Christian Lysanias 'king of the Ituræans,' as also does Porphyry (ap. Eus. Chron. ed. Schöne, 1 170), if we assume that here 'Lysanias' (Λυσανίου) ought to be read for 'Lysimachus' (Λυσιμάχου). It is illegitimate to infer from this, however, that the coins with the legend 'Lysanias, tetrarch and chief priest' (Λυσανίου τετράρχου καὶ ἀρχιερέως: Schürer, 1 598, n. 23) relate not to him but to a younger Lysanias. The coins bearing the legend 'Ptolemy tetrarch and chie[f priest]' (Πτολεμαίου τετράρχου ἀρχ[ιερέως]) are without hesitation attributed to his father. In that case, however, it is very probable that the son also bore the same title. True, Ptolemy is nowhere designated 'king' as his son is. The expressions of Josephus are quite general—that he 'was ruler' (δυναστεύων, Ant. xiv. 7 4, § 125), or 'bore sway' (ἐκράτει, BJ i. 9 2, § 185). But the titles 'tetrarch' and 'king' are not sharply distinguished. 'Tetrarch' at that time and for many a day had lost its original meaning of ruler of a fourth part of a kingdom and had come to be applied quite generally to any ruler over a territory not too great, dependent on Rome (Schürer, i., § 16, n. 12, 350-352; ET ii. 1 7, n. 12). The writers of that period, however, often substitute for it the title of 'king' also, which strictly denotes a higher dignity. Even Josephus designates the territory of one and the same Lysanias partly as a tetrarchy (τετραρχία) and partly as a kingdom (βασιλεία, § 1 b). In most quarters, therefore, no difficulty is found in identifying the pre-Christian Lysanias with the tetrarch of the inscription to be treated of in next section.

[1] Holtzmann (most recently in HC ad loc.) adds the conjecture that Lk. took literally the title 'tetrarch' which he mentions in 3 1 as belonging to two sons of Herod the Great, and accordingly believed that out of the kingdom of Herod there must have been formed a fourth tetrarchy besides the two he had named, and Judæa—viz., the 'tetrarchy of Lysanias.' It is not necessary, however, to go so far as this; see § 2.

3. Inscriptions. The following inscription upon a tomb at Ba'albek (=Heliopolis) to the N. of Abila (CIG 4523) is of importance if the lacunæ have been rightly filled up by Renan (Mission de Phénicie, 1864, p. 317-319, and more exhaustively in Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. et Belles Lettres, vol. 26 b [1870], pp. 70-79): '. . . daughter to Zenodorus [son of] Lys[anias t]etrarch and [to] Lys[anias . . . and t]he sons [and to Ly]san[ias . . . and th]e sons in me[mor]y [piously] erected (. . . θυγάτηρ Ζηνοδώρῳ Λυσ[ανίου τ]ετράρχου καὶ Λυσ[ανίᾳ . . . καὶ τ]οῖς υἱοῖς [καὶ] (Λυ)σαν[ίᾳ . . . καὶ τοῖ]ς υἱοῖς μν[ήμ]ης χάριν [εὐσεβῶς] ἀνέθηκεν). Schürer and others deduce from this not only that the Zenodorus named above (§ 1 a and b) was a son of the pre-Christian Lysanias, but also that younger members of his family also bore the name Lysanias. Krenkel considers this to have no point inasmuch as the inscription bestows the title of tetrarch only on the father of Zenodorus, but designates the other persons by their mere names without any addition. It remains a possibility, however, that one or more of them may have received the title of tetrarch only after the erection of this monument, which perhaps may have been set up soon after the death of Zenodorus (20 B.C.). Moreover Krenkel has confined himself, as he ought not to have done, to Schürer's reproduction of the inscription. Schürer himself says that he is giving only the legible portions of it and takes no account of the lacunæ assumed by Renan. Just as the first-named Lysanias is more precisely designated as tetrarch, so Renan desiderates some more definite title for the second and for the third. Krenkel is right, however, in so far as he contends that neither the second nor the third can have been designated tetrarch, otherwise the first Lysanias would have required some further addition —for example the name of his father—for distinction's sake. In point of fact Renan conjectures only so much as this—that the second and the third Lysanias were distinguished by addition of the names of their fathers. The most important consideration, however, is that for both of them the name Lysanias itself rests upon pure conjecture. Renan himself says that in the second place, for example, the reading might quite as easily be Lysimachus or Lysias; and, in the third place, Brocchi, the only person who had seen this fragment of the inscription which has since disappeared, did not read 'Lysan' (ΛΥΣΑΝ) at all, but 'Dasan' (ΔΑΣΑΝ).

(b) Another inscription (CIG 4521, cp Addenda in vol. iii.) relates that a freedman of the tetrarch Lysanias has constructed a road and built a temple 'for the weal of the lords Augusti' (ὑπὲρ τῆς τῶν κυρίων Σε[βαστῶν] σωτηρίας). There was no plurality of Augusti (=Σεβαστοί) until the time of Tiberius, alongside of whom his mother Livia, after the death of the Emperor Octavianus Augustus (14 A.D.), bore the title of Augusta (Tac. Ann. 1 8; Schürer, 1 603, n. 37). Now it is by no means impossible that a freedman of the Lysanias who died in 36 B.C. should, fifty years afterwards, or more have made a road and built a temple, particularly if, as often enough happened, he had been emancipated as a child along with his parents. Thus neither does this inscription supply any decisive evidence in favour of the existence of a younger tetrarch Lysanias.

P. W. S.

LYSIAS (λυсιαс [ANV]). 1. A general of Antiochus Epiphanes (see ANTIOCHUS, 2) and one of the seed royal. Antiochus, smarting under the recent defeat of his captains APOLLONIUS (2) and SERON (qq.v.), placed Lysias in charge of the W. portion of his empire with orders to 'root out and destroy the strength of Israel and the remnant of Jerusalem.' He himself with half the army removed from Antioch to proceed with the invasion of Persia, entrusting his young son—afterwards Antiochus V. Eupator—to the care of Lysias (1 Macc. 3 32 ff.). An army of 47,000 men under three leaders was sent against Judæa, but met with no success (1 Macc. 4 1 ff., see GORGIAS, NICANOR), and Lysias, vexed and discouraged, started out the following year with a force 65,000 strong (165-164 B.C.). He was badly defeated at Beth-zur by Judas (1 Macc. 4 28 ff.), and the tidings of this disaster completed the discomfiture of Antiochus, who, on his deathbed, entrusted the guardianship of his son to PHILIP, 5[1] (1 Macc. 6 5 ff.). Lysias, however, set up Antiochus Eupator as king, and set out upon a fresh invasion of Judæa (6 28 ff.). Beth-zur was besieged, and at the neighbouring locality of Bethzacharias the Maccabæan party was defeated (see ELEAZAR). Leaving behind a portion of his army to continue the siege of Beth-zur, Lysias marched upon Jerusalem; but hearing that Philip had returned to assert his newly gained authority, Lysias concluded a treaty with Jerusalem, which, however, he immediately violated (6 51 ff.). He hastily marched to Antioch, which Philip had already occupied, and ultimately overcame him (see PHILIP, 5).[2] He was put to death at the commencement of the reign of DEMETRIUS I. [q.v.]. His history as recounted in 2 Macc. 10 11 ff. 11-12 1 13 1-14 2 differs in several essential particulars from the above; see MACCABEES, SECOND, § 2 f., col. 2869 ff.

LYSIMACHUS (λυсιμαχοс [BℵAV]).

1. Son of Ptolemy, who is said to have translated into Greek the book of Esther; see apocryphal Esther 11 1 (𝔊 10 11). On this and on the statement that the translation was made at Jerusalem (τῶν [L$^{\beta}$ τὸν] ἐν Ἰερουσαλήμ) see ESTHER, § 9, col. 1405, Willrich, Judaica, 25 f.

2. A high priest (about 171 B.C.), temporarily appointed by his brother MENELAUS [q.v.]. His many acts of sacrilege roused the indignation of the common people, who rose against him and killed him (2 Macc. 4 29 39 ff.).

On the statement in v. 29 (τῆς ἀρχιερωσύνης διάδοχον) see Willrich, Judaica, 165; the Vg. seems to have supposed that Lysimachus was his brother's successor (see RVmg.), reading: 'Menelaus amotus est a sacerdotio succedente L. fratre suo.'

In view of the fact that his brother Menelaus bears a Hellenised form of a Hebrew name, Mr. S. A. Cook conjectures that Lysimachus itself is a Hellenising of the Hebrew אליסמך* (cp ISMACHIAH, SEMACHIAH). See generally ONIAS.

LYSTRA (λυсτραν, Acts 14 6 21 16 1; εν λυсτροιс, Acts 14 8 16 2 2 Tim. 3 11).[3]

1. Site. The site of Lystra was guessed by Leake in 1820, and his conjecture was confirmed by Sterrett's discovery of a large

[1] Probably this was due to the ill-success of Lysias.

[2] Another tradition in 2 Macc. 13 23 would seem to show that Philip had been appointed chancellor.

[3] The same variation in gender and declension as is found in the case of MYRA [q.v.]; but while the mod. name of Myra is proof of the existence of the local form Μύραν, there is no evidence, other than the passage in Acts, available in the case of Lystra. See on this point, Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 128. The name Lystra, as Ramsay remarks (Hist. Comm. on Galatians, 223), is probably Lycaonian, as the similar names Ilistra and Kilistra occur to the SE. and NW. of the town respectively (cp Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM 451).

LYSTRA

pedestal, standing perhaps in its original position, having an inscription in honour of Augustus (Wolfe Exped. 142: Divum Aug[ustum] Col[onia] Iul[ia] Felix Gemina Lustra consecravit d[ecreto] d[ecurionum]). This proves that the colony occupied the hill about one mile NW. of the modern village Khatyn-Serai (= 'The Lady's Mansion'), some eighteen miles SSW. of Iconium. A considerable stream, flowing eastwards out into the Lycaonian plain, runs between the ancient site and the modern village. Few remains of the old city are visible above ground; but a small church stands near an Ayasma (i.e., 'Αγίασμα) or spring reputed holy by the Christians of Iconium and the Turks of the neighbourhood. This tradition of sanctity probably goes back to pagan times. There is no trace of the temple of Zeus (Act 14 13); but its site is perhaps indicated by the pedestal already mentioned (see JUPITER).

2. History. When on the death of Amyntas in 25 B.C. his kingdom was formed into a province (Galatia), Lystra, Isaura, and Derbe were all included within it: for Lystra had belonged to the Lycaonian tetrarchy transferred to Amyntas in 36 B.C. (see LYCAONIA), and Derbe had been taken by him from Antipater with the connivance of the Romans (see DERBE). The importance of the town was ephemeral, and dated only from 6 B.C., when Augustus made an effort to regulate and civilise the mountaineers on the southern frontier of Galatia. To this end there was created a system of military roads radiating from Antioch to the garrison cities or colonies. The military colonies founded in this region were Olbasa, Comama, Cremna, Parlais, Lystra, and Antioch (cp CIL 3, suppl. 6974) [see PISIDIA]. Lystra was the most easterly of these colonies, and the bulwark of southern Galatia; for Derbe, which lay farther E., did not become important until 41 A.D., and was never a colony; nor was Iconium, the nearest important town to the N., a colony (until the time of Hadrian). Lystra thus stood in proud isolation in this nook of Galatia as the representative of Roman civilisation, and the Latin-speaking Coloni formed a military aristocracy amid the incolæ or Lycaonian natives of the town. The nearest Roman city was Antioch, the military centre.

The sympathy between the two colonies is illustrated by the inscription discovered at Antioch on the base of a statue presented by Lystra (Sterrett, Wolfe Exped. 352: τὴν λαμπροτάτην 'Αντιοχέων κολωνίαν ἡ λαμπροτάτη Λυστρέων κολωνία τὴν ἀδελφὴν . . . ἐτείμησεν). The Latin feeling in Lystra is shown by the fact that the name of the city is written Lustra on coins and in inscriptions, under the influence of a false analogy between the Lycaonian word and the Latin word lustrum (cp CIL 8 6596, Col. Lustrensium, and 6786. Coins have COLONIA . JULIA . FELIX . GEMINA . LUSTRA). Nevertheless, it was only special circumstances that for a time impressed this foreign character upon the town.

3. NT references. Lying as it did in a secluded glen ten miles S. of the great trade route, which naturally ran by way of Iconium and Derbe, Lystra retained more tenaciously than those towns the native stamp. When the hill-country was pacified, Lystra ceased to be of importance; and its situation was not such as to make it a great town by reason of its trade. Hence it was neither Romanised nor Hellenised; of all the places visited by Paul, Lystra was the only one the native character of which was sufficiently prominent to receive notice in Acts. The belief in the epiphany of the gods, and the use of the 'speech of Lycaonia' (Acts 14 11) in a moment of excitement testify to the permanence of the native character in the bulk of the population.

Athough on the ground of their constitution as Roman colonies, Lystra and Antioch go together, from the point of view of the organisation of the Roman province, Lystra goes with Derbe, these two together being the cities of the Lycaonian region of the province of Galatia. Hence, Lystra is grouped with Derbe in Acts 14 6 (where τὴν περίχωρον, 'the region that lieth round about' AV = the χώρα, Regio, of Lycaonia Galatica. See LYCAONIA, § 3, and GALATIA, § 7). From the point of view of its commercial relations, the connection of Lystra was closest with Iconium, and next to that with Antioch, for the trade flowed westwards. Hence, in Acts 14 19, it is Jewish traders from Iconium and Antioch that come to Lystra; and in Acts 16 2 Lystra and Iconium are grouped together as the district in which Timothy was well known (Rams. St. Paul the Traveller, 179). Lystra was the birthplace and home of Timothy, whose parentage illustrates the composite character of the population. 2 Tim. 3 10 f. clearly implies that Timothy was a spectator of the brutal assault made upon Paul by the Lystran rabble. Lystra was revisited by Paul on the way home on the completion of the first journey (Acts 14 21), and again on the second journey (Acts 16 1): the order of the names corresponds to the geographical order, for on the second journey Paul travelled westwards by way of the Cilician Gates. A visit to Lystra, on the third journey, is implied in Acts 18 23 (on the South Galatian theory only [cp GALATIA, §§ 7 and 9-14, 24]).

In later Christian history Lystra is rarely mentioned. Artemas or Artemius, one of the Seventy, is said to have been its bishop. Excavation will doubtless reveal much on this interesting and promising site.

MAACAH (so 2 S. 10 6 8) or Maachah (מַעֲכָה; μαχατει [B], μαχαθι [AF], μαχαθει [L]; other readings μαχει, αχαθει, ομαχαθει [=ο μαχ., cp L], νωχαθει, μοχατει, μαχαχααχει [B]; μοχατει [ℵ], μαχατι, μαχαται, μαχαθθει, μαχαθα, μωθατει, μααχαθ [A]; μααχαθι [Q]; μακαθι, μακαρθι, μαχαθιτου [L]). If the name is, as the present writer holds, probably a popular corruption of Jerahmeel (see MAACAH ii.), we need not wonder to find it both in the N. and in the S. of Palestine. The final editors of our narratives certainly took Maacah to be an Aramæan country. It is mentioned in connection with Rehob, Zobah, and Ish-tob (Tob?) as furnishing Aramæan mercenaries to the Ammonites, 2 S. 10 6 8 (μααχα [AL], αμαληκ[1] [B]); in the parallel, 1 Ch. 19 6, it is even called ARAM-MAACAH [RV], SYRIA-MAACAH [AV] (אֲרַם מַעֲכָה, συριας μοοχα [Bℵ], σ. μαχα [A], σ. μααχα [L]). In 2 S. 20 15 (AV) we read of a city called Abel of Beth-maacah (see ABEL-BETH-MAACAH), which is commonly supposed to have derived its name from the northern Maacah. It should be noted, however, that Abel-beth-maacah (so RV) is called (v. 19) 'a mother in Israel' whereas Maacah only became Israelitish after the defeat of Hadad-ezer;[2] the reading Abel-beth-maacah must be corrupt (see SHEBA, b. Bicri). The gentilic noun Maachathites (AV), Maacathites (RV), מַעֲכָתִי, occurs with 'Geshurites' in Josh. 13 13*a* [JE] (in b, מַעֲכָת, whence RV Maacath) and in Dt. 3 14 (AV 'Geshuri and Maachathi,' ὁ ιαειρ [AF]); here a northern people and land is evidently meant. In 2 S. 23 34, however, 'the Maacathite' as clearly indicates a southern district (see ELIPHELET, 2).

A corrupt form of 'Maacath' is חמת (EV HAMATH). Wi.[3] thinks that there were two Hamaths, one in Syria, the other on the S. of Mt. Hermon; the second חמת however is surely a corruption of מעכה (Maacah). We know as a fact that there was a southern Geshur (if that be the right vocalisation); it is hardly less certain that there was a southern Maacah, and the true text of that much-disputed passage, 2 S. 8 1*b*, most probably stated that 'David (not Solomon) took the Maacathite (district) out of the hand of the Ṣarephathites' (see METHEG-AMMAH). The popular corruption חמת may underlie the strange place-name חמטה (HUMTAH), and the odd personal names חמוטל and the more corrupt alternative form (𝔊BAL 2 Ch. 36 2) אבימל; מעכה, i.e., the southern Maacah, may also occur in Ps. 60 6 [8], emended text (see PSALMS [BOOK], § 28 [iv.]) and elsewhere.

T. K. C.

MAACAH RV, so also in 2 S. 3 3 AV, which has elsewhere MAACHAH (מַעֲכָה, μααχα [BAL]). Like MICAH and MICAIAH (qq.v.), the name seems to the present writer to be a popular corruption of Jeraḥme'el or Jeraḥme'elith ('a Jerahmeelite'). Talmai, the father of Maacah 2, was also probably designated 'a Jerahmeelite' (b. Ammiḥur?). See TALMAI 2, and MAACAH 2.

1. A 'son' (or 'daughter'?) of Naḥor (i.e., Ḥauran) by Reumah (Gen. 22 24, μωχα [ADL]). The name (see above) corresponds to 'Kemuel-abi-aram' (another disguise of Jeraḥme'el), in the list of Naḥor's sons by Milcah. See KEMUEL, NAHOR.

2. Daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, and mother of Absalom (2 S. 3 3, μααχαθ [A], 1 Ch. 3 2, μωχα [BA]). See GESHUR 2, TALMAI.

3. Mother of Abijah (1 K. 15 2 2 Ch. 11 20-22), also called MICAIAH (2 Ch. 13 2; AV MICHAIAH). In 1 K. 15 her father's name is given as Abišalom, in 2 Ch. 11 as Abšalom, but in 2 Ch. 13 as Uriel of Gibeah (𝔊BA, however, for 'Gibeah' has γαβαων, Vg. Gabaa, Pesh. rāmĕthā, 'Ramah'). It has been thought that the name Uriel may have been derived from 1 K. 15 10 (where it may originally have stood, see ASA, 1), the motive of the change being a desire to provide some other parentage for Abijah's mother (cp TAMAR 3).

A more satisfactory theory can be offered. The reading in 1 K. 15 2 is more nearly correct; אבישלם may be a corruption of ארימאל, and both ארימאל and אריאל corruptions of ירחמאל. Maacah, as we have seen, is probably a corruption of ירחמאלית, and the original statement was that Abijah's mother was named Maacah [a Jerahmeelite], of Gibeah. The Gibeah meant is that of Josh. 15 57.

4. Mother of Asa (1 K. 15 10, ανα [BL]; 2 Ch. 15 16). See ASA, 1. Most probably 1 K. 15 10 should run thus: 'His mother's name was Maacah [a Jerahmeelite],' on the analogy of 1 K. 15 2 (see 3). She was deposed from her position as queen-mother on account of some religious symbol (מפלצת, RV 'an abominable image') which she had made for ASHERAH [q.v.], 1 K. 15 13.

In Pesh. of 1 K. 15 10 Maacah's father's name is given as Ebed-salom, a mistaken emendation of Abishalom (cp 3).

5. Father of ACHISH [q.v.] (1 K. 2 39, αμησα [B]), called also MAOCH (מָעוֹךְ, 1 S. 27 2, αμμαχ [B], μωαβ [A], αχιμααν [L]); so Targ. in both passages. The reading of 𝔊L and Tg. is important. See TALMAI (ad fin.).

6. A concubine of Caleb (1 Ch. 2 48, μωχα [BA]), personifying the Jerahmeelites.

7. Wife (or 'mother,' Pesh.) of Machir (also=Jeraḥme'el?), the Manassite (1 Ch. 7 15 f., μοωχα [B], μοοχα [A]); cp MAACAH 1; SAUL 1.

8. Wife of Jehiel, 'father' of Gibeon (1 Ch. 8 29, μολχα [B], μιλχα [Ba? b?], μαχα [L]; 9 35 μοωχα [BℵA]). B's reading confirms the derivation from Jeraḥme'el.

9. Father of HANAN [2] (1 Ch. 11 43, μοωχα [Bℵ], μαχα [A]).

10. Father of Shephatiah, a Simeonite (1 Ch. 27 16, μαχα [B], μααχα [A], μαχατι [L]). Note that the next name is that of a son of Kemuel, another distortion of Jeraḥme'el.

For another instance of the distortion of 'Jeraḥme'el' into 'Maacah' see SAUL, § 1 (on 2 S. 20 14, Abel-beth-maacah). Cp also MEHOLATHITE; Maacah and Meholah are both probable corruptions of 'Jeraḥme'el.'

MACCABEES (FAMILY)

The name 'Maccabæus' (ΜΑΚΚΑΒΑΙΟϹ ; Lat. Machabæus ; Syr. ܡܩܒܝܐ) was originally a name of the third son of Mattathias (see § 3), commonly called Judas, and in the books of Maccabees is applied only to him.

1. The name 'Maccabee.'

(Ἰούδας ὁ καλούμενος Μακκαβαῖος 1 Macc. 2 4 3 1 ; Ἰουδ. [ὁ] Μακκ. 2 66 ; Ἰουδ. ὁ Μακκ. 5 24 2 Macc. 2 19 8 1 ; ὁ Μακκ. 1 Macc. 5 34 [A], 2 Macc. 8 5 16 10 19 ff. ; or simply Μακκ. 1 Macc. 5 34 [ℵV] 2 Macc. 10 1.)[1] It thus makes the impression of being a surname ; see, however, below.

As Maccabæus was the central figure in the struggle for Jewish independence, it was natural that his name should be used at a later day (so, e.g., in Origen) to designate the other members of the family to which he belonged (also called 'Hasmonæans' ; see below, § 2), or even in a wider sense, to apply to all those who were in any way associated with him or his brethren. Similarly, certain writings which are concerned directly or indirectly with the deeds or the times of these leaders have been entitled Books of Maccabees (Μακκαβαίων, or Μακκαβαϊκά ; properly, the Maccabæan history or times ; cp Βασιλειῶν, etc.). See below on the titles of '3 Macc.' (col. 2879) and '4 Macc.,' especially (col. 2872).

The form and the meaning of the Hebrew (or Aramaic) original of the name Maccabæus are alike uncertain. The Greek transcription points to a form with ḳ (ק). Against this, the Latin machabæus (ch= כ [k]) has been urged, but without sufficient reason.

The argument in favour of the form מכבי has been presented with great thoroughness and ingenuity by S. I. Curtiss (The Name Machabee, Leipsic, 1876), who attempts to give the Latin form 'Machabæus' direct connection with the Hebrew, through Jerome. The argument breaks down completely at that point, however, even if we let Jerome's indefinite 'Machabæorum primum librum Hebraicum reperi' (in Prol. Gal.) mean all it can, and believe that he had actually seen a Hebrew 1 Macc.[2] There is not the slightest probability that the old Latin translation of 1 Macc. was revised by Jerome ; on the contrary, all the evidence is strongly opposed to this view.

So far, therefore, as the testimony of the old versions is concerned, we have to guide us only the undoubted fact that the Greek form of the name is derived from a translation of the book made with painstaking accuracy directly from the Hebrew (see below, MACCABEES, FIRST, § 3 [col. 2858]), whilst the Latin form of the name is found in a version made from the Greek.[3]

The favourite interpretation of the name has connected it with the Hebrew maḳḳébeth (see HAMMER, 1) ;

[1] [The spelling of the name occasionally varies in AℵV.]

[2] There is justification for the suspicion that this statement of Jerome's was based simply on Origen's testimony to the existence of a Semitic 1 Macc. See col. 2857, § 1 ; and col. 2866, § 11.

[3] All other forms of the name, even those which appear in (late) Jewish writings (מכבאי, מכבי, מקבי), are derived either from the Greek or from the Latin.

Aram. maḳḳābā. Judas would thus have been called 'The Hammerer,' presumably because of his prowess in battle. To this, however, there are objections :

1. The form of the word—apparently an adjective ending in ai or i—which the Greek naturally suggests. We should hardly expect an adjective to be used in such a case.

2. The kind of hammer designated by the Hebrew מקבת (see Curtiss, 22 f.). Both Hebrew and Aramaic have words in common use for 'heavy hammer,' 'sledge-hammer,' whilst מ' is the smaller workman's tool. Especially in view of the familiar passages Jer. 50 23 (cp Bĕrākhōth, 28*b*) 51 20, the 'hammer' theory of Judas' name seems hardly credible.

3. It is by no means certain that the name Maccabee was given to Judas because of his valour. There is no hint of such an origin of the name in our oldest sources,[1] and it is evident that the interpretations of this nature found in later writings (e.g., in Gorionides) are mere guesses.

It is to be observed that not only Judas, but also each of his brothers, has a double name. In the passage 1 Macc. 2 2-5, John is said to have been called Gaddi (see col. 2853, n. 1); Simon, Thassi; Judas, Maccabæus;[2] Eleazar, Avaran; Jonathan, Apphus. It has commonly been supposed that these 'surnames' are all descriptive of the character or exploits of those to whom they are applied (thus Eleazar's name, Avaran, has been explained from the incident of his boring a hole (root חור) in the elephant); but the fact that not one of the names lends itself to any such interpretation should be conclusive against this theory.

On the contrary, the 'surnames' have rather the appearance of names given at birth (Gaddi is a familiar Jewish name; see below, § 3 1); and when the list 'Simeon, Judah, Eleazar, etc.,' is put over against the corresponding list 'Thassi, Maccabi, Avaran, etc.,' the probability at once suggests itself that the latter were the names originally given by Mattathias to his five sons, whilst the former were the names which they received later as the princes of the Jewish people (in the way that has been so generally customary, with kings, popes, caliphs, etc.).

It is a precisely similar case when Josephus (Ant. xiii. 4 8) writes: Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ Βάλας λεγόμενος, although 'Balas' was the original name of this king, and 'Alexander' the later official name which came to him with his elevation in rank (see Schür. GJV 1 178; ET 1 1, p. 240). Cp also the names of the queen Alexandra, whose Hebrew name had been Salome: Ἀλεξάνδρα ἡ καὶ Σαλίνα (Eusebius); Alexandra quæ et Salina vocabatur (Jerome, Comm. on Dan. 9 24 ff.); by Josephus called only Alexandra.

It is doubtful, therefore, whether much help is to be gained from the side of etymology in determining the Hebrew form and meaning of 'Maccabæus.'

For the various conjectures that have been made, see Curtiss, 12-24; Wace's Apocrypha, 1 247 f.; Schürer, GJV(2) 1 158; ET 1 1, p. 212 f.

As for the form, the evidence decidedly favours מקבי (with single ק?);[3] the possibility of a form with כ must, however, be admitted.

2. The name 'Hasmonæan.'

The Jews do not seem to have applied the name 'Maccabee' either to the members of the dynasty or to the books dealing with the events of their time. Instead, they used for both the adjective 'Hasmonæan' (Asmonæan, חשמוני, Ἀσαμωναῖος), which seems to have been the family name of the house of Mattathias.

'Hasmonæan' does not occur in the books of Maccabees, but is frequently used by Josephus (see the references, below), and appears once in the Mishna (Middōth 1 6),[4] where Judas and his brethren are called בני חשמונאי. Similarly Targ. 1 S. 2 4 (בית ח'), and many passages in the Gĕmārā and later Jewish literature. For the complete list of references, see Gaster, 'The Scroll of the Hasmonæans' (Transs. 9th Orient. Congress, Lond., 1892), p. 7; Levy, Neuhebr. und chald. Wörterbuch, s.v.). The Hebrew form חשמונים also occurs.

The origin of the name is wholly obscure. It was probably borne originally either by Mattathias himself, or by one of his ancestors; but we are quite destitute of information on this point. In 1 Macc. 2 1, Mattathias is called 'the son of John, son of Simeon' (Ματταθίας Ἰωάννου τοῦ Συμεών);[1] Josephus, Ant. xii. 6 1, carries the line one step farther back, adding τοῦ Ἀσαμωναίου (cp xiv. 16 4 xvi. 7 1); but it is not likely that he had any authority for this.[2] The adjective may have originated in the name of a man, Hasmon (cp the Chronicler's חָשֻׁם; see HASHUM); or, more probably, in the name of a place (cp P's חשמון, Josh. 15 27 and חשמונה, Nu. 33 29 f.; see HESHMON, HASHMONAH); or even in an appellative, though the absence of a root חשם in the Hebrew-Aramaic literature known to us makes this very unlikely.

The fanciful etymology connecting the name with the ἅπ. λεγ. חשמנים, Ps. 68 32 (the result of a scribe's blunder), which is then explained by the Arabic ḥašm (!), 'fatness,' should be put aside once for all.

3. Uprising under Mattathias.

While Palestine was under the Egyptian rule, the Jews were not directly interfered with in the exercise of their religion and customs. Even then, however, Greek cities were springing up in all parts of the land, and a strong pressure was gradually being brought to bear on Judaism by the rapid encroachment of Greek thought and culture. After the beginning of the Seleucid rule (198 B.C., under Antiochus III., the Great) this pressure was vastly increased, both from without and from within. The Syrian kings did not find it easy to hold together the heterogeneous elements of their domain, and it was to their interest to discourage the exclusive Jewish religion. To the Jews themselves, the struggle against Hellenism might well have seemed a losing one. There was a strong party in Judæa that openly favoured union with the Gentiles and the adoption of the new culture. See, e.g., 1 Macc. 1 11 14 15 2 Macc. 4 7-15; etc. On the other hand, as was natural, those who held to the national religion redoubled their zeal. At the head of these was the well-defined extreme legalistic party of 'the Pious'[3] (חסידים, Ἀσιδαῖοι, see LOVINGKINDNESS). Soon after the beginning of the reign of Antiochus (IV.) Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) matters came to a crisis (see ISRAEL, § 70 ff.; ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION). It was not, however, at Jerusalem, but in one of the smaller towns of Judæa that the revolt broke out. When the king's officer, who compelled the people to sacrifice to the heathen gods, came to Modein (Μωδεΐν; see MODIN), a village in the mountains near Lydda, a man of that place named Mattathias (מַתִּתְיָה, 'Gift of Yahwè'; see MATTITHIAH), son of John, a priest of the order of Joarib (1 Macc. 2 1), offered resistance to the king's command; he slew the officer and a Jew who was offering the sacrifice, pulled down the altar, and fled, with his five sons and many others who joined them, into the mountains. Multitudes followed, and the revolt very soon assumed formidable proportions. Mattathias and his companions also went through the land, pulling down the heathen altars, putting to death the apostates, and stirring up the remainder of the people to insurrection. In this same year, however (Sel. 146;

[1] If the author of 1 Macc. had thus understood the name, how could he have failed to make some use of the figure in 3 3-5?

[2] That Judas' name is written with the Greek adjective ending -αῖος, and not simply transliterated, like Γαδδί (see § 3, 1), etc., is of course due to the fact that it had already become a household word among the Greek-speaking Jews.

[3] In favour of the single rather than the double ק, the following considerations may be urged:—(1) The possibility that Josephus wrote the name with a single κ (so generally in Niese's ed.). (2) The occasional employment of κκ to represent a single ק. Thus, Ακκαρων for עקרון; Νακκαρειμ for נקדים (Am. 1 1 [unless we should point naḳḳādim]), etc. (3) The Latin form, which may well have become fixed in use before the translation from our Greek version was made.

[4] In this passage, certain chambers (לשכות) belonging to the temple are described. Of one of them it is said: מזרחית צפונית בה גנזו בני חשמונאי (var. חשמוני) את אבני המזבח ששקצום מלכי יון; 'In the NE. chamber the Hasmonæans laid away the stones of the altar which the Grecian kings had defiled.' Cp 1 Macc. 4 46.

[1] Wellh., Ph. u. Sadd. 94 n., wished to read 'Hasmon' in place of 'Simeon.'

[2] Similarly Josephus speaks of the members of this family in a few places as οἱ Ἀσαμωναίου παῖδες (Vit. 1; Ant. xx. 8 11 20 10), as well as οἱ Ἀσαμωναῖοι and τὸ Ἀσαμωναίων γένος. See Schürer, 1 198; ET 1 1, p. 266.

[3] [See Che. OPs. 56 n., and ASSIDEANS; and on the further development of the two opposing parties, see PHARISEES and SADDUCEES.]

167, 166 B.C.), Mattathias died; first having committed the leadership of the insurgent people to his son Judas.

Thus began the supremacy of the 'Hasmonæan,' or 'Maccabæan,' house which was to play such an important part in Jewish history. Cp HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 17. Two of the five sons, John and Eleazar, did not long survive their father.

1. John, the eldest, originally (? see § 1) called Gaddi, גַּדִּי,[1] was captured and slain by a marauding Arab tribe, in 161, while he was engaged in carrying the property of the Maccabæan party into the country of the Nabatæans for safe keeping (1 Macc. 9 35-42).[2] As this was after Jonathan had succeeded Judas in the leadership, and no other mention is made of him, we may conclude that he was recognised as inferior to his brethren.

2. Eleazar, the fourth son, who also bore the name Avaran[3] (see § 1), is the hero of the battle (lost by the Jews) against the forces of Lysias at Beth-Zechariah, in 162. Seeing that one of the elephants of the enemy's host was furnished with the royal trappings, and believing therefore that the king rode upon it, he crept under the animal and stabbed it, and was crushed by its weight (1 Macc. 6 43-46). He receives no further mention in the books of Maccabees.

The following table exhibits the genealogy of the Hasmonæans, with the date at which each died (as given in Schürer):—

4. Judas Maccabæus. Judas (יְהוּדָה), the third son of Mattathias, and the leader of the Jewish people in their struggle for religious freedom, is one of the most heroic figures in all the history of the nation. On his name Makkabi, Maccabæus, see § 1. If the view there advocated, that this was his original name, and that he and his brethren were given special names as the princes of Israel, is correct, it is not unlikely that he received the name Judah because of his military prowess (cp Gen. 49 9, etc.). According to the account given in 1 Macc. 2 66, Mattathias at the time of his death appointed Judas captain of the hosts of Israel, because he had been 'strong and mighty from his youth.' The army which he commanded at first was not made up chiefly of the adherents of a single party, as seems to be asserted in 2 Macc. 14 6, but was recruited from all classes and parties in Judæa. It is true, the 'Ασιδαῖοι (see the preceding §) were foremost in the movement which Judas led; but neither he nor his brethren were ever identified with that sect.

Marvellous success attended Judas from the first. After gaining a series of brilliant victories over the Syrian hosts sent against him, he was enabled in 165 to purify the temple and restore its worship. His armies, no longer made up merely of religious enthusiasts, were now employed for campaigns against the Edomites and the Ammonites; also in Galilee, Gilead, and the Philistine territory. Judas thus made himself the champion, in the wider sense, of the Jewish nation, not merely of its religious rights. In 163, the object sought by the Jews in the beginning of the struggle was actually attained. They were given full religious liberty, in return for their submission to the king, now Antiochus (V.) Eupator. (For the circumstances, see 1 Macc. 6 48-63, and the summary of the history given below under MACCABEES, FIRST, § 2 [col. 2858].)

Judas' career as a military leader was by no means ended. From this time on, the Jews were engaged in a fateful struggle among themselves; the Hellenising party contending for supremacy with the national party, of which Judas and his brethren were the leaders. Certain adherents of the king, notably one Alcimus, who became high priest (see ALCIMUS), succeeded through misrepresentations in calling in the help of a Syrian army. Judas' valour as a military captain, however, was again displayed, and the Jewish arms triumphed. After the decisive battle near Beth-horon, in 161, Judas was again virtually the political head of the Jewish people, with more power than ever before. It does not appear, however, that he exercised the office of high priest, as his successors did. Probably it did not occur to him to do so.

It was at this time that Judas took at last the momentous step of asserting the political independence of the Jewish nation. Two ambassadors were sent to Rome (1 Macc. 8 1 ff. 17 ff.), in the not unreasonable hope of gaining the support of the Romans against the Syrians, and thus securing the permanent triumph of the Jewish national party. The Romans did in fact return a favourable answer (1 Macc. 8 21 ff.), but it came too late to be of any assistance to the Jews. Only about two months after the victory which Judas had gained over the Syrian captain Nicanor near Beth-horon, the king (Demetrius I.) sent against him an army in comparison with which the Jewish forces were but a handful. Judas refused to retire from the field without a battle, and fought desperately; but his army was utterly routed, and he himself was slain (1 Macc. 9 1-19). The cause of the loyal Jews seemed to have fallen with him.

There is but one estimate of the character of Judas. He was a true patriot and a born captain. The enthusiasm of the writer of 1 Macc. (3 3-9) is shared by the writer of 2 Macc., who had otherwise no interest in the Hasmonæan house. Devout and zealous for the law, as his father had been, prompt of action and brave to rashness, Judas was able to inspire confidence in those whom he led, and to gain surprising results with small means. It was as the fruit of his example and achievements, made possible by a peculiar combination of circumstances, that the Jewish nation under the Hasmonæans achieved such successes in the decades following; though these later gains also were due chiefly to the political situation in the Syrian kingdom (see below, § 5), and were necessarily only temporary.

5. Jonathan. Jonathan ('Ιωναθαν, יְהוֹנָתָן), the fifth son of Mattathias, bore also the name Apphūs, 'Απφους, 1 Macc. 2 5 (see § 1). The original form and meaning of the latter name are quite unknown.

We have no means of knowing with what guttural letter the word began, or what Semitic consonant the Greek ς represents. On the Syriac transcription חפוס no reliance whatever can be placed; see preceding col., n. 3.

Jonathan is mentioned occasionally in 1 Macc. (5 17 24 55) in connection with Judas and Simon as taking a prominent part in the earlier Maccabæan campaigns; and upon the death of Judas, he was unanimously chosen to succeed him as leader of the national party (1 Macc. 9 28-31).

His opponents had at that time decidedly the upper hand. The Hellenising party was triumphant[1] (see the preceding §),

[1] The name גַּדִּי, which has a distinctly heathen sound (see NAMES, § 57, and Kerber, Hebräische Eigennamen, 1897, p. 67; cp GAD, § 1) was not uncommon among the Jews. The Greek form Γαδδις given by many MSS in 1 Macc. 2 2 received its last letter from the following word.

[2] [In 2 Macc. 8 22 10 19, by an ancient false reading (?) he is called Joseph.]

[3] The original form and meaning of the name, which occurs in two places, 1 Macc. 2 5 and 6 43, are quite uncertain. Many Greek MSS give the form Σαυαραν (i.e., Ελεαζαρ ὁ Σαυαραν side by side with Ελεαζαρος Αυαραν), which is also possible. The Syriac, indeed, writes the word with initial ח; but it may be questioned whether this fact should be allowed any weight. As in the case of the name Makkabi, it seems probable that the Syrian translator can have had nothing but the Greek to guide him.

[1] In 1 Macc. 9 24 read: 'in those days their iniquity (רִעָם instead of רעב, 'famine') waxed exceedingly great,' etc.

and, aided by the Syrians, used every means to secure its advantage (1 Macc. 9 23-26). Many former adherents abandoned the Maccabæan cause (v. 24*b*), and those who remained faithful were subjected to intimidation and even violence (v. 26). Jonathan, with his comparatively few followers, was compelled for some years to keep in the background; at first, as a freebooter, making raids in various parts of the land, and at one time (158 B.C.) unsuccessfully pursued by a Syrian army (1 Macc. 9 58-72); then, at the head of a sort of rival government at Michmash, a short distance N. of Jerusalem, where his party seems to have steadily gained in numbers and in power (ibid. v. 73). This was undoubtedly due largely to his own ability, as well as to the truly popular cause which he represented, and to the fact that the Hellenising party since the death of Alcimus (159 B.C.) was without a leader.

At length the scales were turned completely in Jonathan's favour in an unexpected way. Demetrius was compelled to contest the possession of the Syrian throne with a powerful rival, Alexander Balas. Both saw the necessity of making overtures to Jonathan, who finally espoused the cause of Balas, in return for which service he was made the head of the Jewish people, with considerable power, and was also appointed high priest of the nation. This (153 B.C.) was the real beginning of the Hasmonæan rule in Jerusalem. Jonathan continued to hold the office of high priest (vacant, apparently, since the death of Alcimus), and to increase, little by little, the advantage already gained. He was confirmed in his authority by Balas, when the latter became king (1 Macc. 10 65); was received with high honours at Ptolemais by Balas and Ptolemy Philomētor, king of Egypt (ibid. v. 59 ff.); and finally, when Demetrius II. became king of Syria, succeeded by a daring stroke in obtaining a series of most important concessions to Judæa. See the interesting account in 1 Macc. 11 20-37; and cp Schürer, GJV⁽²⁾ 1 182 ff.; ET 1 245 ff.

During all this time Jonathan showed himself a wise and bold leader, both in peace and in war. The Syrian power continued to be divided among rival aspirants to the throne, so that not only Jonathan, but also his successors, were enabled to maintain their power by making shrewd use of the situation. The purpose of completely throwing off the Syrian yoke—a purpose already cherished by Judas—was not lost sight of by Jonathan. He sent ambassadors with letters of friendship to Rome, Sparta, and other places (144 B.C.?), at the same time working diligently to strengthen Judæa in every possible way (see esp. 1 Macc. 11 35 f. 12 32-38). Soon after this, however, Jonathan fell a victim to Syrian treachery. Trypho, the chief captain of the young Antiochus VI. who was now contending with Demetrius II. for the supremacy, became himself an aspirant to the throne. Fearing Jonathan for some reason, and wishing to put him out of the way, Trypho enticed him into Ptolemais and there put him to death (1 Macc. 12 39-53). This was at the close of 143.

6. Simon.

Simon (Σιμων,[1] שמעון) was the second son of Mattathias; according to 1 Macc. 2 3 called also Thassi (Θασσι); see § 1. The Semitic form and original meaning of the name Thassi can no longer be determined. In 1 Macc. he is frequently mentioned with honour in the account of the times of Judas and Jonathan, as an able military leader. Thus 5 17 21 ff. 9 67 f. 11 65 f. 12 33 f. 38 f. During the reign of Jonathan, Antiochus VI. appointed Simon general (στρατηγός) over an important district (11 59). In 2 65 Mattathias is represented as singling him out as the wisest of the brethren, and appointing him their counsellor.[2] Simon seems to have been in all respects a worthy successor of Judas and Jonathan.

Upon the death of Jonathan, Simon promptly took his place at the head of the nation, both as captain and as high priest, being confirmed in this by all the people. He continued to carry out with energy the policy pursued by Jonathan, building up and fortifying Jerusalem and the other strongholds of Judæa (13 10 33 43-48 52 14 7 32-34), extending the territory of the Jews, taking every advantage of the Syrian dissensions, and sending embassies abroad. In all these things he was enabled by the circumstances to attain much more than had been possible for his predecessors, so that his reign was a glorious one for the Jewish people.

In 142, soon after the accession of Simon, the Syrian yoke was at last removed from Israel. Demetrius II., yielding to Simon's demand, formally recognised the independence of Judæa (see the triumphant words of the historian, 1 Macc. 13 41 f.). Soon after this, Simon succeeded in gaining possession of the Acra, or citadel of Jerusalem, which had been occupied by a Syrian garrison for twenty-six years, ever since the beginning of the Maccabæan struggle[1] (13 49-53). In the brief season of peace and prosperity which followed (1 Macc. 14 4-15),[2] Simon's services to his people were given important recognition. A solemn assembly held at Jerusalem in 141 confirmed him in the offices of governor and high priest,[3] and made both these offices hereditary. Thus, a Hasmonæan dynasty was formally established. An inscription in Simon's honour (col. 2864 [b]) was composed and put in a conspicuous place.[4] At about this time, also, embassies were sent to Rome (col. 2863 [a]) and to the Spartans (ib.), which resulted successfully (col. 2864 [c]), 1 Macc. 14 16-24 15 15-24. Soon, however, Simon became involved in other wars, as the Syrian throne changed hands and his help was needed. Moreover, Antiochus (VII.) Sidētes sent an army against Judæa, in the hope of recovering some of the possessions which the Jews had gained; but his captain was defeated and driven from the country by two of Simon's sons, Judas and John. Near the beginning of 135, Simon fell a victim to the plot of his own son-in-law, Ptolemy, 'captain of the plain of Jericho,' who wished to obtain the power for himself. With two of his sons, Mattathias and Judas, Simon was received by Ptolemy into the fortress DOK (q.v.), near Jericho, and there treacherously murdered.[5]

7. John Hyrcanus.

John, son of Simon, generally called Hyrcanus, Ὑρκανός,[6] is said in 1 Macc. 13 53 to have been put in charge of the fortress Gazara by his father in 142. John also took a prominent part in the defeat of the Syrian general Cendebæus (16 2 ff. 9 f.). Immediately after the murder of Simon, Ptolemy sent men to Gazara to kill John, who was now the legitimate successor to the leadership of Israel. John was informed of the plot, however, and with true Maccabæan promptness slew the messengers and made all speed to Jerusalem, where he arrived in advance of his rival, and made his position secure. His reign of thirty years, though by no means peaceful, was decidedly successful politically. In the first year after his accession, he was temporarily humbled by Antiochus Sidētes, who besieged Jerusalem with success, obtaining important concessions from the Jews, besides breaking down the city wall. These losses were soon repaired, however, as the Syrian government was again involved in sore difficulties. Hyrcanus rebuilt the city wall (1 Macc. 16 23), and began in 128, immediately upon the death of Antiochus, a series of important campaigns, one fruit of which was the humbling of the Samaritans and the destruction of their temple. The territory of the Jews was very considerably extended (reaching such an extent as it had not had for many centuries), and their independence completely restored.

6 For attempts to explain this name, which had already been in use for some time among the Jews, see Schürer, 1 204 (ET i. 1, p. 273 f.).

In several respects the reign of Hyrcanus marks a departure from the simpler ways (and perhaps the ideals) of his predecessors. Hyrcanus waged war with the aid of foreign mercenaries, for example, and had his own name engraved on the coins of his reign. It is an especially interesting and significant fact that he cut loose from the Pharisees, and identified himself with the Sadducees (see SCRIBES AND PHARISEES, SADDUCEES, and Che. OPs. 24 f. 39). Concerning the events of the latter part of his reign we have little information. He died in 105 B.C.

MACCABEES (BOOKS)

CONTENTS

FIRST MACCABEES

1. Title. By far the most important of the several writings known as the 'Books of the Maccabees' (Μακκαβαίων βιβλία, or Μακκαβαϊκά) is the history commonly entitled 'Maccabees.' The title borne by the book in its original Hebrew form (see below, § 3) is not known.

Many scholars have tried to recognise it in a well-known passage quoted by Eusebius (HE 6 25) from Origen. Origen enumerates the (twenty-two) books of the Hebrew canon, giving the Hebrew names in Greek transliteration, and then adds: 'Besides these there is "the Maccabaïca," which is entitled Sarbēth Sabanaiel.'[1] It is beyond doubt that the reference is to a Hebrew or Aramaic 1 Macc., whose title is transliterated. All attempts to explain this title from the Hebrew, however, have hitherto been futile (see the comms., and especially Curtiss, The Name Machabee, 1876, p. 30).[2] On the other hand, the solution proposed by Dalman (Gramm. 6), according to which the two strange words in their original form stood for the Aramaic ספר בית חשמנאי, seems very plausible. The title 'Book of the Hasmonæans' would be eminently suitable for 1 Macc. (cp 5 62, and the actual superscription of the later Aramaic composition dealing with the history of this time: see below, § 11); and it is easy to see how, by the aid of common scribal blunders,[3] the form in Eusebius could have been reached. It may be doubted, however, whether even this can give us any sure clue to the original title of 1 Macc. This plainly Aramaic form of words is not likely to have been the superscription of a work written in Hebrew; it is much more probable that the work known (by hearsay only?) to Origen was an Aramaic translation, such as must have been made very early. As will appear in the sequel (§ 11), all the evidence goes to show that the Hebrew 1 Macc. was current only for a very brief period. If we suppose, then, that the above explanation of the name recorded by Origen is correct, there would still remain the possibility that (as frequently happened) the title borne by the translation was quite independent of that borne by the original.

2. Contents. The book is a history of the Jewish struggle for religious freedom and for independence under the Maccabees. It covers the period of forty years beginning with the accession of Antiochus (IV.) Epiphanes, 175 B.C., and ending with the death of Simon, the third of the Maccabæan leaders, 135 B.C. It is for the most part a narrative of events in their chronological order, attention being given chiefly to military and political affairs, and, in fact, to all that concerned the relation of the Jews to other nations.

[1] ἔξω δὲ τούτων ἐστὶ τὰ Μακκαβαϊκά, ἅπερ ἐπιγέγραπται Σαρβηθ Σαβαναιελ. See also the superscription of the Syriac 1 Macc. (Lagarde's Apocrypha Syriace), which was evidently derived from these words of Origen.

[2] Of all these attempts it may be said, that they have an exceedingly improbable sound. Most of them rest on the reading Σ' Σαρβανεελ, which has been in vogue since the sixteenth century, but without any good authority.

[3] The correct transliteration would be σφαρ βηθ ασαμωναιε.

The narrative is continuous, and the treatment uniform throughout the book. The material may be divided conveniently as follows:—

1. (1 1-9) The briefest possible introduction, beginning with the conquest of Alexander, and describing in general terms the origin of the Seleucid empire. 2. (1 10-64) Desperate condition of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes. His attempts to abolish the Jewish religion. 3. (2 1-70) The uprising at Modein (167 B.C.) and the growth of the rebellion led by Mattathias. 4. (3 1-4 35) The first victories gained by the Jews under the leadership of Judas Maccabæus. 5. (4 36-61) Purification of the temple and dedication of the new altar (165 B.C.). 6. (5 1-68) Campaigns conducted by Judas against the surrounding nations. 7. (6 1-17) Death of Epiphanes, in Persia, and accession of Eupator (164 B.C.). 8. (6 18-63) Further wars with the Syrians. Concession of religious freedom to the Jews, in return for their submission. 9. (7 1-50) Demetrius gains possession of the throne (162 B.C.). Death of Nicanor. 10. (8 1-9 22) Treaty with the Romans. Death of Judas (161 B.C.). 11. (9 23-10 66) Jonathan succeeds Judas as military leader of the Jews. Supported by the pretender Alexander Balas, he becomes the high priest of the nation (153 B.C.). He is received in state by Alexander and Ptolemy (Philometor), King of Egypt, at Ptolemais. 12. (10 67-11 74) Further battles fought by Jonathan; and his relations with the Syrian kings. 13. (12 1-53) Embassies to Rome and Sparta. Death of Jonathan (end of 143 B.C.). 14. (13 1-14 15) Fortunes of the Jews under Simon. They secure their political independence (142 B.C.). The Syrians are driven from the castle in Jerusalem. Peace in the land. 15. (14 16-49) Renewal of friendly relations with the Spartans and with Rome. A formal record is drawn up by the people and put in a conspicuous place in honour of Simon, who is thus publicly declared ruler of the Jews (141 B.C.). 16. (15 1-16 24) Relations of Simon with Antiochus Sidētes. His two sons defeat the Syrian general. Murder of Simon (135 B.C.).

3. Original Language. As to the language in which 1 Macc. was written, there is no room for doubt. Mention has been made of the testimony of Origen (§ 1) and Jerome (col. 2850, towards end), which testimony, though less valuable than it at first appears to be, shows at least that each of those great scholars regarded it as an undisputed fact that the book was written in Hebrew. Internal evidence proves beyond question that this opinion (or church tradition) was correct.

That the language was Semitic is evident. Semitic idioms follow one another in such number and variety as would be inexplicable in a Greek composition; see, for example, 1 29 (cp Gen. 41 1, etc.), 36 58, Ἰσραὴλ τοῖς εὑρισκομένοις = לישראל הנמצאים (incorrectly punctuated by Swete, and frequently misunderstood), 2 40 4 2 5 30-33 6 21 (ἐξ αὐτῶν [ℵV] as subject of the verb; so also 7 33), 8 1 9 44 etc.; and such passages as 3 15-26 5 1-8 28-34. The form of many of the proper names shows that they are transliterated from a Semitic text; thus φυλιστιειμ; the names in 11 34 (Schür. GJV 1 183; ET 1 245 f.); Ιμαλκουε [ℵV] for ימלכו, 11 39 (see Schür. l.c.; We. IJG(4), 270), etc. In 14 27, ενσαραμελ [A, ενασαραμελ (אV)] (cp now Exp. T 11 523 ff.) is plainly the transliteration of some word or words which the translator did not understand. Cp also χαφεναθα, 12 37. The weighty evidence afforded by occasional mistranslation, or by renderings which can only be explained as the result of misunderstanding or accidental corruption of the original Semitic text, is not wanting. Thus 8 29, ἔστησαν (mistranslating the Hebrew perfect tense: 'the Romans hereby make agreement'; see the following verses, and cp the similar mistake in 14 28, ἐγνώρισεν ἡμῖν for הודענו; 'we make proclamation'); 9 24, λιμός (רעב for רֹעָם); 10 1, ὁ Ἐπιφανής instead of τοῦ Ἐπιφανοῦς,—a mistranslation made very easy by the Semitic usage in regard to such adjectives; 10 72, οἱ πατέρες σου (אבותיך instead of צבותיך [for צבאותיך], 'thine armies'); 14 9, στολὰς πολέμου (!) (reading צבא instead of צבי, 'gay apparel').[1]

That the Semitic language was Hebrew, not Aramaic, is everywhere manifest.

See the evidence furnished by many of the passages cited above; and add further, 2 39 3 19 (כי אם; also 9 6), 5 40 7 35, and the remarkable succession of Hebrew idioms in 5 1-8.

4. Author.

Nothing is known concerning the author of 1 Macc., beyond the facts that can be gathered by inference from his book. He was certainly a devout and patriotic Jew.

It can hardly be doubted, moreover, that the author lived and wrote in Palestine. It is plain from every part of the book that his personal interests were all in that land.

His acquaintance with the geography and topography of the country is strikingly minute; when, on the contrary, he has occasion to mention foreign lands, he shows himself much less accurately informed. In his narrative he frequently introduces such details as would have no importance for one living at a distance from the scenes and events described. See, for example, 3 24 7 19 8 19 9 2-4 33 34 43 12 36 f. 13 22 f. 16 5 6.

The writer of this history, furthermore, must have stood near to the centre of Jewish political affairs.

There is, to be sure, nothing to require us to suppose that he himself took an active part in the events he records; but he is most plainly in his element when he is dealing with affairs of state, military movements, and court intrigues. He must have been a man of rank, and personally acquainted with the leaders of his people.

The author shows himself a loyal adherent of the Hasmonæan house; it was to this family that Israel owed its rescue and its glory; see especially 5 62, and cp 13 3 14 18 26 16 2. That he should extol the character and deeds of Judas was of course to be expected, but his admiration of the other Hasmonæan leaders is hardly less emphatically expressed.

See what he says of Jonathan, 9 73 10 15-21 59-66 11 20-27 71 12 35 52 f. (notice also 10 61 11 25); of Simon, 13 3 ff. 47 f. 14 4-15 16 14; and of John, 13 53 16 23 f.

When in addition to these facts it is observed in what a favourable light the Jewish priesthood is exhibited throughout the book—the renegade high priests Jason and Menelaus, for example, are not mentioned at all (contrast 2 Macc. 4 7-5 23)—the conjecture of Geiger (Urschrift, 206 ff.) that the author of 1 Macc. was a Sadducee seems not improbable (see SADDUCEES).[2]

i. The date of the composition of 1 Macc. can be determined approximately. If we assume the book to be the work of a single writer, as seems necessary (see below, § 9), it is plain from 16 11-24 that it must have been finished after the beginning of the reign of John Hyrcanus (135-106 B.C.). It is also evident from the way in which the writer speaks of the Romans that the days of Pompey and the Roman rule were not yet dreamed of: he emphasises chiefly the Romans' fidelity as allies (8 1 12 12 1 14 40), and implies everywhere that they are friends to be proud of, although outside the horizon of ordinary Jewish affairs (8 1 ff. 19). The book must, therefore, have been completed before the year 63 B.C.

ii. There are grounds for bringing the date of composition within narrower limits.

(1) The passage 16 23 f., in particular, has afforded a basis for argument. It reads as follows:—

'Now the rest of the acts of John, and of his wars, and of his valiant deeds which he did, and of the building of the walls which he built, and of his doings, behold they are written in the chronicles of his high-priesthood, from the time that he was made high priest after his father.'

It has been customary to conclude from this mention of the 'rest of the deeds' of John, and especially from the reference to the 'chronicle of his high-priesthood,' that his reign must have been far advanced,[1] or even ended (so most scholars since Eichhorn), at the time when these words were written. The cogency of this reasoning may be doubted, however; the more so, as every particle of the remaining evidence points to a different conclusion.

It is evident that the writer wished to bring his history to an end with the close of Simon's reign. If this had been his only purpose, however, he would hardly have followed 16 17 with just these concluding verses 18-22, which tell only half of what was necessary to be told, if the escape of John was to be narrated at all, and leave the history of the Hasmonæan house and of Jerusalem (see v. 20) in suspense. To suppose that these verses were intended merely to serve as the necessary bridge from the reign of Simon to that of John, does not explain them satisfactorily; and the greater the interval of time supposed to have elapsed between these events and the writing of the history, the greater the difficulty becomes.

On the supposition that the historian finished his work soon after the beginning of the reign of Hyrcanus, and wished to conclude it with complimentary mention of his sovereign, every part of the closing passage 16 18-24 is at once satisfactorily explained.

It is all precisely what we should expect. The events following Simon's death were then familiar to every one; it was only necessary to lead up to the statement of John's prompt action (v. 22), and then to add the customary formula: 'the rest of his great deeds,' etc. For the only deeds that are specially mentioned—the carrying on of war, and the building of walls—we have no need to look further than the earlier years of his reign; the wars that brought him his chief glory, and the rebuilding of the wall that had been razed by Antiochus Sidētes, were both begun, it would seem, during or immediately after the year 128 (see col. 2856, § 7). As for the 'chronicle of his high-priesthood' (if we suppose the words to be more than a mere compliment),[2] the historian could have referred to it equally well at any time after the beginning of the reign. If there really was such a chronicle, it was probably the continuation of the record of the preceding reigns; see the latter part of v. 24 (see also below, § 8).

(2) The impression thus gained from the closing verses of the book, that it was completed during the reign of John Hyrcanus, is confirmed by the tone of security and political self-respect that is so evident in all parts of the history. With the beginning of the last century B.C. came a marked decline.

(3) On the other hand, there are indications that the historian began his work during the reign of Simon.

The striking passage 14 4-15, in particular, points distinctly in this direction. So, too, does the much discussed verse 13 42. Even if documents and coins (?) were dated in this way (see Schür. GJV 1 192 ff.; ET 1 257 ff.), the custom can have continued only for a very short time. The only historians who would be likely to write such a verse as this would be those of Simon's own day. Cp on the other hand 14 27, which is equally significant whether written by the author of 1 Macc. or by some one else. The compliment paid to Simon in 2 65 may also be taken as evidence; there is nowhere in the sequel anything that could be regarded as especially illustrating the quality here ascribed to him, or as implying that he was looked upon as the counsellor of his brethren.

iii. The theory best accounting for all the facts (see also below)—and no really plausible argument can be urged against it—would seem to be, that the greater part of this history was composed and written under the inspiration of Simon's glorious reign, and that it was finished in the early part of the reign of John Hyrcanus. That is, the book was probably written between 140 and 125 B.C.

The passage 13 30 can give us no additional help. The words 'unto this day' are the indispensable (OT) formula added to the account of such monuments, and would have been used in any case, whether the time that had elapsed were two years or twenty. This is simply one of the many illustrations of the way in which the writer models his history after the pattern of the older Hebrew scriptures; the use of the formula here serving

[1] The same confusion of these two words more than once in Daniel; see Moore in JBL, 1896, pp. 195, 197.

[2] Geiger was certainly wrong, however, in regarding the book as a 'party document.'

[1] See the advocates of this view cited in Grimm, Comm. 24.

[2] It is not probable, however, that they are anything more than this. See below, § 8.

to show his sense of the importance of the monument (cp 9 22 16 23 f.).[1]

Viewed from the literary point of view, 1 Macc. makes a most favourable impression. Its author was evidently a writer of unusual talents as well as of considerable experience. His narrative is constructed with a true sense of proportion and with skill in the arrangement of the material. The style, which is strongly marked, is plainly his own, though formed on the classical Hebrew models. Reminiscences of OT phraseology are of course frequent, and certain familiar formulas from the older Hebrew history are occasionally introduced (e.g., 2 69 f. 9 20-22 13 26 16 23 f.); but there is no further evidence of any imitation, conscious or unconscious, of the older writers. The chief characteristics of the style are terseness and simplicity. At the same time, the narrative is full of lively details, and is never suffered to lag.

6. Literary characteristics.

The reserve of the writer is worthy of especial notice. Though it is evident that he is intensely interested in all the history he is recording, he generally contents himself with giving a purely objective view of the course of events, keeping his reflections to himself. He writes as a loyal and devout Jew, yet without indulging in such abuse of his enemies as is so common, for example, in 2 Macc.[2] It cannot be said, however, that he does not display enthusiasm. It breaks out into momentary expression again and again, all through the book.

See, for example, 2 48 3 3-9 4 24 58 5 63 f. 11 51 14 8 ff., etc. On such occasions as these, and in fact wherever the writer, for one reason or another, wishes to make his story especially impressive, or is carried away by his feeling, he rises to poetry in the true Semitic manner. Examples are 1 25-28 37-40 3 3-9 45 9 41[3] 14 4-15. Similarly, the impassioned utterances of Mattathias in 2 7-13 49-68, of the people in 3 50 ff., and of Antiochus in 6 10 ff., are expanded in poetic form; cp also the two addresses of Judas to his army 3 18-22 4 8-11.

In all parts of the book we meet the same striking combination of dignity and naïveté, the same excellences of style. We may well believe that in its original form it was a fine specimen of Hebrew prose.

Regarding the religious standpoint of the author, it is to be said that in this respect also the book deserves to hold a high place in Jewish literature. There is nowhere any room for doubt as to his patriotism, in the best sense of the word. He believes in Israel as the people chosen of God.

7. Religious character.

The author is zealous for all the time-honoured institutions; for the law and the ordinances (1 11 15 43 49 54 ff. 62 ff.[4] 2 20 ff. 27 42 48 3 21 14 14 f. etc.), for the holy scriptures (1 56 3 48 12 9), for Jerusalem and the sanctuary (1 21 37 f. 2 7 f. 3 43 45 51 4 38 59 7 37 42 9 54 f.). He refers repeatedly to God's deliverance of Israel in the past (2 59 f. 4 9 ff. 30 7 41), and expresses his firm faith that he is ready to hear and help now also, as of old (3 18 f. 4 10 f. 9 46 16 3); 'none that put their trust in him shall want for strength' (2 61).[5] In 4 55 (cp v. 24 f. 3 44 etc.) 12 15 the successes achieved by the Jews under the Maccabæan leaders are ascribed to the divine help; as in 1 64 (cp 3 8) the evils that had come upon the nation are said to be God's punishment for its sin. Help through miraculous intervention, indeed, is neither asked nor expected—the day of wonders, and of prophets with superhuman power and wisdom, is past (9 27; cp 4 46 14 41 Ps. 74 9 Dan. 3 38 [Song of the Three Children, v. 14], Ezra 2 63 [Neh. 7 65]);[6] but God now works deliverance for his people through the strength he gives to those who call upon him (4 33). In 11 70-72 Jonathan's desperate valour, which wins the day, is the result of superhuman strength given him in answer to prayer.

It is remarkable, in view of such genuine faith and religious devotion as the writer everywhere manifests, that the book from beginning to end should avoid all direct designations of God.

Neither 'God' (θεός, אלהים), nor 'Lord' (κύριος, ארוני), nor any of the titles occasionally employed in the OT are to be found here.[1] Instead, the writer makes use of the term 'heaven' (οὐρανός, שמים), which is so employed as to be the full equivalent of the name 'God'; thus, 3 18 f. 50 4 10 40 55 9 46 12 15 16 3; cp also 3 60. In some of these passages, this use of the word 'heaven' is followed by the personal pronoun in a most significant manner; see 3 22 51 ff. 4 10 55. In two passages (7 37 41 f.) where God is directly addressed, the pronoun 'thou' is used without being preceded by any noun. Similarly, in 2 61 the pronoun of the third person is employed, with only the context to show that God is meant; in 16 3, 'by the mercy,' not even a pronoun is used.

As the tendency thus illustrated begins to appear among the Jews before the time of the Maccabees, and plays an important part in the later literature, it is hardly safe to draw conclusions from these facts as to the personal characteristics of this writer.

The use of the OT in the book may be noticed, finally. The repetition of certain formulas from the historical books has already received mention. Apart from these, there are allusions in 2 52-60 to Genesis, Numbers, Joshua, Samuel, Kings, Daniel; in 14 12 the words of Mic. 4 4 are repeated; 4 24 contains a familiar verse from the Psalms, cp 1 Ch. 16 34 41 Ezra 3 11; in 7 17 Ps. 79 2 f. is formally cited. Other quotations or allusions are found in 2 26 4 9 30 ff. 7 37.

Those who suppose that the author of this history wrote in the early decades of the last century B.C., find it necessary to assume that he made considerable use of written sources.[2] It is indeed quite out of the question to suppose that an account so vivid and accurate, and of such uniform fulness of detail, even in the narrative of the first years of the uprising, could have been written merely on the basis of oral tradition and personal recollection, after such a lapse of time. Nor would the hypothesis that the written sources used by the author were merely scattered official and private documents, of no great extent, be at all adequate to account for the work before us. It is very difficult to suppose the existence of such documents as this theory calls for, or to believe that a Jewish historian of that day could have combined them with such marvellous skill. Nor would any such process have produced this book. If, however, as has been argued above, the book was written soon after the middle of the second century, the necessity of postulating extensive documentary sources is removed. Moreover, both the lack of evidence of any such sources in the book itself, and the character and manner of the whole narrative, make it by far the most probable theory that what we have here is the account of one who had witnessed the whole Maccabæan struggle from its beginning, and had had exceptional opportunities of information.

8. Sources.

The only passages in 1 Macc. in which there might appear to be reference to written sources known to the author are 9 22 and 16 24. In both cases the writer is making use of the familiar OT formula used in closing the history of a king: 'The rest of his acts, and his mighty deeds, behold, they are written,' etc. The reason for his employing it in only these two places is obvious.

The compliment is paid to Judas, as the great hero of these times; to John, because of the time and manner in which the book was finished (see above, § 5). Accordingly, when it is said of Judas, that 'the rest of his acts were not written down,' the natural inference is this, that the writer knew of no record other than his own of the events of Judas' time; this was, therefore, the only way in which he could conclude the formula. Again, when he has occasion to apply the formula to the reign of John,

1 Even if this were not the case, the attempt to determine the time that 'must have elapsed' before a writer could use the phrase 'unto this day' (i.e., 'where it still stands') must be wholly fruitless. To many writers, ten years, or even five, would seem a long interval. Especially in those eventful times, when nothing was long secure, and hostile armies were marching through the land, a historian might well have expressed his gratitude that the conspicuous monument at Modein had been allowed to stand for even a very brief period.

2 The description of Antiochus Epiphanes as ῥίζα ἁμαρτωλός (1 10), and of Alcimus by the adjective ἀσεβής (7 9), are certainly examples of moderation.

3 The grim humour of the passage 9 37-42 is not to be lost sight of.

4 Cp Dan. 1 8.

5 The fact that the writer puts these utterances into the mouth of his heroes, Mattathias, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, renders them no less his own, of course.

6 It is doubtful how much significance should be attached to this phrase in its various forms. See Jerus. Ḳiddūshīm, 4 [near the beginning].

1 The words 'God' and 'Lord' have frequently been inserted, however, both in many of the Greek texts and in the versions. Thus, e.g., in the English AV, 2 21 26 3 18 53 60 4 55 9 10.

2 See, e.g., Schürer, GJV 2 579 (ET 5 6).

which had only recently begun, it is hard to see what form of words he could have employed other than that which he actually used. That such a 'book of the records' of John's reign had already been written, is therefore neither said nor implied; only this, that he was one whose deeds would certainly be recorded.

As for the question whether we may not find in these words at least a hint as to one of the sources at the command of the writer, namely, a chronicle of the reign of Simon (and possibly also of the reign of Jonathan), the answer must be: (1) We are not warranted in drawing any such conclusion from the words of this stock phrase. (2) There is not a grain of evidence, nor any great intrinsic probability, that the record of any of the Hasmonæan reigns was officially kept.[1] (3) There is nothing whatever to indicate that the sources used by the writer for his account of the reign of Simon were in any way different from the sources at his disposal for the history of Judas. It may be added, though the fact has little significance, that the only Jewish source for the history of these Hasmonæan rulers known to Josephus was our 1 Macc. Moreover, regarding the history of the period 175-161 B.C., there is no evidence that 1 Macc. and 2 Macc. (Jason of Cyrene) made use of any common source, or that the latter had any extensive documents at his disposal (see MACCABEES, SECOND, § 2, col. 2869 f.).

In connection with this lack of evidence for the existence of other important records of the Maccabæan period, it should be observed further, that 1 Macc. shows no sign of being a compilation; it is, on the contrary, remarkably homogeneous in all its parts. It would be difficult to imagine greater uniformity of style and method, from beginning to end, in a work of this nature.[2]

As for the many official documents which are embodied in the history, it is not likely that the author of 1 Macc. took them from a collection already made. It seems much more probable, from their character, and the way in which they are used, that they were partly collected by him, but chiefly composed or freely reproduced by him in accordance with his own taste aided by memory. On these documents, see also § 9 f.

9. Integrity. By the earlier investigators of 1 Macc., the integrity of the book was generally unquestioned. In recent times, however, the attempt has been made by some scholars to show that the history as we have it is not in its original form. The question has been raised whether certain of the letters, edicts, and other documents contained in the book can have originally formed a part of it.

(a) Some have gone so far as to claim that the whole concluding portion, from near the beginning of the fourteenth chapter to the end of the book, is a later addition by another hand.

Destinon, Die Quellen des Josephus, 1882, pp. 80 ff., argued that the form of 1 Macc. known to Josephus did not contain chaps. 14-16. He also advocated the theory, formerly held by J. D. Michaelis, that Josephus used a Hebrew 1 Macc. (the original form) differing in other important particulars from our Greek version (l.c., pp. 61-80).

As for the form of 1 Macc. which is reproduced in the Antiquities, it may be regarded as certain, in spite of the arguments of Destinon and others, that it was identical with our Greek version.

See, for example, the weighty evidence incidentally noted in § 11, below. The reason urged by Destinon for regarding the last three chapters as secondary is the haste with which Josephus passes over this portion of the history, giving it hardly any space at all, although these chapters contain abundant material of the sort that would seem to serve his purposes especially well, inasmuch as it is his manifest aim to magnify the political importance of the Jews, and to make as much as possible of their friendly relations with the Romans. The argument certainly deserves notice; but it may be doubted whether it should be given any great weight (see Schür. TLZ, 1882, p. 390). It is hardly safe to rely on the methods of such a writer as Josephus, even in a matter of this nature; it must be remembered, too, that one chief consideration in the composition of his work was the striving after brevity and condensation. A Gentile historian would have found little or nothing of importance in these chapters of 1 Macc., and it is not difficult to believe that Josephus could have made up his mind to omit them.[1] Nor has the theory that the book originally ended near the beginning of chap. 14 ('at about the 15th verse'; We. IJG(1), 222 f., n.; (2), 257 n.; (3), 268 n. 2; sentence omitted in (4), 273 n.) any further argument in its favour; while on the other hand there are many and weighty considerations against it.

In style and manner, as in contents, chaps. 14-16 are in perfect harmony with the rest of the book. 16 17, to take a single instance, cannot fail to remind the reader of the author of the earlier chapters. See also what has been said above (§§ 5, 8) regarding the close of the book.

(b) The question of the document 14 27-47, the inscription in honour of Simon, is more difficult. The manner in which its representation of the course of events seems to run counter to that contained in the preceding and the following portions of the history has long attracted attention.[2] It is urged that there is a serious contradiction here in regard to the order of events, the chief point of difference being the account of Simon's embassy to Rome.

According to the document (v. 40), this would seem to have occurred before the time when Demetrius recognised the authority of Simon, and to have been one of the things that led him to take that step. In the earlier part of this same chapter, on the other hand, the beginning of Demetrius' long captivity among the Parthians is narrated (14 1-3) before the account of the embassy is given (v. 24); and in chap. 15, the return of Numenius with the answer of the Romans (v. 15) would seem, from the connection in which it stands, to have occurred in the year 139, at the beginning of the reign of Antiochus (VII.) Sidētes.

It is by no means certain, however, that the author of 1 Macc. should be cited as dating the events of 14 1-3 earlier than those of vv. 16 ff. 24 ff. Nor are we justified in any case in giving such weight to a verse of the nature of 14 40, belonging to a document whose chief aim was by no means to record history exactly, but rather to glorify Simon in every possible way. The whole question of the dates and order of events of these few years, moreover, is one of exceeding difficulty;[3] and even on the supposition that we have here a true copy of the proclamation that was put in the court of the temple, the difficulty might still be adjusted by supposing the author of 1 Macc. to have been mistaken in regard to the date in 14 1.[4] It is far more likely, however, that what we have here (v. 27-49) is a free reproduction of the substance of the proclamation, after the manner customary throughout this book in incorporating official documents (see next section). The difficulty with the statement in 14 40 is thus most probably to be charged to the author's own inaccuracy, which is of a kind that is very easy of explanation, under the circumstances. There is, therefore, no sufficient reason for regarding 14 25-49 as a later interpolation.[5] Notice also the fact that this passage formed a part of the Hebrew 1 Macc.; see especially v. 27 f. (above, § 3).

(c) The section 15 15-24, which narrates the return of the above-mentioned embassy, and contains the letter sent by the Romans in the year 139 B.C., to Ptolemy Physkon and Simon, has also been suspected of being an interpolation (see Wellh., ibid.; Willrich, Juden u. Griechen, 69 ff.).

[1] See Schürer, GJV 2 584 f.

[2] The greater frequency of poetical passages in the first half of the book, noticed by Westcott (Smith's DB), is simply due to the difference in character of the subject matter and the narrative (see above, § 6), and cannot be used as an argument for diversity of authorship.

[1] It was the easier for him to omit the account of the Roman embassy here, inasmuch as he manages to introduce the most imposing features of it later, on a similar occasion (see below, c).

[2] See the note in Grimm, Comm., at the end of chap. 14; Destinon, 86 ff.; Wellh. op. cit. 222 f., n.; Willrich, Juden u. Griechen, 70.

[3] See, e.g., Schürer, 1 132 ff.; ET I 176 ff.

[4] Another alternative would be to regard v. 40 as the interpolation of some scribe.

[5] The difficulties which some have found in the form of the document (e.g., Wellh. l.c.), are due in part to the translation and transcription, as well as to the fact that the whole is freely reproduced. In v. 28 the original reading was 'We hereby proclaim' (see § 3). In v. 41 the word ὅτι is certainly secondary, and the result of scribal carelessness.

It is generally assumed that this alleged Roman edict is identical with that given in Jos. Ant. xiv. 8 5 (in the time of Hyrcanus II.), the resemblances being too striking to be accidental. See the very extensive literature of the subject, in Schürer, 1 199*f.*, 279*f.*; ET I 1, pp. 267*ff.*, 378*f.* It has been proved by Mommsen ('Der Senatsbeschluss bei Josephus Ant. xiv. 8 5' Hermes, 9 [1875] pp. 281-291) that the document in Jos. really belongs, at least in part, to the time of Hyrcanus II.[1] But Mommsen also argued at length (l.c.) and for weighty reasons, that the edict in 1 Macc. 15 is not identical with that in Jos. His arguments have failed to convince most scholars, because of the still unexplained fact that 'Numenius, son of Antiochus' and the 'golden shield of a thousand pounds weight' appear in both documents. The explanation of this latter fact, however, is certainly this: Josephus, for the reasons given already (above, a) omitted the portion of 1 Macc. containing the mention of Numenius and the golden shield, but took occasion to introduce this important name, and the most interesting details, at the next opportunity. The two documents were thus originally quite distinct. The fact must also be emphasised that the passage 15 15-24 bears striking evidence of having been written very soon after the time when these events occurred. The 'consul Lucius' (Λεύκιος ὕπατος) of v. 16 can be no other (Ritschl, Rhein. Museum, vol. 28, 1873; Mommsen, l.c.) than L. Calpurnius Piso, who was Roman consul in 139. The edict was sent to Demetrius (Δημητρίῳ τῷ βασιλεῖ), which shows that the Romans wrote—as must in fact have been the case—before hearing of the captivity of Demetrius and the accession of Antiochus Sidētes. This again is striking evidence that we have here the account of a contemporary (so Grimm, Comm.); so also is the manner in which this narrative is inserted in the midst of events of the reign of Sidētes, in spite of v. 22, and the way in which the story of the military operations at Dor is interrupted. An interpolator could not possibly have introduced it here (as argued by Wellhausen, l.c.); on the contrary, the author of 1 Macc. must have written from his own recollection of the actual order of events.

The historical accuracy of the whole account, as well as the fact that it formed a part of the original 1 Macc., would therefore seem to be beyond question. That we have in this document the actual words of a Roman edict, however, may be strongly doubted. The only conclusion that can certainly be drawn is that the Romans, under L. C. Piso, accepted the present of the Jewish ambassadors, and returned an answer that was at least polite and was addressed to King Demetrius.

(d) Still other of the incorporated documents have occasionally been suspected of being interpolations, the suspicion being probably due in all cases to a mistaken idea of the purpose and method of a historian of that day in reproducing letters, speeches of military leaders, and the like (see next section).

In the case of the document 10 25-45, for example, it has justly been observed (Wellh. op. cit. 218, n.; cp Willrich, 70) that it cannot be regarded as a genuine letter of Demetrius. But we are certainly not therefore justified in concluding that it was not put in its present place by the careful and conscientious author of 1 Macc. On the contrary, it was probably composed by him on the basis of his knowledge of the attitude of Demetrius, of which it undoubtedly gives a fair idea, in the main. Whether any considerable portion of its contents may be regarded as reproducing actual utterances of the king, is quite another question.

The great importance of 1 Macc. as a source for the history of the Jews is now generally acknowledged.[2]

10. Historical value. Besides being the only detailed account which we have of the events of the greater part of this most important period, the book has proved itself worthy to hold the highest rank as trustworthy history. In the first place, all of the most important events are dated according to the Seleucid era (reckoned from the spring of 312 B.C.; see Schürer, 1 33, ET I 44), the accuracy of the dates given being in the main beyond all question. We thus have here for the first time a Jewish history with a satisfactory chronology. The same verdict of trustworthiness must be accorded to the book as a whole. Both in the account which it gives of the general course of events, and in its narrative of details, it bears the unmistakable stamp of truth. In the preceding paragraphs (§§ 4, 5, 8) we have maintained the view that the author of 1 Macc. records in this book events of his own lifetime, which he had had exceptional opportunities of observing. There are, in fact, many indications of this apart from those already mentioned.[1] For example, the details given in 6 39*f.*, 7 33 etc., and especially in 8 19 (the 'long journey' of the ambassadors to Rome), 9 34 43 (where 'on the Sabbath day' has no significance at all for the narrative), were plainly recorded by a contemporary of these events. In all parts of the book, the narrative has this same vivid and circumstantial character, the details being frequently such as one who had not witnessed the events, or who wrote a considerable time after their occurrence, could have had no reason for adding. It is plain that the author was excellently well informed as to the progress of affairs in general, the character and movements of the chief actors in these scenes (see above, § 4), and even as to minor circumstances of time, place, and manner. It is to be added that he shows himself a true historian both in the choice of his material and in the manner of using it. In the choice of material, especially, his pre-eminence appears. It cannot be said of him that he purposely distorts facts, or invents them. It is true that he was a warm adherent of the Hasmonæan house, and probably a personal friend of its leaders, as well as a sincere patriot; but his history is not written in a partisan spirit.[2] No one will blame him for passing over in silence the shameful conduct of the high priests Jason and Menelaus, or for making only brief mention of the defeats suffered by the Jews. To turn such defeats into victories, as is done, for example, in 2 Macc. 13 9-24 (contrast 1 Macc. 6 28-63), would never have occurred to him. His statements cannot always be believed, it is true; they must occasionally be pronounced mistaken, or inaccurate. Especially when he has occasion to touch upon the geography or political conditions of foreign countries (e.g., 1 1 8 1-16 14 16, etc.), he exhibits a naïve ignorance which is all the more noticeable because of the very exact knowledge of Palestine which he everywhere displays. That his numerical estimates (size of armies, number of the slain, etc.) are often exaggerated, is a matter of course. Such statements were generally the merest guesses, in the early histories. Regarding the incorporated documents the case is somewhat similar. They are not to be taken too seriously. There was no thought of 'authenticity' here, any more than in the matter of recording the speeches made by Mattathias to his sons, or by Judas on the field of battle. The composition, or at least the free reproduction, of such speeches and documents belonged to the task of the historian. In general it may be said of those in 1 Macc. that they may be used only with the greatest caution; though it is probable that in the most of them veritable documents are reproduced, in substance if not in form. On the whole, the book must be pronounced a work of the highest value, comparing favourably, in point of trustworthiness, with the best Greek and Roman histories.

11. Text and Versions. i. Hebrew text of 1 Macc.—The original Hebrew text of 1 Macc. seems to have disappeared at a very early date. There is no evidence of its use by any early writer, not even by Josephus. Nor is there any sure testimony to its existence after the time when the Greek translation was made (regarding the equivocal words of Origen and Jerome, see above, §§ 1, 3). What is more important, there is no evidence of correction from the Hebrew, either in the Greek or in any other of the versions (all of which were made from the Greek). On the contrary, our Greek version is plainly seen to be the result of a single translation from a Hebrew MS which was not free from faults. It hardly seems probable that the Hebrew 1 Macc. can have been widely circulated at any time; there was certainly never any tendency among the Palestinian Jews to include it in the collection of 'sacred writings.' [See further, iv. below, on later Hebrew writings.]

ii. Translations of 1 Macc. (a) Greek.—Fortunately, the Greek translation is an excellent piece of work of its kind. It aims first of all at giving a closely literal rendering of the Hebrew; but the translator has chosen his words so well, and interpreted so clearly, that the result makes very pleasant reading. Most manuscripts of the LXX, including the three uncials ℵ, A, and V, contain the book. B, on the other hand, contains none of the books of Maccabees. The MSS show no great variation among themselves; in general, the text represented by ℵ and V (which resemble one another closely) seems to be the oldest and best.[1] Many passages furnish evidence of the fact that all our texts and versions of the book come from a single Greek MS whose text had suffered corruption.

Thus, in 3 9 καὶ συνήγαγεν ἀπολλυμένους, which makes no good sense here, is plainly a doublet of the following καὶ συνήγαγεν Ἀπολλώνιος: the blunder being found in all MSS and versions. In 9 5 Ελασα or Αλασα should probably be Ἀδασα (Λ for Δ); cp 7 40. Similarly in 9 2 Μαισαλωθ or Μεσσαλωθ should be Μεσαδωθ (Wellh. IJG(4) 266, n.). In all these cases, our witnesses agree in giving the corrupt form. In like manner, all show the same evidence of a confused text, with some words accidentally omitted, or repeated, in 9 14 32-35 43. There are many other examples.

It is especially to be noticed that in the most of these cases Josephus also contains the corrupt reading.

(b) Latin.—There are two Latin versions of 1 Macc.; the one represented by the Vulgate, and the other (extending as far as the end of chap. 13) contained in a single MS (Sangermanensis).[2]

The Vulgate version is in the main a faithful rendering of the Greek; the Sangermanensis version is the result of a recension designed to conform to the Greek as closely as possible (cp the two Latin versions of 2 Macc.).

(c) Syriac.—There are likewise two Syriac recensions of the book.

The common version printed in the Paris Polyglot, vol. ix., the London Polyglot vol. iv. (variant readings in vol. vi.), and Lagarde's Apocrypha Syriace (1861); and another (extending as far as 14 25)[3] found in the cod. Ambrosianus of the Peshitta (publ. by Ceriani, 1876-1883). Trendelenburg (in Eichhorn's Repertorium, 15 [1784] pp. 58 ff.) proved conclusively that the common version is a translation from the Greek. It is careful, and very old. Its readings correspond in general with those of codd. 19, 64, 93 (H and P), generally recognised as 'Lucian' MSS; and it must be regarded as forming with these a separate recension. See especially G. Schmidt, Die beid. syr. Uebers. des ersten Maccabäerbuches, in ZATW 17 1-47, 233-262 (1897). Schmidt concludes (234 f.) that the version of the cod. Ambros. is the result of a revision of the older Syriac according to the common Greek text.

These are the only important versions of the book. According to Dillmann,[4] the Ethiopic version of 1 and 2 Macc. (not yet published) was made from the Latin Vulgate in the sixteenth or the seventeenth century.

iii. Translations of 2 Macc.—What is said of the Greek MSS and the versions of 1 Macc. applies in general to 2 Macc. also; for the two are usually found together, and the history of their transmission seems to have been nearly always the same. Cod. ℵ, however, contains 1 Macc., but not 2 Macc.

iv. Later works based on Macc.—Mention may also be made here of certain later versions of the Maccabæan history, for the most part based on the books of the Maccabees, but having little or no independent value.

1. The Aramaic מגלת אנטיוכס, Megillath Antiochus; or מגלת בני חשמונאי, Scroll of the Hasmonæans.

See especially Gaster, The Scroll of the Hasmonæans (Transs. 9th Internat. Congr. of Orientalists, London, 2 1-32), where the (Aramaic) text is printed, with a translation, and very full references to the literature are given.[5] The Hebrew text (trans. from the Aramaic) is printed, e.g., in Jellinek, Bet ha-Midrash, 1 (1853), where also another form of the Aramaic text is given (vol. vi., 1877).

The book is a very brief Midrashic composition, not based directly on 1 Macc., nor (apparently) on any other written source. It is evident from its internal character that it was written long after the Maccabæan age.[1]

2. The Jewish history of 'Joseph ben Gorion' (Josippus). This work (of about the 10th cent.?) contains a history of the Jews from Adam down to the time of the destruction of the Temple by Titus.

Wellhausen (Der arabische Josippus, Berl., 1897) concludes that its original extent was the same as that of the 'Arabic Book of Maccabees' (see next paragraph), and that the name Joseph ben Gorion (by mistake for Flavius Josephus) was attached later, after the additions from the Jewish War had been made. The chief sources of the book in its original form were 2 Macc. and a secondary (Latin) recension of the Jewish War of Josephus. The author, who seems to have written in Italy, sadly misuses his material, and adds a good deal of legendary matter of his own. As history, the book is absolutely worthless. See, further, Wellh., l.c.; and the literature in Schürer, 1 123 f. (ET 1 1, p. 165 f.).

3. The so-called Arabic Maccabees, or Arabic 2 Macc., printed in the Paris Polyglot, vol. ix., and in the London Polyglot, vol. iv., with a Latin translation made by Gabriel Sionita. This work, which very closely resembles the preceding, contains a history of the Jews beginning with the story of Heliodorus (2 Macc. 3), and continuing down to the end of the Hasmonæan house, in the time of Herod. According to Wellhausen (op. cit., 46 f.), this book, the Arabic Josippus, and the Hebrew Gorionides, are to be regarded as three separate recensions of the same work; the 'Arabic Macc.' representing its original extent, in which form it was truly a 'Book of the Maccabees,' though of no historical value.

An English translation of the work as '5 Macc.,'[2] was given by Cotton in his Five Books of Maccabees, 1832; and a description of it under this same title is given in Bissell, 638 ff. In the Arabic text, from which alone the book is known to us, it bears the title '2 Macc.' A note at the end of chap. 16, misunderstood by Sionita, who repeats his mistake in the preface to the book, says: 'Thus far the 2 Macc. of the Hebrews' (which, in fact, does end at that point). After chap. 19, with which the end of 1 Macc. is reached, the remaining chaps., 20-59, follow Josephus very closely. See the table in Bissell, Wellhausen, op. cit.; and Ginsburg's article in Kitto's Bibl. Cyclopædia. The book deserves more attention than it has received.

[Among these later works we must probably include the incomplete fragments of a Hebrew version of 1 Macc. published by Chwolson, and more recently by Schweizer, from a Paris manuscript of the second half of the twelfth century. The fragments in question cover chaps. 1-4 7 27-9 22 30 73 and 6 1-15. Schweizer, in a critical discussion of the text (see below, end of § 12) comes to the conclusion that it is based upon the original Hebrew from which all other versions have sprung. His view is probably too optimistic. The text may certainly prove to be here and there of some value for a criticism of the readings of the versions, but its general importance is only secondary. The style is too simple and the vocabulary too easy to be ancient, and the work as a whole resembles the paraphrastic compositions above mentioned.]

SECOND MACCABEES

The book known as '2 Maccabees'[1] is a history of the Hasmonæan uprising, differing widely from 1 Macc. both in its general character and in its contents. The events with which it deals are all included in a period of hardly more than fifteen years, from a time shortly before the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C.) down to the year 161. It is thus in the main parallel to 1 Macc. 1-7. Prefixed to the history is an interesting supplement (1 1-2 18), consisting of two letters purporting to have been sent by the Jews of Palestine to the Jews of Egypt. As these letters are quite distinct from the main body of the book, and are plainly not the work of its author, they will be discussed separately (§ 7).

1. Contents.

The contents of the history proper, which begins at 2 19, are as follows:—

Author's preface, announcing the subject of his work, the source from which he obtained his material, and the character and aim of his own labours (2 19-32). Story of Heliodorus, whose attempt to plunder the temple at Jerusalem was miraculously thwarted (chap. 3). Account of the intrigues by which the high-priesthood changed hands, especially the misdeeds of Simon, overseer of the temple, and the renegade high-priests Jason and Menelaus (chap. 4). The calamities that came upon Jerusalem in 170. Jason captures the city and butchers many of the inhabitants. Antiochus, returning from Egypt, makes a great slaughter in Jerusalem, and plunders the temple (chap. 5). Judas and his brethren flee to the mountains (5 27). The persecution of the Jews begun in 168. Story of the martyrdom of Eleazar, and of the seven youths with their mother (chaps. 6 f.).

The remainder of the book (chaps. 8-15) is taken up with the history of the wars waged by Judas Maccabæus. The correspondences with 1 Macc. (often of only a very general character) are the following:—chap. 8 = 1 Macc. 3 1-4 27; 9 = 1 Macc. 6 1-16; 10 1-8 = 1 Macc. 4 36-59; 10 14-38 = 1 Macc. 5; 11 = 1 Macc. 4 26-35;[2] 12 10-45 = 1 Macc. 5 24-68; 13 = 1 Macc. 6 17-63; 14 f. = 1 Macc. 7. The book closes with the death of the hated Syrian leader, Nicanor, in the battle of Beth-horon, 161 B.C. Epilogue of the author (15 37-39).

According to the author's own statement (2 23 ff.), 2 Macc. is merely an epitome of a larger work, consisting of 'five books,' composed by one Jason of Cyrene. Beyond this statement nothing is known concerning this Jason or his work. His name is not mentioned elsewhere, and we possess no further evidence of the use of his history by other writers. The words of the epitomist plainly imply that his own labours consisted solely in abridging and popularising the work of Jason, upon which he relied for all the facts narrated. As the book itself contains no evidence to the contrary, it is only necessary to ask what were the sources used by the older writer in compiling his history.

2. Sources.

It is evident, first, that 'Jason' was not acquainted with 1 Macc.[3] This fact appears both from the frequent

[1] It is first cited under this name by Eus., Præp. evang., 8 9. The title '2 Macc.' appears also in some of the oldest lists of OT books (see APOCRYPHA; also col. 2881, § 7; col. 2886, § 8).

[2] The account of this expedition is confused in 2 Macc. with that of the similar expedition described in chap. 13. Cp especially 11 31 with 1 Macc. 6 59, and see below, § 2.

[3] Some, indeed, have even found in the book a concealed polemic against 1 Macc. So especially Geiger, Urschr. 228; Kosters, Th.T 12 491-558. The evidence of this, however, is quite insufficient. See also below, § 6, first note.

and very noticeable disagreement with that book, in order of events, chronology, and statements of fact; and also from the absence of considerable interesting and important material contained in 1 Macc., which could hardly have been thus omitted altogether in a work of this character, if it had been known to its author. For the same reasons, the supposition of a common written source (or sources) is to be rejected. There is, in fact, no passage common to the two books where the hypothesis of a single document underlying both accounts seems probable. Moreover, from the character of the narrative of 2 Macc., most modern scholars have concluded that the sources at Jason's disposal were mainly oral.[1] The account he gives is frequently confused and even self-contradictory, though often bearing the marks that point to an eye-witness.

The first expedition of Lysias into Judæa, 165 B.C., is represented in 2 Macc. as having occurred after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes. The substantial identity of the account in chap. 11 with that given in 1 Macc. 4 26-35 is beyond question; yet there is introduced into it an important feature belonging to the later expedition of Lysias in 163 B.C.—viz., the concession of religious freedom to the Jews. The story of this second expedition (cp 1 Macc. 6 17-63) is then told in chap. 13, where the incident of the royal concessions is again narrated, with a reference (v. 22) to the former account. There can be no question that 1 Macc. gives the true history and chronology of these expeditions; the way in which they are confused in 2 Macc. is then best explained by supposing that Jason relied for his facts on the imperfect recollection of a number of men, not having written records at his disposal.

There are many other indications pointing in the same direction.

The important campaigns conducted by Judas in the years 164 and 163, described in 1 Macc. 5, are introduced in 2 Macc. in two places, 10 14-38 and 12 10-45. In both places the account is confused and fragmentary, in marked contrast to the narrative of 1 Macc., which connects all the successive events of these campaigns in an orderly scheme whose general accuracy cannot be doubted. As in the case of the two campaigns of Lysias, so also here, events are narrated out of their proper place and order in Jason's work. The most striking example of this is found in the statements regarding the Syrian leader Timotheus. In 10 37, at the close of the former of the two passages mentioned, his death is narrated; yet he appears again repeatedly in the similar campaigns described in chap. 12. It is to be observed, on the other hand, that the narrative in both passages contains such vivid touches—especially in the narration of unimportant incidents—as suggest the recollection of eye-witnesses. See for example 10 37 12 35. Neither here nor elsewhere in the book does it seem likely that the author is reproducing various written sources.

In short, the character of the history of which 2 Macc. is the abridgment can best be explained by supposing that its author was a contemporary of men who had taken part in the Maccabæan struggle; that he was obliged to depend mainly on oral accounts; that he did not receive his information directly from those who had themselves taken part in these events, but only after it had passed through other hands; and that he was often unequal to the task of criticising and arranging the material thus obtained. As for the 'letters' transcribed in 9 19-27 11 16-38, it is plain that they were manufactured entire.

The question to what extent the work before us is to be regarded as that of the epitomist is one of considerable difficulty. It seems probable, on the whole, that the method generally pursued by him in abridging the work of Jason was to omit large portions entire, and to write out others with little or no alteration. (See especially Grimm, 16 ff.; Willrich, Juden u. Griechen, 66.)

The narratives actually preserved seem to be given in their original wording, rather than in a free abbreviation; not even in 13 22-26 is it necessary to see an exception to this rule. It is not unlikely that even such passages as 6 12-17 12 44 f., which might seem to belong to the writer of the preface 2 19 ff., are to be regarded as the words of the older writer.

From what has just been said concerning the sources at Jason's disposal, and the way in which he used them, it is plain that 2 Macc. cannot take a high rank as trustworthy history. Moreover, any careful examination of the book leads to a decidedly unfavourable estimate of it in this regard. In the large part that runs parallel to 1 Macc., comparison affords an excellent basis for judgment as to the relative value of the two accounts.

3. Historical value.

[1] So Grimm, Schürer, Zöckler, Willrich, Cornill, and others.

In the cases where they disagree in statements of fact, it is generally beyond question that the representation in 2 Macc. is incorrect. The order of events in 2 Macc., also, even in places where it might seem quite plausible if we had no means of testing it from without, is often shown by the clear and consistent account of 1 Macc. to be in reality sadly confused.[1] The careful chronology of the first book, moreover, has no parallel in the second. Events are indeed occasionally dated according to the Seleucid era, and on the whole correctly; but the distorted order of events in the narrative has made even the correct dates misleading (see Comms. on 11 33 and 14 1 4), so that many have been led to assume a peculiar way of reckoning the Seleucid era for the chronology of this book.[2] In 13 1 (1 Macc. 6 20) the date given is certainly incorrect.

The contrast in selection and treatment of material caused by the difference of aim in the two books is also strongly marked. The aim of the writer of 1 Macc. is simply that of a historian; the epitomist of Jason, on the other hand, had in view primarily the edification and entertainment of his fellow-countrymen. So he himself informs us (2 25-29; cp 6 12 ff., etc.), and the fact is abundantly illustrated in the book. It may be partly due to this parenetic aim of the epitomist that certain incidents of minor importance receive so much space, and are so overdrawn; the fact must be emphasised, however, that most of the exaggeration of statement and description which is so prominent a feature of 2 Macc. was probably due to the older work. It is plain that Jason was a zealous Jew, and that his book was intended chiefly for his Jewish brethren. It would seem that to him, as to the epitomist, the probability of a story was a matter of little importance, provided it were interesting and patriotic (see Willrich, 64 ff.). Examples are plentiful.

Thus, the long description of the tortures and death of the martyrs, chap. 6 f., is quite incredible from beginning to end. The account of the death of the patriot Razis (14 37-46) is in the same vein; so, too, is the story of the end of King Antiochus (chap. 9), who, before his death, offers to become a Jew (v. 17). See also such exaggerations as 12 16 13 12. That the many numerical estimates contained in the book should show the same tendency to overstatement is certainly not surprising. For examples, see especially 8 24 30 10 23 31 12 23 26 28. [See also ONIAS, §§ 7 f. 10 12.]

As has already been shown, it is not only in such minor matters that the book is untrustworthy. See the incorrect statements (already referred to in § 2) regarding Lysias and his expeditions; the misleading accounts of the campaigns of Judas in chaps. 10 and 12; the narration of the death of Timotheus in the year 164 (chap. 10), although he is made to play an important part in subsequent events (chap. 12). The statement regarding Philip in 9 29 is flatly contradicted in 13 23, the matter in question being one of considerable importance, such as only a historian who was neither well-informed nor careful could thus deal with. In 11 22 ff. we have a (spurious) letter written by Antiochus Eupator, the successor of Epiphanes, giving the officer Lysias instructions concerning his first campaign in Judæa (cp also 10 11). We know from 1 Macc. (4 28 ff.), however, that this same expedition of Lysias was ended the year before the death of Epiphanes. In 10 3 it is stated that the rededication of the temple took place two years after its profanation; it is plain, on the contrary, from 1 Macc. 4 52-54 (cp 1 54) that the length of the interval was three years (168-165 B.C.). In 15 31 35 it is plainly assumed that the Acra was in the possession of the Jews at the time of the death of Nicanor. In reality, it was occupied by the Syrians until the time of Simon.

The passage 13 15-23 affords a striking example of perversion of the truth for the sake of glorifying the Jews. The successive defeats experienced by Judas and his allies in 163, as a result of which they were reduced to dire extremities (1 Macc. 6 47-54), appear in 2 Macc. as a succession of brilliant and decisive victories for the Jews.

Still another feature of the book, not calculated to increase confidence in its trustworthiness, is the prominent place given to miracles. See 3 24 ff. 33 f. 5 1-4 10 29 f. 11 8 12 22 (cp 15 27), 15 12-16. How far this feature may be due to the epitomist, rather than to Jason, is a legitimate question. It seems most probable, however, from what we know both of the taste and of the aim of Jason, and of the method of the epitomist, that all these miracles and 'apparitions' formed a part of the older work.[1]

[2] See Schürer, GJV 1 32 f.; ET 1 45 f.

When all has been said regarding the unhistorical and untrustworthy character of the book, the fact remains that its value as history is by no means inconsiderable. From the character of the sources used by Jason (§ 2) it is evident that he must have preserved some valuable material. The fact that the book, although written quite independently of 1 Macc., agrees with it in a great many points is to be mentioned in its favour. In still other points its statements are confirmed by those of Josephus (Grimm, 13),[2] and from other sources (Rawlinson, 541 n.). In many parts of the history concerning which we are already well informed, 2 Macc. adds interesting details, the correctness of which there is no reason to doubt. If used with great caution, it thus furnishes a welcome supplement to our other sources of information. There is hardly a chapter in the book that does not yield something that can be utilised. It is probable that too much confidence has been placed in chaps. 3 ff. by commentators and historians. The temptation to this is very strong, inasmuch as our information regarding the period just preceding the Maccabæan wars is almost entirely limited to the statements of this book. There is really no ground whatever (apart from this very lack of the means of correcting the statements of the writer) for supposing that the book is more trustworthy here than elsewhere.[3] It is, on the contrary, only with the greatest reserve that this portion may be used at all.

4. Literary character.

That our 2 Macc. was written in Greek is beyond question. The words of Jerome, 'The second book of Maccabees is Greek, which can be shown even linguistically,'[4] must be echoed by all who read the book. Hebraisms are almost entirely wanting,[5] and there is no other sign that the book is a translation, but every kind of evidence to the contrary. It follows, in view of what has been said regarding the method of the epitomist (§ 2), that the work of Jason of Cyrene must also have been written in Greek, as would, indeed, have seemed probable on other grounds. The language of 2 Macc. is, in general, similar to that found in the best Greek writers of the last centuries B.C., and the beginning of the Christian era, this remark applying as well to the passages certainly composed by the epitomist (2 19-32 15 37-39) as to the main body of the book. The vocabulary is extensive; ἅπαξ λεγόμενα and words or phrases employed in an unusual way are frequently met with; see Grimm, 7, and the list (compiled by Westcott) in Rawlinson, 540. The style is generally easy and flowing, idiomatic, and well-balanced. Both in the construction of periods and in the use of the favourite rhetorical devices of the Alexandrine writers, a considerable degree of skill is shown. On the other hand, the most common faults of this school of writers, an overloaded and artificial style, and an ill-judged striving after rhetorical effect, are not absent. On the whole, the book occupies, in point of language and style, a position between 3 Macc. and 4 Macc.; not attaining the high level of the latter, though far superior to the former.[6] An unpleasant peculiarity, which appears in all parts of the history, is the use of abusive epithets or phrases when enemies of the Jews, or others of whom the writer disapproves, are mentioned. See 8 34 15 3. As a narrator,

[1] It is hardly permissible, however, to draw this conclusion from the words τὰς . . . ἐπιφανείας in 2 21.

[2] Yet the disagreement of Jos. with 2 Macc. is even more noticeable than the agreement. See Willrich, 83 ff.

[3] Grimm's statement (16) is quite unjustified: 'Doch scheint die für den Abschnitt Cap. 3 1-6 11 benützte Quelle viel lauterer geflossen zu sein als diejenigen, die für die späteren Abschnitte zu Gebote standen.'

[4] [Machabæorum liber] secundus Græcus est, quod ex ipsa quoque φράσει probari potest (Prologus Galeatus).

[5] Most of the examples cited by Grimm, 6, can hardly be called true Hebraisms.

[6] The harsh estimate of the style of 2 Macc. in Rawlinson, 540, is much exaggerated.

the writer displays no remarkable gifts. He is fond of exaggerating details, of painting scenes at undue length (see, e.g., 3 15-22), and of introducing his own reflections, not content with simple statements of fact. The way in which the tortures of the martyrs are depicted at length, in chaps. 6 f., is an especially unpleasant feature of the book to modern readers. There is occasionally a lack of connection between the parts of the narrative, and an appearance of awkwardness of composition, due in part no doubt to the omission of considerable portions of the original work. The arrangement of the material is purely chronological (the passage 10 1-8 seems, it is true, to have been intentionally removed from its proper place; cp v. 9 f.), and in our epitome, at least, there is no formal indication of successive divisions, except at 10 9 f.[1]

The aim of the book to edify and instruct the Greek-speaking Jews—an aim which seems to have characterised Jason's work as well as this epitome—has received mention already (§ 3). The writer wished to strengthen the faith of his fellows; to glorify the Jews, as the chosen people under God's especial protection, and the temple at Jerusalem, as the holiest of all places; to show how unfaithfulness to the national religion brought sure destruction (4 13-17 12 39-42), and how through Judas Maccabæus, the leader of the faithful of the people and the instrument of God's providence, the deliverance of the nation was wrought. In all parts of the book this didactic purpose appears prominently in one form or another. The attitude of the writer is, in general, not that of a historian, but rather (and professedly) that of a religious teacher; see especially 3 1 ff. 4 15-17 5 17-20 6 12-17 9 5 f. 12 43-45 13 7 f. 15 7-10. The most interesting feature of the religious teaching of the book is its expression of faith in the resurrection of the dead (cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 69); see especially 12 43-45, and cp 7 9 11 14 36 14 46. In no other of the few passages in pre-Christian Jewish literature in which this belief appears is it so clearly and emphatically expressed. Some have thought to find in 2 Macc. a Pharisee party document (Bertholdt, Einl. 1813, p. 1069; Geiger, Urschr., 219 ff.),[2] arguing especially from 14 6, where Judas is represented as the leader of the Assideans, but also from the religious tone of the book, and from the ungentle way in which the priests are handled (contrast 1 Macc.). It is beyond question that all the sympathies of the writer, both in religious and in political matters, must have been with the Pharisees; but we are hardly justified in going beyond this general conclusion. There is no evidence of any polemic against the Sadducees (such as Bertholdt saw in 12 43 f.); and the book, whatever else may be said of it, is certainly not a party document.

5. Religious character and aim.

One chief aim of the writer, beyond doubt, was to bring about a more perfect unity of the Jews by strengthening, especially among the Jews of Egypt, the feeling of national pride and of enthusiasm for the orthodox religion and worship; in this way and in other ways he sought to keep them in close connection with their brethren of Palestine.[3] This purpose explains in the most satisfactory way the prefixing of the two letters to the book (see below, § 7). It also accounts for another external peculiarity of 2 Macc. Many scholars since Ewald (GVI 4 606, n.) have remarked the prominence given in the plan of the book not only to the feast celebrating the death of Nicanor, with the institution of which the whole history comes to an end, but also to the feast of the rededication of the temple, the description of which closes the first half of the book, the passage 10 1-8 apparently being removed for this purpose from its proper place. The account of the institution of the Nicanor feast would have been a most natural point for Jason to bring his book to a close at, in any case. This would have been just the kind of ending best suited to his general purpose; cp the ending of 3 Macc. (7 19 f.), of Esther, and of Judith (Lat. Vulg.). The author's aim not being that of a historian, there was no need for him to go on and narrate the death of Judas; his purpose was fully accomplished without that. The transposition of 10 1-8, however, is probably to be attributed to the epitomist, who saw how the plan of the book could thus be made subservient to his more definite aim, increased significance being thereby given both to the Nicanor feast and to the feast of the Dedication. These were the two Maccabæan feasts, by the observance of which the Jews of the Diaspora could share, as in no other outward way, in the national glory of that struggle.[1] Further evidence of this same purpose may very likely be found in the manner in which the writer takes every opportunity to magnify the temple at Jerusalem; see, for example, 2 19 3 12 5 15 14 13 31 15 18, also 3 2 f. 5 17-20 13 23 15 32, etc. Thus to dwell upon the indisputable fact that the true centre of Judaism was at Jerusalem, was to emphasize the national unity, and the ground of it. That the purpose of the writer was to impress upon the Egyptian Jews the duty of worshipping at Jerusalem, or to disparage the worship at the temple of Leontopolis (Rawlinson, 544; Willrich, 66), there seems to be no sufficient reason to suppose.

There is good ground for believing that the epitomist lived and wrote in Alexandria. His mastery of the best Greek language and style of the time, and the evidence he gives of a thorough familiarity with the Greek rhetorical schools, would not, indeed, of themselves be sufficient to establish the conclusion. Such training, more or less thorough, was to be had in all parts of the 'Hellenistic' world. The presence of the letters addressed to the Jews of Egypt at the beginning of this book, however, combined with the fact that all the earliest allusions to 2 Macc. (see § 8) come directly or indirectly from Alexandria, must be regarded as very strong evidence.

6. Author and Date.

Regarding the date of the epitome, no very definite conclusion can be reached. It is, of course, not legitimate to argue from 15 37, 'the city from that time onwards being in the hands of the Hebrews,' that the abridgment was completed before 133 (when Jerusalem was taken by Antiochus Sidētes); for these words are a mere flourish, designed to give the book a proper close. It is to be observed that in 15 36 there is a reference to the book of Esther, which was written probably not earlier than 130 B.C. (so Cornill, Kautzsch, Wellh. IJG(4), 302 f.). It follows that even the work of Jason (to which this verse certainly belonged) must have been written later than this. This conclusion, it may be added, is confirmed by the internal evidence of the book; the author appearing everywhere as one who was at some distance, both in place and time, from the events he describes. On the other hand, our 2 Macc. was known both to Philo and to the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (see § 8), though unknown to Josephus. It seems therefore most probable, on the whole, that the epitomist put forth his work near the close of the last century B.C. The date of Jason's history, which seems to have been completely superseded by the epitome, may be conjecturally placed about a century earlier.

[1] Any separation of the book into five divisions 'corresponding to the five books of Jason of Cyrene' (Zöckler, 90) must be purely arbitrary.

[2] Cp also Wellh., Ph. u. Sadd., 82.

[3] It may be remarked that there is no conclusive evidence that this aim was shared by Jason. It is perhaps most likely that in all the manifestations of it which are so noticeable in 2 Macc., the hand of the epitomist is to be recognised; and that this is to be regarded as his one important contribution to the book.

[1] The feast of the Dedication was the more important of the two, and we have in the letters prefixed to 2 Macc. direct evidence that it was at least thought of as a bond of unity between the Jews of Palestine and those of Egypt. The emphasising of this feast, however, was only a single feature (though a very prominent one) of the writer's general plan, and it is a distorted view of 2 Macc. that pronounces it 'ein Chanukabrief' (Willrich, 67).

It is due to the fact of Jason's distance from the scene of the events he describes, as well as to his parenetic aim, that he shows so little interest in the family to which Judas belonged, and in its subsequent history. In 5 27, which contains apparently his whole account of the uprising at Modein, nothing is said of the brothers of Judas, and they are nowhere given any special prominence; though there is no evidence of a wish to disparage them.[1] Mattathias is nowhere mentioned. The fact is, the fortunes of the Hasmonæan house were not in any way connected with the purpose of Jason's book, or with his own interests. The case of the writer of 1 Macc. affords a striking contrast in this respect, for he not only lived in Palestine, but also seems to have been a personal friend of the Hasmonæan leaders.

It has already (§ 1) been noticed that there stands at the beginning of the book of 2 Macc. (1 1-2 18) what purports to be the copy of certain official letters sent by the Jews of Palestine to those of Egypt. The professed aim of these letters, as appears from 1 9 18 2 16 (cp 10 8), is to stir up the Egyptian Jews to observe the feast of the Dedication. The character of the Greek in which the letters are written shows that they cannot be attributed either to Jason of Cyrene or to the epitomist; on the other hand, they are joined as closely as possible to the epitomist's prologue, 2 19 beginning with 'Now as concerning Judas,' etc. (Τὰ δὲ κατὰ τὸν Ἰούδαν, κ.τ.λ.), and making mention immediately of the 'purification of the great temple, and the dedication of the altar.'

7a. The prefixed letters.

i. The first letter, 1 1-9 (regarding the precise point at which it ends, see next par.), contains little more than the request that the feast be kept.[2] It is plain that the writer did not have in mind the first institution of this feast in Egypt. On the contrary, as is evident from v. 9, and from the fact that not a word is said about the observance of the feast in Palestine, those to whom the letter was addressed were supposed to be already familiar with the custom, and to have themselves observed it: the letter is merely a reminder. The real difficulty is with the interpretation of v. 7 f., especially the words 'We have written to you in the extremity, etc.' (γεγράφαμεν ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ θλίψει, κ.τ.λ.). The 'extremity of tribulation' that came upon the Jews of Jerusalem in consequence of the misdeeds of Jason and his party could hardly refer to anything else than the terrible distress under Antiochus Epiphanes; and this probability is confirmed by v. 8, which evidently refers to the restoration of the worship of the temple in 165 B.C. 'In the reign of Demetrius (II.), in the (Seleucid) year 169' (=144-143 B.C.), these times were long past. Moreover, nothing is said about the contents of that former letter (on the supposition that γεγράφαμεν is to be translated by a past tense, as is generally done). The reader who supposes that he is hearing about events of 143 B.C., suddenly finds himself back in the year 165, without knowing where the transition occurred.

These difficulties have been vastly increased by the custom now in vogue of joining the date at the end of v. 9 (otherwise the beginning of v. 10) to this first letter (so Grimm; Fritzsche, Apocr. Gr.; Reuss, Das AT; English RV; Swete, OT in Greek; and most recent comms.). In this way the Seleucid year 188 (=124 B.C.) is made the date of the letter 1 1-9; that is to say, the writer reminds his readers of a letter sent to them nineteen years before, without characterising it, or showing that it stood in any connection with the present letter or with the institution of the Dedication feast! The date must, however, on the contrary, be joined to the second letter, as is done by the well-nigh universal tradition of the early church, represented by the best Greek MSS, and the Syriac and Latin versions. (See further below.) As for v. 7, the obvious solution of all the difficulties mentioned is to put a period after 'you' (ὑμῖν). The verb (γεγράφαμεν) is to be translated in the only natural way, as epistolary perfect,[1] and the whole verse as far as 'you' (βασιλεύοντος . . . ὑμῖν) is to be regarded as the date of the letter 1 1-9. With 'in the extremity' (ἐν τῇ θλίψει) begins the real business of the letter; the writer reminding his readers, in a few well-chosen words, of the circumstances under which this important feast was instituted. The whole document is thus perfectly comprehensible, and in every way well suited to its purpose.

ii. The second letter, 1 10-2 18, has generally seemed even more troublesome than the first. According to the accepted view, it purports to have been sent to the Jews of Egypt by Judas Maccabæus and others in authority at Jerusalem, soon after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, its purpose being to announce the institution of the Dedication feast. It thus becomes necessary at once to brand it as a shameless forgery, because of the many things it contains which are incongruous with the supposition of such an origin, and especially, because of the strange story of the death of Antiochus (1 13-16), which flatly contradicts all the other accounts of that event.

It may be doubted, however, whether the current view of this letter is correct. It is hardly less evident here than in the case of the first letter that the writer could not have had in mind the institution of the Ḥănukka in Egypt. There is no account given of the purification of the temple and the restoration of the worship by Judas; there is nothing to indicate that a new feast is being instituted; nothing definite is said about the particular manner of observing it. On the contrary, it is taken for granted (just as in the former letter) that the feast, and the mode of celebrating it, have long been known. Only on this supposition can we account for the fact that all mention of the celebration is confined to the two verses 1 18 2 16, both of which have plainly the air of dealing with matters of course. The impression naturally made by 2 14, besides, is that the war mentioned is a thing of the past; Judas Maccabæus is thought of as one who has already passed off the stage. As for the 'Antiochus' of 1 13-16, it is quite incredible that Epiphanes should have been intended by the writer It is not likely that any story of the Maccabæan struggle was more widely familiar than that of the manner of Epiphanes' death. It is a most significant fact, moreover, that shortly before the date prefixed to this letter, 124 B.C., Antiochus VII. Sidētes, who had been a bitter enemy of the Jews (see Schürer, 1 200-208), had perished in an expedition against the Parthians.[2] Nor is this the only coincidence to be noted. At the end of the year 125 B.C. (three years after the death of Antiochus Sidētes), the allies of Ptolemy Physkon triumphed at last in Palestine. Alexander Zabinas, who came to the throne at that time, had been introduced into the struggle by Ptolemy, and was himself an Egyptian. He at once made friends with John Hyrcanus and the Jews (Jos. Ant. xiii. 9 3). So the year 124 B.C. was a singularly appropriate one for the sending (or forging) of such a letter as this from the Jews of Palestine to those of Egypt. It would seem to be the reasonable hypothesis, therefore, that the writer (or forger) of this letter intended it as a reminder to the Egyptian Jews of the same kind as the preceding one; and that he gave it the date (124 B.C.) which corresponds exactly with its contents. It may be added as further proof, that the person who put these two letters together in their present order certainly regarded the second as belonging to a later date than the first. As for the names mentioned in 1 10, 'Aristobulus' is probably the well-known Jewish sage, who flourished

[1] The conclusion of Kosters, Th.T 12 491-558, that 2 Macc. is a polemic against the Hasmonæans and against 1 Macc., does not seem to be justified.

[2] Bruston, ZATW 10 110 ff. (1890), attempts to divide this letter at v. 7, making three letters in all.

[1] The necessity of this has often been felt and expressed. See esp. Ewald, Gesch.(3) 4 610 n.

in the second century B.C.[1] We do not know, however, that he was in any sense the 'preceptor' either of Ptolemy Philometor (181-146) or of Ptolemy Physkon (146-117). The 'Judas' in this verse is probably due to the blunder of a translator or scribe. What is required at this point is 'the council of the Jews' (ἡ γερουσία τῶν Ἰουδαίων), as the Syriac actually reads (probably a fortunate conjecture). If our Greek letter is a translation from the Hebrew or the Aramaic, as seems not unlikely (see next col., begin.), the mistake would be very easy.

This second letter is, moreover, from beginning to end a document of very considerable interest. Its several parts,[2] which seem at first sight to have little to do with one another or with the avowed purpose of the whole, are all found on closer examination to be written with the aim of showing the true importance of the Maccabæan feast of the Dedication. The writer sets himself the task of demonstrating at length its historical significance; indicating at the same time in other ways the analogy between the Maccabæan period and the other principal epochs of the nation's life. In fact, the whole letter might well be entitled:—The Antecedents of the Ḥănukka in Jewish Sacred History.

One feature of the writer's demonstration deserves especial notice: namely, the extent to which it is based on the conception of the Dedication (ἐγκαινισμός) as a restoration of the sacred fire to the altar and the temple.[3] Evidently at that time this idea had a most prominent place (perhaps the central place) in current Jewish thought regarding the origin and meaning of this feast. Apparently, also, the writer could take it for granted that his readers were perfectly familiar with this feature of the restoration of the worship by Judas, as well as with the manner of observing the feast. In the passage 2 8-14 the nature of the writer's argument can best be seen as he attempts to establish the series: Moses, Solomon, Nehemiah, Judas Maccabæus; each of whom was connected with the miraculous appearance or renewal of the sacred fire. See also 2 1, cp 1 19 (Jeremiah, Nehemiah, Judas). Another point in which Judas is the legitimate successor of Jeremiah and Nehemiah, namely, the preserving and handing down of the sacred writings, is emphasised in 2 2 ff. 13 f.

The question of the authenticity of the two letters is not easily answered. It has been shown in § 7*a* that the contents of each correspond perfectly with their respective dates (143 B.C. for the first; 124 B.C. for the second), and with their avowed purpose. It can hardly be doubted, moreover, that the motive which produced these writings was felt as strongly in Jerusalem as in Egypt. There is nothing improbable in the supposition that many such letters were actually sent. Regarding the first letter, it must be said that its very commonplace character argues in its favour. It can best be understood on the supposition that it is in fact just what it professes to be. The second letter is for the most part a collection of incredible stories; and this fact makes it less likely that it was official in any true sense. Still, it could hardly be claimed that all official writings of the Jerusalem Jews were worthy of credence; or that a scribe with a thesis in religious history to prove, and a vivid imagination, always expressed the soberest views of those whom he represented. Perhaps the most that can be said of this letter is that it may well be genuine, in spite of the appearances against it; and that it undoubtedly had been influential among the Jews of Egypt.

Scholars have generally agreed that the two letters are of diverse authorship (see Grimm, 24; Kosters, Th.T, 1898, p. 76); regarding the language in which each was written, on the other hand, there has been great difference of opinion. See Grimm, 23 f.; Ewald, Gesch., 4 610. Whilst it has not been shown in the case of either letter that the character of the Greek necessitates the conclusion that it is a translation, yet in view of the large number of Semitic idioms, and the frequency of such obscure expressions as seem to suggest a careless translation, it is on the whole most probable that both were written in Aramaic or Hebrew. In 1 10 'and Judas' for 'of the Jews' has already been mentioned as possibly due to careless transcription of a Semitic text. In 1 69 καὶ νῦν was pronounced by Ewald (l.c.) 'absichtliche Nachbildung der hebräischen Farbe.' In 1 16 'hewed in pieces' (μέλη ποιήσαντες) reminds us of the Aramaic phrase (עבר הרמין) in Dan. 2 5 3 29. The difficulties in 1 18 are probably to be solved by making the verse end with the word 'feast of tabernacles' (σκηνοπηγίας), and taking the remaining words (καὶ τοῦ πυρὸς . . . θυσίας) as the superscription of the long discussion which occupies the remainder of the letter (so the Syr., quite correctly).[1] This and the following sentences have then a distinctly Semitic sound. See also the (doubtful) evidence of such passages as 1 7 19 23 26 (connection of clauses) 17 f. Ewald (l.c.) regarded it as certain that the translator of the second letter was the epitomist himself. For a fuller discussion of this whole question, see ZATW 20 236-239.

There seems to be no good reason for doubting that it was the epitomist himself that prefixed these two letters to the book. It is of course possible to suppose that it was a later editor who at the same time inserted the conjunction (δέ, EV 'now') in 2 19. But the rest of v. 19 certainly belongs to the writer of what follows; and its fitness to establish a connection between the letters and the history is very evident. When we take into account the tastes of the epitomist, his definite aim in all this work (§ 5), the date and address of these letters compared with the probable date and place of composition of his book, and the fact that all copies and recensions of the work contain the letters in this position and order, it must be pronounced extremely probable that the epitomist himself prefixed them to 2 Macc.

The earliest attestation of 2 Macc. is in Philo's work entitled Quod omnis probus liber, in which undoubted dependence on it may be recognised, as has been fully demonstrated by Lucius (Essenismus, 37 ff.). Evidence of its influence next appears in the Epistle to the Hebrews, 11 35 f., where the writer has in mind, beyond question, the narrative of 2 Macc. 6 18-7 42. The word 'tortured' (ἐτυμπανίσθησαν), v. 35, is derived from 2 Macc. 6 19 28; 'obtain a better resurrection' (ἵνα κρείττονος ἀναστάσεως τύχωσιν) strongly reminds us of 2 Macc. 7 9; and the word 'mockings' (ἐμπαιγμῶν), v. 36, was very likely suggested by 2 Macc. 7 7 10, where it stands in close proximity to the phrase just referred to. (See Bleek, St. u. Kr., 1853, p. 339.) Again, the author of 3 Macc. shows himself acquainted with the book (see col. 2881, § 6); whilst 4 Macc. is wholly based upon it (see col. 2882, § 2). It is cited further by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. v. 14 97), Hippolytus (De Christo et Antichristo, chap. 49), Origen (see reff. in Schürer, 741 f.), and very frequently by later writers. The stories of the martyrs, especially, exercised an important influence among both Jews and Christians. For references to Jewish literature see Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge, 123; and for the later Christian literature see Grimm, Comm. 133 f., and the references in Schürer, 742 (ET ii. 3 214 f.). Josephus appears to have been unacquainted with the book.

[1] The Greek text of this verse in Fritzsche is an arbitrary reconstruction.

Apart from the Old Latin version of the book, represented by the Vulgate, another Latin version is preserved in a single codex in the Biblioteca Ambrosiana at Milan. This has been edited by A. Peyron (Ciceronis orationum pro Scauro, pro Tullio, . . . fragmenta, Stuttgart, 1824, pp. 71-125). It appears on closer examination to be merely a painfully literal rendering of the standard Greek text.

THIRD MACCABEES

1. Title. The title '3 Maccabees' is unfortunate, for the book professes to record events which occurred during the reign of Ptolemy (IV.) Philopator (222-204 B.C.). That it should have been classed as 'Maccabæan' is due to its being a narrative of persecution of the Jews by a foreign king.[1]

2. Contents. The book is a religious novel having for its subject the triumph of the Jews over their enemies through divine intervention. Their persecutor is the Egyptian king, out of whose hands they are delivered by a series of marvellous occurrences. The narrative runs as follows:—

After his victory over Antiochus the Great at Raphia (217 B.C.), Ptolemy visits Jerusalem, and tries to enter the temple, in spite of the frantic opposition of priests and people. Just as he is on the point of executing his purpose, he is stricken from heaven, and falls to the ground (1 1-2 24). Returning to Alexandria, bent on revenge, he assembles all the Jews of Egypt and shuts them up in the great hippodrome, where they are to be butchered together. It is necessary, however, first to write down their names. This proves an endless task because of their immense number; before it can be finished the supply of writing materials in Egypt is exhausted, and the Jews are saved for the present (2 25-4 21). The king then devises a new plan. Five hundred elephants, made frantic with wine, are to be let loose upon the Jews in the hippodrome. The execution of this order is hindered in various ways. On the first day, the king oversleeps. On the second day, being caused by God to forget all that had happened, he suddenly calls the Jews his best friends, and reproves those who remind him of his decree. Finally, on the third day, as the sentence is about to be executed, two angels appear, terrifying the king and his officers, and causing the elephants to turn upon the men of his army and trample them to death (5 1-6 21). The scale is now completely turned in favour of the Jews. They are set free at once; the king provides for them a great banquet lasting seven days; and a solemn proclamation in their favour is sent out. With the royal permission, they kill more than three hundred renegades of their nation, then return to their homes with great joy, after erecting a monument in memory of their deliverance, and setting apart the days on which it was effected to be celebrated henceforth (6 22-7 23).

It is plain from this synopsis that the book contains little more than a collection of the most incredible fables. Moreover, the details of the narrative are for the most part so absurd and so self-contradictory as to be merely grotesque. The story is not told with the skill that might give it, at least in part, the air of plausibility; the author only heaps one exaggeration upon another.

3. The beginning lost. The book as we have it is evidently not complete; the beginning is missing. This appears not only from the opening words 'Now when Philopator' (ὁ δὲ Φιλοπάτωρ), but also from distinct allusions to a preceding portion of narrative which the book no longer contains. The most striking examples are 1 1, 'from those who returned'; 1 2, 'the [above mentioned] plot'; 2 25, 'the boon companions already mentioned.' The character and extent of the missing portion can be inferred with probability from the indications afforded by the book in its present form. The story is concerned mainly with the triumph of the Jews over their persecutors. This part of the narrative seems to be complete; there is nothing to indicate that any other tale of persecution had preceded, whilst the contrary impression is plainly given by 1 8 ff. 2 25 ff., etc. The missing portion was probably of the same general character as 1 1-7—i.e., it formed with it the introduction to the story of the Jews. It must have included some mention of the following items:—(1) Character of Ptolemy and his companions. (2) Condition of the Jews in Egypt (probably). (3) Antecedents of the war with Antiochus. (4) The plot against Ptolemy's life. All this might have been contained in a single short chapter; and it is probable that this much, and no more, has been accidentally lost. On this supposition, the book, with its elaborate historical introduction, uniform contents, and impressive close, is seen to have been a well-rounded composition, complete in itself; not a fragment of a larger work.[1]

4. Language and style. The original language of 3 Macc. was Greek, beyond question. Its author had at his command an unusually large vocabulary (see the introduction in Grimm) and considerable resources of rhetoric. Still, the result of his labours is far from pleasing. The style is bombastic and inflated to the last degree; everything is embellished and exaggerated. The impression made by the literary form of the book is thus similar to that gained from its contents; it is an insipid and wearisome production, with hardly any redeeming features.

5. Historical basis. The question whether the narrative of 3 Macc. is to any considerable extent to be taken seriously can hardly arise. The beginning of the book sounds like history; but the providing of some such introduction, or background, is a necessary feature of the construction of any historical romance. It is quite another question whether the principal narrative, dealing with the fortunes of the Jews, has any basis of fact. There is to be noticed especially the striking resemblance between the story of the Jews' deliverance from the intoxicated elephants and the account given by Josephus (c. Ap. 2 5), of certain events of the reign of Ptolemy (VII.) Physcon. According to Josephus's account, which is very brief, the king assembled and bound all the Jews of Alexandria, and exposed them to be trampled upon by his elephants, which he had made drunk. The elephants, however, turned upon his own men and killed many of them. Moreover, the king saw a 'fearful apparition' which caused him to cease from his purpose. It is added that the Jews of Alexandria have been accustomed to celebrate this day of their deliverance. Obviously, we have here the same story, only reduced to its simplest form, and told of a different king. It must be remarked, also, that the fabulous character of the story is not done away with even in the form given by Josephus;[2] and further, that it does not fit well into the setting he has given it. There is certainly a literary relationship of some kind between the two versions (notice especially the mention of the apparition in Josephus, corresponding to the angels of 3 Macc.); and as Josephus was evidently unacquainted with 3 Macc., the explanation of the correspondence would seem to be this, that a current popular tale, already fixed in form, was used by both writers. Whether this tale had any basis of fact, it is useless to inquire. We cannot even be confident that such a day of deliverance was actually observed in Egypt; for this feature of both versions may well have been due to a mere fiction of the older tale. Cp Judith 16 31 (Lat. Vulg.). There is thus no evidence that the statements of this book regarding the Jews and their history rest on a foundation of fact.[1]

[1] Some have thought to find another title in the problematic Πτολεμαϊκά, which appears in connection with Μακκαβαϊκὰ βιβλία in the 'Synopsis of Athanasius.' See below, § 7.

[1] Ewald's theory (GVI 4 611-614), that 3 Macc. is a fragment of a historical work of considerable extent, is quite destitute of probability.

[2] See, in defence of the version given by Josephus, Whiston, Authentick Records, Pt. i., 200 ff.

6. Author and date. That the author of 3 Macc. was an Alexandrine Jew is made exceedingly probable both by the contents and by the evidence of language and style. The knowledge of Egyptian affairs displayed is also worthy of notice. (See Abrahams in JQR, Oct. 1896, 39 ff.) Regarding the date of composition, no very definite conclusion is possible. To look for a 'historical occasion' for the writing of an edifying story such as this is quite useless.[2] It is not at all necessary to suppose that the Jews of Egypt were in any especial need of comfort or encouragement at the time when 3 Macc. was composed. The author gives evidence of acquaintance with 2 Macc. (see the proof in Grimm, 214, 220), and once (66) cites the Book of Daniel in its later form, with the apocryphal additions. It is therefore quite unlikely that the book was written earlier than the last century B.C.; on the other hand, i can hardly have been written later than the first century A.D.

7. Attestation. The book '3 Macc.' is found in most MSS of the LXX, including the two uncials A and V. It was also included in the Syriac translation of the Scriptures. On the other hand, it seems to have been for a long time unknown in the Western church. There are no traces of any Latin version earlier than the one made for the Complutensian Polyglot (1517).

No early Jewish writer shows any sign of acquaintance with 3 Macc. The earliest witness to it in Christian literature is the catalogue of biblical books in the Codex Claromontanus (probably third cent.).[3]

In the fourth century 3 Macc. is attested (here also indirectly) by Cod. ℵ, which contains '1 Macc.' and '4 Macc.,' but neither of the two intermediate books. It is next mentioned by Philostorgius (Photius' Epitome, 1 1) and Theodoret (Comm. in Dan. 11 7); the former pronouncing it unworthy of credence, the latter appealing to it as trustworthy history. The other instances of its early attestation are in Eastern lists of the OT books (but never in any list originating in the Latin church). Thus it appears in canon 85 (or 76) of the Apostolic Canons (5th cent.);[4] in the Stichometry of Nicephorus; in the list of the sixty canonical books; and in the so-called Synopsis of Athanasius.[5]

The Greek text of 3 Macc. has been printed repeatedly.

In Holmes and Parsons, VT Græcum, vol. 5; Bagster's Apocrypha, Greek and English; Tischendorf's LXX, vol. 2; Fritzsche, Libri apocr. VT; Swete's LXX, vol. 3 (text of A, collated with V); and in most of the other editions of LXX or Apocrypha.

The Syriac translation, which is quite free, seems to have been the only old version of the book made from the Greek. Printed in the London Polyglot, vol. 4, and in Lagarde's Apocr. Syriace.

[3] Through some accident the 'liber tertius' has fallen out before the 'liber quartus'; but it is none the less attested. See Zahn, Gesch. des NT Kanons, 2 157 ff.

[5] The text of this last passage is troublesome. See Credner, Zur Gesch. des Kanons (1847), p. 144, and Zahn, op. cit., 317. The reading is Μακκαβαϊκὰ βιβλία δʹ Πτολεμαϊκά. Credner wished to read καὶ in place of δʹ, and to regard Πτολ. as referring to 3 Macc. Zahn, on the contrary, would retain the δʹ and read πολεμικά (!).

FOURTH MACCABEES

1. Title. The so-called Fourth Book of Maccabees is a composition of homiletical character, receiving its title from the fact that the principal part of its material is based on the story of the 'Maccabæan' martyrs told in 2 Macc. 6 18-7 42. By many early Christian writers (see § 4) the work was attributed to the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus, in the manuscripts and editions of whose writings it is commonly included. It therefore frequently receives a corresponding title, even in many manuscripts of LXX.[1] Finally, as it partakes of the nature of a treatise, and has a definitely stated subject (an unusual circumstance), it appears at an early date with the appropriate superscription περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ,[2] 'On the Supreme Power of Reason' (see § 2). The oldest form of the title, however, seems to have been simply Μακκαβαίων δʹ; the form found in the oldest MSS of LXX (including the three uncials which contain the book), and attested by the list of the Cod. Claromont., Eusebius (indirectly),[3] and Philostorgius.

2. Contents. The author states his subject, or 'thesis,' plainly at the start. He wishes to show that 'the pious reason is absolute master of the passions' (1 1, cp v. 13 18 2, etc.).

In a brief introductory passage, he indicates the scope of the question, and the nature of the chief illustration which he intends to use for his argument (1 1-11). He further states, in a single sentence (1 12), the general plan of his discourse; first, a philosophical discussion of the main proposition (ὑπόθεσις); then, the illustration afforded by the history of the martyrs.

The remainder of the book thus falls into two parts. (i.) The philosophical discussion (1 13-3 18). The various terms are defined, and one after another the passions are considered, with the attempt to show that all are under the control of the reason. (ii.) The story of the martyrs, with the lessons to be learned from it (3 19-end).

This part of the book is based on 2 Macc. chaps. 3-7. After a brief introduction (3 19-21), the narrative of 2 Macc. is reproduced, in much abridged form, as follows:—4 1-14 = 2 M. 3,[4] 4 15-21 = 2 M. 4 1-17, 4 22-25 = 2 M. 5 1-6 11.

The discourse on the sufferings and triumph of the Jewish martyrs, constituting three-fourths of the whole book, to which the preceding is merely introductory, begins with chap. 5. Its frame-work is an expanded version of 2 Macc. 6 18-7 42.

The following divisions are more or less distinctly marked:—

1. Narrative of the trial and torture of the aged priest Eleazar (5 1-6 30).
2. Lessons drawn by the author from this narrative (6 31-7 23).
3. Description of the torture of the seven youths (8 1-12 20).
4. Author's comments on their fortitude (13 1-14 10).
5. Reflections on the sufferings and constancy of the mother (14 11-17 6).
6. Conclusion (17 7-18 24).

3. Integrity. The integrity of the last chapter has generally been called in question by scholars of the present century, for reasons which appear at first sight to be strong. The mother's exhortation, 18 6-19, seems to be a disconnected piece, joined neither to the preceding nor to what follows. It is, moreover, in some respects a repetition of the similar exhortation contained in 16 16-23. Accordingly, W. Lowth (see Hudson's Josephus ii. 14 11 [1720]) and Dähne (see below, § 9) concluded that the book originally ended with 18 5 [6a]. Others went farther. The contrasts and correspondences between 17 20-24 and 18 3-5 attracted attention. It was argued that the latter passage, so far as it is parallel in contents with the former, is superfluous, whilst the statement regarding Antiochus in 18 5 is not in keeping with that found in 17 23 f. It was further observed that in MSS and editions of [3] See the quotation in § 8.

[4] In the story of Heliodorus, the name 'Apollonius' is substituted

Josephus the last chapter begins with 18 3, and that in fact with 18 2 a stopping-place seems to be reached. Accordingly, Hudson (Josephus ii. 14 11), Gfrörer (see below, § 9), and Grimm,[1] followed in recent times by most of those who have discussed 4 Macc.,[2] regarded 18 2 as the original close of the book, and all that follows as a later addition.

The evidence is far from conclusive. 18 2 would make a weak and unsatisfactory ending for such a homily as this; on the other hand, the passage 18 20-24, which is exactly in the style of our author, and against which no one has been able to raise any objection, is in every way suited to the place where it stands.[3] The incongruity between 17 20-24 and 18 3-5 is only apparent; both statements regarding Antiochus were useful for the author's argument, each in its place; the one by no means excluding the other. The way in which the mention of the king's fate is terminated at 18 5 sounds abrupt; but it must be borne in mind that the writer was addressing those who were perfectly familiar with the story of Antiochus's death in Persia; the barest allusion to it would be sufficient. As for the mother's exhortation, 18 6-19, the lack of any connection on either hand must be admitted. It seems at first sight to be decidedly out of place, the more so in view of 16 16-23.[4] When the nature of the composition is borne in mind, however, it may appear that the very abruptness of transition in these closing paragraphs had its purpose. Having finished his argument, the author wished to construct a peroration that should be as impressive as possible. This he accomplished with skill, by causing to pass before the mind of his hearers, in the passage 18 6-19, a rapid panorama of the national heroes, combined with an ideal picture of their own family life. Having thus brought the lesson of his discourse home to them in a way that could hardly fail to stir them profoundly, he had prepared the way for the short but most effective paragraph with which the book ends.

4. Author and date. That the author of 4 Macc. was a Jew, who is here addressing his countrymen, is everywhere manifest (see, e.g., 18 1, cp 1 11 17 19-23, etc.). The opinion of many early writers,[5] that he was no other than Flavius Josephus, is certainly erroneous; as appears not only from the lack of any resemblance to Josephus' style, but also from the fact that 2 Macc., which is here so extensively used, was plainly unknown to Josephus. The reason why the ascription was made can only be conjectured.[6] From the character of the language of 4 Macc. (see § 6), the thorough acquaintance with the Greek rhetorical schools shown by its author, the emphasis laid by him (at least in appearance) on the study of philosophy (1 1; cp 5 6-11, etc.), and the training which he evidently presupposes in his hearers, it is possible to draw at least the conclusion, that it was written in some city where the Jews were for the most part completely Hellenised. It is most natural to think of Alexandria, especially in view of the importance given in the book to 2 Macc., nearly or quite all of the earliest references to which come, directly or indirectly, from that city (Philo, 3 Macc., Hebrews, Clem. Alex., Origen; see above, col. 2874, § 6). There is nothing in the book, however, that could be called specifically Alexandrine, and it is quite possible that its author lived and wrote in some other city.

As for the date of 4 Macc., the grounds for reaching a conclusion are the same as in the case of 3 Macc. (q.v.). It was probably written either shortly before, or shortly after, the beginning of the Christian era.

5. Literary character. In form, as in contents, 4 Macc. is a sermon, or homily. The attitude of its author is everywhere that of one who is delivering a formal address to an audience. In the opening words, he speaks of himself in the first person and of his hearers in the second person, and continues to do this in the sequel. In 18 1 he addresses his hearers, 'men of Israel,' in the vocative. Rhetorical devices and turns of expression such as belong properly to an oration are frequent—e.g., 3 19 7 6 ff. 15 1 4 13 17 2 ff., etc. Moreover, it is plain from the words of 1 12, 'I will now speak . . . as I have been wont to do,' that the author at least wishes to represent himself as before those whom he is accustomed to address in this same formal way. It is quite evident from the manner and tone of the whole composition that the object aimed at was less to gain intellectual assent to a proposition than to give a religious impulse. In short, we have before us the discourse of a Jewish preacher, who was a man of culture, and (apparently) one accustomed to speak with authority. It is not, however, a 'homily' of the kind made familiar to us by Philo and the early Christian fathers, consisting chiefly of a running commentary on some portion of Scripture. It differs, in fact, from all such compositions, Jewish or Christian, that have come down to us, in the manner in which it combines Greek and Jewish literary forms.[1] It is indeed based on Scripture (2 Macc. was certainly regarded by the author as belonging to the national sacred literature), as its true foundation; but at the same time, the formal subject is a philosophical proposition, laid down at the beginning and kept in view throughout, after the manner of a Greek rhetorical exercise. As both the Jewish and the Greek elements appear at their best, and are handled in a masterly manner, we may regard the book as a characteristic product of Hellenistic culture of the best type. Whether it may be taken as a specimen of sermons actually delivered in the synagogue is a question that cannot be answered with certainty, because of our very meagre knowledge of Greek-Jewish customs in this regard. We know of nothing to forbid the supposition, however; and the writing before us must be regarded as furnishing very strong evidence for the affirmative.

The plan of the discourse is carefully thought out, and follows in general the rules of the Greek rhetoricians.[2] The literary skill and taste shown by the writer deserve in the main high praise. He writes with dignity, and an evident consciousness of mastery. The rhetorical power which he exhibits is very considerable. The one great blemish in the book, from the modern point of view, is its detailed description (exaggerated far beyond the bounds of reason) of the horrible tortures to which the martyrs were subjected. Though such descriptions were doubtless in accordance with the taste of that day (cp especially the abundant examples of the kind in the early Christian literature), they are quite intolerable now; and as a considerable part of the book is thus occupied, the defect is fatal.

6. Language and Style. In literary style and use of language, the writer of 4 Macc. shows himself a master. Of all the specimens of Hellenistic Greek that have been preserved, this stands among the very foremost in point of excellence. The

2 Freudenthal (op. cit., 155-159), arguing in ingenious but arbitrary fashion, concludes that 18 6-19 and 17 22-24 are interpolations, and that in these places considerable passages of the original have been lost.

3 So also Freudenthal.

4 It cannot be said, however, that the one passage makes the other superfluous. They differ from each other almost as widely as possible. It should also be observed (what some have overlooked) that neither is properly the fulfilment of the promise in 12 7.

5 Eusebius, Jerome, Philostorgius, and others; besides the titles of a good many MSS. See below, § 8; also Grimm, 291 f.; Freudenthal, 117 ff.

6 Some (e.g., Ewald) have supposed the ascription to be a mistake due to the fact that the name of the author of 4 Macc. was Joseph.

1 The nearest parallel—in many respects a striking one—is the 'Epistle' to the Hebrews.

2 See especially Freudenthal, 18 ff., and the lit. referred to in Kautzsch, Apocr. u. Pseudep. 2 156. Cp also von Soden on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Holtzmann's Hand-kommentar(2), 6 ff.).

style is well suited to the matter, simple in the narrative portions, and rhetorical where this quality is in place. It is smooth, flowing, and vigorous, always highly finished, and rarely overloaded. Well constructed periods abound. In the use of classical constructions (e.g., the optative mood),[1] the writer stands almost alone among Jewish Greek authors. His style and diction do not seem to have been influenced by the LXX, though he occasionally quotes from it ($2_{5\ 19}$ 17_{19}); Hebraisms are almost totally wanting; ἅπαξ λεγόμενα are unusually abundant (see the list in Grimm, 287; supplemented by Freudenthal, 28, n.).

It has already been observed that 4 Macc. partakes of the nature of a philosophical treatise. It has for its starting-point a formal thesis, stated and defined in more or less technical language at the outset, and kept in view throughout the whole composition. Both in its general plan and in its phraseology it shows plainly the influence of the Greek schools. Moreover, its author consciously assumes the attitude of a champion of the study of 'philosophy' (1_{1}), and it is plain that he wishes to make prominent the philosophical side of his discourse, though aiming primarily at giving religious instruction. See, for example, 1_{1} $5_{6\text{-}11}$ 7_{18}, etc. The decidedly Stoic colouring of his philosophy is worthy of notice, moreover. See especially the 'four cardinal virtues' (φρόνησις, δικαιοσύνη, ἀνδρεία, σωφροσύνη, 1_{18}; cp $1_{2\text{-}6}$ 2_{23} 5_{22} f. 15_{7}), and for further evidence, the thorough discussion in Freudenthal, 37 ff. On the other hand, it is plain that 4 Macc. is far from representing any particular school; nor does its author appear as the advocate of any 'system' made up from combined Greek and Jewish elements. His philosophy is merely a part of his general culture; his faith is not essentially modified by it. The religion which he preaches here is Judaism of the most thorough-going type, somewhat enriched from Greek thought, but none the less loyal. His chief aim in this discourse is to inspire his hearers by the example of the constancy and devotion of the Maccabæan martyrs. In drawing the lesson he displays the most ardent patriotism, and a zeal for the ceremonial law worthy of any Pharisee. The motive that actuated these heroes was not so much the hope of gaining eternal life as the purpose to perform their duty (12_{12}; cp 5_{16} ff. 6_{14} ff. 7_{7} 9_{15} 13_{16}). They died in behalf of a cause, in support of the law, in obedience to God; by their death, moreover, they wrought deliverance for their nation (1_{11} $17_{19\text{-}23}$ 18_{4}). In this connection the writer gives expression to a doctrine which is one of the most interesting features in the book on the side of its theology: namely the belief that the death of a martyr is in some way an expiatory offering for his people (6_{29} 17_{21}; cp 2 Macc. 7_{37} f.).

7. Philosophical and religious character.

The eschatology of the book is also of especial interest. As was of course to be expected, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is given a prominent place. What is emphasised by the writer, however, is not the belief in the resurrection from the dead, as in 2 Macc., but rather the doctrine that all souls, whether righteous or wicked, exist for ever after death. The good shall be in eternal happiness together (17_{18}), with the fathers of Israel (5_{37}), and with God (9_{8} 17_{18}). The wicked shall be in eternal torment (9_{9} 10_{11} 12_{12} 13_{15}), burning in eternal fire (9_{9} 12_{12}). Cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 77.

The personal earnestness and enthusiasm of the writer are manifest at every point. He is a true preacher, not a mere rhetorician, and the present discourse is something very different from a formal exercise. He shows himself thoroughly acquainted with the Hebrew scriptures, and assumes that his hearers are. The reference in 18_{8} to the serpent, the evil spirit (cp Wisd. 2_{24}) of Gen. 3, is worthy of notice; so also is the expression 'the rib that was built up' (referring to the story of Eve), in 18_{7}. The whole passage 18_{6} ff. gives us very interesting glimpses of Jewish family life of the writer's own day.

The verdict of Freudenthal, who thought to find in 4 Macc. a good many 'Christian interpolations,' has created a somewhat erroneous impression of it in this respect. As a matter of fact, the only apparent instances of the kind worthy of notice are 7_{19} 16_{25} (cp, however, 15_{3}) and 13_{17} (three words). These seem to be mere expansions of the text by Christian scribes, without importance of their own and adding nothing to the teaching of the book.

8. Attestation. Text and versions.

Eusebius, in speaking of the works of the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus, mentions 4 Macc. in the following words:—πεποίηται δὲ καὶ ἄλλο οὐκ ἀγεννὲς σπούδασμα τῷ ἀνδρὶ [viz. Josephus] περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ, ὅ τινες Μακκαβαϊκὸν ἐπέγραψαν τῷ τοὺς ἀγῶνας τῶν ἐν τοῖς οὕτω καλουμένοις Μακκαβαϊκοῖς. συγγράμμασι ὑπὲρ τῆς εἰς τὸ θεῖον εὐσεβίας ἀνδρισαμένων Ἑβραίων περιέχειν (Hist. eccles. iii. 10_{6}). Jerome, De viris illustr., chap. 13 (Josephus), speaks of it in very similar terms: 'Alius quoque liber ejus, qui inscribitur περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ valde elegans habetur, in quo et Machabæorum sunt digesta martyria.' Again, contra Pelagianos, 26, he quotes 4 Macc. 3_{5}; this time also naming Josephus as the author of the book. Gregory Naz., Homil. in Macc., cites the book as ἡ βίβλος περὶ τοῦ αὐτοκράτορα εἶναι τῶν παθῶν τὸν λογισμὸν φιλοσοφοῦσα. In Photius' Epitome of Philostorgius, chap. 1, occur the words: τὸ μὲν τέταρτον τῶν Μακκαβαϊκῶν βιβλίον ὑπὸ Ἰωσήπου γέγραφθαι καὶ αὐτὸς [Philostorgius] συνομολογῶν οὐχ ἱστορίαν μᾶλλον ἢ ἐγκώμιον εἶναί φησι τὸ περὶ τὸν Ἐλεάζαρον καὶ τοὺς ἑπτὰ παῖδας τοὺς Μακκαβαίους διηγούμενον.

The book appears as '4 Macc.' (see § 1) in the list of the Cod. Claromontanus (original of the third century?), the 'Catalogue of the sixty Canonical Books,' and the so-called 'Synopsis of Athanasius' (see above, col. 2881, § 7), and is contained in the Greek uncials ℵ, A, and V.

For information regarding the MSS containing the book—MSS both of the LXX and of Josephus' works—see Grimm, 294 ff., and especially Freudenthal, 120-127.

The first printed text of the book, that of the Strasburg LXX of 1526, was based on a single very poor MS (Freudenthal, 127 f.). It became nevertheless the basis of the 'vulgar text,' printed in many Greek Bibles of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and in many editions of Josephus; e.g., that of Basel, 1544; those of Lloyd (Luidus), Oxford, 1590; Hudson, 1720; and the later editions based on the Hudson text (Dindorf [1845-47], and especially Bekker [1855-56], improved it considerably). A recension differing from this, based on the Alexandrine Cod., was represented by the LXX editions of Grabe, 1719, and Grabe-Breitinger, 1731; and by Apel, Apocr. VT, 1837. More recently, the book has been printed in Bagster's Apocrypha Greek and English (1882); in Fritzsche's Libri apocr. VT, 1871 (a decided improvement on all preceding editions of 4 Macc.); and in Swete's LXX (Cod. A, with variants of ℵ and V). The text of the book is still in a very unsatisfactory condition, however. Much remains to be done, by collating new MSS (only a comparatively small number of those available having thus far been used), by making use of the Syriac version (see below), and by conjectural emendation.

Nothing is known of any old Latin version of 4 Macc., or even of the sources used by Erasmus in making his Latin 'paraphrase,' which differs so widely from our Greek text. See Grimm, 296; Freudenthal, 133; Churton, 564. The old Syriac translation is contained in the Peshitta, Cod. Ambrosianus (published by Ceriani, 1876-83), and has recently been edited from nine MSS in Bensly's The Fourth Book of Maccabees and Kindred Documents in Syriac, 1895. This translation, which is generally faithful and well executed, is seen to agree with ℵ rather than with A (Bensly, 14); but its more exact relation to the Greek texts has yet to be determined.

9. Literature.

The only commentary on the whole book is that of Grimm, 1857; an excellent piece of work. Zöckler's Apokryphen, 396-402, gives a translation, with commentary, of the introductory part of the book, 1_{1}-3_{18}. Bissell (637 f.) furnishes only a brief introduction. English translations in Cotton, Bagster, and Churton (see above, col. 2868, § 12). German translations in the Bibliothek der griechischen u. römischen Schriftsteller über Judenthum u. Juden, vol. ii. (1867), and (by Deissmann, with many useful notes) in Kautzsch's Apocr. u. Pseudepig. A very thorough monograph by Freudenthal, *Die Fl. MACEDONIA (ΜΑΚΕΔΟΝΙΑ, Acts 16 10 12 etc. Combined with mention of Achaia—Acts 19 21 Rom. 15 26 2 Cor. 9 2 1 Thess. 1 7 f. The ethnic is Μακεδών—Acts 16 9 19 29 27 2 2 Cor. 9 4 1 Macc. 1 1 6 2 2 Macc. 8 20; applied to Haman in Esth. 9 24 16 10 𝔊).

The Macedonians were of Greek stock, as their traditions and remains of their language prove. In its

1. Earlier history. original sense, Macedonia was simply the plains of the lower Haliacmon (Kara-Su) and Axius (Vardar), on the N. and NW. of the Thermaic Gulf (Gulf of Salonica). The old capital was Edessa, or Ægæ, on a terrace above the river Lydias, overlooking the sea. Gradually the Macedonians extended their power westward and northward over the hill-tribes of Illyrian race, the Orestians, Lyncestians, etc. The key to early Macedonian history lies in this absence of community of tradition and race between the highlanders and the lowlanders (see brilliant sketch by Hogarth, Philip and Alexander, 8 f.). Not until the accession of Philip II. (359 B.C.) was the unification of Macedonia effected; the conquest of the Greek cities of the Chalcidic peninsula opened the door of the Ægean and made her a factor in Greek politics. The supremacy of Macedonia over Greece was realised during Philip's lifetime; whilst that of his son saw the Macedonian kingdom converted into a world-wide empire (cp the sketch of the achievements of Alexander the Great with which the history of the years 175-135 opens, 1 Macc. 1 1). Macedonia came at last into conflict with Rome. The battle of Cynoscephalæ (197 B.C.) broke the power of Philip V., and that of Pydna (168 B.C.), in which his son Perseus was defeated, brought the Macedonian kingdom to an end (ref. in 1 Macc. 8 5).

The 'Macedonians' of 2 Macc. 8 20 are probably the Macedonians in the service of the Seleucid kings. Perhaps the word came to be applied to the soldiers of the phalanx, with which the Macedonian conquests were so closely associated.

The 'Macedonia' of the NT is the Roman province of that name. This was not constituted immediately

2. NT times. after the victory at Pydna; the country was for a time allowed to retain a certain degree of independence. It was broken up into four divisions: (1) Macedonia Prima: between the Nestus and the Strymon—capital, Amphipolis. (2) M. Secunda: between the Strymon and the Axius—capital, Thessalonica. (3) M. Tertia: between the Axius and the Peneius in Thessaly—capital, Pella. (4) M. Quarta: the mountain lands on the W.—capital, Pelagonia (cp Livy, 45 29 f.; for details, see Mommsen, Hist. Rom. ET 2 302 f.; silver and bronze coins ΜΑΚΕΔΟΝΩΝ ΠΡΩΤΗΣ, etc., Head, Hist. Num. 208 f.). In 146 B.C. Macedonia received a provincial organisation. It is not clear that the fourfold division was entirely abolished;[1] but the country was henceforth under the control of a resident official, whose headquarters were in Thessalonica. The province included Thessaly, and in the other direction extended to Thrace and the river Nestus. East and west it ran from sea to sea, for that part of Illyria which lay between the Drilo (Drin) and the Aous fell to it, so that the ports of Dyrrhachium and Apollonia were Macedonian. The province also contained the most important artery of communication in the empire—the Via Egnatia, which connected those ports with Thessalonica and Amphipolis.

In the partition of the provinces (27 B.C.) Macedonia fell to the Senate (Str. 840, Dio Cass. 53 12); but in 15 A.D. it was handed over to the emperor (Tac. Ann. 1 76), and so continued until in 44 A.D. Claudius restored it to the Senate (Suet. Claud. 25, Dio Cass. 60 24). As a senatorial province it was governed by a proconsul of prætorian rank. Such was Macedonia when Paul entered it (in 50 A.D.?; cp CHRONOLOGY, § 71).

The entrance into Macedonia and the visit to Rome are the two most important stages in Paul's missionary

3. Paul. career; hence, looking back in the 'afternoon' of his life, he can speak of his work in Macedonia as the 'beginning of the gospel' (Phil. 4 15). The account of this breaking of new ground on the second journey is given in great detail in Acts 16 9 f. A new meaning is given to the phrase 'a man of Macedonia' (ἀνὴρ Μακεδών) which had sounded like a knell in the ears of the greatest Greek orator (cp Demosth. Phil. 1 43). If we accept Ramsay's conjecture that Luke himself was the man seen in his vision by Paul (St. Paul the Traveller, 202 f.), this explains also the 'emphasis laid on the passage to Macedonia,' for which Ramsay thinks 'it is not easy to account on strictly historical grounds' (op. cit. 198 f.). It is hardly true to assert that 'a broad distinction between the two opposite sides of the Hellespont as belonging to two different continents had no existence in the thought of those who lived in the Ægean lands.' In the second place, it was the after events that unfolded the importance of the step now taken; and Lk. writes with these results in his mind. Lastly, if Luke himself was the instrument used to direct Paul upon his new path, we can see how even at the moment the incident at Troas might seem the climax of the whole journey and the entry into Macedonia bulk largely in the writer's mind.

Paul visited Macedonia many times. Five or six years after the foundation of the churches he revisits them twice, as he goes and as he returns, on his third missionary tour (Acts 19 21 20 1-3 1 Cor. 16 5 2 Cor. 1 26 2 13 7 5 8 1 9 24). Perhaps he saw them immediately after his first Roman imprisonment (cp Philem. 22 Phil. 2 24), and yet again, before he came to Nicopolis (1 Tim. 1 3). He was surrounded by representatives sent by the three Macedonian churches—Aristarchus and Secundus from Thessalonica, Gaius (Acts 19 29 20 4 27 2), Sopater from Berœa (Acts 20 4), Epaphroditus from Philippi (Phil. 2 25). The distinguishing mark of the Macedonians is their loyalty to Paul's teaching, and their intense affection for himself (1 Thess. 1 3 8 3 6 4 9 2 Thess. 1 3 2 Cor. 11 9 Phil. 4 1 15 f.). A characteristic of Macedonia, as of Asia Minor, is the prominence of women (cp the story of Lydia, Acts 16 13 f., at Philippi; also at Berœa and Thessalonica women are specially mentioned among the converts, Acts 17 4 12 Phil. 4 2 f., 'those women which laboured with me in the gospel.') MACHÆRUS (ΜΑΧΑΙΡΟΥΣ, in Talm. מכוור, or, according to the 'Ārūch, מַכְבַּר; but Jastrow [Dict. of Targ. etc. 781] disputes the identification),[1] the most southern point of the dominions of Antipas the Tetrarch, on the E. of the Dead Sea; according to Pliny (HN v. 16 72), the strongest Jewish castle next to Jerusalem. It had been fortified by Alexander Jannæus (106-79 B.C.), and afterwards by Herod the Great, who there built a city. There the suspicious Antipas confined JOHN THE BAPTIST [q.v.], and there the great prophet was executed.

In the year 70 A.D. the town seems to have harboured, irrespective of the Jewish garrison, a population of at least 2000 men, besides women and children (see Jos. BJ vii. 6 4 f.; cp ii. 18 6 Ἰουδαίων τὸ πλῆθος). It is the modern Mkaur (3675 ft. above the level of the Dead Sea, and 2382 ft. above that of the Mediterranean), where extensive ruins are still to be seen. μαχειρ [F]), father of Geuel; Nu. 13 15†. Read probably Machir—i.e., Jerahmeel (Che.).

MACHIR (מכיר; μαχ[ε]ιρ [BADFL]). 1. Son of Manasseh, son of Joseph (Gen. 50 23, E). The name, however, is properly ethnographic. Either the gens which bore this name was the most important of the gentes of Manasseh—this is expressed by representing Machir as Manasseh's firstborn (Josh. 17 1 1 Ch. 7 14); or else the whole of Manasseh was one great gens of Machir—this is symbolised by the statement that Machir was the only son of Manasseh (Nu. 26 29 ff.; cp Gen. 50 23). The latter view is extremely plausible. In Gen. 50 23 E tells us that 'Joseph saw Ephraim's children of the third generation: the children also of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were born upon Joseph's knees.'[1] Clearly Ephraim and Machir are put upon the same footing. Similarly in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5 14) we find Ephraim and Machir mentioned instead of Ephraim and Manasseh. The tradition is that Machir (i.e. the gens of Machir) went from the W. to the E. side of Jordan and conquered Gilead (Nu. 32 39 JE); this is even placed in the time of Moses (cp Nu. 32 40 Dt. 3 15, late passages). Other writers add Bashan (Josh. 13 31, P; 17 1*b*, R; a gloss in the former passage carefully says, 'half Gilead'). It is also stated that Gilead was the son of Machir (Nu. 27 1, P; 1 Ch. 2 21; cp Josh. 17 1*b*, R, where Machir is אֲבִי הַגִּלְעָד, 'father of the Gilead,' i.e., the land of Gilead). This of course simply means that Gilead was occupied by Machirite (Manassite) clans. Cp Kuenen, Th.T 11 (1877) pp. 483 ff., and notes in Oxf. Hex. vol. ii.

Was the conquest of Gilead really so ancient as to be loosely referred to the time of Moses? Judg. 5 14 is opposed to this; 'Machir' is there equivalent to (western) Manasseh. It is possible that we may assign the conquest of N. Gilead to the clan of Abiezer, whose representative in legend is GIDEON [q.v.].

This hero is represented in Judg. 8 5-16 as the conqueror of Succoth; now Succoth is explained elsewhere (SUCCOTH) as a corruption of Salecah or Ṣalḥad, the frontier-city of Bashan towards the E. Salecah occurs, the present writer believes, under various disguises in the genealogies of Chronicles (which contain valuable early material, though often in a corrupted form). Two of its most noteworthy corruptions are HAMMOLECHETH [q.v.] and ZELOPHEHAD [q.v.]; now Hammolecheth (Salecah) is given in 1 Ch. 7 18 as the sister of Gilead, and Zelophehad in v. 15 as the second son of Manasseh. Abiezer (the eponym of Gideon's clan) is in the same context (v. 18) called a son of Hammolecheth. It is possible that the conquest of N. Gilead by the Machirites was marked by a desperate fight for Salecah, and in this connection it may be remarked that in 1 Ch. 7 14 'Machir the father of Gilead' is said to have been the son of Manasseh by 'his concubine the Aramitess' (RV). 'Gilead' should here, as in some other passages, be 'Ṣalḥad' (=Salecah): the reference to the concubine is a symbolic indication of the subordination of the Aramæan element in the population of NE. Gilead to the Israelitish. In Nu. 26 29 (P) we read of the family of the Machirites (מכירי; μαχειρι). See further GILEAD, MANASSEH.

As to the name Machir. Has it some connection, as has been suggested (EPHRAIM, § 1), with the story of Joseph? Rather it is one of the many corruptions and abbreviations of 'Jerahmeel'; the Machirites may have been partly of Jerahmeelite origin. Now perhaps we can understand why the hero who conquered Succoth (Judg. 8) is called not only Gideon, but also Jerubbaal; for Jerubbaal too is very possibly an ancient corruption of Jerahmeel. 'Manasseh' may perhaps be a title of the god once worshipped in the Machirite territory W. of Jordan. Cp GAD, and see MANASSEH, § 4.

2. Son of Ammiel, residing at Lo-debar, commonly supposed to be a place on the E. of the Jordan (see LO-DEBAR), 2 S. 9 4 f. 17 27. It has been inferred from these two passages that Machir was a wealthy landowner, who remained faithful to the house of Saul, and gave a refuge to Meribbaal or Mephibosheth, though at a later time he was ostentatiously loyal to David, whose army he supplied with ample supplies at Mahanaim, during the rebellion of Absalom. There is reason, however, to suspect that the text of both passages has been so seriously corrupted that no reliance can be placed on these inferences. See SAUL, § 6, and cp MAHANAIM, MEPHIBOSHETH. MACHMAS (1 Macc. 9 73), RV MICHMASH, q.v.

MACHNADEBAI (מַכְנַדְבַי? a corruption either of מִבְּנֵי נדבו (Che.) or of מכרנבו, 'possession of Nebo' [Ass. namkur = 'possession']; see G. B. Gray, Exp. T, Feb. 1899, p. 232 f.; but cp NEBO), one of the b'ne BANI in list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i., § 5 end), Ezra 10 40†. MT is practically supported by μαχαδναβου[1] [B], αχ. [ℵ], μαχναδαα. [A]; but a reading 'Nadab' (נדב) is suggested by 𝔊L (και ναδαβου [Lag.], cp κ. ναδαμου [19], κ. ναδαβου [93, 108]).[2] ‖ 1 Esd. 9 34 reads καὶ ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν εζωρα (OZORA, RV EZORA) σεσεις κ. τ. λ. [BA][3] with which cp the Complut. in Ezra l.c. καὶ μαχναδα καὶ σαρουα καὶ σεσει whence it appears to be not improbable that 𝔊BA read שרי ששי (for מכנרבי) מבני; see SHARAI. ['Barnabas' may ultimately come from Bar-nadabu (Che.).]

MACHPELAH (הַמַּכְפֵּלָה, 'the Machpelah'), a piece of land (שׂדה) and a cave near Hebron (Gen. 23 9 17 19 25 9 49 30 50 13, all P).

𝔊 (τὸ διπλοῦν), Vg. (duplex), Tg. Onk., and ps.-Jon. derive from כפל 'double,' the suggestion being that this, like other sepulchral caverns, had two chambers. This is plausible; but in 23 17 (cp 19) the field of Ephron is 'in Machpelah.' 'Machpelah' is nowhere else referred to, and P's date is late. Still, P had access to older writings, and we have no reason at all to doubt that the name 'the Machpelah' (putting aside the question as to the reading) belonged properly to the whole district in which the property including the cave lay.

Few points of biblical geography are more interesting and more difficult than that connected with Machpelah. The statements in Genesis—i.e., those of P—can only be estimated in connection with the statements of J and E respecting the death and burial of the three patriarchs.

1. We have first to assume the general correctness of the geography of the lives of the patriarchs as given in the traditional text. According to P (Gen. 23 19 25 9 50 13) Abraham, Sarah, and Jacob were buried 'in the cave of the field of Machpelah,' and it is implied in 35 29 that Isaac also was buried there. Turning to JE, we notice that the account of the death and burial of Abraham and Isaac has been lost. But we may assume that J placed Abraham's tomb at Hebron, where he considered the patriarch to have resided; Isaac's grave, however, may possibly have been put farther south, viz., at BEER-LAHAI-ROI [q.v.]. On the death of Jacob J appears at first sight to be inconsistent. In 47 30 Jacob directs Joseph to bury him where his fathers were buried, but 50 5 (J) points to a tomb specially his own, for Jacob says that he had digged, or less probably bought,[4] one for himself in Canaan. It must be admitted, however,[5] that 47 30 (J) has been manipulated by R to make it accord with P (see We. CH 62; Oxf. Hex. 274). In Gen. 50 11 J places the burial of Jacob at Abel-Mizraim or rather Abel-mizrim, a place in the far SW. of Canaan (see ABEL-MIZRAIM). Whether E's account agreed with that of J must be left uncertain. This narrator (unless, indeed, we suppose the original document to have had a S. Palestinian geographical setting) must be held to have placed Rachel's death and burial near Beeroth (35 16 19? crit. emend.; see RACHEL), and Dinah's death and burial near Bethel.

[1] Cp MACHBANAI, or Nebo in v. 43.

[2] 19, 93, and 108 in Holmes and Parsons exhibit Lucian; cp Ceriani, Lag., and see Field, Hex. 87.

[3] 𝔊L retains καὶ Ναδαβου as in Ezra.

[4] כָּרִיתִי admits of either rendering (Staerk); but כרה, 'to purchase,' is rare, and if Jacob had referred to the legality of his acquisition of a tomb, he would have said from whom he had purchased it (cp 50 13 P). See Is. 22 16.

[5] Driver's analysis of Gen. 47 27-31 does not recognise this. Consequently he can represent Gen. 47 29-31 as parallel in JE to 49 29-32 in P (Hastings, DB 2 532 a).

He also mentions (33 19 f.) Jacob's purchase of a piece of ground from the Shechemites. All this seems adverse to the choice of such a remote spot for Jacob's burial as Abel-mizrim. On the other hand, the burial of Rachel had probably the same location in J as in E, yet J places the funeral of Jacob in that very remote spot. Possibly more than one place boasted of being the guardian of the tomb of Jacob,[1] and from the title of the altar (or rather maṣṣēba) at Shechem in Gen. 33 20 (see EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL) we may perhaps assume that the tomb at Shechem (which must surely have existed, perhaps near the sacred tree, Gen. 35 4 Josh. 24 26, both E) was known originally as 'Israel's grave,' and that at Abel-mizrim as 'Jacob's grave.' A confusion of names would, of course, arise very early. 'Jacob's well' (near Shechem) is no doubt late in its attestation; but the name in the Karnak list of Thotmes III., usually interpreted 'Jacob-el,' may conceivably (though not at all probably) be explained 'Jacob-beēr'—i.e. 'Jacob-well?' (so apparently C. Niebuhr). We have now done our best to make the traditional geography intelligible, but must confess that all is not as satisfactory as we could wish.

2. At this point it is needful to examine the accuracy of the text. It is maintained elsewhere (see REHOBOTH, and cp Crit. Bib.) that 'Hebron' and 'Kirjath-arba' are probably in some passages corruptions of 'Rehoboth' and 'Kirjath-'arbim' (city of the Arabians) respectively, and that 'Rehoboth' has a claim to some part of the fame appropriated by Hebron. Also (see ISAAC) that Beer-lahai-roi is a corruption of Beer-jerahmeel, and (see SHECHEM) that 'Hamor, Shechem's father' (Gen. 33 19) is a corruption of 'Cushan-jerahmeel.' Dinah's burial-place too was very possibly near 'the southern Bethel,'[2] close to Ḥalūṣah or Ziklag (see SHECHEM). The traditions of the sepulture of the patriarchs in the original tradition were, therefore, probably not so very different from that given by P, except that P does not place the tombs of the ancestors sufficiently far south. It was in Jerahmeelite land that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (as distinguished from Israel?) both lived and died.

We now come back to the name 'ham-machpelah' (המכפלה). It is itself a distortion of Jerahmeel (ירחמאל). The place near which the cave lay was Cushan-jerahmeel—i.e., one of the chief cities of the Jerahmeelite Negeb (see NEGEB), most probably Ḥaluṣah (Ziklag). 'Mamre,' to the E. of which (לפני) lay the 'field' and the 'cave,' is nothing less than this same Cushan-jerahmeel (ירחמאל=מַמְרֵא). If we take this view in connection with other similar rectifications of ancient but not primitive tradition, it will readily be seen how plausible, nay, how satisfactory it is. If Hebron loses some of its delightful associations, the Jerahmeelite cities of Rehoboth and Ḥaluṣah are the gainers, and readers of the lamented E. H. Palmer's Desert of the Exodus will quickly adapt themselves to the truer theory.

3. The traditional 'Machpelah' has a claim to be considered which is somewhat in excess of our space.

'The cave of Machpelah is concealed, beyond all reasonable doubt, by the mosque at Hebron,' are the words of Dean Stanley. The same opinion has been often expressed, and in deference to the antiquity of the tradition, we are bound to give some details from the accounts of early pilgrims, beginning with Josephus, who says (BJ iv. 9 7, § 532) that the monuments of Abram and his sons are still shown at Hebron in the fairest marble.

The Bordeaux Pilgrim (333 A.D.) tells of a square memoria of marvellously beautiful masonry, in which were placed the three patriarchs and their wives. Arculf (700 A.D.) says that each of the tombs is 'covered with a single stone worked somewhat in the form of a church, and of a light colour for those of three patriarchs which are together.'

The most circumstantial account of the cave, however, is that of Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela (1163 A.D.). He says that for a fee a Jewish visitor is allowed by the Gentiles to enter the cave. 'He descends into a first cave which is empty, traverses a second in the same state, and at last reaches a third which contains six sepulchres—those of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, one opposite the other. All these sepulchres bear inscriptions.' It is probable enough that R. Benjamin was one of the last who, in the period of the Christian rule, obtained admission into the interior. For a full account of this great mosque (the Ḥarām) and of everything about the caves except the caves themselves, see PEFMem. 3 303, etc., and for the statements of the various travellers and other authorities, the Pal. Pilgrim Text Society's publications, and Palestine under the Moslems. See also Sir C. Warren's article, 'Machpelah,' in Hastings' DB 2 197-202.

The same Hebrew word is rendered by EV (a) 'Medes' (Μῆδοι) in 2 K. 17 6 18 11 Is. 13 17 Jer. 25 25 (Περσῶν [BℵAQ], Μήδων [Qmg.]) Ezra 6 2 and elsewhere, (b) 'the Mede' (הַמָּדִי) in Dan. 11 1, and (c) 'Media' in Is. 21 2 (οἱ Πέρσαι) Dan. 8 20 (Μῆδοι) Esth. 1 3 10 2 (Μῆδοι). In Is. 21 2 and Jer. 25 25, however, there is reason to think that the original reading was different. In the case of Jer. l.c. this is virtually certain. See SHESHACH, Crit. Bib.

MADIABUN (RV EMADABUN, ΗΜΑΔΑΒΟΥΝ [BA]), and ELIADUN (RV ILIADUN; [Ε]ΙΛΙΑΔΟΥΝ [BA], ΕΛ. [L]), two names of Levites, 1 Esd. 5 58 (∥ Ezra 3 9).

Probably 'Jesus' (in the same verse) and 'Madiabun' are doublets to 'Joda' and 'Eliadun.' 'Eliadun' (BAL) seems to represent Henadad (read ENADOUN=חנדן?), and ημαδαβουν perhaps arose from the form ωναδαβ (see HENADAD). MADMANNAH (מַדְמַנָּה). 1. A remote city of Judah towards Edom, mentioned with Ziklag and Sansannah Josh. 15 31, P (ΜΑΧΑΡΕΙΜ [B], ΒΕΔΕΒΗΝΑ [A], ΜΑΡΑΡΕΙΜ [L]). The name, however, is corrupt (cp MADMEN). In Josh. 19 5 its place is taken by Beth-marcaboth; Madmannah (from מרכבה) must be a corruption of Marcaboth, which is itself certainly a distortion of Rehoboth. See MARCABOTH. That Eusebius and Jerome connect the name Medebena or Medemana with a village near Gaza called Menoeis (OS(2) 279 24 139 10) is no objection to this view. Cp MEKONAH.

The name ('dung-heap'; cp Del. Iob 62 f.) is most improbable, and since (1) the context is suggested by Is. 15 1, and (2) there is a very similar corruption in Is. 15 9 (see DIMON), we can safely for Madmen read נמרים, NIMRIM (q.v.), which in Is. 15 5 f. occurs just after HORONAIM.

MADMENAH (מַדְמֵנָה; ΜΑΔΕΒΗΝΑ [BℵAQ]), a supposed village of Benjamin, mentioned with Gebim, Is. 10 31. 'No trace of the locality is left' (Di.-Kittel). Probably the name is corrupt (cp MADMEN), and we should read רִמֹּנָה, Rimmonah; for a parallel see DIMNAH. This Rimmonah was not 'the rock Rimmon' of Judg. 20 45, but nearer to Jerusalem. See Che. 'Geographical Gains, etc.,' Expos., Sept. 1899, and cp GEBIM.

MADNESS (שִׁגָּעוֹן), MADMAN (מִתְהֹלֵל).

1. Terms. The Hebrew root שָׁגַע, šāga', which the 'mad' of the RV most commonly represents is in use almost a synonym of התנבא 'to prophesy' (Jer. 29 26) and denotes either the raving of the madman (1 S. 21 14 f. [15 f.] = יתנבא 18 10) or the prophetic ecstasy (Hos. 9 7). The root-meaning is clear from Ass. šigu 'to be in vehement inward excitement,' Del. HWB 639. Arabic šaju'a means to be strong, vigorous; either the root is the same as שגע, but has developed a secondary meaning on Arabic soil (cp Del. Prol. § 9), or it has nothing to do with שגע—in which case 'ašja'u, 'mad,' mušja'un, 'utterly mad,' will be loan-words from the Hebrew. This would account for the anomalous correspondence of שׁ and Arab. š. Cp Barth, Etym. Stud. 47.

Another root also rendered by 'mad' in RV (Is. 44 25 Jer. 25 16) is הָלַל, hālal, the root meaning of which (cp Ar., Ass.) is 'to cry aloud.' The nouns הוֹלֵלָה, or הוֹלֵלוֹת are synonyms of סִכְלוּת, folly (see FOOL). The root-meaning of מִתְלַהְלֵהַּ (Prov. 26 18) is not clear. [The final ה is dittographed; read מִתְהוֹלֵל [Frankenb., Toy], '(As) a madman.']

Greek words rendered 'madness' in the RV are μανία (Acts 26 24), παραφρονία (2 Pet. 2 16), ἄνοια (Lk. 6 11; mg. 'foolishness').

In spite of the fact that madness (šiggā'ōn) is one of the plagues with which Israel is threatened in the event

2. OT References. of disobedience to the law (Dt. 28 28), actual cases of insanity are rare in the OT. One might be inclined to regard the case of Saul as the most historical, occurring as it does in the course of a narrative which no one can deny to contain a kernel of fact; yet even here we cannot be sure, without strict investigation, that the notices of Saul's frenzy do not belong to the less historical stratum (see SAUL, § 4). This does not, however, involve our rejection of these notices as material for an article on Madness in OT and NT. As the narrator represents, the successes of David awakened Saul's jealousy, and 'at last the turbulent ferment of passion broke forth into wild frenzy . . . With the tenacity peculiar to one haunted by an illusion, he devotes himself henceforth almost exclusively to his purpose of avenging himself on his supposed mortal enemy and persecutor' (Kittel, Hist. 2 121). Saul's reported breach with Samuel also, according to the narrator, contributed to unhinge the mind of Saul; 'he feels himself forsaken by God . . . sees spectres everywhere which are hatching mischief against him' (Gesch. 2 105). Looking at the notices of his state from a non-critical point of view, we may perhaps say that the malady of Saul was an idiopathic insanity, exhibiting the usual mental symptoms of melancholia (1 S. 28 20) and delusion (20 30), with homicidal and suicidal mania (18 11 20 33 31 5).

A second instance of insanity in the OT, the 'lycan-

3. Case of Nebuchadrezzar. thropy'[1] (or 'boanthropy') of Nebuchadrezzar (Dan. 4 cp Verg. Ecl. 6 48 ff.) is, in spite of the testimony of Abydenus (ap. Eus. Præp. Ev. 9 41), most probably unhistorical.

The passage is translated in full by Bevan (Daniel, 87 f.); the part which bears most closely on the question of Nebuchadrezzar's madness is as follows:—

'or else, would that he might betake himself to some other place, and might be driven through the desert, where is no city nor track of men, where wild beasts seek their food and birds fly hither and thither, would that among rocks and mountain cliffs he might wander alone!'

With this we have to compare Dan. 4 33.

'The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hair was grown like eagles' (feathers), and his nails like birds' (claws).'

Prince (Daniel, 1899, pp. 32-35) is of opinion that the great king may have been 'afflicted by a form of insanity which incapacitated him from governing, and necessitated the succession of his son.'

Bevan (Daniel, 1892, p. 89) can only say that probably 'some Babylonian legend on the subject of Nebuchadnezzar had, perhaps in a very distorted form, reached the ears of the author of Daniel.' With this, Driver (Daniel, 1900, pp. 59 f.) appears to agree. See also Schrader, 'Die Sage vom Wahnsinn Nebukadnezars, JPT 7 [1881], pp. 618 ff.[2]

Madness is conceived of in the OT as a kindred phenomenon to the prophetic 'furor'; see PROPHECY.

4. Beliefs respecting origin of madness. A spirit from Yahwè is in both cases the agency at work (cp 1 S. 16 14 with 1 K. 22 19 ff.), and, whilst some of the contemptuous pity which the lunatic could not but evoke attaches at times to the prophet (2 K. 9 11), the superstitious awe with which the prophet was regarded serves to clothe the other also and renders his person sacrosanct. In the East the madman is still regarded as something sacred. It is possibly the sacred character of the madman which accounts for the refusal of ACHISH (q.v.) to interfere with David when he

[1] A form of disease in which the sufferer, imagining himself to be a wild beast, roamed about the forests. A somewhat milder form of the disease is not unknown to alienists.

[2] [Nebuchadrezzar's madness, however, is simply the product of misunderstanding, if the words of Dan. 4 25 are borrowed from a Babylonian song in which 'eating grass' was a symbolic expression for 'living in misery' (so Winckler, OLZ, 1898, p. 71; AOF 2 214, n. 2; cp Gunkel, Gen. 17).]

feigned madness (1 S. 21 12 [13] ff.; cp Ewald, GVI 3 116). It would seem too that, according to the narratives, Saul forfeited the allegiance of neither court (16 15 ff.) nor people (26 1 28 4; but cp 22 17).

The madmen of the NT are not kings but common folk, and their malady is attributed not to a spirit sent from God (cp SAUL), but to inferior deities or 'demons' entering into them—a conception of madness, as of disease generally, which the Jews brought back with them from Babylon (see DEMONS, § 11). The influence of music is no longer invoked to calm and soothe (1 S. 16 16), nor is the lunatic's person sacred; he wanders about at large, or, if dangerous, is bound in chains (Lk. 8 29). It is hard to say how many of the δαιμονιζόμενοι healed by Jesus may be reckoned as insane; see further DEMONS, § 8 f., LUNATIC. In Jn. 10 20 we have madness expressly connected with demoniacal possession. A. C. P.

MADON (מָדוֹן), a royal city of the Canaanites, perhaps on the W. of the Waters of Merom. Josh. 11 1 (μαρρων [BF], μαδων [AL]); 12 19 ([λα]μορων [L]; for BF see SHIMRON).

But is the text right? Following 𝔊 (cp Eus. OS(2) 278 7, μαρωμ) we might read מרום or מרון (see MEROM). This seems better than identifying with Madīn near Ḥaṭṭīn, W. of Tiberias (PEFM 1 365). Further study is needed. See SHIMRON.

MAELUS (ΜΑΗΛΟϹ [A]), 1 Esd. 9 26 = Ezra 10 25, MIJAMIN 2.

MAGADAN (ΜΑΓΑΔΑΝ) is the reading in Mt. 15 39 of ℵBD Ti. WH, RV, etc., for the ΜΑΓΔΑΛΑ, MAGDALA [q.v.], of TR and AV. Accepted by the most authorities, the names cannot either of them be identified with any site (but see GALILEE [SEA OF], § 5). The corresponding passage Mk. 8 10 has DALMANUTHA [q.v.], which is equally uncertain. Eusebius (Onom. ed. Lag.) spells it Μαγεδαν and identifies it with the Μαγεδανή of his time 'in the neighbourhood of Gerasa,' that is, on the E. shore of the lake (cp Lightfoot, Op. Post. 70 b, on the site of Magdala). But Jesus is said to have embarked from it for 'the other' (i.e., eastern) 'side' (εἰς τὸ πέραν, Mk. 8 13). Ewald (Hist. ET 6 348) suggests Megiddo (Μαγέδω in Jos. Ant. viii. 6 1); so too Volkmar; Henderson (Pal., § 114) says there is 'nothing unlikely in the identification, as our Lord may have passed into the plain of Beisān.' But whilst this in itself is improbable, on Conder's theory that Megiddo was near Beisān, it becomes almost impossible if we adopt the usual and best supported theory which places MEGIDDO [q.v.] at Lejjūn in the plain of Esdraelon. G. A. S.

MAGBISH (מַגְבִּישׁ; ΜΑΚΒΕΙϹ [L]), a name in one of the post-exilic lists; the b'ne Magbish returned with Zerubbabel to the number of 156; Ezra 2 30 (ΜΑΓΕΒΩϹ [B], -ΒΙϹ [A]) = 1 Esd. 5 21, NEPHIS, RV NIPHIS (νειφεις [B], φινεις [A]). The name is absent from ∥ Neh. 7. Cp MAGPIASH, which, as Meyer (Ent. 156) sees, represents the same name. Almost certainly that name is נְפִיסִים [נפישים?], NEPHISIM (q.v.). The next name in Ezra (l.c.) is עילם אחר, which is a corruption of ירחמאל. See also MESHULLAM. T. K. C.

MAGDALA (ΜΑΓΔΑΛΑ), the reading of TR in Mt. 15 39 where ℵBD Ti. WH have ΜΑΓΑΔΑΝ, MAGADAN [q.v.]. Whilst 'Magadan' is the best supported reading and Magdala is supposed to be a substitution due to the ignorance of later scribes with regard to Magadan, it ought to be pointed out that Μαγαδαν is a possible corruption of an original Magdala. However that may be, the existence of a Galilean Magdala is rendered certain both by the name of Mary Magdalene (cp MARY, § 26), and by the testimony of Jewish writers. The Talm. Jerus. places a Magdala, מגדלא, within a sabbath day's journey of Tiberias ('Ērūbīn 5 1), and indeed within the same distance of the hot baths of Ḥamata, to the S. of Tiberias (Id. 23 4); and the same things which some Talmudic writers assign to Magdala others assign to a Migdal Ṣebo'ayya, מגדל צבעיא, 'Dyers-Tower,' (cp Midrash, Shīr ha-shīrīm 1 18 with Talm. Jerus. Pĕsāḥīm 4 1; and Midrash 'Ēkhāh 3 3 with Talm. Jerus. Ma'ăśēr Shēnī 5 2) which accordingly Neubauer identifies as a part of Magdala (Géogr. Talm. 218). The Babylonian Talmud speaks of a מגדל נוניא, Migdal Nunya or 'Fish-Tower,' one mile from Tiberias (Pĕsāḥim 46 b). [Cp GALILEE (SEA), § 5, where it is suggested that Magadan, Magdala, and Dalmanutha are all corruptions of this compound name Migdal Nunya.—ED.]

Magdala was a place of some wealth (Talm. Jer. Ta'ănīth 48) and is said to have been destroyed מִפְּנֵי הַזְּנוּת, 'because of licentiousness' (Midrash 'Ēkhāh 2 2). The name does not occur in other early writers, nor in Josephus (for the reading Μαγδαλα in Vita 24 on which some older scholars depend for their location of Magdala on the E. of the Lake should be Γαμαλα); nor even in Eusebius and Jerome.

Willibald (about 722) passed from Tiberias 'round the sea, and by the village of Magdalum to the village of Capernaum.' Whether this was the Magdalum Castrum of Brocardus is less certain though most probable. It is doubtless that of a writer of the same century who after speaking of the Mensa Domini goes on to say; 'Ibi prope juxta mare Tiberiadis versus Tabariam est locus quæ dicitur Magdalon' (Rob. BR 8 279 n. 3, who refers for the citation to Steph. Baluzii, Miscellanea, tom. 6 369, Paris, 1713). Quaresmius (2 866) mentions a Mejdel on Gennesaret in his time and identifies it with Magdala. The name still lives, on a site which is suitable to the mediæval data, but too far N. to suit the Talmudic statement that Magdala was within a Sabbath day's journey of Tiberias.

On the Lake, in the SE. corner of the plain of Gennesaret, 3 m. NW. of Tiberias, near a stream which comes down from the Wādy el-Ḥamām, el-Mejdel is a miserable little village, with 'some indications of ancient ruins both of walls and foundations' (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, 2 136), probably a watch-tower guarding the entrance to the plain (Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 382). The country immediately around is called the Arḍ el-Mejdel (Wilson), and is cultivated by the villagers and Bedouins. Some have taken it to represent the MIGDAL-EL [q.v.] of Josh. 19 38.

Besides the authorities quoted, see Lightfoot, Op. Post. 70 b; PEFQ, 1877, p. 121 f.; Buhl, Pal. 225 f.; Schür. GJV(2) 1 515 = ET 2 224 (on a proposed identification with Tarícheæ).

1. Definition. Magic may be briefly described as the attempt on man's part to influence, persuade, or compel spiritual beings to comply with certain requests or demands. It rests upon the belief that the powers in the world are controlled by spirits, and that therefore to be able to overrule these spirits is to have the mastery of nature. In a narrow but later sense, magic has to do with feats of power, not of knowledge, the relation between it and divination being comparable to that between miracles and prophecy. At the beginning, and at the present time among savage people, this distinction is not drawn. Similarly, at the first, good spirits and bad spirits were not distinguished.[1]

There are, no doubt, many cases in which spirits are little, if at all, thought of. The means employed to obtain good or to obviate evil seem to have no connection with belief in spirits; just as ritual acts are performed by some people with little or no thought of the deity or deities they were originally believed to conciliate. Nevertheless, however much the invocation or other charm may appear as cosmic means of influencing the forces of the universe as such, there was originally, as there still is at bottom implied, an acknowledgment of spiritual beings who are influenced in these ways.[2]

2a. A factor in Hebrew life. Such an acknowledgment is certainly made by the ancient narrative (JE) of the story of Balaam (see BLESSINGS). That Balaam is a magician, it is, in the light of ancient Arabian customs, impossible to deny; and it is equally clear that the reality of the power claimed by Balaam is acknowledged in the biblical account. Else why should Yahwè be represented as transferring Balaam's service to the cause of Israel?[3] Nor can we overlook the same acknowledgment in P's account of the Egyptian plagues[4] (Ex. 7-11). Moses throws down his rod and it becomes a serpent; the magicians do the same (Ex. 7 11 f.). The reality of the transformation accomplished is not so much as doubted (see SERPENT, § 3). Moses, by his rod, turns the water of Egypt into blood; the magicians 'by their enchantments' do the same (Ex. 7 20-22). The case is similar with the plague of frogs. The power of the magicians fails indeed when it is a question of producing gnats (Ex. 8 17 [13] f.; EV LICE [q.v.]). Even here, however, there is no scepticism as to the reality of magic.

The word rendered magicians (חַרְטֻמִּים, ḥarṭummīm)[5] is found in one of the older sources (Gen. 41 8 24 [E]), where it denotes the dream interpreters of Egypt—those whom the Pharaoh summoned to interpret his dream. In Exodus, on the other hand, it stands for magicians in the narrower and stricter sense. The only other passages in which the word is used are in Dan., where the men so described are represented as living in Babylon; but as the book was written in Palestine, and Gen. and Ex. in their present form stood before the author, there is good ground for believing that the writer borrowed the word from the old books.

A trace of a belief in the efficacy of a plant is clearly seen in Gen. 30 14 [J] where Reuben brings Leah dūdā'īm or MANDRAKES (q.v.). This plant was known among the northern Semites as Baaras (cp Jos. BJ vii. 6 3), and was supposed by the Arabs and by the ancient Germans

[1] Divination is but a species of magic in the wider sense implied in the first definition given above: it is magic used in discovering the will of spiritual beings. See the present writer's Magic, etc., p. 4 f. Divination has to do, however, usually with omens, and it is more convenient, as it is more usual, to distinguish magic and divination as is done above.

[2] Frazer (Golden Bough (2), 1 61) takes magic proper to be a kind of savage logic, a crude species of reasoning based on similarity and contiguity. Where the operation of spirits is assumed (and 'these cases are exceptional'), magic is, according to him, 'tinged and alloyed with religion.' He admits, however (pp. 67 ff.), that in actual fact, such an assumption is often made, but he concludes from various considerations that 'though magic is . . . found to fuse and amalgamate with religion in many ages, and in many lands, there are some grounds for thinking that this fusion is not primitive.'

[3] See BLESSINGS AND CURSINGS, and for Arabian illustrations see Goldziher (Abh. z. Arab. Philol. 1 26 ff. [1896]), who has shown that among the ancient Arabs, as among the Jews, the magical words of blessing and of cursing played a prominent part. In war, the poet by cursing the enemy rendered service not second to that of the warrior himself; the uttered word was, in fact, a most potent 'fetish' (Goldziher, 28). The Jews of Medīna brought into their synagogues images of their arch foe Malik b. al-Aglam, and at these they hurled curses every time they came together.

[4] In JE no such reference to the magicians occurs.

to be inhabited by a spirit which gave it extraordinary powers (see WRS Rel. Sem.(2) 442, and cp Lang, Custom and Myth, 143 ff.). The biblical narrative ascribes to this plant effects which could not be supposed to follow from its natural properties; but no disapproval of its magical use is expressed either by the author or by the redactor. [Whitehouse, in Hastings' DB 3 210*b*, connects dūdā'īm with the דודה of Mesha's inscription, l. 12, cp also ISSACHAR, § 2.]

There is another incident recorded in the same chapter which belongs to the category of magic, though it is magic of the sympathetic or symbolic kind. (For a description of this see Jevons, Intr. to Hist. of Religion, 28 ff., Frazer, Golden Bough,(2) 149 ff.). The peeled rods which Jacob put in front of the sheep and goats as they came to drink water, caused those that were pregnant to bring forth young that were spotted and striped (Gen. 30 37 f. [J]); the natural explanation may be adequate, but it is probable that more than this was in the mind of the writer.

There is a good deal of uncertainty as to the teraphim which Rachel stole when she and Jacob left her father's house, Gen. 31 19 ff. [E] (see TERAPHIM). They were of human form (1 S. 19 13), and were looked upon as gods (Gen. 31 30 and Judg. 18 24), though their possession is regarded as illegitimate. (Josiah put them away with the wizards, etc., 2 K. 23 24; cp Zech. 10 2 where they are associated with diviners.)

Among the Assyrians images of gods were kept in the house because they were believed to have the power of warding off evil spirits. A certain exorcist is said to have had statues of the gods Lugalgira and Alamu put one on each side of the main entrance to his house, and in consequence, he felt perfectly impregnable against all evil spirits (see Tallqvist, Assyr. Beschw. 22).

It is probable that in Gen. and elsewhere we should construe teraphim as a plural of 'excellence' or of 'majesty,' answering to אֱלֹהִים (Elōhīm), אֲדֹנִים (Adōnīm). The teraphim were kept in the house as a guarantee of good luck; though originally perhaps idols, they were afterwards, and in biblical times almost exclusively, a kind of charm. That they had a magical import is suggested by Zech. 10 2, where teraphim, diviners, and tellers of false dreams are put in the same category. The Genesis narrative, and also Hos. 3 4, show that teraphim were not always condemned.

In the prohibition 'Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother's milk' (Ex. 23 19 34 26 Dt. 14 21), many scholars, from Spencer (Leg. Heb. Rit. 1335 ff. [1732]) downwards, have seen an allusion to a magical broth, prepared in order to give fertility to the fields;[1] more probably the reference is to an ancient form of sacrifice—similar to the sacrifice of blood (WRS Rel. Sem.(2) 221, n.).

In Is. 3 2 the Ḳōsēm (magician or diviner) is named along with the knight and the warrior, the judge, the prophet, and the elder, among the stays and supports of the nation; of none of them is any disapproval implied.

One great fact which induced the Hebrews to condemn magic and the like was that it was so closely connected with idolatry; in 2 K. 9 22 it seems identified with it. T. W. D.

2b. In Babylonian religion.

1. Place of magic in Babylonian religion.—In the religion of the Babylonians magic always had a prominent place. Every misfortune, and especially all sickness, was regarded as arising from some malign spell, a ban (mamītu), under which the sufferer had come. A ban of this kind could be incurred in all possible ways—not only by the commission of positive acts of sin such as murder, adultery, theft, fraud, but also by neglect of ritual and ceremonial precepts, or by casual contact with persons or things which themselves lay under some ban.

1 Spencer adduces (340), as supporting his view, Maimonides, Abarbanel, Nic. de Lyra, and an anonymous Ḳaraite commentator.

All the contingencies in which the ban can be incurred are exhaustively set forth in the second, third, and eighth tablets[1] of the Šurpu series of exorcism tablets. Thus, for example, we read in the second tablet: 'Has he [the bewitched person] sinned against his god, been guilty towards his goddess? . . . Has he dishonoured his father and mother? . . . Has he used false weights, circulated false money? . . . Has he approached his neighbour's wife, shed his neighbour's blood, stolen his neighbour's garment?' The same tablet, however, contains also the question whether the sufferer has slept on the bed of a bewitched person, sat on his seat, eaten from his dish, drunk from his cup.

Alongside of this conception of a more or less impersonal visitation we find that other—doubtless more primitive—in which malevolent divine beings, demons, or else human beings, wizards and witches, in league with these evil demons, are regarded as the producers of disease and disaster. The malign activity of these wicked spirits—in connection with whom the number seven is prominent (cp Lk. 8 2 Mk. 16 9 Mt. 12 45)—is vividly depicted in the Babylonian exorcism texts.

They are regarded as the spawn of hell. The wilderness is their favourite dwelling-place, whence they make their inroads upon the abodes of men. From house to house they make their baleful way, no bar or bolt being able to exclude them; snakelike they steal through doorways, windlike through crevices. Their hostility to men is unsparing; their influence is specially seen in the havoc they work on family life. They alienate husband and wife, father and son, partners and friends. Of these Babylonian demons we meet with two representatives in the OT; Lilitu (see LILITH) and the šēdu (Heb. šēdīm, see DEMONS).

The activity of wizards and witches is in like manner fully and vividly set forth in the exorcism texts, especially in the exorcism tablets of Maḳlū.[2] Day and night the witches—for in this field the female plays a much more conspicuous part than the male—dog the steps of their victims.

The witches haunt the streets and public places, beset the wayfarer, force their way into houses. Their tongue brings bewitchment, their lips breathe poison, death attends their footsteps. A very favourite method of working their enchantments was, in popular belief, by means of figures of clay, wood, dough, or the like. The tying of witch-knots was also largely resorted to. The most usual Babylonian word for witch is kaššaptu; cp Heb. מְכַשֵּׁפָה (below, § 3 [2]).

2. Methods of counteracting the evil power.—In correspondence with this deep and widespread belief in the power for evil wielded by demons and witches was the belief in the possibility of counteracting it; and the methods by which this could be accomplished constituted an essential part of the religion of Babylonia. The spell, the ban, to which a man was constantly liable demanded a counterspell, an exorcism. This was sought in a great variety of ways; and the main part of the business of the exorciser lay in finding out which particular charm could be used against each particular spell.

Here, water was regarded, above all other media, as of great efficacy. Sprinklings and washings with pure water, taken if possible from the sacred rivers, the Euphrates and the Tigris, accordingly have a large and important place in the Babylonian ceremonies of exorcism. Similarly, the power of breaking hostile spells was ascribed to fire. Hence the practice freely resorted to of placing a brazier at the bedside of the sick and burning on it a great variety of substances so as to represent symbolically the breaking of the spell. Besides water and fire, many plants and minerals of real or supposed healing virtue were brought into requisition, and thus the practice of magic constitutes the primitive stage in the practice of medicine.

The evil demons who had laid their victim under a ban and taken possession of him were expelled by exorcism and driven back into the wilderness whence they had come. For the witches death by fire was regarded as the only appropriate punishment.

Whether as matter of fact witch-burning was actually practised by the Babylonians cannot indeed, as yet, be quite clearly made out. At all events the witches were burned in the effigy which their victim kindled before the image of the divinity whose help he wished to invoke. The form taken by these witch-adjurations is in many respects quite similar to that of a legal process in which the bewitched person is the accuser, the witch the accused, and the divinity the judge.

1 Translated by H. Zimmern in Beitr. zur Kenntnis der Bab. Rel. i., 1896.

2 Translated, with a useful introduction on Babylonian magic in general, in K. Tallqvist's Die Assyrische Beschwörungsserie Maqlū (1895).

A matter of prime importance—and in this, relatively, Babylonian magic presents a good side—always was to secure the assistance of one or more of the good greater deities in counteracting these assaults of demons and witches; hence the frequent and fervent prayers still preserved to us in the magical literature of Babylon.

No notices of the practice of necromancy in the manner of 1 S. 28 have as yet been met with. Still something quite similar can be read at the end of the Gilgameš-Nimrod epic in the summoning of the spirit of Eabani by Gilgameš with the assistance of Nergal (god of the under world).[1] At all events the Babylonians had quite the same ideas as the Israelites about the spirit of the departed (ekimmu) and the possibility of causing it to appear.

This is plainly shown by the repeated mention of the necromancer (mušēlū ša ekimmu, literally, 'he who causes the spirit to come up') in Babylonian lists of official names. Of special interest in connection with the Babylonian notions regarding the disembodied spirit is a text[2] containing the prayer of one possessed by a ghost along with the petition for deliverance from it.

3. Soothsaying.—Alongside of magic, soothsaying also had an important place in the Babylonian-Assyrian religion. Through the agency of the seer (bârû)—a class of priest held in special esteem—the effort was made to obtain information as to the future from all sorts of occurrences. The clay tablets recovered at Nineveh from the library of Ašur-bāni-pal, the last of the great Assyrian kings, are full of texts containing omens of this description—which were taken from the flight of birds, from anomalous birth of man and beast, from the behaviour of certain animals, such as the pig, ass, horse, dog, serpent, scorpion, and locust. The interpretation of dreams, and especially the hepatoscopy, are important departments of soothsaying, and these two can be most clearly shown to have existed from the earliest times. Lastly, the cuneiform literature shows that astrology, the observing of the positions and combinations of the stars — a pursuit which has ever been, justly, regarded as having taken its rise in Babylonia—influenced the entire life of the Babylonians in the highest degree. The Assyrian kings made extensive use of all the methods of divination mentioned above, in determining their policy (cp Ezek. 21 21 [26]).[3] H. Z.

For the many terms used in the OT, several of which include both magic and divination, cp DIVINATION, § 3 f. Two words appear never to have had any exclusive reference to one or the other. These are ḥăkāmīm (חכמים; σοφοί, σοφισταί) 'wise men' and ḥarṭummīm (חרטמים; EV 'magicians').

3. OT Terms.

Ḥăkāmīm is used of the counsellors of the Pharaoh (Is. 19 11 f.), and of the King of Persia (Esth. 1 13 f.); ḥarṭummīm, which may be rendered 'sacred scribes'[4] (Gen. 41 8, RVmg.), is applied to the dream-interpreters of the Pharaoh (Gen. 41 8 24 E), and in post-exilic writings to the magicians at the Egyptian court (Ex. 7 11 8 7 [3] 9 11 [P]), and to the dream-interpreters of Nebuchadrezzar (Dan. 2 2 27 4 7 [4] 5 11).

The specific terms, of which the commonest is ḳésem, are in some cases obscure. They are the following:—

1. Ḳésem (קֶסֶם). This word probably had originally a magical reference (Fleischer), though the secondary sense (see DIVINATION, § 2 [1]) has almost driven out the primary.

Cp Ar. ḳasama, which (in 2 and 4), as well as the noun ḳisāma ('oath'), has a distinctive magical meaning; also the Syriac awmī, 'to exorcise,' strictly 'to make swear,' and likewise the Gr. ὅρκια τέμνεσθαι = 'to make an oath,' and then 'to make a covenant with.' W. R. Smith, however (J. Phil. 13 278), and Wellhausen (Heid.(1), 128, Heid.(2), 133, n. 5), both take the contrary view; Smith making 'decision' (cp Prov. 16 10 and Targ.), Wellhausen 'allotment or distribution,' the fundamental meaning. The present writer differs with reluctance from such eminent authorities. It is true that there are cases in which the Ar. word has the sense of divination (e.g., Ḳuran 5 4), 'obtaining a divine decree by headless arrows, etc.,' and that in Aram., the same signification is most common; but we must remember that in early times magic and divination came under one category.

The primary sense may be one which includes both the special ones. Of the two senses that of magic seems much more likely to be the original.

2. From √kšp, כשף (2 Ch. 33 6 'to use witchcraft,' RV 'practice sorcery') are derived kaššāph (כַּשָּׁף; Jer. 27 9) and mᵉkaššēph (מְכַשֵּׁף, Ex. 7 11 Dan. 2 2 Mal. 3 5) rendered by EV 'sorcerer' (in Dt. 18 10, and Ex. 22 18 [17]: fem. מְכַשֵּׁפָה, AV 'witch,' RV 'sorceress').

W. R. Smith derives from Ar. kasafa, 'to cut,' the Hebrew word having in it the idea of cutting oneself in coming to the deity (see 1 K. 18 28 and Jer. 41 5). He points out that it is still common in Arabia for a person guilty of some wrong to cut himself in the presence of the wronged person as a sign of repentance. The noun kěshāphīm (כְּשָׁפִים) he takes to mean 'herbs or drugs shredded into a magic brew.' (Cp Ar. kisfa, 'bits of things.') The meaning of verb and noun, however, are unconnected, and though in Mic. 5 11 [12] כשפים may well have the meaning of material drugs, in 2 K. 9 22 and Nah. 3 4 (EV 'witchcraft'), it cannot have that meaning, notwithstanding 𝔊 φάρμακα. Nor is this sense suitable in Is. 47 12, nor in Nu. 23 3 (where we should perhaps read with Kue. וילך לכשפיו).

The present writer follows Fleischer, who argues for its derivation from Ar. (kasafa) 'to obscure,' of the sun and moon 'to eclipse.' If the derivation just suggested were adopted, the Hebrew might denote first of all 'to have dark appearance,' then 'to be gloomy,' 'distressed,' and finally 'to be a suppliant,' 'to seek something from the deity'; cp the Syriac ethkesheph to entreat.[1]

The Syriac word, in all the twelve instances in OT where kashaph (כשף), in one or other of its forms occurs, is ḥeresh. Now in the simple form this verb means 'to be silent —i.e., to restrain one's voice. In the Pa. and Aph. it means to practise magical arts. To distinguish two separate roots (with the Lexx.) would seem to be unnecessary. Suppose the primary sense to be 'to restrain,' then 'to keep one's voice under,' 'to speak in a low mumbling tone'; we have in that case a link of connection with the meaning in the derived form, for the magician utters his incantations in such a suppressed tone. Smith, however, connects the Syriac word with the rare Arabic term ḥurs and ḥursa = a kind of food given to women in child-bearing, which was a drug, thus agreeing exactly with φάρμακα.

3. Láḥaš (לַחַשׁ), 'enchantment' (cp Is. 3 3, נְבוֹן לָחַשׁ, RV 'a skilful enchanter') is used more specifically of serpent-charming (Jer. 8 17 Eccles. 10 11; cp מְלַחֵשׁ Ps. 58 5 [6] 'charmer'), and hence of any charm which could be worn, cp Is. 3 20 (לְחָשִׁים, RV 'amulets').[2]

The primary meaning of the word may perhaps be seen in 2 S. 12 19 Ps. 41 7 [8], not however in Is. 26 16 (see SBOT). It has been thought that laḥaš (לחש) and naḥaš (נחש) may have a kindred origin, and it is at any rate singular that the Arabic equivalents of both[3] are used in the sense of unlucky.

4. Ḥéber (חֶבֶר), found only in pl. (Is. 47 9 12 'enchantments') or in connection with ḥōbēr, חבר (Dt. 18 11 Ps. 58 5 [6], 'charmer'), is explained by Ges. (Thes. 1 441) to mean binding or tying—i.e., of magical knots.[4] Similarly Smith, who says it is used to denote the tying together of words in order to constitute an incantation. He (followed by Ges.(13)-Buhl(2), and Sieg.-St., also by Stade, GVI 1 505, and Dr. Deut., ad loc.) goes back to the Jewish tradition which sees in the word some kind of snake-charming. Note the parallelism in Ps. 58 5 [6].

Here we may refer to the Rabbinical ḳēmīaʿ (קָמִיעַ), 'amulet,' from קמע, 'to bind.' Most likely it signifies something bound to a person, with no reference therefore to magical tying. It is the [4] חרטם is derived by G. Hoffmann (ZATW 3 89) from Arab. (ḥaṭm) 'nose,' and explained as meaning 'one who speaks in a low nasal tone' (cp מְעוֹנֵן. DIVINATION, § 2, and γόητες, below, § 4). 𝔊 gives variously ἐξηγηταί (expounders), ἐπαοιδοί (chanters, those who say incantations), and φαρμακοί (those who use drugs for magical ends).

[1] Cp also Ar. kāsif, 'unlucky' (of days). Note that Fleischer (Levy, NHW 2 459 a) takes Ar. kasafa in the derived sense of speaking in a low, murmuring tone.

[2] Similarly בָּתֵּי נֶפֶשׁ (ib.), AV 'tablets,' RV 'perfume boxes,' is taken by Smith to be a kind of amulet.

[3] Laḥasa (as lāḥūs, 'unlucky') and naḥasa (naḥs, 'unlucky'). Cp SERPENT, § 1 [3].

[4] Cp Ar. ḥabar, a narrative—i.e., a series of words bound together. Or we may argue for a derivation from ḥabara, to be beautiful, from an (assumed) earlier, but lost meaning 'to weave, bind.' So חָבֵר, ḥābēr, a companion, one that is bound (to an individual or society), cp T. W. Davies, Magic etc., 55 f.

Rabbinical term for phylacteries; see FRONTLETS. It is not at all impossible that Jesus' words in Mt. 16 19 18 18 were suggested by this magical practice, known in his time and in his country as in all times and lands. See BINDING AND LOOSING.

5. Saḥ(ḥ)ēr (שחר) in Is. 47 11, is explained by the great majority of critics (Hi. Ew. Di. etc.) 'to charm (away),' or the like (so RVmg.). This can be well defended (see the Comm.); but the absence of any analogy in Heb. and Aram. favours the view that the text is corrupt.[1]

4. In NT. Among the ancients the employment of certain formulæ was considered efficacious in proportion to the number of repetitions. In India to-day if an ascetic says in one month the name of Radha, Krishna, or Rom 100,000 times, he cannot fail to obtain what he wants; and it is in the same spirit that Moslem dervishes renew their shrieks or whirlings. Similarly, the prophets of Baal called upon their god from morning until night, saying 'Baal, hear us,' 1 K. 18 26.

The words of Jesus 'say not the same thing over and over again' (Mt. 6 7 μὴ βαττολογήσητε[2]) have reference to the same superstition.

In 2 Tim. 3 13 γόητες (from γοάω, 'to sigh,' 'to utter low moaning tones') is used of a class of magicians who uttered certain magical formulæ in a low deep voice. They were to be found, according to Herodotus, in Egypt (2 33) and elsewhere (4 105 7 191); they are mentioned also by Euripides and Plato.

Paul, in addressing the Galatians (5 20), names among the works of the flesh φαρμακεία [EV 'sorcery']; Syr. ḥarrāshūtha; Heb. versions of Salk. and Del. כְּשָׁפִים [kĕshāphīm], which is closely connected with idolatry by being placed next after it. It is not possible here to do more than mention Simon Magus (Acts 8 9 f.) and Bar-jesus, the sorcerer whom Lk. calls also Elymas (Acts 13 8). This name the writer explains by μάγος; it is really the Arabic ('Ālim), 'learned,' which is much the same in sense as μάγος (cp SIMON MAGUS, ELYMAS). Cp EXORCISTS. T. W. D.

The terms to be enumerated are five—

1. שֹׁפֵט šōphēṭ (Dt. 16 18 etc.). See JUDGE, 1.

2. יֹרֵשׁ עֶצֶר, yōrēš 'éṣer (Judg. 18 7 †) RV 'possessing authority' (mg. 'power of restraint'), an impossible rendering (Moore). The text is very corrupt. In connection with other emendations, and parallel cases of misunderstood references to the N. Arabian Muṣri (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b), it may be best to regard both ירש and עצר as corruptions of a dittographed מצר (i.e., Miṣṣur = Muṣri); בארץ, 'in the land (of)' precedes. The city conquered by the Danites was apparently in the far south (see MICAH i., 2; ZIKLAG), not in the far north.

3. ἀρχή, Lk. 12 11 AV; cp 20 20.

4. ἄρχων, Lk. 12 58; cp RULER.

5. στρατηγός: (a) Acts 16 20-38; cp PRÆTOR, PHILIPPI; (b) Lk. 22 4 etc., see ARMY, § 6. T. K. C.

MAGOG. See GOG AND MAGOG.

MAGOR-MISSABIB. See PASHHUR (1).

MAGPIASH (מַגְפִּיעָשׁ, cp MAGBISH?), signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7); Neh. 10 20 [21] (βαγαφης [Bℵ], μαια [A], μεγαιας [L]).

MAGUS (Acts 13 6 8 RVmg.). See BAR-JESUS, MAGIC, § 4.

MAHALAH. See MAHLAH.

MAHALALEEL, RV Mahalalel (מַהֲלַלְאֵל, § 34, as if 'praise of God'; but 𝔊BAEL, μαλελεηλ, suggests מְהַלֲלְאֵל, 'praiser of God' [Gray, HPN 201, with Redslob and Nestle]; but see below).

1. Fourth in descent from Seth, Gen. 5 12 ff.; 1 Ch. 1 2 † (Bk. Jubilees, Malālēl). Cp CAINITES, MEHUJAEL.

2. One of the bnē Judah in a post-exilic list, Neh. 11 4 † (μαλελεηλ [Bℵ]). See PEREZ.

The Judahite name, if not also the Sethite, is probably to be explained, like JEHALLELEL, as one of the many popular corruptions of the tribal name Jerahmeel. Cp βελεηλ, 𝔊B 1 Ch. 8 1, a fuller form of the Benjamite name Bela, which, like Balaam, seems also to come from Jerahmeel. See also MAGDIEL. T. K. C.

MAHALATH (מָחֲלַת, §§ 74, 78; also as a proper name in Talm. Bab. Pes. 112 a. The name possibly comes from ירחמאלית, Jeraḥme'elith = 'a woman of Jerahmeel' [Che.]).

1. Esau's Ishmaelite wife: Gen. 28 9 [P] (μαελεθ [ADEL]), called BASHEMATH (q.v.) in chap. 36. For an explanation of the double name see SALMAH.

2. Daughter of Jerimoth b. David, and wife of Rehoboam: 2 Chr. 11 18 (μολ[λ]αθ [BA], μαελλεθ [L]).

MAHALATH upon [AV], or set to [RV] (עַל־מָחֲלַת, υπερ μαελεθ [BℵART]; επι χορεια [Aq.], δια χορου [Sym.], υπερ της χορειας [Theod., Quinta]; pro choro, per chorum [Jer.]), Ps. 53, 88 (headings). Ibn Ezra suggested that Mahalath was the first word of a song, to the tune of which these two psalms were set. Ewald and Wellhausen adopt this view; the 'sickness' might be that of God's people. Rashi, however, thought that the flute, Gesenius and Lagarde that the cithara or cithern, was meant. Jerome and the Greek versions except LXX imply the pointing מְחֹלֹת, mĕḥōlōth, 'dances': cp heading of Ps. 88, where Leannoth (perhaps = 'for singing') follows. None of these views has much plausibility or is free from objection. A musical note which occurs in only two psalm-headings, and has no clear meaning, is probably corrupt. As Grätz has seen, a better reading is almost certainly 'upon ALAMOTH' [q.v.]. LEANNOTH (לְעַנּוֹת; τοῦ ἀποκριθῆναι [𝔊]; τοῦ ἐξάρχειν [Aq.]; ad respondendum [Jer.]) is also probably a mis-written עֲלָמֹת, originally intended as a correction of מחלת; see PSALMS [BOOK], § 12 a (on 'Alamoth'). T. K. C.

MAHALI. See MAHLI.

MAHANAIM (מַחֲנַיִם, 'encampment,' cp castra).[1] A

1. O.T. References. city on the E. of Jordan, placed by P on the frontier of Gad and Manasseh (Josh. 13 26 30), and mentioned by him again as a 'city of refuge' together with 'Ramoth in Gilead'

[1] Ges.(13)-Bu.(2) (followed by Che. 'Isaiah,' SBOT, Heb.) most felicitously reads for שַׁחְרָהּ in שחרה. Render: 'There shall come upon thee an evil which thou art not able to prevent by payment.' Note the use of the verb in Job 6 22, and the parallelism of כֹּפֶר and שֹׁחַד in Prov. 6 35.

[2] From Battus, a stuttering Greek poet (see Herod. 1 155). Cp Ecclus. 7 14 'Repeat not thy words in thy prayer' (μὴ δευτερώσῃς λόγον ἐν προσευχῇ σου). For references relating to battology among Moslems and others, see Lange in Herzog, 18 396.

[1] [That the form is not really dual, is maintained elsewhere (see NAMES, § 107). We. (CH 46) would take מחנה (maḥănē) in Gen. 32 22 [21] as a proper name, parallel and equivalent to Mahanaim; but Mahanē does not occur elsewhere, and Ball (SBOT) therefore reads מחנם. There may, however, have been a form Mahanath (see MINNITH). Note the sporadic μααναιθ in 1 Ch. 6 80 (B), as well as the cases where 𝔊 renders by the sing. ἡ παρεμβολή. See ad fin. S. A. C.]

Heshbon, and Jaazer (ib. 21 38 [36], cp 1 Ch. 6 80 [65]). There was doubtless an ancient sanctuary there, for Jacob, so E represents, when he came to the place after parting from Laban, met there a 'host (mahăneh) of divine ones': a skilful application of the obvious etymology. Some find a second reference to the etymology in Gen. 32 7 (J), where 'two hosts' (mahănōth) are spoken of; but there are difficulties in supposing that the scene of Gen. 32 4 ff. (J) is N. of the Jabbok, where E rightly, of course, places Mahanaim (see Holzinger, ad loc., and GILEAD, § 4). On two great occasions the security of the position of Mahanaim seems to have led royal personages to make it their residence. 'Ishbosheth' resided there during his short reign (2 S. 2 8 12), and David retired thither in his flight from Absalom (2 S. 17 24 27; cp 19 32 1 K. 2 8). Under Solomon, Mahanaim was the administrative centre of a department (1 K. 4 14); see AHINADAB. The name occurs in the list of Palestinian cities taken by Shishak (Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 773), and is finally met with (if the article prefixed to מחנים is no objection) in Cant. 6 13 [7 1], where the Shulammite is somehow brought into connection with the 'dance of Mahanaim' (χοροὶ τῶν παρεμβολῶν, AV, 'company of two armies'); criticism, however, throws much doubt upon the text[1] (see CANTICLES, § 9; DANCE, § 7).

Reference is probably made to a re-conquest of Mahanaim in Am. 6 13; for קַרְנַיִם read מַחֲנַיִם, and render, 'Have we not, by our strength, taken Mahanaim'? The name of the other town was hardly Lo-debar, but Jabesh-gilead (of which the MT לא דבר is a corruption). See MEPHIBOSHETH; SAUL, § 6.

2. Identification. The exact site of Mahanaim is uncertain. Conder's reasons for placing it to the east of es-Salṭ,[2] beyond the round basin of the Bukei' will hardly bear examination. The critical analysis of Gen. 32 seems to show that Mahanaim lay N. of the Jabboḳ, but where, is disputed. Merrill (East of the Jordan, 437) thinks of the ruin called Suleikhat, 300 ft. above the Jordan valley, in the Wâdy 'Ajlūn. Robinson, van Kasteren (ZDPV 13 205 f.), and Buhl (Pal. 257), however, urge the claims of Miḥnè or Maḥnè in the Jebel 'Ajlūn, a little to the NE. of the town of 'Ajlūn, whilst Porter and, according to Gautier, Germer-Durand, suggest that Gerasa rose on the ruins of Mahanaim.

In 2 S. 2 29, Abner and his men, on leaving Gibeon, are said to have passed over Jordan, and gone through all Bithron, and so come to Mahanaim. Prof. H. P. Smith explains הַבִּתְרוֹן, as 'doubtless the proper name of one of the side valleys up which Mahanaim was situated.' This is correct, except that 'all Bithron' is corrupt; the real proper name of the side valley was probably 'the valley of Pistachio trees'[3] (נַחַל הַבָּטְנִים). According to 2 S. 18 6 the battle between the army of David and that of Absalom took place in the 'wood of Ephraim.' For 'Ephraim' an early authority reads 'Mahanaim'; but probably 'Ephraim' should rather be Rephaim (see EPHRAIM, WOOD OF). At any rate, it was clearly in the vicinity of Mahanaim, and the nearest way from this 'wood' or copse-land to the city was by the כִּכָּר (EV 'plain'), or rather, since no satisfactory explanation of this reading (v. 23) has been offered,[4] by the נַחַל—that is to say, the eager Ahimaaz ran along in the wady in which, at some little distance, Mahanaim lay.

From a critical glance at the OT passages it is evident that Mahanaim was a strong city; we have to look for one of the very best sites for such a city in N. Gilead. It must also, as Gen. 32 shows, have been easily accessible from Mizpah, which we have elsewhere provisionally identified with Sūf. Putting all this together, we may plausibly identify Mahanaim with 'Ajlūn, so finely situated at a point where valleys meet, with abundant wood in its neighbourhood (GILEAD, § 7), and with an unequalled site for a fortress not far off, which is still occupied by the imposing Ḳal'at er-Rabaḍ. At some distance to the N. is still found the name of Miḥnè or Maḥnè, and some of the best geographers (Robinson, van Kasteren,[1] and Buhl) would therefore place Mahanaim there. It seems better, however, to suppose that the 'wood of Mahanaim' extended as far as Miḥnè, and that the name of Miḥnè is really an abbreviation of that ancient phrase.

Here, as elsewhere, geographical results are dependent on critical exegesis. The idea that 'Ajlūn might be Mahanaim has also occurred to Prof. G. A. Smith (HG 587; cp 335 n., 586); but he did not recognise that it was almost forced upon us by the biblical data, rightly viewed. Mühlau (Riehm(2), 954) feels a similar hesitation; he thinks that Miḥnè is not near enough to the Jabbok and the Jordan Valley.

MAHANEH-DAN or Dan's camp (מַחֲנֵה־דָן; παρεμβολη δαν [BAL]), a place 'behind'—i.e., W. of—Kirjath-jearim, where the 600 Danites from Zorah and Eshtaol encamped in the course of their advance northwards (Jud. 18 12). The explanation of the name is questionable, and a different localisation of Mahaneh-Dan is given in Judg. 13 25—viz., 'between Zorah and Eshtaol.' It was there that the spirit of Yahwè first stirred up Samson. The explanation of this discrepancy is to be found in 1 Ch. 2 52 54, at least if we may read מָנַחְתִּ־דָן instead of מחנה־דן. The Manahethites were partly 'sons' of Shobal the father of Kirjath-jearim, and partly connected with the Zorites (of Zorah). See MANAHETHITES. S. A. C.

MAHARAI (מַהֲרַי, cp Ph. מהרבעל?), a Netophathite [of the Zerahites], one of David's heroes (2 S. 23 28, νοερε [B], μαεραει [A], μααρναν [ο του φελτια] [L], 1 Ch. 11 30, νεερε [Bℵ, i.e., נהרי], μοορα [A], μαρρι [L]; 27 13, μεηρα [B], μοοραι [A], μααρι [L]).

MAHATH (מַחַת, cp Aḫimiti, son of Azuri king of Ashdod, temp. Sargon, see below; μααθ [BAL]).

1. b. Amasai, in the genealogy of the Kohathite Samuel; 1 Ch. 6 35 [20] (μεθ [B], αμιωθ [L]) apparently = AHIMOTH (q.v.) in v. 25 [10] (where L has αμιωθ as here); perhaps derived from Mahath b. Amasai in 2 Ch. 29 12 (μαεθ [A]). Cp JAHATH, 2, GENEALOGIES i., § 7, iii. c. Mahath, 'Amasai, 'Azariah are all Kohathite (i.e., S. Palestinian) names. Amasai probably comes from 'Ishmā'ēlī (Ishmaelite, cp 1 Ch. 2 17), 'Azariah from 'Asshūrī (cp ASSHURIM); Mahath or Ahimoth is presumably also an ethnic, and perhaps (like Aḥiṭub?), comes from Rehōbōthī. A Rehobothite king of Ashdod, and a Levite connected with Rehoboth are very possible.

2. A temple officer temp. Hezekiah (2 Ch. 31 13; θαναι [B; see NAHATH, 3], ααθ [L]), perhaps the same as 1. T. K. C.

MAHAVITE. Eliel the Mahavite is the EV rendering of the MT אֱלִיאֵל הַמַּחֲוִים (1 Ch. 11 46 . . . ο μιει [Bℵ], ο μαωειν [A], ο μαωθι [L]), a rendering which cannot be legitimately obtained from the present state of the text.

Read הַבַּחֻרְמִי (cp Vg., Mahumites), 'a man of Bahurim.' Eliel and Bahurim are both probably Jerahmeelite names (Che.).

Be. (Chron.) and Barnes (Camb. Bible) would read הַמַּחֲנִי, an inhabitant of MAHANAIM (q.v.). Pesh. presents a form ܡܚܘ ܡܚܡ).

[1] Plausible as the 'sword-dance' theory may be, there is so much corruption in the context that we may suggest an emendation akin to that proposed for Cant. 6 11 (see TIRZAH). Read, 'What do you see in the Shulammite? A narcissus of the valleys' (חֲבַצֶּלֶת הָעֲמָקִים). This is grammatically easier and suits the context.

[2] Heth and Moab, 180 f.

[3] Pistachio-trees are found in Gilead (Post, PEFQ, 1888, p. 200; Tristram, NHB 367). The current explanation of Bithron as 'ravine' will hardly bear examination (cp BETHER). Cp בטנים (EV Betonim), a place in Gad, mentioned beside Mahanaim, Josh. 13 26.

MAHAZIOTH (מַחֲזִיאוֹת, 'visions,' cp NAMES, § 23), according to the Chronicler a son of Heman (1 Ch. 25 4 30, μελζωθ v. 4, μεαζωθ v. 30 [B], μααζιωθ [AL], mahazioth [Vg.]), see HEMAN.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ (מַהֵר שָׁלָל חָשׁ בַּז, § 23; οξεως προνομην ποιησαι σκυλων and ταχεως σκυλευσον, οξεως προνομευσον [BℵAQΓ]), the name given by Isaiah to his son (Is. 8 13). Like SHEAR-JASHUB (q.v.) this name is intended as an omen (cp Che. Is.(3), ad loc.). The name means 'swiftly cometh spoil, speedily hasteneth prey' or, to keep closer to the abruptness of the Hebrew, 'hasten booty, speed spoil.' See ISAIAH i., § 4.

MAHLAH (מַחְלָה; μαλα [BAL], μααλα [F]), a daughter of ZELOPHEHAD [q.v.] (Nu. 26 33 [37]; 27 1 [L om. all the names of the daughters]; 36 11 μααλα [B], μαλαα [AL]; Josh. 17 3 μααλα [BL]). In RV of 1 Ch. 7 18 Mahlah (AV MAHALAH) is one of the sons of HAMMOLEKETH [q.v.], Machir's sister (μαελα [B], μοολα [A], μααλαθ [L]).

All these names are corrupt; but the true readings can probably be recovered. Zelophehad springs from Ṣalḥad; Hammoleketh from Salecah (another name of the same place). Mahlah may come from [Abel]-meholah; there was possibly a second place of this name, which ultimately comes from 'Jerahmeel.' Note that Gideon, who has been fused with Jerubbaal, is an Abiezrite, and that Abiezer in 1 Ch. 7 18 is a brother of Mahlah.
T. K. C.

MAHLI (מַחְלִי, § 74; μοολ[ε]ι [BAL]), a Levitical subdivision which appears as a distinct family in Nu. 26 58 (𝔊^BAFL om.), but is elsewhere associated with the division MERARI. These names seem to appear independently in Ezra 8 18 f. (see SHEREBIAH) = 1 Esd. 8 47 (μοολλει [L]); more commonly, however, they are brought into relationship. Thus Mahli is either made the son of Merari (and brother of MUSHI) in Ex. 6 19 (AV MAHALI) Nu. 3 20 1 Ch. 6 19 [4] (μοολλι [L]) 29 [14] (om. B) 23 21 (μοηλ [B in b]) 24 26, or becomes the son of Mushi and grandson of Merari, as in 1 Ch. 6 32 [47] (μοολλι [L]), cp 23 23 24 30 (μοολλει [B]). See, generally, GENEALOGIES i., § 7.

The gentilic Mahlites (הַמַּחְלִי) occurs only in Nu. 3 33 (ὁ μολει [B], ὁ μοολ[ε]ι [B^ab AFL]) 26 58 (see above).

The name is possibly derived from MAHALATH (q.v.); but may come straight from 'Jerahme'eli' (Che.); note that one of Mahli's descendants is named Jerahmeel (cp 1 Ch. 23 21 24 28 f.), and see MOLID.

MAHLON. See CHILION, and cp RUTH (BOOK).

MAHOL (מָחוֹל, § 74; μαλ [B], μαουλ [A], μααλα [L]), the father of Heman, Calcol, and Darda, three (foreign) wise men who, together with Ethan the Ezrahite, were surpassed in wisdom by Solomon (1 K. 4 31 [5 11]). These names can all be accounted for on the assumption that the wisdom of the Edomites is referred to. Ethan and Heman both seem to be corrupt forms of TEMAN [q.v.]; Calcol (כלכל) is probably a corruption of Caleb (כלב), and Darda (דרדע) of AROER (ערער). EZRAHITE is certainly another form of 'Zarhite,' and Zerah in Gen. 36 13 17 is an Edomite clan. Lastly, Mahol, like HAMUL, comes from JERAHMEEL (ירחמאל). It was really, perhaps, only Aroer that was a son of Jerahmeel; 𝔊^BL give υἱὸς or υἱόν, not υἱοὺς in 1 K. l.c. The enthusiastic remark of 1 K. 4 31 [5 11] now becomes more striking, for the wisdom of the Edomites (with whom the Jerahmeelites were connected) was proverbial (cp Obad. 8), and when we take into consideration that in v. 30 we should almost certainly read בני רקם (a corruption of בני ירחמאל, 'sons of Jerahmeel') for MT's בני קדם, and that Job was also 'greater than all the Jerahmeelites' (read בני רקם Job 1 3), the view here offered becomes in the highest degree probable. See EAST (CHILDREN OF), JERAHMEEL, MAHALATH.

Klo.'s ingenious theory (see his notes on 1 K. l.c.) that there was a poetic dialogue, like our Job, in which Ethan and the other sages took part, is baseless; מָחוֹל cannot mean 'a round of alternate speeches.' Lag. (Or. 2 25) more plausibly thought that בְּנֵי מָחוֹל meant 'dancers' (and singers); cp בְּנוֹת הַשִּׁיר, Eccles. 12 4.

MAKAZ (מָקַץ; μαχεμας [B], μαχμας [A], μαγχας [L]), mentioned first among the cities of the second of the prefectures of the land of Israel, 1 K. 4 9. The next three places named being among those reckoned to Dan (Josh. 19 41-43), it would seem that 'Makaz' should be a corruption of one of the other names of Danite towns. ME-JARKON (q.v.) suggests itself as probable. If the site proposed for this place is correct, Me-jarkon well deserved to be so prominently mentioned.[1] Makkûs, a little to the NE. of Ascalon, once proposed by Conder, is neither in an important position, nor would the site be Danite.
T. K. C.

MAKED (μακεδ [AℵV]; Vg. Mageth), an unknown place in Gilead, mentioned in 1 Macc. 5 26 (μακεβ [A]) —cp 36 (where AV MAGED)—along with Bosora and Carnaim.

MAKHELOTH (מַקְהֵלֹת; μακηλωθ [BAF], μακηλωθ [L]), a place named in Nu. 33 25 f., probably identical with KEHELATHAH; cp also MIKLOTH.

All these forms are almost certainly corruptions of 'Jerahmeel.' P's list of stations is artificial; the substratum, however, consists of place-names belonging to the Jerahmeelite region, S. of Palestine.

See WANDERINGS.
T. K. C.

MAKKEDAH (מַקֵּדָה; μακηδαν, μακηδα; Jos. Ant. v. 1 17 μακχιδα, v. 1 μακκηδα; Pesh. māḳār, but in 15 41 naḳdā), a royal Canaanite city (Josh. 12 16; om. [?] B) in the lowland of Judah (15 41), mentioned at the end of a group of cities together with Beth-dagon and Naamah. It was 'in the cave at Makkedah' that the 'five kings of the Amorites,' who had sought refuge there after the battle of Beth-horon (10 10 16), were taken and slain. Makkedah itself was captured afterwards (10 21). Eusebius places Makkedah 8 R. m. E. from Eleutheropolis (OS 278 90; cp 138 8). This is clearly impossible. Nor is it at all certain (the name having disappeared) whether the site proposed by Warren at el-Mughār ('the cave'), SW. of Ekron, 5 m. E. of Nā'aneh (perhaps the Naamah of Josh.), and some 25 m. from Gibeon, is the right one. There are, indeed, signs that an ancient town stood here, and Conder says that this is the only site in the plain where caves are to be found. The Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār has, in fact, made a way here through a bar of soft sandy stone, and the precipitous cliffs are pierced by caverns of various sizes (PEF Mem. 2 411). The narrative in Josh. points to a single specially large cave (המערה) which was outside of the town. The name may seem to suggest a sheep-breeding region (cp נֹקֵד and Dr. on Am. 1 1). It may, however, have suffered changes, and the original name may possibly have had the same origin as MEGIDDO [q.v.]. It has not been traced with certainty in the Egyptian name-lists.
T. K. C.

MAKTESH (הַמַּכְתֵּשׁ; την κατακεκομμενην [BℵAQ]; εις τον ολμον [Aq.], των ολμων [Symm.], εν τω βαθει [Theod.]), usually supposed to be the name of a quarter of Jerusalem where merchants and dealers resided (Zeph. 1 11), and to be so called because in configuration it resembled a mortar (RV^mg., 'the mortar'); cp Judg. 15 19 'the mortar (EV 'hollow place') that is in Lehi.' See MORTAR.

[1] In the main as Klost., who reads the name Me-rakkon.

The Tg. thinks of the Valley of the Kidron, most moderns of the Tyropœon (see JERUSALEM, § 23). The name, however, which is both odd in itself and nowhere else found, is not improbably corrupt. It is best to read הַר־הַמַּשְׁחִית (2 K. 23 13), or rather הַר־הַמִּשְׁתַּחֲוִים (see DESTRUCTION, MOUNT OF); the locality meant is the Mount of Olives. Observe that the 'gates' and the 'hills' are mentioned just before.

This may be illustrated by Neh. 13 15, where we read, according to a probable critical emendation of a corrupt text, that sellers of agricultural produce brought their goods into Jerusalem 'by the ascent of those who worship' (בְּמַעֲלֵה הַמִּשְׁתַּחֲוִים for ואעיר ביום מכרם ציר). Probably there were houses or shelters on the Mount of Olives for those sellers who could not return home in the day. Possibly, too, the phrase מַעֲלֵה הַמִּשְׁתַּחֲוִים is the original name of the הר הזיתים (Zech. 14 4): i.e., זיתים (olives) may be a corruption of משתחוים ('those who worship'). In 2 S. 15 30 we find the phrase מעלה הזיתים ('the ascent of the olives'), for which we should perhaps read (cp v. 32) מעלה המשתחוים. Cp OLIVES, MOUNT OF. T. K. C.

MALACHI. According to the title (Mal. 1 1), the last book of the Minor Prophets contains 'the word of Yahwè to Israel by Malachi.' It would seem that a proper name is intended here, but the difficulty of understanding the word malachi (מַלְאָכִי, 'my messenger')[1] in this way has been felt since the earliest times. Even 𝔊^BNAQ has ἐν χειρὶ ἀγγέλου αὐτοῦ, 'by his messenger'; a translation which (whether from מלאכי or מלאכו) would hardly have been possible at a time when the existence of a prophet Malachi was generally recognised. In fact, the prevailing tradition among the Jews for some time after Christ continued to reject the proper name.

1. Name.

The Jon. Targ. (Mal. 1 1) declares this 'messenger' to have been no other than Ezra the scribe, and Jerome adopts this view. Cp also Talm. Megill. 15*a*. The earliest Church Fathers generally regard the word as an appellative (see Reinke, Malachi, 6-9; Köhler, Nachexil. Proph. 4 4 f.; Nestle, Sept. Stud. 3 13, and cp 4 Esd. 1 40). In any case, it is hardly to be doubted that the superscription is the work of a later hand.[2]

When, finally, it is observed how the phrase 'my messenger' is employed in 3 1, at the beginning of the most striking passage in the book, the conclusion seems imperative that the proper name 'Malachi' originated in a misinterpretation of this word, aided perhaps by Hag. 1 13 as well as Mal. 2 7.

The book falls into two main divisions: (a) a rebuke addressed to the priests (1 6-2 9); (b) a series of oracles addressed to all the people (2 10-3 21 [4 3]).

2. Contents.

(a) The theme of the brief introduction (1 2-5), Israel God's peculiar people, plays a very important part in the book from beginning to end. See 1 6 2 10 3 6 f., and cp 2 5 f. That the prophet should choose here as his sole illustration of this truth a reference to calamities that have recently come upon Edom, Israel's brother nation, is characteristic of the time at which he wrote (see below, § 6).

Of the charges brought against the priests, the foremost is one of gross misconduct in their performance of the temple service (1 6-13). They treat the sacred rites with indifference, and bring the most worthless offerings as good enough for the worship of Yahwè. They are further accused of betraying their trust as the official guides of the people in religious matters (2 4-9). As members of the priestly tribe, they are the bearers of the tōrāh (תורה) or (oral) teaching concerning the religion and worship of Yahwè. They have broken their covenant, however, and turned aside from the path; their teaching has become a stumbling-block to the people. In v. 9*b*, if the text is correct, still another accusation is unexpectedly introduced, namely that of partiality in the use of the 'teaching.' The meaning of the charge is not quite clear, and it is decidedly out of place as it stands.

(b) In the passage 2 10-16, with which the second main division of the book begins, nearly all interpreters since Jerome have seen the prophet's rebuke of two evils—marriage with heathen women, and divorce (so also Targ., though with a noteworthy variation in v. 16, due to the corrupt state of the Hebrew original; see also EZRA i., § 5). This interpretation fails to meet the requirements of the text (see below, § 4). The rebuke is rather directed against the encroachment of foreign worship in Israel (so 𝔊, Pesh.). Judah has dealt falsely with the wife of his youth, the covenant religion, and is wedding a strange cult. The people lament because their offerings fail to bring a blessing, and are strangely unable to see why ill-fortune has come upon them (vv. 13 14*a*).

The two sections 2 17-3 5 and 3 13-21 [4 3] are very much alike in character and contents. In each, the assertion of some of the people that Yahwè does not concern himself with human affairs is answered by the prophet's assurance that the great and terrible day will soon come, when the good shall be separated from the evil and the righteous shall finally triumph. These oracles are interrupted by a characteristic passage (3 6-12) in which the people are censured for neglecting to pay their tithes. The passage was begun in a quite different strain (see esp. v. 7), suggested by the catalogue of sins in v. 5. The way in which the prophet seizes upon this particular delinquency as it occurs to him, abandoning the main line of his reasoning altogether, illustrates both the hasty looseness of style into which he sometimes falls, and his present interest in matters connected with the public worship.

It is probable that 3 22-24 [4 4-6] is a later appendix to the book.[1] It has no natural connection with the preceding, but has all the appearance of an addition by another hand, having for its chief object the providing of an impressive close for the collection of the prophetic writings. It is hardly by accident that Moses and Elijah, the two great representatives of Israel's golden age, appear together in these isolated verses at the end of the last of all the prophets.

The most interesting passage in the book from the theological point of view is 1 11, with its assertion that all sincere worship of the one God, even among the heathen, is accepted by Yahwè, whose name is truly honoured (cp in the NT Rom. 1 19 f. [cp 2 10 f.; Wisd. 13 6-9]; Acts 10 35). This interpretation, which is now adopted by most OT scholars, is the one required by both the language and the context of the verse. See esp. Kuenen, Hibbert Lectures (1882), p. 180 f.; GASm. The Twelve Prophets (1898), p. 358 ff. But the passage stands alone in the OT. In Ps. 65 3 [2], which is perhaps the nearest approach to a parallel, the language is much less definite. Still, remarkable as the expression is, the idea was certainly not foreign to Judaism—it is quite in the spirit of the 'Wisdom' literature, for example—nor can it be said to be out of keeping with the character of this prophet as it appears in the rest of the book.

3. Heathen worship.

It has been remarked above that the current interpretation of 2 10-16 is untenable. The text of the passage is, unfortunately, corrupt;[2] but it is not difficult to recognise the nature of the charge brought by the prophet against his fellow-countrymen. The sin which he is attacking is one of unfaithfulness, of false dealing (verb bāgad). The accusation is stated definitely in v. 11*b*: 'Judah has profaned the sanctuary of Yahwè, which he loves, and has espoused a bath 'ēl nēkār' (בת אל נכר, 'daughter of a foreign god'). A few verses farther on (vv. 14 f.) the charge is made: 'Thou hast dealt falsely with the wife of thy youth, the wife of

4. Figurative interpretation of divorce.

[1] So far as the form is concerned, מלאכי might be a contraction of מלאכיה or מלאכיהו, 'messenger of Yahwè.' But the name is not a likely one, and there is no evidence of the occurrence of the longer form in any Hebrew text (to appeal to the later Greek superscription, Μαλαχίας, is absurd).

[2] Cp especially Zech. 9 1 (text incomplete) 12 1.

[1] [The phraseological evidence for this view has been collected by Böhme, ZATW 7 210 ff.—ED.]

thy covenant.' To treat these expressions literally, as referring to actual marriage and divorce,[1] involves us in insuperable difficulties. To assume, in the first place, that divorce of Israelitish wives stood in any necessary or even probable connection with the wedding of women from other nations is unreasonable. Many modern commentators, in the desire to avoid this difficulty, suppose a change of subject, from intermarriage with Gentiles to divorce in general (Köhler, Orelli, Wellh., etc.). It is not possible, however, thus to separate vv. 13-16 from vv. 10-12. The phrase 'wife of thy covenant-religion' (that 'ēšeth bĕrîthĕkā [אשת בריתך] cannot mean 'wife of thy marriage vows,' Kraetzschmar, Bundesvorstellung, 240 f. has shown conclusively) is plainly contrasted with 'daughter of a foreign god'; 'with whom thou hast falsely dealt' (v. 14) refers to the charge made with the same word in v. 11; bĕrîth in v. 14 is repeated from v. 10. Better evidence of continuity could hardly be desired.[2] Another attempt to remove the apparent incongruities of the passage is that of G. A. Smith (The Twelve Prophets, 2 340 365), who proposes to strike out vv. 11 and 12—a desperate expedient. There is one, and but one, admissible interpretation, namely, that which recognises the use of figurative language here. 'Wedding' a foreign cult necessarily involved 'divorce' from the covenant religion. The figure employed by the prophet is very natural and effective, certainly better suited to his time than that introduced by Hosea.

5. Conditions. The book of Malachi gives us in small compass a many-sided view of the religious conditions in which the writer lived. Israel was beginning to feel the effects of her more intimate acquaintance with the great nations round about. The world had grown larger, and the perspective had changed. A new type of 'free thinkers' had arisen (2 17 3 13 ff.); a class too numerous, and perhaps too sincere, to be ignored. The feeling was gaining ground that the old beliefs and rites were outgrown. Hence the shameful conduct of some of the priests, and the readiness of many influential men among the people to 'betray' the nation (as the prophet insists, 2 10) by openly espousing foreign cults. On the other hand, the orthodox, the 'God-fearing,' formed a sort of church or party by themselves (3 16) in opposition to these tendencies. The situation closely resembles that which produced the two parties of the Pharisees and the Sadducees at a later day. The prophet's own position is that of one who can welcome the broader view, while remaining thoroughly loyal to the national religion. He declares without hesitation that heathen worship is accepted by Yahwè, but in the next breath appeals to the patriotism of his hearers, and to their hope of a Messianic time.

6. Date. As for the date of Malachi, it was certainly written in the Persian period (allusion to the 'governor' in 1 8) after the completion of the temple (3 10). Regarding the other criteria it may be said that they all point distinctly to a late rather than an early date.[3] The remarkable passage 1 2-5 (Edom the arch enemy of Israel) is to be classed with Am. 9 12 and Ob. 21;[1] the apocalyptic passages 3 1 ff. 19 (4 1) ff., with their conception of the day of judgment as the day when 'the wicked' (רשעים) shall be destroyed out of Israel, remind us of the Psalms (Wellh.); the theological development presupposed by the book finds its nearest parallels in the Psalter and the Wisdom literature; and finally, the position of Mal. at the end of the collection of the Prophets may be adduced, though the argument is not weighty. We may, therefore, assign the book with some confidence to the first half of the fourth century.

To argue from the fact that Mal. calls the priests 'sons of Levi,' that he was not acquainted with the priestly law-book (Wellh. on Mal. 3 22 [4 4]; cp Now. 391) is hardly permissible. It is evident, from all parts of the book, that the writer (like many of the latest OT writers) is strongly influenced by Dt. Nothing could be more natural than that he should use its familiar phraseology. The same may be said of 3 22 [4 4] (probably by a later hand; see above) with its mention of Horeb instead of Sinai. Such expressions as 'the laws and statutes' which were 'enjoined by Moses upon all Israel' were, of course, associated with the name 'Horeb' (see, e.g., Dt. 5 1 f.). Cp also Ecclus. 48 7 Ps. 106 19. From 3 10 (cp Nu. 18 21 ff.) it is natural to suppose that the priestly law of tithes was already codified, as it certainly was recognised.

7. Style. The diction of Mal. is pure, the style vigorous, though often prosaic and sometimes awkward. In more than one place, the meaning is seriously obscured by an abrupt transition, due apparently to the writer's impulsive haste. A personal peculiarity of his style is seen in his favourite way of opening an argument, by introducing the supposed objections of his hearers, which he then refutes (1 2 ff. 6 ff. 2 17 3 7 f. 13 ff.).[2] Originality and earnestness are marked characteristics of the book in all its parts. The estimate that pronounces it a monument of the degeneracy of Hebrew prophecy, the product of an age whose religious teachers could only imitate, but not attain to, the spiritual fervour of the old prophets (so esp. Duhm, Reuss) is decidedly unjust.

8. Literature. Among the special comms. on Mal. those of Edward Pococke, 1677 ((2), 1692), Reinke, 1856, Köhler, 1865, may be mentioned. Cp also Stade, Gesch. Isr. 2 128-138; and JBL 17 1-15, where the views expressed in this article, as now revised, are more fully set forth. [See also W. Böhme, ZATW 7 (1887) 210 ff.: Wi. AOF 2 531 ff.]

[1] [The latest advocacy of the literal interpretation is to be found in Nowack's Kl. Proph. 389 410 ff., and Che. Jew. Rel. Life (60). The most plausible reconstruction of the whole background of the passage (Mal. 2 10-16) on the same view is that of Stade (GVI 2 136 f.), who remarks, 'The connection shows that the writer has to do in the first place with matrimonial alliances which respected members of the community, who were already of a certain age, had contracted with rich and influential families of the peoples of the land. These persons were already married, and their non-Jewish fathers-in-law were able, in consequence of their social position, to make the new marriage conditional on a preceding divorce of the Jewish wife.' Against this, however, see Winckler, AOF 2 536 ff.—ED.]

[2] [It is, of course, v. 16 which may appear to break the continuity of Mal. 2 10-16. 'For I hate dismissal (of a wife), says Yahwè,' may seem too general and far-reaching to serve as an argument in this special case. But it is urged that reformers often do not see all that follows from the general principles which they invoke, which explains some of the strange inconsistencies in the later OT literature.—ED.]

[3] It has been customary, chiefly because of the traditional exegesis of 2 10 ff., and the fact that mixed marriages are assailed in Ezra-Neh., to assign Mal. to the middle of the fifth century. [The precise position of the book in relation to Nehemiah and Ezra is a matter of controversy. Stade places it before the arrival of Ezra; Driver during the absence of Nehemiah at the Persian Court; Che. (Jew. Rel. Life) shortly before the arrival of Nehemiah, and consequently before that of Ezra. The question has passed into a new phase in consequence of recent critical study of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah.—ED.]

[1] See JBL 17 16-20; also EDOM, § 9.

[2] It is a curious fact that many scholars, following Ewald, have seen in this (in itself by no means remarkable) habit of style a mark of the transition to the dialectic manner of the Jewish schools, although dating Mal. in the fifth century.

Observe that in Neh. 3 32 (by a 'necessary' emendation) the Zarephathites (הצרפתים) and the Jerahmeelites (הירחמאלים for הרכלים) are mentioned as co-operating in the repairs. See ZAREPHATH.

As to the fact, see SAUL, § 4. As to the name, the second element שוע is a corruption of שאו, the first three letters of שאול dittographed. נרב in the preceding name נרב is evidently a variant of נתן in יונתן. The name of Saul's second son may have been either אבימלך (Abimelech) or, if אבי is merely a variant of יו (Marq.), מלכי is most probably a corruption of מחריאל (Maḥriel) = ירחמאל (Jeraḥme'el). [See further JUNIPER, and for a recovered parallel to Job 30 4 (Job 6 6) see PURSLAIN.] Mallūăḥ comes from mélaḥ, 'salt,' and it is now agreed that the plant is that called ἅλιμος or ἅλιμον by the Greeks, viz. the sea orache, Atriplex Halimus, L. This was first shown by Bochart (Hieroz. 3 16), who quoted the statement of Ibn Baitar (d. 1248 A.D.) that the people of Syria in his time gave the name mallūkh to the ἅλιμον.

The plant is described by Dioscor. (1 120) as 'a hedge shrub, resembling a bramble, whitish, but thornless. Its leaves are like those of the olive, but broader and softer; they are used as potherbs and cooked for food.'

According to Tristram (NHB 466) the sea orache 'grows abundantly on the shores of the Mediterranean, in salt marshes, and also on the shores of the Dead Sea still more luxuriantly. . . . It forms a dense mass of thin twigs without thorns, has very minute purple flowers close to the stem, and small, thick, sour-tasting leaves which could be eaten, as is the Atriplex hortensis, or Garden Orache, but it would be very miserable food.' MALLUS (μαλλωται 2 Macc. 4 30). Mallus rebelled, along with Tarsus, against Antiochus Epiphanes about 171 B.C. Its earliest Greek name was Marlos (cp coins); in the Middle Ages it was called Malo. It was a town of some importance, lying on a height (ἐφ' ὕψους κειμένη, Strabo, 675), on the E. of the Pyramus (Jihun), for Alexander the Great had to bridge the river before reaching the town in his advance to Issus. The site lies about 1 hour SW. of the small village of Kara-tash. The Pyramus divides near its mouth into two arms, which flow respectively E. and W. of the short range of hills extending along the coast NE. of Kara-tash. In ancient times the western arm was the more important; but now it is almost dry and the real mouth of the river is at the opposite end of the chain, at the bay of Ayash (anc. Ægæ).

The conclusion as to the site given above, which is that of Ramsay (Hist. Geogr. of AM, 385; cp Murray's Handbook to AM, 190, with map), is controverted by Heberdey, the most recent authority. He holds that Kara-tash represents the ancient Magarsa (Strabo, 676), Mallus lying 150 stades farther inland, just at the point at which the Pyramus forks. Some support to this view is given by the coins, which show the goddess of the city between two river gods: the proposed site is now a marsh. The ancient authorities, however, combined with the presence of many inscriptions of Mallus at Kara-tash, would seem conclusive against this view—though undoubtedly the Stadiasmus in saying that Mallus lay 150 stades E. of Magarsa is greatly in error. of the Greek now sanctions the mm; μαμωνᾶ is found as early as the Complutensian Polyglot and the first two editions of Erasmus; it is in editions 3-5 of Erasmus, in Stephens, and in Elzevir that we first find μαμμωνα, and this not in Lk., but only in Mt., 'c. min. ut vid. pauc.' (Tisch.).[1]

Though not found as yet in any uncial MS, this spelling is attested by several ancient versions, especially MSS of the O. Latin c, f, ff$_1$, g$_1$, h, Ulfilas in Mt. (mammonin, with the marginal gloss faihu-þraihna = pecunia; the latter word standing in Lk. in the text); the official Vulgate, with some ten of the MSS of Jerome as collated by Wordsworth-White, who now, with the greater number of older MSS, write mamona; the Sahidic (though in the Catena published by Lagarde everywhere [7 times] μαμωνα, p. 15, 160). In ecclesiastical literature μαμμωνᾶς is the prevalent spelling (Zahn, Einl. 1 12); but the editions of the fathers can only in part be trusted. For μαμωνᾶς see Clem. ad Cor. 6, 1; Clem. Al. Lagarde, 102 17 22; Pitra in both passages -μμ). There is an interesting passage in the newly discovered Latin Didascalia (ed. Hauler, p. 46), 'De solo mammona cogitant, quorum Deus est sacculus'; in the Syriac דממונא, 'they are only of (=for) the mamon, whose God is the purse and the belly' (p. 65, 8, 11); in the Greek: ἀντὶ τοῦ θεοῦ τῷ μαμωνᾷ λατρεύει τουτέστι δουλεύει τῷ κέρδει. Origen (ed. Klostermann, iii. 53 28). θεός σού ἐστιν 'ἡ κοιλία' (Phil. 3 19) . . . θεός σού ἐστιν ὁ μαμωνᾶς καὶ κύριος.

The question of spelling is more important here than elsewhere because of the etymology (see below, §§ 3, 4); for the Greek the single μ seems to be certain (cp also Edward Miller, Textual Commentary 47, μαμωνα, Burgon, 'All Uncials and most Cursives'); the Latin 'mm' may be influenced by the analogy of mamma and annona; cp also grabbatum for grabattum, Barrabas for Barabbas, and similar cases.

2. Accentuation. The question of accentuation is also of unusual importance.[2] All modern editors write μαμωνᾷ in the dative, with 'iota subscriptum.' As the oldest MSS of the NT have no accents we cannot tell how far this iota rests on MSS authority; but the nominative μαμωνᾶς is found in the Onomastica Vaticana (Lag. 194, 59, μαμωνᾶς πλοῦτος ἢ μῶμος, δῶρα ἢ πέμματα with ζ [ητει] i.m. at the last word); in Suidas (ed. Bernhardy, 2679): Μαμωνᾶς χρυσός, γήϊνος πλοῦτος οὐχὶ ὁ ἐκ τοῦ Σατανᾶ, ἀλλ' ὁ περιττὸς καὶ ὑπὲρ τὴν χρείαν. As the word is already inflected in the earliest Latin writers (e.g., Tertullian) we need not doubt that the nominative was μαμωνᾶς (not -ᾶ), like Σατανᾶς.[3] Certainly to Greek readers μαμωνᾶς must have had the ring of a masculine proper name, at least in such a connection as that of Mt. 6 24 = Lk. 16 13. The latest editor, Fr. Blass (Evangelium secundum Matthæum cum variæ lectionis delectu, Lipsiæ, Teubner, MCMI) returns to the spelling with a capital as WH had printed in their privately-distributed Gospels. As an impersonal neuter it would have been spelt μαμῶνα like μάννα, πάσχα. That it really is masculine as the dictionaries mostly state is shown by the passage from Origen, 3 53, quoted in § 1.[4]

Biblical Hebrew does not contain a word מָמוֹן or מַמּוֹן; it is met with, however, in MH, see, e.g., Pirḳē Ābōth 2 12 (R. Jose used to say

3. Use and meaning. יהי ממון חברך חביב עליך כשלך, 'the mamon (riches) of thy neighbour shall be dear to thee as thy own'; or מלח ממון צדקה, 'the salt of mamon is almsgiving.'

Here Strack vocalises מָמוֹן even in the st. cstr., whilst Delitzsch punctuates מְמוֹן הָעַוְלָה in Lk. 16 11 [but in ed. 1892 מָמוֹנָהּ שֶׁל־עַוְלָה]; Pagninus gave מָמוֹנָא מַמּוֹן, Dalman (Gram. 135) gives מָמוֹן, Ex. 21 30 (Onk.). In the Syriac versions it is uniformly ܡܳܡܽܘܢܳܐ (ā), though Karmsedinoyo in the Thesaurus Syriacus mentions the spelling ܡܰܡܽܘܢܳܐ (ă) in the first syllable. In the Palestinian Syriac we have the spellings ܡܡܘܢܐ cod. B (in Mt.), C (in Lk. 11 13), ܡܐܡܘܢܐ cod. B (in Lk. 11 13), ܡܡܘܢܐ C (in Mt.), AC (Lk. 11 13). On the Mandaic forms מאנונא and מינונא (with נ), see Nöldeke, Mand. Gr. 50.

The LXX seems to have found the word in Ps. 36 (37) 3 for אמונה.[1] The word is especially frequent in the Targums and sometimes supplemented there by דשקר (= τῆς ἀδικίας of Lk.). The passages of this kind are marked in the following list with a star.

It corresponds to Heb. בֶּצַע in Gen. 37 26 Ex. 18 21 Judg. 5 19 *1 S. 8 3 *Prov. 15 27 *Ezek. 22 27. הוֹן in Ps. 44 13 [12] Prov. 3 9. הָמוֹן, Eccles. 5 9, Tg. and Pesh., Targ. with the addition יתיר; cp ὁ περιττός in Suidas above, § 2. חַיִל in Ps. 49 11 [10]. כֹּפֶר in Ex. 21 30 (also Pesh.); Nu. 35 31 *1 S. 12 3 *Amos 5 12. מְאֹד in Dt. 6 5 Onk. נכס (wherewith cp Ecclus. 5 8, נכסי שקר = χρήμασι ἀδίκοις). מְחִיר in Is. 55 1. צַו in *Hos. 5 11. רְכוּשׁ in Gen. 14 12 (Jon.). שֹׁחַד in *Is. 33 15 45 13.[2] In the Peshitta of Ecclus. the word is found 10 8 14 3 (𝔊, χρήματα), 31 5 8 (𝔊, χρυσίον). In the Hebrew Ecclesiasticus it is now found 31 8, not in 14 3 (where חרוץ). On the proposal to read ממון or מַמוֹן, also 40 26*c* (𝔊, βοήθειαν) see Schechter-Taylor, 55. In 42 9 we have בת לאב מטמנת שקר (marg., מטמון) = 𝔊, θυγάτηρ πατρὶ ἀπόκρυφος ἀγρυπνία, Pesh. ܡܛܫܝܐ ܡܡܘܢ. Strange that in Tg. it stands nowhere for מטמון (Tg. mostly = סִמְין, 𝔊 always θησαυροί Gen. 43 23 Job 3 21 Prov. 2 4 Is. 45 3 Jer. 41 8), from which many derive it.

The following are the chief etymologies which have been proposed. (1) From √אמן, the thing in which

4. Etymology. men trust or what is entrusted to man, or that which supports and nourishes men. The Syriac lexicographers favour the last view. In Lk. 16 11 there is an apparent play of words with this root (πιστοί, τὸ ἀληθινόν, πιστεύσει).

2. From √המה = מ(ה)מון, Eccl. 5 9 Ps. 37 16.

3. From √ממן, as contraction of מטמון. This explanation is much older than Gesenius (Thes.), being already quoted by Calovius and Castell-Michaelis. It is maintained also by Dalman (Gram. 135), who thinks that מַטְמוֹן = מַמּוֹן came as a Hebrew word to the Aramæans, and that its origin was considered to be of the form ḳāṭōl and consequently vocalised with ā and without dagesh.

4. From √מן in the sense of מנה = the allotted portion; thus Frz. Delitzsch (ZLT, 1876, p. 600). For a different view see Michaelis (Cast. Lex. Syr.).

5. Lagarde (Mittheil. 1 229 and Übersicht) maintained that it is = מעמן = Arab. maḍmūn.

6. It was even connected in early times with μῶμος (see Onomastica and Buxtorf); with μαιμώω (see Buxtorf, Castell); and in modern times, by G. Hoffmann, with νόμισμα (see details in his Phön. Inschriften, 43).

[1] Bengel quotes for μαμωνα the cursive MSS 83, 84, 86, 89, evst 24, et multi alii; for μαμμ. only 'editions.'

[2] Kautzsch (Aram. Gramm. 10) states that WH accentuate μαμωνά, but in fact—in all impressions—they have μαμωνᾶ as genitive and μαμωνᾷ as dative. This 'iota subscriptum' points to the fact that they consider the nominative to be μαμωνᾶς. It is strange too, that Baljon should give in the dictionary μαμωνᾶ, ᾶ ὁ (with Cremer(8), 632); in NT he himself gives the dative as μαμωνᾷ.

[3] Hence arises the question whether Lagarde was right when he inferred from the termination -ας that a word like Σατανᾶς was regarded as a proper name and not as an appellative. Schmiedel-Winer, § 6, n. 17, denied it, and we may compare κορβανᾶν beside κορβᾶν.

[4] Nic. de Lyra (on Mt.) remarks, in accordance with the Glossa Ordinaria, 'mammona syra lingua divitiæ,' adding that it was also said to be the name of a demon ('nomen dæmonis qui tentat de cupiditate divitiarum'; Glossa Ordinaria, 'qui præest divitiis'). In Lk. he takes the other course: 'Mammon est nomen dæmonis tentantis de divitiis male acquirendis et ideo nomen eius ad divitias significandas derivatur et potest esse primæ vel tertiæ declinationis dicendo mammona, mammonæ, vel mammon, mammonis.'

[1] Not, however (as is sometimes stated), in Is. 33 6, where ἐν θησαυροῖς corresponds to חסן. Nevertheless this passage is important, because θησαυροὶ δικαιοσύνης (אוֹצָרוֹ) later in the verse reminds us of the μαμωνᾶ τῆς ἀδικίας in Lk.

[2] Cp, further, 1 S. 2 5 Ps. 112 9, 2 S. 14 14 (nothing to correspond in Hebrew), and ממון דרשע, Hab. 2 9 = בֶּצַע רָע. The plural does not seem to occur in the Targums; but in Jewish writings דיני ממונות, 'processes about property,' are distinguished from ד' נפשות.

Hoffmann's objection to Lagarde's explanation, that it does not fit the Punic meaning lucrum, known to Augustine ('Lucrum Punice mammon dicitur,' on the Sermon on the Mount, ii. 14 17) is scarcely to the point.

That there was a god (or as Nic. de Lyra said [§ 2, n. 3], a demon) called Mammon or Mamon, like the Πλοῦτος of the Greeks, does not follow from the words of Tert. adv. Marc. 4 33, 'iniustitiæ enim autorem et dominatorem totius sæculi nummum scimus omnes'; nor from those quoted above from the Didascalia, 'quorum Deus est sacculus.' The personification of riches lies close at hand.

Luther is apparently the first German translator of the Bible to give 'Mammon'; the early translators (like Ulfilas, and later translations like the French Martin) gave its equivalent. So far as we have hitherto been able to learn, it makes its first appearance in English in Piers Plowman (1392?): 'And of Mammonaes money mad hym many frendes' (11 87). The wide currency of the idea that Mammon is the name of a god is due to Milton (W. H. Bennett, in Hastings, DB 3 224).

MAMNITANAIMUS, RV Mamnitanemus (ΜΑΜΤΑΝΑΙΜΟC [B], ΜΑΜΝΙΤΑΝΑΙΜΟC [A], ΜΑΤΘΑΝΙΑ [?] [L]), a corruption in 1 Esd. 9 34 of 'Mattaniah, Mattenai, and Jaasu' (Ezra 10 37).

MAMRE (מַמְרֵא; ΜΑΜΒΡΗ [ADEL]), a name closely connected with the legends of Abraham. The 'oaks' (or rather perhaps 'oak'; so 𝔊, Pesh.; cp Gen. 18 4, 'the tree') 'of Mamre,' for which AV constantly gives 'plains' (see PLAIN) are mentioned in Gen. 13 18 14 13 18 1 (all J, except 14 13).

1. References. In 14 13, as also in v. 24, Mamre is described as an Amorite, and as the brother of ANER and ESHCOL. In P (Gen. 23 17 19 25 9 35 27 49 30 50 13) Mamre is connected with Abraham's burial place, and is identified (23 19 35 27) with HEBRON [q.v.]. Jos. (BJ iv. 9 7) speaks of a large terebinth, as old as the world, which stood in his time six stadia from the city; doubtless it was traditionally associated with the oak of Mamre, and in the Jewish legends which sprang up later, Mamre plays a prominent part. Sozomen states that in his time it was called Τερέβινθος,[1] and was the scene of a yearly feast and fair (cp WRS Rel. Sem.(2) 177, 193). We may admit, then, that Josephus's statement 'as old as creation' is not without an element of truth; the old, heathenish tree-worship survived, in an innocent form, even to Christian times. See further, NATURE-WORSHIP, § 2, and, on the name, cp MARY.

Winckler, however (GI 2 38 f.), thinks that the connection of Mamre with Hebron is due to misunderstanding. Mamre and Kirjath-arba were connected; but Kirjath-arba was in the far N., and may have been Dan. The terebinths of Mamre represent the sacred precinct of the sanctuary.

So far we have proceeded on the assumption that MT is correct in its readings.

2. Textual criticism. In the light of emendations, however, which have been suggested in other passages, we can hardly help emending באלני ממרא (Gen. 13 18 14 13 18 1) into בירחמאל 'in Jerahmeel,' or בבאר ירח׳ 'by the well of Jerahmeel.' This and the related critical emendations pour a flood of light on the legends of Abram or Abraham, whose name indeed possibly means 'The (divine) father loves' (properly Ab-raḥam), indicating that he represented originally the tribe of Jerahmeel ('God loves'?). The brothers of Mamre are Aner and Eshcol. For ענר, Aner, read ארבע, Arba[2] (probably from עֲרָב, 'Arabia,' and for אֶשְׁכֹּל, Eshcol, read חֲלָצָה, Ḥalāṣah (remembering that יצחק, 'Isaac,' not improbably comes from אחיחלץ, Aḥiḥeleṣ; see ISAAC).

[1] The τερέβινθος in OS(2) 297 36, is that of Gen. 35 4 (Shechem). 'There is also a Τρεμιθοῦς in Cyprus, explained from the trembling of the ground when Aphrodite set her feet upon the spot, but really, as Steph. Byz. says, Τρεμιθοῦς is Cypriote for Τέρμινθος, terebinth. The connection of the terebinth with Aphrodite is doubtless correct' (WRS, MS note).

[2] עֲנָק, 'Anak,' is suggested by Wi. (GI 2 40) as a possibility; but see SODOM.

It was probably at Rehoboth, not at Hebron, that the tall sons of Anak dwelt; cp 1 Ch. 11 23, which suggests that the Muṣrites were noted for their stature (see MIZRAIM). Rehoboth, Ḥalāṣah, and Beer Jerahmeel were all important places in the Negeb, and famous in legend (see NEGEB, HEBRON).

MAMUCHUS (ΜΑΜΟΥΧΟC [BA]), 1 Esd. 9 30; see MALLUCH, 2.

MAMZER (מַמְזֵר). This word, probably of popular origin (see below), became a technical term in later Judaism for one born of related persons between whom marriage is illegal (see BASTARD). An old Talmudic tradition, however, defines a Mamzer differently, as meaning a child born of a marriage of a non-Jew or a slave with a Jewess (see references in Geiger, Urschrift, 54). Geiger thinks that this is the original meaning, and that this is proved by Zech. 9 6, 'a mamzēr shall dwell in Ashdod' (cp Neh. 13 23 f.). It is highly probable, however, that ממזר in that passage is a corruption of an Assyrian loan-word mindīdu, 'measuring-clerk' (see SCRIBE), so that the passage means that Ashdod shall be subject to Assyrian functionaries. If so, the only OT passage containing mamzēr is Dt. 23 2; the ideas which gathered round the word, however, are alluded to in Jn. 7 49, which Nestle is probably right (against B. Weiss) in paraphrasing thus, 'We are no heathen, but the legitimate members of the assembly of God' (Exp. T, Feb. 1900, p. 235).

The origin of mamzēr seems far from being settled. Must it not be an old popular corruption, not of מֵעַם זָר, as Geiger thought, but of the lengthy Hebrew phrase עַם הָאָרֶץ, 'am hāāreṣ (cp Jn. 7 49)? Dt. 23 2 ff. can hardly be pre-exilic. Nestle, 'Der Mamzer von Asdod,' ZATW 20 [1900], p. 166 f., raises the question of a connection between Zech. 9 6 and Neh. 13 23 f., but quite misses the sense both of ממזר and of מפסר. Cp the present writer's article, PSBA 22 [1900] 165 f.

T. K. C.

MAN, MEN. Five Hebrew words are thus rendered:—

1. אָדָם, 'ādām (on possible root, see ADAM AND EVE, § 3 [a], and cp Del. Prol. 103 f.; Muss.-Arn. Ass. Dict. 20; Di. Gen.(6) 53 f.; in Sab. ארם means 'servant, vassal'). A collective term (properly with art.) for 'mankind' (Gen. 6 1 7) or 'men' as opposed to God (‖ אִישׁ or אֲנָשִׁים [Is. 2 17, and, without art., 9 11]). Also, 'a representative or typical member of the human race,' so אָדָם חַי, 'a living man,' Lam. 3 39 (but see LAMENTATIONS, § 4, end); אָדָם רָשָׁע, 'a wicked man' (Job 20 29 27 13 Prov. 6 12 11 7). In late usage, אָדָם can mean 'any man' (Neh. 2 10). If emendations suggested elsewhere are accepted, it is remarkable how liable this word is to corruption; consequently some very doubtful meanings have found their way into the lexicons. Examples are, Gen. 16 12 (see ISHMAEL); Is. 43 4 Jer. 32 20 Hos. 6 7 (see LOVINGKINDNESS); Job 31 33 Ps. 17 4 82 7 116 11. In J's narrative of creation, הָאָדָם is the first created man (see ADAM AND EVE). On the phrase 'son of man,' see special article. Cp MESSIAH.

2. אִישׁ, 'īš (root uncertain; the plur. אֲנָשִׁים is evidently connected with אֱנוֹשׁ [3]). The word is used as a designation of the male sex (e.g., Gen. 4 1 1 S. 1 11, and [of animals] Gen. 7 2). Also for a husband as opposed to a wife (Gen. 3 6 29 32 34 Ruth 1 11). Hence for Yahwè as Israel's husband (Hos. 2 7 [9] 16 [18]). Also, for an inhabitant of a city or country (Judg. 10 1 1 S. 7 11, etc.); generally as a collective (Josh. 9 6 Judg. 7 23, cp MI 1 10). Also for servants or soldiers (1 S. 23 3 12, etc.); cp the phrase 'man of God' = prophet. Whether בְּנֵי־אִישׁ and בְּנֵי־אָדָם in antithesis (Ps. 49 3 [2] 62 10 [9]; cp 4 3 [2]) mean 'low and high,' 'men of low degree,' and 'men of high degree' (so EV), is disputed. In Jer. 5 1 אִישׁ even acquires an ethical connotation.

3. אֱנוֹשׁ, 'ĕnōš (possibly connected by the Hebrews with √אנשׁ, 'to be weak'; a mere Volksetymologie); cp Ass. tēnišētum, 'human beings' = 'mankind'; nišu, 'a people,' pl. nišē, 'people.' Properly a collective = the human race (Dt. 32 26 Job 7 17 15 14 Ps. 8 4 [5]); so also בֶּן־אֱנוֹשׁ (Ps. 144 3). Rarely of individuals (Is. 56 2 Jer. 20 10 Ps. 55 13 [14] Job 5 17 13 9). In Is. 8 1 חֶרֶט אֱנוֹשׁ, 'a man's pen' = 'in common characters' (RVmg.). In allusion to its supposed etymology אֱנוֹשׁ can mean 'frail (mortal) man,' as opposed to God; so in Job, Psalms, Is. 51 7 12 2 Ch. 14 10 [11]. Di. and Del. would thus explain Enos (Enosh) in Gen. 4 26; but see ENOS, and on Is. 8 1, see Crit. Bib.

4. גֶּבֶר, gébher (Aram. גְּבַר; MI 50 16, גברן and גברת, 'men' and 'women'; Arab. jabr, 'a vigorous young man'; cp גִּבּוֹר, 'a strong man'). In the sing. only once in prose—viz., in Dt. 22 5 (opposed to אִשָּׁה, 'woman'); in plur. Ex. 10 11 12 37 Josh. 7 14 17 f. 1 Ch. 23 3 24 4 26 12. גְּבָרִים (the pl. form) is more definite than אֲנָשִׁים (see 2), which includes men, women, and children. גֶּבֶר is (a)=אִישׁ—i.e., simply 'man' (Ps. 34 9 [8] 40 5 [4] 52 9 [7] 94 12 Jer. 17 5 7); (b) 'strong man,' like גִּבּוֹר (Job 38 3 Is. 22 17); (c)=זָכָר, 'male' (Jer. 30 6 31 22), also of a male child (Job 3 3); (d) 'husband' (Prov. 6 34); (e) 'warrior' (Judg. 5 30); (f) 'man' (=אָדָם), as opposed to God (Job 4 17 10 5 14 10 14 Prov. 20 24 Lam. 3 35).

5. מְתִים, mĕthîm (sing. מְתוּ, cp perhaps METHUSAEL, METHUSELAH; cp Ass. mutu, Eth. met, both meaning 'husband'), especially in the phrase מְתֵי מִסְפָּר, 'few people' (Gen. 34 30 Dt. 4 27 Ps. 105 12 1 Ch. 16 19), or the synonymous מְתֵי מְעָט (Dt. 26 5 28 62). Six times in Job (11 3 11 19 19 22 15 24 12 31 31); six times in Dt. (2 34 3 6 4 27 26 5 28 62 33 6). The only old passage is Is. 3 25, where it seems to mean 'warriors.' In Judg. 20 48 (see Moore, Bu.) מְתִם should be read for מְתֹם. T. K. C.

MANACLES (אֲזִקִּים), Jer. 40 1 AV^mg.; EV, CHAINS (q.v. 2).

MANAEN (ΜΑΝΑΗΝ [Ti.WH], i.e., מְנַחֵם; cp readings of MENAHEM), a Christian prophet or teacher at Antioch called [RV] the 'foster-brother' [Vg. collactaneus] of Herod the tetrarch, Acts 13 1 (Ἡρῴδου τοῦ τετραάρχου σύντροφος). 'Foster-brother,' however, seems to say too much; σύντροφος is well attested as a court-title in Hellenistic Greek (Fränkel, Alterthümer von Pergamon, viii. 1, pp. 111 f., quoting inscriptions and Polyb. v. 9 4 xxxii. 25 10; Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 180 f., cp 173). Manaen, then, was in the confidence of Herod Antipas; the title implies nothing as to his early life.

Μαναημος was also the name of an Essene who foretold that Herod the Great would one day become king (Jos. Ant. xv. 10 5), and who is to be identified with the colleague of Hillel in the Sanhedrin (Chăgigā, 2 2; Geiger, Jüd. Zt., 1869, pp. 176 f.). But the coincidence is accidental. The name would naturally be a favourite with those who 'waited for the consolation of Israel' (Lk. 2 25). Cp 'Manaim' (ISRAEL, § 101), a zealot. Acc. to Talm. Jer. Ber. 2 4, Midr. on Lam. 1 16, one of the names of the Messiah would be Menahem, 'comforter.' Cp MENAHEM. T. K. C.

MANAHATH (מָנַחַת, § 78; ΜΑΝΑΧΑΘ [A*D*L]).

1. One of the sons of Shobal the Horite, Gen. 36 23 (μανναχαθ [A], μαναχα [E]); 1 Ch. 1 40 (μαχαναμ [B], μαναaθ [L]). Cp the origin assigned to the Manahathites of Judah, 1 Ch. 2 52 54.

2. A place to which the Benjamites of Geba were compelled by other Benjamite clans to migrate, 1 Ch. 8 6 (μαχαναθει [B], μαναχαθι [A], μανουαθ [L]). This Manahath may be assumed to be the chief town or village of the MANAHATHITES of Judah [q.v.], and may reasonably be identified with (3).

3. (μανοχω [BAL], μαναχ [44 54 etc.], μανναχ [74 76 etc.], Mānak [Syrohex.].) One of the cities of Judah added by 𝔊 in Josh. 15 59 (cp SBOT); it follows BETHER (q.v.) as the last in the list. Perhaps the modern Māliḥa (n and l confounded, as often), a large village SW. of Jerusalem, near Bittīr (Bether). So Cl.-Gan. PEFQ, 1874, p. 162. See above, 2.

MANAHETHITES (הַמְּנַחְתִּי; ΜΑΛΑΘΕΙ [B], ΜΑΝΑΘ [A], -Ι [L]), 1 Ch. 2 54, and, by a virtual correction of the text, v. 52, RV 'MENUHOTH' (הַמְּנוּחוֹת; ΜΩΝΑΙΩ [B], ΑΜΜΑΝΙΘ [A] [1] om. L). AV's (virtual) harmonisation of v. 52 and v. 54 is fully justified (see Ki. SBOT); but the English form Manahathites in RV is preferable to Manahethites. 'Manahathite' is a gentilic noun from MANAHATH [q.v.]. The clan so called had Calebite affinities. The origin of one half of it is traced to the tribal hero Shobal, that of the other half to Salma. The locality of Salma's half is at and near Zorah—the well-known town of MANOAH [q.v.]—that of Shobal's is not mentioned, but presumably it was Danite. SHOBAL [q.v.], it should be remembered, is both Edomite and Judahite. There was also an Edomite MANAHATH (q.v., 1). Note, too, that Salma (called in 1 Ch. 2 51, 'the father of Beth-lehem,'—i.e., Beth-jerahmeel? [Che.]) is properly N. Arabian. See SALMAH.

[1] חצי המנוחות was unintelligible to the old translators (εσειρα μωναιω [B], εσει αμμανιθ [A]; L om.). Tg. makes הַמ׳ equivalent to הַמִּנְחָה.

MANASSEAS (ΜΑΝΑCCΗΑC [BA]), 1 Esd. 9 31 = Ezra 10 30, MANASSEH (2).

MANASSEH.

Manasseh (מְנַשֶּׁה; § 62; on etymology see below, § 4; gentilic Manassite, מְנַשִּׁי [see § 4, end]; noun and adjective alike, ΜΑΝΑCCΗ [BAEDFL], ΜΑΝΝ. [A], ΜΑΝΑCCΗC [BAQRT]) is mentioned in Is. 9 20 as a part of Israel, engaged, or about to be engaged (Marti, ad loc.), in strife with Ephraim [1] (cp EPHRAIM, § 5, i. end). There is no other contemporary reference of a historical character.[2] In the genealogical schemes Manasseh ranks as a brother of Ephraim. Since Ephraim is practically synonymous with Israel (see EPHRAIM, § 1), if we could feel sure that the seniority ascribed by J, E (virtually), and P (see below, § 2) to Manasseh represented a real tradition, we should be tempted to believe that the people who held the highlands of N. Israel at an early date were called Manasseh.[3] Machir, who in Judg. 5 14 seems to represent Manasseh, is in Josh. 17 1 Manasseh's eldest son, and in Nu. 26 29 ff. (cp Gen. 50 23) his only son, and is therefore perhaps Manasseh himself (cp MACHIR, and below, § 5, end). It is not impossible, if 'Benjamin' was not originally mentioned in Judg. 5 14 [4] (cp BENJAMIN, § 4), that Ephraim and Manasseh (or Machir) were by poetical parallelism names for the same thing. This would explain how, when, at a later date (Graf, Gesch. des Stammes Simeon, 5; Ew. Gesch. 2 423 ff.), Western Israelites planted the name of Machir-Manasseh E. of Jordan (JAIR, MACHIR), the geographical name of EPHRAIM [q.v., § 2] prevailed in the west. If the names ascribed to Manasseh (there is no definite territory: EPHRAIM, § 11) in Josh. 17 2 be taken to make probable the existence of some special Manassite clan or clans forming part of the population of the Ephraim country they may, before most of them migrated eastwards, have been influential enough to lend their name sometimes to the whole. How well Machir as an equivalent for Joseph would suit the Genesis narrative has been pointed out elsewhere (EPHRAIM, § 1). It may have been the comparatively early migration of most of these settlers that led to the western story of the seniority of Manasseh.

1. Application of name.

Whatever may have been the real history of the name (see § 1), then, at some time or other Manasseh was not identified with Ephraim, was in fact subordinated to it. The supremacy of Ephraim could not be denied. It was held to be the effect of the laying of the right hand of the blind old Jacob-Israel on the head of the eponymos of Ephraim (Gen. 48 14 a, J). J, however, evidently felt that there was something strange about the distinction falling to the lot of Ephraim. His explanation is the quaint story told in Gen. 48: Ephraim had not always been first.

2. Relation to Ephraim.

[1] Che., however ('Isaiah,' Heb. SBOT, 194), thinks that 9 20 [19] a b 19 [18] c 20 [19] c 21 [20] a b 'probably' come 'from another context,' and that 'Judah alone was referred to by the original writer [of the poem].' This would leave the date of the reference to Manasseh and Ephraim uncertain, for v. 21 [20] a b can hardly be brought into connection with 3 14; it would have to be a gloss.

[2] For a hypothetical mention see col. 2406, n. 5.

[3] Note that 'Manasseh' of Judg. 1 27 becomes 'Israel' in v. 28.

[4] Its mention between Ephraim and Manasseh would be strange.

MANASSEH

Original precedence is definitely ascribed to Manasseh by J (Gen. 48 14 and practically 18), and virtually by E (v. 20; followed by P, v. 5) in the adoption story, and by P quite explicitly (בכור) in Josh. 17 1, perhaps to account for Manasseh's inheritance being originally described by P (cp 16 4) before that of Ephraim (v. 5), not, as in our present book of Joshua, after it (17 1).

Apart from these passages there is no evidence excepting (1) the order in which the names of the two tribes occur in statements made about them, and (2) the order in which they are dealt with when all the tribes are treated in succession.

(1) In the case of passages dealing with the two tribes, Manasseh first is found (once) in P possibly (Josh. 16 4),[1] later (Steuernagel) in 14 4 certainly. Nor need J be opposed to this.[2] The Chronicler's five passages[3] give no positive light on his way of thinking, the order (Ephraim first) being merely geographical.

(2) In the case of passages treating of all the tribes, Manasseh is again first in the genealogical lists of this kind in P (which may belong to supplementary strands: Gen. 46 = Nu. 26), in P's list of dividers of Palestine, and in the arrangement adopted by the Chronicler in the first section of his book: Manasseh (1 Ch. 7 14), Ephraim (v. 20);[4] perhaps also in J[5]. All the other lists in P and in Chronicles give Ephraim first.[6]

There may possibly have been from the first, as Staerk (Studien, 2 23) suggests, two orders in use; but if those who repeated the story told by J and implied by E saw no underlying meaning, it would have been enough, as Winckler remarks, simply to say that Ephraim was the first-born. When a Vedic hymn says 'The Brahmana was his mouth, the Raganya was made his arms, etc.' the explanation may explain nothing; but there was something to explain. In addition to what is said elsewhere (EPHRAIM, § 5, i.; JOSEPH i., § 2), some considerations must be offered here.

3. Its explanation.

In favour of Jacobs' explanation as a survival of a 'junior-right' from a pastoral period (EPHRAIM i., § 5, i.) is the advantage it has of explaining so many other cases of the younger being preferred.[7] It is doubtful, however, whether the genealogical system is quite old enough to have retained a custom so antique. Still, though the whole question of the meaning and origin of the 'junior birth-right' where it is known to have prevailed is difficult, the suggestion that some at least of the old Hebrew genealogical relationships are due to it perhaps deserves more consideration than it seems to have received.[8] Reference is made below (§ 4, begin.) to the view of Winckler (GI 2 74 f.) that the two sons of Joseph, whom he regards as in some respects a solar character (above, col. 2582, n. 3), represent the two halves of the year, and that their exchange of places refers to a change in the mode of calculating the year that is known to have occurred (MONTH, § 3). This seems one of the least tempting mythical interpretations,[9] and appears to be uncalled for, as Winckler himself offers another explanation decidedly more plausible (GI 2 85).

Winckler suggests that there was much more than the story of Gideon-Abimelech to indicate an early importance of Manasseh. The fact that in one account the career of Saul began at Jabesh in Gilead he regards as one of several indications (GI 2 158) that Saul was from across the Jordan, probably a Manassite leader of a band of warriors who made the chieftainship of Benjamin a stepping-stone to the kingship of a Benjamin monarchy, which, through the expulsion of the Philistines, became a state of considerable dimensions (16 1 16 4). A forecast of this is given in the victory of Jephthah over Ephraim (2 14 1), which Winckler thinks originally made Jephthah king in Shechem (14 1), and with this he connects the story of Abimelech. Manasseh had thus the supremacy in a very real sense before it passed to Ephraim with Jeroboam. The theory that Saul's home was across the Jordan is strongly defended by Winckler. For Cheyne's reasons for rejecting it, and the emendations of the text on which his own theory partly rests, see SAUL.

Naturally the name as well as the status of Manasseh was popularly explained. It was connected with the verb to forget. Josephus says that the name means 'causing to forget' (Ant. ii. 6 1, § 92, ἐπίληθον): Joseph's present happiness made him forget his former misfortunes. The explanation intended by Josephus occurs in Gen. 41 51 (E), alongside of another version (J? so Gunkel) which makes the thing forgotten not Joseph's trouble (עמל [E]) but his father's house.

4. Meaning of name.

It is not very clear what is the point of the emphasis laid (41 50 [E]) on Manasseh and Ephraim being born in the fruitful years before the years of famine: it is doubtful whether it implies a special interpretation of the names—Manasseh = postponer (cp Arabic nasa'a), Ephraim = fruitful (cp EPHRAIM, § 1 f.). Such a popular etymology would fit admirably Winckler's (GI 2 74 f.) mythological account of Ephraim's taking the place of Manasseh as referring to the postponing of the new year from autumn to spring (see YEAR, §§ 6 8); but the theory is precarious (see above, § 3).[1]

The real etymology of the name is unknown. The abnormal vocalisation (נַשַּׁנִי) of the verb expressing E's explanation would confirm the traditional vocalisation of the name if we could be sure that it is not (so Ball, ad loc.) accidental. Fortunately Manasseh is one of the few tribe names that were early used by individuals, and so we have seventh-century evidence of the pronunciation.[2] It is, however, not quite decisive. In Esarhaddon's list of tributary princes the name is Menasē (Me-na-si-e); but in that of Ašur-bani-pal it is Minsē (Mi-in-si-e).

Noting certain other names ending in sa (שא), Siegfried in 1875[3] suggested that Manasseh was a compound name: Men-nasa (cp 𝔊A, μαννασση), 'Men sustulit' (cp Amasiah, עמסיה). Meni, who seems to have been, like Gad, a god of fate (see FORTUNE, GAD, § 1, end), found worshippers in Israel even in very late times (Is. 65 11, RV). If Meni has been shortened into -man in Ahiman, as Fürst suggested (cp AHIMAN), it is possible that it might be treated similarly even at the beginning of a word. It is not certain, however, that the names ending in sa support the theory. שא in תימשא may be a divine name like Dušara in תימדושרא, and in אלהשא it may be like Bēl in אלהבל (Ελαβηλος).[4]

It would thus be possible, indeed, to regard the name Manasseh as one of a class by no means small, the class namely of names that contain two divine titles.

[1] So MT, 𝔊L and Pesh.; but 𝔊BA gives Ephraim first.

[2] J seems to take the other side (Ephraim first); but it is only in appearance: in Josh. 17 17 the phrase is a gloss (𝔊L, 𝔊BA om.), and in Dt. 34 2 the same is probably true; although the passage is old enough to be found in 𝔊 (𝔊BAL), its place in the Sam. text is taken by one quite different.

[3] 1 Ch. 9 3 (dwellers at Jerusalem), 2 Ch. 15 9 (gērīm at Jerusalem: temp. Asa), 30 1 (letters), 30 10 (posts), 30 18 (at Hezekiah's passover: destruction of sanctuaries).

[4] Since he has already given Benjamin, the order cannot be geographical, as that in Ezek. 48 may well be in this part of it.

[5] The order, Manasseh first (vv. 27 f. and 29 in the account of the tribes in Judg. 1), may be due to R; and what to make of Judg. 5 (Ephraim [Benjamin] Machir) is not clear.

[6] Nu. 1 5 ff. (censors), 1 32 ff. (census), 2 18 ff. (camp), 10 22 f. (camp), 13 8 11 ('spies'), Josh. 21 5 = 1 Ch. 6 66 ff. (Kohathite cities), 21 21 25 = 1 Ch. 6 65 [where Ephraim is omitted] (priests' cities), 1 Ch. 12 30 f. (deserters to David), 1 Ch. 27 20 f. (David's tribal rulers [nāgīd]).

[7] Jacobs' list (Bibl. Arch. 50) is: Abraham, Isaac, Bethuel, Rebekah, Jacob, Rachel, Judah, Joseph, Benjamin, Ephraim, Moses, etc.

[8] Even Gunkel in his interesting note (Gen. 271 f.) does not refer to it.

[9] Cp Gunkel, Genesis, p. liv, n. 1.

[1] The suggestion of G. H. B. Wright (Was Israel in Egypt? 245) that we should connect the name with the story of a surviving remnant of Ephraim in Judg. 12 4 (פלטי אפרים, פלם being considered equivalent to נשם, whence Manasseh) is hardly consistent with a recognition of the fact (see Moore, Bu., Now. ad loc.) that the text of the passage is corrupt. (The use Steuernagel [Wanderung, 25] makes of the passage is more cautious.) Nor is there more to be said for a connection (Wright, l.c.) with נֵס, 'standard'; whatever the story of the 'witness'-altar in Josh. 22 may owe its origin to (see col. 2922, n. 3), it is hardly possible that a nēs-standard had anything to do with it; and moreover, even if we should incline to accept Steuernagel's acute suggestion (Einwanderung, 96) that originally it was only certain Josephites that were blamed (see REUBEN), 'Manasseh' does not seem to have been mentioned in the story originally.

[2] We must remember, however, the possibility that the pronunciation of the personal name may have reacted on the tradition of the tribal name.

[3] ZPT (1875) 366 f. He is followed by C. Niebuhr (Gesch. Ebr. Zeit., 252 [1894]).

[4] On names in sa see S. A. Cook, Exp. T 10 525 f. (1899).

Min-še, which would be the exact Hebrew equivalent of Ašur-bani-pal's Minsē, would in that case contain the two divine names Men and Ša (cp BAASHA).

It would be natural then to conjecture that the strange name Nimshi ought to be Minshe (see, however, NIMSHI). Jehu, the founder of the third great post-Davidic northern dynasty, would thus be called 'ben Minshe'—a Manassite. It has been suggested elsewhere (ISSACHAR, § 4) that there are perhaps hints of a recognition of a deity Ša in N. Ephraim. If Men, on the other hand, were more at home on the east of the Jordan, the compound title Minše would be symbolical of the east and the west. Menahem, who was probably a Gadite (ben Gādī; see GADI, GAD, § 10), may have borne the name of the same deity: to judge from the spelling of the king's name in Tiglath-pileser's contemporary list of tributaries (Me-ni-ḫi-im-mē), Menahem may stand related to HAMUEL [q.v.] as JOAB to ABIEL.

If on the other hand we are willing to follow the old Hebrew etymology in regarding Manasseh as a participial form (see below), it will be plausible to find in it the name or title of a divine being honoured by Manassite clans. The unnamed god who vanished with the appearance of morning (Gen. 32 24 [25] ff., JE) inflicted an injury in what v. 25 [26] calls גִּיד הַנָּשֶׁה[1] (EV, 'the sinew of' the 'hip'). In Arabia nasiya is to suffer, and nasā, to inflict, such an injury. Manasseh (the piel participle) would thus be the name of a supernatural being of whom the inflicting of such an injury was characteristic (so Land, De Gids, Oct. 1871, 'De wording van staat en godsdienst in het oude Israel,' 20).[2] Gunkel suggests that the story is connected with a local religious dance of a peculiar halting kind. It is worth noting that taḥalluj, 'walking in a loose manner, as though disjointed, . . . as though dragging a thing' is the effect of contact with ǵinn (Ḥam. p. 30, l. 4; compare the story in Abulf. Ann. 3 202). It is not certain, however, who it was that was lamed. Gen. 32 26*a* (E, Gunkel) certainly suggests that it was Jacob's antagonist, and 'Jacob' in v. 26*b* (J? Gunkel) may very well be an erroneous gloss. W. M. Müller (As. u. Eur. 163, n. 1) well compares Iliad, 23 725-727 (Odysseus' unfair wrestling). That this is really the view of J seems to be borne out by v. 29 (J) where Jacob has 'prevailed with gods and men.'[3] It would appear, therefore, that in the original story the epithet Manasseh was a fitting title of Jacob himself, which might be borne by his worshippers, as in the case of Gad. According to 1 K. 18 26 the N. Israelite prophets (priests?) were accustomed to perform certain religious dances which could be called limping[4] (RVmg.; וַיְפַסְּחוּ). There may have been something similar east of the Jordan, where it is commonly held that the wrestling scene is laid. Bernh. Luther, however, argues with some plausibility (ZATW 21 69 [1901]) that it really belongs to Bethel (Gen. 28). The question is of less importance in the present inquiry, since, if the story is connected with a real tradition of some kind, it refers to settlers on their way to the west.

It is perhaps in favour of this last explanation that there is some evidence that the name Manasseh was felt to be a participle, therefore in a sense an adjective, and consequently capable of being used with the article.

Manasseh occurs in the Hexateuch with the article some twelve times (D and P), in each case after the construct חצי שבט,[5] which occurs only thrice[6] (P)[7] without the article. Outside the Hexateuch on the other hand—i.e., in Chronicles—חצי שבט (4 times) does not take the article,[1] and it is therefore at least quite possible that the abnormal המנשה is due to misreading המנשי in the archaic script, which may have continued in use in the Torah (and Joshua?) longer than elsewhere. This gentilic 'Manassite' (מְנַשִּׁי) occurs four times, always (quite normally) with the article[2] and always of the trans-Jordan tribe.

Reference has been made to the representation in Judg. 5 of a Machir (= Manasseh) settled in the highlands of Ephraim and the representation of J according to which the Machirites crossed the Jordan (?) and established themselves (Nu. 32 39 41 f.) in Gilead, the land of the Amorites. See further JAIR, NOBAH. Gad and Reuben, however, having been described in JE (Nu. 32) as being assigned their homes before their kinsmen settled in W. Palestine (cp GAD, § 11), it came to be said that Machir too received Gilead from Moses (v. 40). With this is connected the view of the Deuteronomic writers that the whole country from the Jabbok northwards—the half of Gilead (Josh. 12 25 13 31), i.e., the part not given to Gad (Dt. 3 12), and all BASHAN, all the region of ARGOB, the kingdom of OG (Dt. 3 13)—was given by Moses to Manassites (cp Dt. 29 8 Josh. 12 6 13 8 [𝔊, Di. etc.] 30 f. 18 7 22 7; for Bashan Dt. 4 43 Josh. 20 8 21 6 27), who come to be called regularly 'half the tribe of Manasseh.' Naturally it became necessary to associate these Manassites with Gad and Reuben in helping their kinsmen (mentioned alone in Nu. 32) to effect a settlement in the west[3] (Josh. 1 12 4 12 [D_2]) and in the obscure story of the altar (Josh. 22; see GAD, § 11, and especially REUBEN). The view of P has often been supposed to be similar (cp Josh. 13 29 14 3?).

5. Legends of settlement.

According to Steuernagel, however, E and (so now also Holzinger, Joshua, p. xii) P recognise only Reuben and Gad in the east (Josh. 201); his view being based on the P parts of Nu. 32 and on the genealogy (216). From the fact that the Manassite genealogies in Nu. 26 29 ff.[4] and Josh. 17 1 ff. differ only in their account of Machir and Gilead,[5] Steuernagel argues that Machir and Gilead are a later insertion into P which knows nothing of any Machir—an insertion worked in in two ways (217 f.).

The confusion on this subject is perhaps past repair; but we venture to make the following suggestions. It appears that in Josh. 17 1*b* 2 as it now stands the sons—being called 'the rest' in opposition to Machir who figures as the father of Gilead—are regarded as settling in W. Palestine. Steuernagel reaches the same result, for when he cuts out the mention of Machir he cuts out also the words 'the rest of.' On the other hand it is just as certain that in P's list (Nu. 26 34) the sons are assigned to the east (on Nu. 27 1 36 1 see below). Kuenen argues that Gen. 50 23 (E) also held Machir to be the only son of Manasseh. Is it necessary, however, to suppose that E would have called Machir 'father of Gilead'? May not the 'sons of Machir' mean the 'tribe of Machir,' and the 'adoption' (St. ZATW 6 145 ff. [1886]) be E's acknowledgment of the equivalence of Manasseh and Machir? (so practically Gunkel). The names of some of the sons certainly suggest the west.

That is true of Abiezer, Shechem, and Hepher; perhaps also of Shemida (שְׁמִידָע), which may be connected in some way with Shamir, Shimron, Shomron; 𝔊 reads (mostly) r for d.[6] None

1 The critical analysis of the passage is still matter for discussion. Verse 25 [26] may be wholly late.

2 Land compares the Arabian ǵinn.

3 Cp Holzinger, Gen. 210; PENUEL. Of course J may have had a parallel to E's Mahanaim fragment 32 2 f., which perhaps originally told of a (successful?) conflict of Jacob with divine hosts (so Gunkel).

4 The dancing of David (2 S. 6 14) is called 'whirling' (מְכַרְכֵּר), at least if the text is right (but cp DANCE, § 4 [4]).

5 After מטה (חצי), on the other hand, the article is never inserted. Is this due to the final ה of מטה?

6 Of course also in Nu. 32 33 before בן יוסף.

7 The ungrammatical השבט המנשה in Josh. 13 7 is no doubt a scribal error (probably homoioteleuton). König's explanation (Lehrgeb. 2 2, § 20*c*) itself needs explanation. Kautzsch's explanation (Gramm. § 125 d, n.) is not convincing.

1 In 1 Ch. 27 21 occurs חצי המנשה.

2 Dt. 4 43 לַמְנַשִּׁי, 2 K. 10 33 וְהַמְנַשִּׁי, and twice with חצי שבט, Dt. 29 8 [7] 1 Ch. 26 32. In each case Reuben*ite* precedes.

3 On the possibility of some historical reminiscence underlying this story (Steuernagel, Einwanderung, 94) see REUBEN.

4 Gen. 46 20 gives no genealogy of Manasseh (EPHRAIM, § 12, n. 1, and see below). 𝔊BAL inserts a notice agreeing with 1 Ch. 7 14: by an Aramæan concubine Manasseh begat Machir, who begat Gilead.

5 Machir's relation to Hepher, etc., is in Nu. that of grandfather, in Josh 17 2 that of brother (in v. 3, however, grandfather: see Kue. Th. T 11 487).

6 𝔊B reads שמרם in Josh.; but the μ may be a graphical error from α. In 1 Ch. 7 18 Ishhdod may possibly represent Shemida (so Benzinger, ad loc.) especially if the ע is not original.

suggests the east: Helek is unknown and so is Asriel, if indeed it be not an intruder, for it seems on the whole as probable as not that the writer of the words (17 5) 'And there fell ten parts to Manasseh [. . .][1] (v. 6) for the daughters of Manasseh received an inheritance amongst his sons' counted the brothers carelessly as five, including Hepher. How the name Asriel might come into existence we see from 1 Ch. 7 14 (see ASRIEL).

If the sons must then be assigned to the west are we to conclude that, as Dillmann (on Nu. 26) suggests, the writer who is responsible for the mention of Gilead had lost all hold of the geographical meaning of the name Gilead, or, believing that Gilead was conquered first, regarded the W. Manassites as offshoots of the E. Manassites?[2] It is on the whole more likely that the source of confusion is the word Machir. Sons were assigned to Machir-Manasseh (e.g., Gen. 50 23, E), who was then mistaken for Machir-Gilead, and therefore called in a gloss 'father of Gilead' (see below, n. 3).

It seems natural to suppose that the five daughters (Nu. 26 33) are to be judged like the sons.

27 7 does not say that Moses actually gave the daughters their inheritance, nor does 36 2, whilst in Josh. 17 4*b* 'them' not 'us' shows that we are to regard the provision as having been carried out by Joshua—i.e., in W Palestine.[3] The case had to be mentioned in Nu 27 36 because it was necessary that the legal decision should be attributed to Moses. The most natural explanation of the postponement of the carrying out to Josh. 17 is that the whole story was known to belong to the west. There is nothing in the five names as they appear in the present text to suggest the east: Tirzah, Beth-hoglah, and *Abel*meholah are in the west; Noah is probably, like Neah (Josh. 19 13), a corruption of something else (Naarah on the boundary of Ephraim?), and Milcah is obscure (see, however, the special articles). On the question who the father was, see below, § 9.

We must pass on to other aspects of the Manasseh question. On the assumption, which is universal, that Manasseh is a real tribe name, it is generally supposed that when the curtain rises the Manassites are part of the inhabitants of Mt. Ephraim.

Winckler's suggestion that the Gideon-Abimelech story is a monument of the arrival of Manasseh from the east has been mentioned above (§ 3). Steuernagel, conversely, remarks that Gideon's claim on Succoth and Peniel suggests that part of what he calls the Jacob-tribe —i.e., what afterwards became Joseph (=Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh)—may have remained E. of the Jordan when the others entered Palestine (Einwanderung, 64).

Although it is also commonly supposed that Benjamin had already been constituted when Manasseh or Machir became distinct from Ephraim,[4] this is by no means certain (see BENJAMIN, §§ 1 f. 5, EPHRAIM, § 5, ii., JOSEPH, § 2). The expansion of Joseph seems to be dealt with in a much discussed passage in Josh. (17 14-18). The house of Joseph (see the comm.) complains that the blessing of Yahwè has made it too large for a single tribal portion: it finds the highlands too narrow and the plain inaccessible. The answer is: clear the forest and force a way into the plain. At the same time it is admitted to be entitled to more than one portion. If the plausible theory of Budde (Ri. Sa. 35 ff.), adopted by Kittel (Gesch. Heb. 1 240), that the forest to be cleared was in Gilead[5] (cp EPHRAIM, § 3), be adopted, it is natural to regard the spread of Machir-Manasseh to the E. (Nu. 32 39) as a further stage of the same expansion which produced West Manasseh. Steuernagel (Einwanderung, 97) finds an echo of the birth of Manasseh in the story of the advance of Joseph to

[1] The omitted words and the second part of v. 6 are probably from another hand (Steuernagel).

[2] So also E. L. Curtis, Hastings' DB 2 129*b* and perhaps Driver, 3 232.

[3] In Nu. 36 it is heads of the fathers' houses of the family of the children of Gilead (v. 1) that call Zelophehad their brother (v. 2); but in v. 5 the speakers are called 'the tribe of the sons of Joseph.' 'Gilead' and 'Machir,' therefore, in v. 1 are probably not original. According to Jos. Ant. iv. 7 5 it was the chief men of the tribe of Manasseh that told Moses of the death of Zelophehad.

[4] So Stade (GVI 1 160), Guthe (GVI 56), and others.

[5] Hitzig (GVI 106) found it in S. Ephraim, Knobel, Keil, and Steuernagel (ad loc.), in the N., Ewald (GVI(3) 2 243 f.) in the plain.

MANASSEH

Dothan.[1] He thinks that there were probably struggles with the Leah tribes Issachar and Zebulun who were making their way from the SW. of Ephraim where they had at first settled (see ZEBULUN).

Judg. 5 seems to imply that the whole of Manasseh was in West Palestine. When the Machirites are to be supposed to have crossed into Gilead of course we do not know. Steuernagel thinks that there was a conflict between (W.) Manasseh and Gad (Einwanderung, 24, below) which ended in the conquest of northern Gad (Gilead) by the Machirites (expedition of Gideon, conquest of Succoth and Peniel; see, however, GIDEON): when the Gileadites are called a Machirite clan they are thereby treated as dependent on Machir.

6. Other references.

The 'Blessing of Jacob' contains at present no mention of Manasseh (or Ephraim), treating it as part of JOSEPH (see, however, JOSEPH i., § 2, first small type, EPHRAIM, § 5, ii., second paragraph), and there is considerable confusion in the blessings connected with the adoption of Joseph's sons (see Carpenter-Battersby and the comm.). In the 'Blessing of Moses' on the other hand the last two lines of Dt. 33 17 where Manasseh is mentioned are a gloss. Who the 'first-born' (MT, בכור שורו) referred to in the first line is, is disputed; but in any case the reference is not to Manasseh.

It is improbable that 2 S. 20 26 tells us that David had a Manassite priest—having perhaps (Winckler) carried off some Manassite deity to his capital. Besides the question at what date 'Jairite' and 'Manassite' were equated (see § 9, ii.), there is the question whether the reading 'Jairite' is correct. In addition to what is said elsewhere (IRA, 3) is to be noted Winckler's suggestion (GI 2 241, n. 2) that Ja'irite has arisen from a variant Ja'ir for 'Ira. The sixth and the seventh in the list of Solomon's administrative districts (1 K. 4 13 f.) lay in the northern part of the trans-Jordan country. In Ps. 60 [7] (=108 8) Gilead and Manasseh represent the trans-Jordan district (‖ Ephraim and Judah); in 80 2 Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh are the representatives of the ancient northern Israel.[2] There is nothing to be learned from the Chronicler's list of seven Manassites who deserted to David at Hebron (1 Ch. 12 20).

7. Probable history.

It is now time to ask whether it is possible to get behind the legends and other data and arrive at any theory of the actual course of events. The centre of gravity of northern Israel in historical times appears to have been at Shechem (EPHRAIM i., §§ 4 10). There is no hint in the OT of any tradition of the southern Leah tribes ever having been farther north than Shechem. If we are to connect them, as seems probable, with the Ḥabiri of the Amarna letters,[3] the settlement of the Israelites proper (including 'Manasseh') in the Ephraim highlands will fall later (cp NAPHTALI, §§ 1 3). They contributed, as we have seen, to the struggle sung of in Judg. 5. It seems probable that the southern 'Benjamite' monarchy of Saul was made possible by earlier achievements farther north. It is not possible to distinguish definitely Manasseh from the rest of the Ephraim highlands which are dealt with elsewhere (EPHRAIM, i. 3 f.). There can be little doubt that there was always more or less communication with the trans-Jordan lands. The history of the northern portion of the trans-Jordan lands, which is traditionally regarded as Manassite, is very obscure. See GILEAD, BASHAN, ARGOB, ARAM, HAVVOTH-JAIR, JEPHTHAH. The most obvious fact written on the face of the records preserved to us is the series of struggles with Aramæans. If there were such, as no doubt there were, in the earlier days (see JACOB, LABAN), it is even more certain that they were frequent later (e.g., Am. 1 3). On the contributions made to the history of Israel by the trans-Jordanic division see GAD, § 10. On East

[1] He combines with this the fight at the waters of Merom, which, following OS 278 99, he places near Dothan.

[2] Either Benjamin or Manasseh must be an addition—perhaps Manasseh, as best accounting for the strange order (cp Judg. 5 14).

[3] See above, col. 1316, n. 5. Since that was written Steuernagel has argued ably for this view in his very clever discussion of the settlement of Israel (Einwanderung, 115-123). On the general question see (besides NAPHTALI, § 1) SIMEON.

Manasseh's reputation for valour see Josh. 17 1 1 Ch. 5 18-22. According to the Chronicler the [eastern] half of Manasseh was transported by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch. 5 26); 2 K. 15 29 had said simply 'Gilead,' on which see NAPHTALI, § 3, n. In the fragment referred to below (next col.) we are told, if the reading is correct, that Geshur and Aram obtained possession of the Havvoth-jair (1 Ch. 2 23). The Chronicler is strangely fond of introducing references to Manasseh (see col. 2919, n. 3).

There is nothing surprising in the fact that the geographical data as to where Manassites were settled are perplexing. P's south border is dealt with elsewhere (EPHRAIM, §§ 5 11); the northern border is omitted (see JOSHUA, § 9), unless the last clause of v. 10, which has no grammatical subject, represents it. No list of Manassite cities is given (cp JOSHUA, § 9), only a list of those which might have been expected to be Manassite, but were not: Tappuah belonged to Ephraim, and five—viz., BETH-SHEAN near the Jordan, IBLEAM, TAANACH, and MEGIDDO on the S. edge of the great plain, and Dor[1] on the coast—remained in the hands of the Canaanites (on the text of v. 11 see ASHER, § 3). What the Naphoth in Issachar and Asher were we do not know (see NAPHTALI, § 2). Instead of a list of Manassite cities we have in v. 2 a list unparalleled in the book of Joshua: each item is 'the sons of—.' Some, however, if not all, of the names are names of towns; and the same is true no doubt, as Kuenen saw (Th. T 11 488 [1877]), of the daughters mentioned in v. 3 (see col. 2923, small type).

8. P's geographical data.

9. Genealogies.

i. The list just referred to (Josh. 17 1 f.), and the equivalent list in Nu. 26 34[2] has been discussed already (col. 2922) in its bearing on the Manasseh-Machir-Gilead question. As a genealogy it raises a further question. The brothers among whom the daughters received their inheritance (בתוך אחי אבינו; Josh. 17) are nowhere mentioned. The father himself is named in five passages (Nu. 26 = 1 Ch. 7 Nu. 27 Nu. 36 and Josh. 17); but nowhere is there any hint of his having any brothers. In fact, as Kuenen (for another object) has pointed out (Th. T 11 489), only if there were no such brothers could the daughters succeed to Hepher's inheritance. In Nu. 36 11, however, it is expressly said that the five daughters married sons of their uncles (בני דדיהן[3]). If the daughters' father were Hepher instead of being Hepher's son the difficulty would disappear. If we suppose that Nu. 26 33 originally began 'And Hepher had no sons,' and that later Hepher became corrupted into Zelophehad (ולחפר becoming וצלפחד), necessitating the gloss 'son of Hepher,' we clear up the matter and also get rid of the difficult name 'Zelophehad.' Cheyne very acutely treats Zelophehad as a corruption of a supposed Ṣalḥad (see SALECAH); but that assumes that we are to look in the E., and that view, it has been urged above (§ 5, mid.), is not without difficulty.

ii. The 10 (11) Manassite (?) names mentioned before (§ 5) reappear for the most part, though quite differently arranged, in what seems to be the Chronicler's main Manassite genealogy (1 Ch. 7 14-19): it comes between Naphtali and Ephraim. The passage seems to be deeply corrupt (see the separate articles).

Abiezer is a son (not an uncle), and Maḥlah a son or daughter (not a sister), of Milcah who is called Molecheth. Heleḳ (called Liḳḥi) and Shechem are sons (not brothers) of Shemida. Hepher is not mentioned, being represented by Zelophehad. Shemida has no brothers, two of them appearing as sons (Heleḳ and Shechem) among whom is also No'ah one of 'Zelophehad's daughters (in Joshua), of whom two (Ḥoglah and Tirzah) disappear, whilst two new names appear (Ahian son of Shemida, and Ishhod son of Moleketh).

The source of the names in vv. 16 17*a* (Peresh [which 𝔊B omits = Sheresh], Ulam [Benjamite in 8 39], Rekem [a Benjamite town, Josh. 18 27], and Bedan) cannot be conjectured. The same is true of the little list of seven names which some one has inserted, as a register of 'half the tribe of Manasseh,' 'who dwelt in the land,' to supplement the Reuben and Gad lists.

Since the famous JAIR [q.v.], called Gileadite in Judg. 10 3, appears to be assigned in Nu. 32 41 to Manasseh, it is strange that there is no mention of him in the genealogies. The Chronicler has perhaps repaired the omission: a fragment (1 Ch. 2 21-23) wedged into the Judah genealogy tells that a daughter of Machir had a grandson named Jair who had twenty-three cities in the land of Gilead. The closing words of v. 23 suggest that the fragment belongs to the obscure genealogy in 7 14 ff.[1] Whatever be the real meaning of that genealogy, however, it is not quite certain that anywhere else, at least, Jair is correctly made to be a Manassite. Dt. 3 14 is not a reliable passage; but it may mean this: no doubt Moses had given the territory mentioned in the context to half the tribe of Manasseh, but (read ויאר with 𝔊) Jair took all the region, etc. 'Son of Manasseh' was probably appended to 'Jair' after Nu. 32 41 had received its present form—i.e., probably after the insertion of v. 40 about Machir the son of Manasseh. Originally v. 41 probably resembled v. 42 where Nobah has no patronymic. Jair was therefore Gileadite rather than exactly Manassite.[2]

The late passage Josh. 13 30 of course implies the later form of Nu. 32 41.

Whether we may venture to infer from 1 Ch. 2 21-23 that Jair was the outcome of a fusion of Reubenite (cp Ed. Meyer, Entsteh. 16) families (Hezron) with Gileadite families (sister of Gilead), that it was settled at first somewhat S. in Gilead (Judg. 10 3 ff.), and afterwards moved northwards (Nu. 32 41), mingling with Manassites (so Steuernagel, Einwanderung, 25), is less certain. See REUBEN. If SEGUB, Jair's 'father' (1 Ch. 2 22), is a corruption of Argob, which Jair is said to have conquered (Dt. 3 14), there may have been a theory to that effect.

On the problem connected with Manasseh see in addition to the commentaries, the histories, and the dictionaries, Kuenen, 'De stam Manasse' (Th. T 11 478-496 [1877]) and Steuernagel, Die Einwanderung der israelitischen Stämme in Kanaan (1901), especially 21-28. H. W. H.

MANASSEH (מְנַשֶּׁה; ΜΑΝΑCCΗ(C) [BℵAL]).

1. King of Judah (692-639 B.C.), son of Hezekiah, and father of Amon; on his mother's name see HEPHZIBAH. Very little is recorded of his long and, it would seem, extremely prosperous reign. As we approach the final catastrophe, the editor feels it less important to communicate details, because of the reactionary character of the religion favoured by the latest kings. The sins of Manasseh, so we are assured—i.e., first, his patronage of heathenish cults, and next, his shedding of innocent blood (as a persecutor of the prophets?)—were the true causes of the captivity. But how could this wickedness of the king be consistent with the long-continued prosperity which the annals appear to have recorded?

According to a long-assumed critical result (see Graf, St. Kr., 1859, pp. 467 ff.; Kue. Ond.(2) i. 473; Wellh. Prol.(2) 215 [ET 207], and cp CHRONICLES, § 8 (e)), the Chronicler found a way of reconciling this inconsistency, which seemed to threaten his dogma of prompt retribution for sin, by supposing a Babylonian captivity of Manasseh (a sort of prophecy of the later captivity under Nebuchadrezzar), from which the king was only delivered through his repentance (2 Ch. 33 11-13). Schrader, however (KAT(2) 367 ff.), has given highly plausible arguments in favour of the accuracy of the Chronicler, so far as his facts are concerned. (i.) In the lists of twenty-two tributary kings of Canaan and the small neighbouring countries given alike by Esarhaddon and by Ašur-bāni-pal we find the name of Mĕnassê king of Jaudu—i.e., Judah (KB ii. 149 239). (ii.) When Šamaš-šum-ukīn, king or viceroy of Babylon, rebelled against his royal brother (cp ASURBANIPAL, § 7), he obtained the support of the kings of the very region to which the tributaries on the lists belonged (KB 2 185; cp 195). It is not known whether Manasseh was more cautious than the rest; but we have no reason to suppose this. (iii.) Even if we grant that Manasseh was suspected of being implicated in the revolt, he would certainly have been summoned by Ašur-bāni-pal to give an account of his actions, and there are inscriptions to prove that after the overthrow of Šamaš-šum-ukīn (647 B.C.), Ašur-bāni-pal received both kings and ambassadors in Babylon. Knowing, as we do, much better than Graf, how the Chronicler generally worked—viz., by adopting and modifying or supplementing earlier traditional material—we have no sufficient reason to doubt that Manasseh did go to Babylon at the call of his suzerain. Whether he was carried thither in chains, like Pharaoh Necho I., or whether this is a romantic addition to the story, we cannot venture to say. That the repentance of Manasseh was a fact, no historian could assert. The whole course of the later history is opposed to such a view (cp ISRAEL, § 36; Wi. AT Unt. 122 f.; M'Curdy, Hist. Proph. Mon. 2 386, who boldly corrects 'Babylon' in Ch. into 'Nineveh'; Driver, in Hogarth, Author. and Archæol. 114-116).

3 In estimating the value of this datum it must of course be remembered that dōd is a somewhat indefinite term.

2 So also Cheyne (JEPHTHAH, § 3).

The vagueness of the Chronicler's statement in 2 Ch. 33 11 may seem to support the idea that the narrative is an edifying fiction. But was the vagueness always there? One expression may lead us to doubt this—viz., 'took him with hooks' (so RVmg. for בַּחוֹחִים). This expression might pass in poetry (see 2 K. 19 28 Ezek. 19 4; cp Job 40 26 [41 2]), but hardly in sober prose. Yet the rendering 'in chains' (RV; so 𝔊, Vg., Tg.) does violence to usage. We must either render 'with hooks' or emend the text. A parallel passage (2 K. 25 5) suggests that חוחים may conceal the name of a place, and further, that the latent place-name may be Jericho (ביריחו; miswritten בחותי=בחוחים). If so, Manasseh fled to Jericho on the capture of Jerusalem, and was taken there. So, too, אשר may perhaps be a relic of [ל]אשרבנפל—i.e., 'of Ašur-bāni-pal.' Observe that the parallel description of the imprisonment of Pharaoh Necho (Schr. KAT 371) says nothing of 'hooks.'

MANDRAKES, RVmg. LOVE-APPLES (דּוּדָאִים; ΜΗΛΑ ΜΑΝΔΡΑΓΟΡΟΥ, Gen. 30 14; ΜΑΝΔΡΑΓΟΡΑΙ (-ΟΙ AD once), Gen. 30 15 f. Cant. 7 13 [14] [-ΡΕϹ A]†).

The Hebrew name, dūdā'īm, was no doubt popularly associated with dōdīm, דּוֹדִים, 'love'; but its real etymology (like that of μανδραγόρας) is obscure. It denotes the fruit—in Cant. 7 13 [14] possibly the flowers—of a plant of the same genus as the belladonna plant (Atropa Belladonna, L.). A Greek description of the mandrake will be found in Dioscorides (4 76); among its names he mentions κιρκαία.[1] Wetzstein, who on 9th May (1860) found the already ripe fruits growing profusely on a mountain in Ḥaurān (cp Del. Hohelied u. Koheleth, 439 ff.), argues for the plant of the OT being the autumn mandrake (Mandragora autumnalis, Bertol.), rather than the spring mandrake (M. officinarum, L.), because in Palestine the spring mandrake would have disappeared long before the time of wheat harvest (ib. 444 f.). It appears, however, that M. autumnalis is not a Palestinian plant at all; and the other species, which flowers from February to March, or in warm situations as early as Christmas, has, according to Tristram (NHB 468), the time of wheat harvest as its general period of ripening. Tristram describes the blossom as 'cup-shaped, of a rich purple colour. The fruit is of the size of a large plum, quite round, yellow, and full of soft pulp. It has a peculiar, but decidedly not unpleasant, smell, and a pleasant, sweet taste.' Tristram adds that the belief still survives in Palestine that the fruit when eaten ensures conception. A quite distinct tradition is that on which rests the use of the plant as an aphrodisiac (see Wetzstein, l.c., and Löw, 188). Cp MAGIC, § 2 a, and see Starr, Am. Antiq. and Or. Journ., 32 259-268 (1901).

[The connection of the story in Gen. 30 14 f. (on the origin of which see ISSACHAR, § 2) with heathen superstition is easily recognised. Like the mallow, the mandrake was potent in all kinds of enchantment (see Maimonides in Chwolson, Ssabier, 2 459, and the notes). The German name of the plant (Alraun; OHG. Alrûna) indicates the prophetic power supposed to lie in little images made from this root which were cherished as oracles. The possession of such roots was lucky (see Ducange, s.v. 'Mandragora,' and Littré).] N. M.—W. T. T.-D.

MANEH is given in EV once (Ezek. 45 12) for Heb. מָנֶה (√מנה, cp MENE; ΜΝΑ [BAQ]; Vg. MINA or MNA). In all other places where māneh or μνᾶ occurs (1 K. 10 17 Ezra 2 69 Neh. 7 71 f. 1 Esd. 5 45 1 Macc. 14 24 15 18 Lk. 19 13 16 18 20 24 f.)[1] EV has 'pound.' See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, KESITAH, POUND.

In Ezek. 45 12 MT is indefensible: the true form of the text is that in 𝔊A (so Co.). J. P. Peters (JBL, 1893, pp. 48 f.) has explained the motive of the ungrammatical emendation in MT, which 'succeeds after a fashion in making Ezekiel say that sixty shekels = one maneh, and so harmonising what was regarded as a prediction with fact.' The cause of this early emendation is now plain. 'The [true] text of Ezekiel places the maneh at fifty shekels, which seems to have been the old Hebrew ratio, and was actually retained in the silver coinage. But the maneh of fifty shekels gave way to the Babylonian maneh of sixty shekels.' The whole note in JBL, l.c., is well worth reading.

MANIUS (ΜΑΝΙΟϹ [AV]), 2 Macc. 11 34 RV, AV MANLIUS.

MANLIUS, RV MANIUS, TITUS (ΤΙΤΟϹ ΜΑΝΙΟϹ [AV], so Syr. and Vg.; ΜΑΝΛΙΟϹ [al.]), the name of one of the ambassadors who is said to have written a letter to the Jews, confirming whatever concession Lysias had granted them (2 Macc. 11 34). Four letters were written to the Jews, of which the last is from 'Quintus Memmius and Titus Manlius, ambassadors (πρεσβῦται) of the Romans.' There is not much doubt that the letter is a fabrication, as history is entirely ignorant of these names. Polybius (xxxi. 9 6), indeed, mentions C. Sulpitius and Manius Sergius, who were sent to Antiochus IV. Epiphanes about 163 B.C., and also (xxxi. 12 9) Cn. Octavius, Spurius Lucretius, and L. Aurelius, who were sent into Syria in 162 B.C., in consequence of the contention for the guardianship of the young king Antiochus V. Eupator; but he entirely ignores Q. Memmius or T. Manlius. We may, therefore, conclude that legates of these names were never in Syria. The true name of T. Manlius may be T. Manius (cp RV), and, as there is not sufficient time for an embassy to have been sent to Syria between the two recorded by Polybius, the writer may have been thinking of the former.

The letter is dated in the 148th year of the Seleucidan era (= 165 B.C.), and in that year there was a consul of the name of T. Manlius Torquatus, who appears to have been sent on an embassy to Egypt about 164 B.C., to mediate between the two Ptolemies, Philometor and Euergetes (Livy, 43 11; Polyb. Rel. 32 1 2).

The employment of this Seleucidan era as a date, the absence of the name of the city, and especially the fact that the first intercourse of the Jews and Romans did not take place till two years later, when Judas heard of the fame of the Romans (1 Macc. 8 1, seq.), all prove that the document is far from authentic.

[1] 𝔊 87 in Bel 27 reads πίσσης μνᾶς τριάκοντα.

The three other letters do not merit serious attention (2 Macc. 11 16-33; cp Wernsdorff, De fid. Libr. Maccab., sec. 66; Grimm, Exeg. Handbuch, ad loc., also MACCABEES, SECOND, § 3).

MANNA (מָן; ΜΑΝΝΑ;[1] Ex. 16 15 31 [𝔊BAF ΜΑΝ in this cap. except A in 35*a*] 33 35 [composite, P and JE, see below, § 3], Nu. 11 6-9 [JE], Dt. 8 3 16 [D], Josh. 5 12 [P], Neh. 9 20 Ps. 78 24; also Jn. 6 31 49 Heb. 9 4 Rev. 2 17, and, in some MSS, Jn. 6 58†).

1. Meaning of word.

The origin of the name is still doubtful, though Ebers's derivation from an Egyptian word of the same meaning (mennu) is probable (Durch Gosen, 226 f.). A play on the name is suggested in Ex. 16 15; there can be little doubt that in that verse מָה=מָן, 'what,' though the use of an Aramaic pronominal form is peculiar.[2] The explanation of Ges. and others that it is there=Ar. mann 'gift,' is most unlikely (see Di. ad loc.); the Arabic use of the name mann is almost certainly due to Hebrew.

2. Identifications.

According to P manna was first given to the Israelites in the Wilderness of Sin on the 15th day of the 2nd month of the Exodus, from which point it continued to form their nourishment during the wilderness journey.

(i.) The indication of place and time and the description given of the substance itself have led to its identification as the exudation of a tree which is still common, and probably was formerly more abundant, in the E. of the Sinai peninsula—viz., a species of Tamarix gallica, L., called by Ehrenberg mannifera. Ebers (op. cit. 223 ff.), who visited the peninsula in 1871, journeying from N. to S. along the eastern side according to the recorded route of the Israelites, came upon these trees first in the W. Gharandel, and found them most plentiful in the W. Feirān and fairly plentiful in the W. esh-Sheikh (see SINAI). This agrees with the older accounts by Seetzen and Burckhardt. The former, visiting the district on 10th June 1809, found quantities of 'manna,' partly adhering to the soft twigs of the tamarisks, and partly fallen beneath the trees. At six in the morning it was of the consistency of wax; but the sun's rays soon melted it, and later in the day it disappeared, being absorbed into the earth. A fresh supply appears each night during its season (June and July). Burckhardt describes its taste as sweet like honey, pleasant and aromatic, and its hue as dirty yellow; others say that as it falls by night it is pure white. (See the accounts of these and other travellers collected in Ritter, Erdk. 14 665 ff.). In 1823 Ehrenberg discovered that the flow of manna from the twigs of the tamarisk was due to their being punctured by a scale insect which is now called Gossyparia mannifera, Hardn. Doubt has been thrown on this view by later travellers, who found manna at a season when the trees no longer bore traces of the insect; but there can be little doubt that Ehrenberg's explanation of the origin of this exudation is true. The quantity now produced in the peninsula is small—according to Burckhardt only between 500 and 600 pounds annually; but it may once have been much greater when the woods were thicker and more extensive.

(ii.) Another kind of 'manna' said to be found in the desert of Sinai is that yielded by the Camel's Thorn—Alhagi camelorum, Fisch.—a small spiny plant of the order Leguminosæ. The 'manna' used as a drug is derived from quite a different tree—viz., the manna ash, Fraxinus Ornus, L. On this and other sorts of manna, see Flück. and Hanb.(2) 409 ff., and cp ZDMG 23 275 ff., 35 254 on Turkish and Kurdish mannas.

(iii.) More recently has been put forward another view of the nature of the biblical manna which identifies it with lichen—viz., Lecanora esculenta, Eversm., and allied species. A good account is to be found in Kerner von Marilaun's Nat. Hist. of Plants, Eng. ed. 2 810 ff. It is met with in Arabia and many other parts of W. Asia, as well as in the Sahara and deserts of Algeria. It first forms thick wrinkled and warted crusts on stones, preferably on small fragments of limestone; the outer colour of the crust is a grayish yellow, whilst on breaking it appears as white as a crushed grain of corn. As they get older the crusts separate from their substratum, and become rolled back; ultimately the loosened piece forms an elliptical or spherical warted body. Owing to their extreme lightness these pieces are rolled about by the wind, and are carried hither and thither in the air, which in dry countries is the means of their distribution. Where, on the other hand, there are heavy rains the pieces are washed along by the water and deposited in great heaps, from which 'a single man can in a day collect 4-6 kilograms (about 12,000 to 20,000 pieces, varying in size from a pea to a hazel nut). In the steppe region and in the high lands of south-west Asia, the manna lichen is used as a substitute for corn in years of famine—being ground in the same way and baked into a species of bread. The so-called manna rains occur generally between January and March—i.e., during the wet season.

The tamarisk manna consists chiefly of sugar (Flück. and Hanb.(2) 415) and it is difficult to see how this could by itself form the sustenance of human beings for any lengthened period. The manna-lichen, on the other hand, is said to be 'dry and insipid' (Teesdale in Science Gossip, 3 233), and so would not answer altogether to the description in Ex. 16 31 [P]; but the comparison of its taste to that of honey is wanting in JE (Nu. 11 6-9). It is conceivable, however, that both these substances may have been known and occasionally used as food by the Israelites.

3. Criticism of the narratives.

The passages relating to the gift of the manna are Ex. 16 and Nu. 11 6-9. The latter belongs to a chapter which is certainly pre-exilic, and of which vv. 4-15 are, with some confidence, to be ascribed largely to J. Ex. 16, 'one of the most perplexing battle-grounds of criticism,' consists of a few old fragments (4 15*a* 16*a* 19-21 35), the rest being P and R_P.[1]

The fact that the manna was given to assuage the hunger of the people, whereas the presence of food in the form of cattle is expressly mentioned in Ex. 17 3 19 13 24 5 32 6 34 3 might help us to ascertain the source of these fragments were it not that critics are not unanimous respecting them.[2]

The wilderness of Sin was the scene of the first appearance of the manna, according to P (§ 2 above). Where the older narrative placed it does not at first sight appear; at all events it comes immediately before the smiting of the rock at Massah and Meribah. In the article MASSAH AND MERIBAH (q.v.) the view has been taken that these names were originally distinct, and since we find that in Nu. 11 6-9 the account of the manna is wedged in between the events at Taberah (1-3), and Kibroth-hattaavah (31-35),[3] and that in Dt. 9 22 Massah is placed between these two names, it seems probable that in the older narrative in Ex. 16, the giving of the manna was located in Massah; cp the punning allusion to the name in Ex. 16 4 ('that I may prove them,' אֲנַסֶּנּוּ).[4] It is noteworthy that another tradition in Ex. 17 7*b* (gloss), Dt. 6 16, 1 𝔊 uses the same form repeatedly in the prophets to render מִנְחָה.

2 Field (on Ex. 16 15) cites (from 𝔊F) a Gk. version μαν αὐτό (cp Zenner, ZKT, 1899, p. 165 f.), 'is that manna?' [Parthey (Vocab. Copt.-lat. 106) gives a Coptic word ναμ='arbor similis tamarisco' (Schulte, ZKT, 1899, 570). Wi. AOF 2 322 f., quoting a Palm. inscr. published by Clermont-Ganneau. *Ét. d'Arch. 2 Dr. (cp also Kue., Co.) ascribes all to E. But 34 3 is ascribed to JE by Kue., and to J by Co., and the Oxf. Hex. Di., We., Bacon, on the other hand, find both J and E varyingly in these passages.

3 The election of the elders (vv. 16-17) belongs to a later phase of E (see ELDAD AND MEDAD) and may be safely passed over.

associates the name not with the 'proving' of Israel by Yahwè, but with the 'tempting' of Yahwè by Israel (see Bacon, l.c., also MASSAH AND MERIBAH).

4. Mystical interpretations. Manna is called 'heavenly corn,' and 'bread of the mighty' (דגן שמים, and לחם אבירים, Ps. 78 24 f.), 'heavenly bread' (ל' ש', Ps. 105 40), cp 4 Esd. 1 19 (panis angelorum), Wisd. 16 20 (ἀγγέλων τροφή), 19 21 b (ἀμβροσία τροφή), and 1 Cor. 10 3 (πνευματικὸν βρῶμα), phrases which bring us into touch with Jewish beliefs (cp Bammidbār r. 16, and see above, § 1, n. 2). With Wisd. 16 20*b*, 'bread . . . agreeing to every taste,' agrees the Rabbinical legend that the manna adapted itself to every one's taste; to him who preferred figs its taste was like a fig, etc. (cp Eisenmenger, Entdeckt. Judenth. 1 485). See also Sib. 7 149 (cp Rev. 2 17), Apoc. Bar. 2 98, Taylor, Sayings of the Fathers (2), 178 f. N. M., § 1 f.; S. A. C., § 3 f.

MANOAH (מָנוֹחַ, § 74; 'rest' or from מנח, 'to present a gift,' ΜΑΝΩΕ [BAL]; Jos. ΜΑΝΩΧΗϹ), the father of Samson, of Zorah (q.v.), 'of the clan (see DAN) of the Danites' (Judg. 13 28 ff. 16 31). See JUDGES [BOOK], § 11, THEOPHANY. Manoah is obviously the legendary eponym of the MANAHATHITES of Judah (or Dan); hence his burying-place can be also that of Samson (Judg. 16 31). The story in which Manoah plays a part should be compared with the parallel narrative in Judg. 6 11-24 (GIDEON), which is usually assigned to the same author. The story is that first Manoah's wife, and then Manoah himself as well, were visited by a messenger of Yahwè, who was sent to announce the birth of a son, and to give directions respecting his bringing up. It was this son (Samson) who should deliver Israel from the Philistines.

MANTLE. In addition to what has been said generally in the article DRESS on the clothing of the Israelites a few supplementary remarks are necessary here on the mantle in particular. Under this heading are included not only the words so rendered (sometimes incorrectly) by the EV, but also and more especially, those Hebrew terms which appear to denote any outer garment, cloak, or wrapper. It will be prudent for the present to keep the archæological evidence—the sculptures of Assyria and Egypt, and Muḥammadan usage—quite distinct from the very insufficient evidence afforded by the OT alone.

1. Archæology. One of the difficulties associated with a discussion of the kinds of outer-garment worn by the Israelites is the question whether it was worn over the loin-cloth, or skirt (see GIRDLE) alone, or over the tunic alone, or over both. The Roman toga was apparently worn at first over the loin-cloth or subligaculum only, and the same, probably, was frequently the case with the Israelite[1] mantle. On the other hand, the first caliph Abu Bekr, distinguished for his simplicity of dress, is once described as wearing the šamla (cp śimlah, § 2 [1], below) and 'abā'a—the latter a striped and ornamented mantle with short sleeves; and his successor Omar, equally simple in his tastes, wore a woollen jubba (a garment reaching to the knees, sewn down the front with the exception of the extreme top and bottom) and the 'abā'a. Here we have to do with tunic and mantle. No mention is made of a primary garment corresponding with loin- or waist-cloth. Finally, Muḥammad himself wore ḳamīṣ (tunic),[2] sirbāl (trousers), and above both a jubba bordered with silk. Among Arabian[3] outer garments of a finer sort are the ḥabara, specifically a striped and spotted garment, and the burd, often simply an oblong dark piece of thick woollen cloth, or plain with dark stripes close together (called musayyaḥ). The poorest and meanest of garbs is the kisā, the mark of a poor man, an oblong cloth, sometimes cut and sewn.

On the Egyptian outer garment see EGYPT, § 39. Its use was established by the eighteenth dynasty, though priests still retained the primitive tunic or skirt. The upper garment was a short shirt sometimes with a left sleeve and a slit for the right arm. Gala dresses were of course common, and it is worth noticing that men's garments were usually more ornamented than the women's, whose earliest clothing consisted of a simple foldless garment reaching from below the breasts to the ancles.

In the regions of Assyria and Babylonia, on the other hand, so far as can be judged from the sculptures, the ordinary dress is a tunic from neck to knee, with short sleeves down to above the elbow. Very frequently the outer garment reaches only from the waist, and is elaborately ornamented.[1] A girdle encircles the waist, and not uncommonly the skirt is so draped as to fall below the ancle of the right foot, whilst the whole of the left from just above the knee-cap downwards is bare.

The upper part of the body is often bare, save only for various kinds of ornamented bands, etc. Occasionally, however, the garment seems to be thrown over the left shoulder (leaving the right arm bare). Most striking is the mantle sculptured upon the royal statue in the Louvre (see Perrot and Chipiez, Art in Ass. 2, pl. 6).

Turning finally to representations of the inhabitants of Palestine and their nearer neighbours, we note the over-garment with cape worn by the princes of Lebanon (see above, col. 1225, fig. 5). The Asiatics depicted above, col. 1221 f., fig. 3, wear the garment wound round their bodies. Jehu's tribute-bearers[2] show a mantle with ornamented borders, and short sleeves, and Jehu himself[3] is clad more simply in a long garment, fringed round the bottom. The artist represents the people of Lachish quite differently. They wear a long shirt or mantle, which seems to have a slit for the right arm.[4] The people of Tyre and Sidon in Shalmaneser's inscription are dressed only with a skirt, whilst Ašur-bani-pal's Arabians fight in a waist-cloth. Noteworthy is the rich clothing of the N. Arabian 'Amu women depicted on a Beni-Ḥasan tomb.[5] It reaches from neck to ancle, and the right arm is left bare. The men on the other hand have simply a skirt, apparently of skin.

2. Terms. Leaving to the article TUNIC what may have to be remarked upon the under-garment of the Israelites, we proceed now to a discussion of the Hebrew terms which fall to be considered

1. שִׂמְלָה (śimlāh; less frequently שַׂלְמָה, śalmāh; 𝔊, ἱματισμός, ἱμάτιον [=Rom. pallium]), the garment of both sexes (of women in Ex. 3 22 Dt. 22 17 Ru. 3 3 Cant. 4 11), though, as Dt. 22 5 implies, there was a difference between them; probably the woman's was longer and perhaps characterised by some colouring. It was something more than a mere tunic. Ruth (3 3) puts one on before going out-of-doors, and a man could dispense with it, at all events, in the day-time (Ex. 22 26 f. Dt. 24 13). Its folds (ḥēḳ, lit. 'bosom,' Ex. 4 6 f. Prov. 6 27) were adapted for bearing loads or for wrapping round an object (Judg. 8 25 Ex. 12 34 1 S. 21 10 Prov. 30 4; cp béged 2 K. 4 39),[6] and we may assume, therefore, that it was primarily nothing more than a rectangular piece of cloth. The śimlah, accordingly, would correspond with the Roman toga, or better still, the pallium. On the other hand, the term is sometimes used apparently of clothing in general (cp Job 9 31 Cant. 4 11)—e.g., of a prophet (1 K. 11 29 f.;

[1] The priests, however, according to Jos. Ant. iii. 7 1-4 wear breeches (מכנסים), tunic (כתנת), an outer girdle, and a turban. To these the high-priest adds the mantle.

[6] In Ezra 9 3 5, béged and me'īl (see no. 6) are named together. Since the me'īl was certainly a mantle (see no. 6), béged may perhaps be used of the inner garment.

on his usual garb see below 5), and of a warrior (Is. 9 5 [4]), who, we may be sure, would hardly go into battle clad in a long flowing garb. Another, probably similar, outer garment was the

2. כְּסוּת, kᵉsûth (cp Ar. kisā, § 1 above), used generally (see DRESS, § 1 [4]), but also specifically Ex. 22 26, and Dt. 22 12, where the appending of FRINGES [q.v.] is commanded.

3. מִטְפַּחַת, mitpāḥath, Ruth 3 15 (AVmg. 'sheet, or apron,' περίζωμα; Is. 3 22; but cp 𝔊), a large wrapper, which could be gathered up for bearing loads. It is possible that this word is to be read in Ezek. 13 18 21, instead of כְּסָתוֹת (EV wrongly 'kerchiefs'), on which see DRESS, col. 1141.

4. סָדִין, sādīn (cp Ass. sudinnu), probably a rectangular piece of fine linen cloth; cp Judg. 14 12 f., where AV 'sheets' (mg. 'shirts,' RV 'garments'). The sādīn was an article of domestic manufacture (Prov. 31 24), worn also by women (Is. 3 23). In Mish. Heb. it is used of a curtain, wrapper, or shroud. Levy, Chald. WB, s.v., cites Men. 41 a where the sādīn is styled a summer garment, the שרבלא on the other hand, being used in winter. It has, probably, no connection with σινδών[1] which in 1 Macc. 10 64 is used of Jonathan's regal garment (𝔊A, but 𝔊ℵV πορφύραν, cp Syr.), and in NT of a garment worn next the skin (Mk. 14 51 f.), or of a shroud (Mt. 27 59, cp Herod. 2 86).

5. אַדֶּרֶת, addéreth (lit. 'glory'? or cp Ass. adru 'purple,' Muss-Arnolt, 22 b), denotes a garment of the richest as well as of the simplest description. On the one hand, it was the distinctive garb of the prophet (1 K. 19 13 19 2 K. 2 8 13 f., μηλωτή); it was of hair (cp א' שֵׂעָר Zech. 13 4 and אִישׁ בַּעַל שֵׂעָר 2 K. 1 8).[2] On the other hand, the addéreth was worn by kings (Jon. 3 6, EV 'robe' στολή), and one was found and coveted by Achan in the spoil of Jericho (Jos. 7 21). If the reading in Josh. 7 21 is correct, the best mantles came from Babylonia. Possibly we should read שֵׂעָר for שִׁנְעָר (see, however, SHINAR).

6. מְעִיל, mᵉʿīl (deriv. uncert., see BDB), an outer garment worn by men of high degree (1 S. 18 4 24 5 12 [4 11] Job 1 20), also by Samuel (1 S. 15 27 28 14 cp 2 19), and Ezra (Ezra 9 3 5). It had flowing ends (1 S. 15 27, etc., kānāph, see FRINGES). In 2 S. 13 18, where the mᵉʿīl would seem to have been worn by females, the text is corrupt (read מֵעוֹלָם, see the Comm.), and in 1 Ch. 15 27 (מעיל בוץ) where David is said to have worn it before the ark, the ‖ 2 S. 6 14 (בכל עז) warns us against accepting the MT too readily.

The mᵉʿīl (or mᵉʿīl of the Ephod) is a recognised term for the high-priest's extra garment worn upon special occasions. The descriptions (Ex. 28 31 ff., 39 22 ff., Jos. Ant. iii. 7 4, BJ 5 7, cp Ecclus. 45 7-9 [Heb.]) make it a long seamless garment of blue (תְּכֵלֶת, ὑάκινθος [Jos.]), with an open bordered neck. At the foot were bells and pomegranates arranged alternately. See further EPHOD, § 3.

7. The precise meaning of מַחֲלָצוֹת, maḥălāṣōth (pl. only), of high priest (Zech. 3 4) and of females (Is. 3 22) is uncertain. EV understands some change of garments, removed or taken off (cp √ḥālaṣ, Dt. 25 9 Is. 20 2) in ordinary life. According to Orelli they were 'state dresses which the wearer "takes off" and places on some honoured guest.' With this agrees the specific meaning of ḥălīṣāh (2 S. 2 21 Judg. 14 19), and the analogy of the Ar. hilʿa[3] (√pull off).

Another term usually taken to mean some change of garments is—

8. חֲלִיפָה, ḥălīphāh[4] (Judg. 14 19; with שמלות Gen. 45 22, with בגדים Judg. 14 12 f., 2 K. 5 5 22 f.); cp 9. Such changes were necessary for purification (Gen. 35 2), after a period of mourning (2 S. 12 20), or more especially as honorific gifts. In ancient Arabian custom the gift should consist of the donor's own personal clothing, though naturally in course of time supplies were kept for the purpose. Such gifts are still considered an honour—a scarlet cloak, in particular, being held particularly flattering.[5]

9. פְּתִיגִיל, pᵉthīgīl (Is. 3 24, EV 'stomacher,' χιτὼν μεσοπόρφυρος), usually interpreted 'mantle,' is obscure. This foreign-looking word resembles the Tg. פתגא, 'over-garment,' with which, indeed, Levy (Chald. WB) actually connects it; Che. (Crit. Bib.) would read, חֲלִיפוֹת (ח and נ confounded).

10. מַעֲטָפוֹת, maʿăṭāphōth, Is. 3 22 (EV 'mantles'), cp Ar. iṭāf and miʿṭāf, a long-sleeved robe.

11. רְדִיד, rᵉdīd, Cant. 5 7 Is. 3 23, EV 'veil' is appropriate, though primarily it is, probably, a wide loose mantle. Tg. on Gen. 24 65 uses רדידא to render:—

12. צָעִיף, ṣāʿīph, Gen. 24 65. It is also used as a woman's article of clothing (EV 'veil'), but etymologically it means properly some square garment.

13. תַּכְרִיךְ, takrīk, Esth. 8 15 AV 'garment,' RV preferably 'robe,' in MH a shroud.

14. סַרְבָּל, sarbāl, probably correctly rendered 'mantle' by AVmg. in Dan. 3 21 (AV 'coats,' RV 'hosen'); see BREECHES. In MH it denotes some garment reaching from the neck downwards.[1]

15. כַּרְבְּלָא, karbᵉlā, Dan. 3 21, for which RV has 'mantles,' is more likely 'hats' (AV) or 'turbans' (AVmg.), the supposed denom. 1 Ch. 15 27 (מכרבל, as though 'wrapped in a mantle') being insecure (‖ 2 S. 6 14 מכרכר); see J. Ph. 26 310, and cp TURBAN.

Some of the common classical mantles are referred to in the Apoc. and NT:—

16. στολή, Mk. 16 5 (common also in MH in the form איצטלא; cp Tg. for חליפות Gen. 45 22). Both στολή and Lat. stola primarily had a general meaning; on the specific use of stola to designate the garb of the Roman matron, see Dict. Class. Ant., s.v.

17. ἱμάτιον (=Rom. pallium), Mt. 9 20, etc., distinguished from the χιτών (tunic) in Mt. 5 40 Lk. 6 29 Acts 9 39.

18. ποδήρης, Rev. 1 13, EV 'garment,' one reaching down to the feet.

19. περιβόλαιον, Heb. 1 12 (AV 'vesture,' RV 'mantle'), a wrapper or cover.

20. χλαμύς, Mt. 27 28 31, a military mantle (Rom. paludamentum), fastened by a buckle on the right shoulder so as to hang in a curve across the body. Cp 2 Macc. 12 35 AV 'coat,' RV 'cloke.'

21. φελόνης, 2 Tim. 4 13 (Ti.WH; prop. φαινόλης=pænula), worn on journeys. It was a long sleeveless mantle of durable cloth. Sometimes, but wrongly, taken to be a receptacle (esp. of books, cp Syr.). I. A.—S. A. C.

MAOCH (מָעוֹךְ), 1 S. 27 2. See MAACAH, 4.

MAON (מָעוֹן; ΜΑΩΝ [AL], ΜΑΑΝ [B]; but in Josh. 15 55 ΜΑΩΡ [B], in 1 S. 23 24 f. 25 1 Η ΕΡΗΜΟϹ Η ΕΠΗΚΟΟϹ [L]), a town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. 15 55), interesting from its twofold connection with the story of David (1 S. 23 24 f. 25 1 f. [if in v. 1 we read 'Maon' for 'Paran' with 𝔊B; but see PARAN]). As Robinson has shown, it is the modern Tell Maʿīn, which is about 10 m. SSE. from Hebron, and 2 m. S. from the ruins of el-Kurmul. Eastward of the ridge on which it stands is an extensive steppe, called in 1 S. 23 24 and perhaps (but see PARAN) 25 1 [𝔊B], 'the wilderness of Maon.' The greater part of this district is waste pasture-land, rough rocks with that dry vegetation on which goats and even sheep seem to thrive—though a little corn and maize is grown in the valleys (Conder, PEFQ, 1875, cp p. 46). It slopes towards the Dead Sea. Cp the MAON of Chronicles.

Genealogically, Maon (μεων [B]) is represented as a descendant of Hebron through Rekem (i.e., Jerahmeel?) and Shammai, and as the 'father' or founder of Beth-zur (1 Ch. 2 45).

In Gen. 10 13 (if for עֲנָמִים, Anamim, we should read מְעוּנִים, Meonim) the clan of Maon is represented as a son of מצרים (i.e., Miṣrim, not Miṣraim). See MIZRAIM. Observe that, according to this view, Maon and Carmel (see LUD, LUDIM, 1) are grouped, as in Josh. 15 55. T. K. C.

MAON (מָעוֹן; ΜΑΔΙΑΜ [BAL], ΧΑΝΑΑΝ [Symm.]; CHANAAN [Vg.]; 'Ammon,' Pesh.), EV [rather boldly] Maonites, a people mentioned in Judg. 10 12 in conjunction with the Zidonians and Amalekites as early oppressors of Israel. Tradition is silent elsewhere as to Maonite oppressors, and some critics (including Be., Gr., Kau., Buhl, and [SBOT, but not Comm.] Moore) would therefore adopt 𝔊BAL's reading 'Midian.' To this course, however, there are objections.

(1) It would be strange that the familiar 'Midian' should be corrupted into the unfamiliar 'Maon.' (2) The 'Zidonians' and 'Amalek' are only less troublesome than 'Maon' in this context; the text needs to be more thoroughly criticised. The list of names in vv. 11 f. is probably partly made up of corrupt doublets. The Zidonians, Amalekites, and Maonites of v. 12

[1] So in Syr. we should probably distinguish the rare native word sĕdīnā from the foreign seddōnā.

[2] Later an ascetic's garb. The founder of the Jacobite church in Asia, Jacob bar Theophilus, was surnamed Burdĕʿānā because his dress consisted of a bardaʿthā or coarse horse-cloth (Wright, Syriac Lit. 85).

[3] A connection with חלצים 'loins'—as though primarily a loin-cloth—seems out of the question.

[4] √to pass away or change (of garments, Gen. 35 2 Ps. 102 27 [26]). Note, however, Ass. ḫalāpu 'be clothed,' ḫalluptu 'covering, trappings' (cp IRON, § 2).

[5] Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 41 348 2 20 35 55 310 351. According to Doughty (2 19) an outfit consists of a tunic, a coarse worsted cloth, and a kerchief for the head.

correspond to the Misrim, the Amorites, and the benē Ammon of v. 11. The true text appears to the present writer to be, 'Did not the Miṣrites and the Jerahmeelites oppress you, and when ye cried unto me, I saved you,' etc. מעון is a conjectural emendation of, or a scribe's error for עמון (Ammon); עמון, as in some other passages, is a corruption of עמלק (Amalek), and עמלק is an early popular distortion of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel). אמרי is also miswritten for ירחמאלי (Jerahmeelite); צידונים is an error (cp צידון in 1 K. 17 9, Joel 3 4 for מָצוּר, Miṣṣur = Miṣrim for מצרים). Cp MIZRAIM.

The result, if it be accepted, is highly important, and must be taken in connection with Judg. 10 6, where, for 'Aram, Zidon, Moab, Ammon, Philistines'—errors due to an age which had forgotten early history—we should certainly read 'Jerahmeel, Miṣṣur (twice), Amalek (= Jerahmeel), and Zarephathites.' Cp JERAHMEEL, ZAREPHATH. It is an anticipation of the 'sin of Jeroboam,' which consisted in falling back on Miṣrite religion. Cp MOSES, § 11 (a). For a different view, proposed by Hommel, see MEUNIM. T. K. C.

MARA (מָרָא, 'bitter'), Ruth 1 20. See NAOMI.

MARAH (מָרָה; in Ex. 15 23*a b* ΜΕΡΡΑ [BAFL]; in v. 23*c* ΠΙΚΡΙΑ [BAFL]; in Nu. 33 8 f. ΠΙΚΡΙΑΙ [BAFL]; MARA), the name of a well of brackish water, mentioned in connection with the wilderness of Shur or (see SHUR) Beer-sheba. Cp EXODUS i., MASSAH AND MERIBAH, WANDERINGS.

There is no need to trouble about identifications. Later writers fancied a locality for the well of Marah; but really Marah belongs to the realm of the imagination. We are familiar with a localisation (in the Negeb?) of the land that flows with milk and honey (see HONEY). Wi. (Gesch. 2 93, n. 3) has recently illustrated this by the mythic lake (pseudo-Callisthenes, 2 42), with waters as sweet as honey, beside which Alexander the Great encamped, and corresponding to which is mentioned a river with waters too bitter to drink (ib. 3 17). 'After some had died, weeping and wailing arose beyond measure' (cp Ex. 15 24). See also the Syriac Hist. of Alexander (Budge), pp. 96 f. Cp also the πικρὸν ὕδωρ (the Hellespont), introduced by Herodotus into the story of Xerxes (Herod. 7 35; Mücke, Vom Euphrat zum Tiber, 90 94), and see SALT SEA. T. K. C.

MARALAH (מַרְעֲלָה; ΜΑΡΑΛΑ [L]), a place on the SW. border of Zebulun, and apparently E. of Jokneam, Josh. 19 11† (ΜΑΡΑΓΕΛΛΑ [B], ΜΑΡΙΛΑ [A]).

The reality of the name is, however, very doubtful. The Paseḳ (vertical line) before לְיָמָּה warns us to suspect the text. ומרעלה very possibly comes from יָמָּה וְעָלָה where ימה is of course a mere dittogram. If so, Maralah passes out of existence. T. K. C.

MARANATHA, in RV Maran Atha (ΜΑΡΑΝ ΑΘΑ. Ti. [DcL, etc.], WH; as one word [M, etc.]; ΜΑΡΑΝΝΑΘΑ [FG], MARANATHA [vet. Lat.; Vg.]; MARATHANA [r]; IN ADVENTU DOMINI [g; cp Æth. vers.]), an Aramaic expression used in 1 Cor. 16 22†.

Although it has been proposed to regard the expression as a single word,[1] there can be little doubt that it represents two, and the only question is where to make the division, and how to explain the component parts. Most scholars, however (e.g., Dalman, Gram. 120, n. 2; Nöld. GGA, 1884, p. 1023; Kau. in Siegfr. ZWTh., 1885, 128; N. Schmidt, JBL, 1894, 55 ff., etc.) have accepted the explanation propounded in 1884 by Bickell (ZKTh., 1884, p. 403, n. 3), that it means 'our Lord, come,' and the restoration, proposed in the same year by Halévy (REJ 9 9), Wellhausen (Nöld. l.c.), and Duval (REJ, 1884, p. 143), of מָרַנָא תָא, mārănā thā, as the original form,[2] though Schmidt argues strongly for מרן אתא, māran ethā. Rev. 22 20 makes it likely that some such formula (verb in the imperative) was in use in early times, and the Aramaic expression itself is found in the Didaché (10 6), where the invitation to approach the Lord's table runs thus: εἴ τις ἅγιός ἐστιν, ἐρχέσθω· εἴ τις οὐκ ἔστι, μετανοείτω· μαραναθά. ἀμήν.

On the suggested possibility of a similar formula having been in use among Jews, see JQR, Oct. 1896, p. 18 f., and for a discussion of the whole question, cp N. Schmidt, JBL, 1894, pp. 50-60. See, further, under BAN, § 3, EXCOMMUNICATION, § 2. J. H. Thayer, in Hastings' DB 3 241-243, deals at some length with the history of interpretation. H. W. H.

[1] For example, by Bullinger.

[2] For the philological evidence see Dalman (op. cit. § 74, 1 f.). The form adopted in RV is that rendered by the Church Fathers (Chrys., Theod., etc.), ὁ κύριος ἡμῶν ἦλθεν, etc. (cp gloss on Codex Coislin, ὁ κ. παραγέγονεν) 'our Lord is come' (cp Arab. vers. 'Mārān athā—i.e., "the Lord is already come"'), and it is apparently a feeling that this does not fit well into the context that has led to the substitution, so often found in later commentators (but also already, e.g., in Euseb. OS(2) 195 65), and reproduced on RVmg., of a present-future for the past tense. For an account of other (not very plausible) hypotheses, and a careful exegetical discussion of the passage in 1 Cor., see Klo.'s essay in his Probleme im Aposteltexte (1883), pp. 220-246. His own theory, that Māran āthā means 'our Lord is the sign' and was a formula used in connection with the fraternal kiss (v. 20), is very ingenious, but does not carry conviction. MARBLE. In three passages in the OT the EV suggests that in their architecture the Hebrews were acquainted with the use of marble of different colours (1 Ch. 29 2 Cant. 5 15 Esth. 1 6). The mention of marble in these late books need not surprise us; but the references being so few, and the passages in which they occur bearing traces of corruption, the question is involved in great obscurity.

In 1 Ch. 29 2, where the allusion is supposed to be to stones of white marble (AV; RV 'marble stones'; MT אַבְנֵי־שַׁיִשׁ), the word translated 'white marble' is probably misplaced.[1]

Again, in Cant. 5 15, the author, influenced by his characteristic fondness for trees (see CANTICLES, § 15), probably compares the legs of the bridegroom to 'pillars of acacia'[2] rather than to 'pillars of white marble' (עַמּוּדֵי שֵׁשׁ).

Finally, in Esth. 1 6, if with EV we are to follow MT, three other species of marble (besides the supposed 'white marble,' שֵׁשׁ) are mentioned. The versions, however, point to a different text. Following these we should perhaps read

ועמודי שִׁטָּה מטות זהב וכסף על־רצפת בהט־ודר
וּמִפְרְשֵׂי שֵׁשׁ בִּרְקְמָה לְסָחֹרֶת

'and pillars of acacia, couches of gold and silver upon a pavement of alabaster and mother-of-pearl-like stone, and screens of fine linen in the form of shields (or 'round about').'[3]

According to this view of the text, only two species of stone were used for the pavement (see PAVEMENT, § 1) on which the couches of silver and gold rested in the improvised banquet-room of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1 6). Of these stones, one, dar (דַּר), would seem to have possessed the brilliance of 'mother-of-pearl' since the same word (durr, durrat) in Arabic and Persian means 'pearl,' or even 'mother-of-pearl' itself. For in spite of the fact that pearls were used by the ancients in decorating the walls of apartments in royal palaces, we have no warrant for assuming their use in the case of pavements. We must, therefore, with Kautzsch (HS), Wildeboer (KHC), and the Variorum Bible suppose the word to mean in this passage 'mother-of-pearl-like stone.'[4] The other stone, báhaṭ (בַּהַט), was probably, as Ges.-Buhl (comparing Ar. bahut) and Kautzsch (HS) suggest, 'alabaster.'

Even now the two words (בהט־ודר) are perhaps to be taken closely together, and are really only meant to suggest one species of stone, the Alabastrites of Pliny (HN 36 7 8)—a kind of alabaster with the gloss of mother-of-pearl.[5] It was found, according to Pliny, in the neighbourhood of Damascus. M. A. C.

[1] For שַׁיִשׁ (Syr. sīšā) Ges.-Buhl, cp Assyr. šaššu; but, according to Del., the Assyrian word is of doubtful meaning. ורקמה is probably out of place and should be read after שֵׁשׁ (for שַׁיִשׁ), וְאַבְנֵי being corrupt for וְאֹרְגֵי. Translate: 'and weavers [or 'woven work'] of fine linen and chequered work in abundance' (cp Ex. 28 32 2 K. 23 7). See, however, PRECIOUS STONES.

[2] Read עַמּוּדֵי שִׁטָּה, the word שִׁטָּה being a more likely parallel to אֲרָזִים. See also below on Esth. 1 6.

[3] The words וּמִפְרְשֵׂי . . . בִּרְקְמָה (cp Ezek. 27 7) dropped out of the text or were illegible, and שֵׁשׁ and דר were transposed. עַמּוּדֵי שִׁטָּה is suggested by the Syriac. The additional phrase appears in 𝔊 as καὶ στρωμναὶ διαφανεῖς ποικίλως διηνθισμέναι κύκλῳ ῥόδα πεπασμένα—where κύκλῳ should be read with what precedes, ῥόδα πεπασμένα being a gloss on בִּרְקְמָה. An addition of the kind proposed above is also presupposed by Vulg., Syr., and Targ. (ed. Lagarde).

[4] So 𝔊 (πιννίνου λίθου); Syr. omits; Targ. (ed. Lag.) has דורא, 'pearl.' Siegfried (HK) has 'mother of pearl.'

[5] J. D. Michaelis suggested that דַּר alone was used to denote this stone. 𝔊BאA* renders בהט by [λιθοστρώτου] σμαραγδίτου λίθου (λιθ. σμαραγδίτου [L^{β}], λιθ. σμαραγδου [AL^{α}]); Vulg. has smaragdinus; Targ. (ed. Lag.) קרוסטלינין, 'crystal,' but Syriac apparently omits. BDB proposes 'porphyry' (so RVmg.), comparing Eg. behiti, behet, behat.

MARCABOTH, in the compound name BETH-MARCABOTH [q.v.], a place in the territory of Simeon (Josh. 19 5 1 Ch. 4 31). Most probably a corrupt expansion of Rehoboth (רְחֹבוֹת), suggested by the following name HAZAR-SUSAH (or -SUSIM).

No one has attempted to identify Beth-marcaboth, and with good reason. The confusion between רחב and רכב was easy; cp Raḥab and Rechab (see RAHAB). So C. Niebuhr (Gesch. 1 356). T. K. C.

MARESHAH (מָרֵשָׁה; μαρηcα [A]; but Josh. 15 44 מָרֵאשָׁה, βαρcηα [L]; βαθηcαρ [B]), the μαρηcα of Eusebius (OS(2) 279 27), a city in the shĕphēlah of Judah. The Chronicler mentions it in 1 Ch. 2 42*b*[1] (μαρεισα [B], μαρισα [A]), 4 21 (μαρισα [L], but μαιχα [B]), as having Calebite and Jerahmeelite connections; for Mareshah is a son of Caleb, on the one hand, and, on the other, of Jerahmeel, son of Shelah (אבי לכה ולערה is an expansion of fragments of ירחמאל). The Chronicler also gives Mareshah a genealogical superiority to Ziph, and even to Hebron (neighbouring places). Coming down to the historical period, he states (2 Ch. 11 8, μαρ(ε)ισα [BAL]) that Mareshah was fortified by Rehoboam, and that Asa won his victory over Zerah, the Cushite, in a valley defined (probably) as north of Mareshah (2 Ch. 14 9*f.*, μαρισηλ, μαρεισα [B], μαρισα [L]; see ZEPHATHAH, ZERAH). It was the home of one of the Chronicler's prophets, Eliezer b. Dodavah (2 Ch. 20 37, μαρεισα [B], μαρισα [A], μαρισα [L]); also of the prophet Micah, if 'Moresheth' and 'Mareshah' mean the same town (this, however, depends on a critical emendation of the MT of Mic. 1 14*f.*, on which see MORASTHITE, but also MORESHETH-GATH).

Mareshah is the Μαρισσα of Josephus (Ant. xii. 8 6), and was Idumæan in the Maccabæan period (Jos. Ant. xiii. 9 1). It was plundered by Judas the Maccabee (Jos. Ant. xii. 8 6; 1 Macc. 5 66, where read 'Marissa' for 'Samaria'; cp RVmg., also 2 Macc. 12 35, μαρισα [VA], EV MARISA). John Hyrcanus captured it (Ant. xiii. 9 1; cp 10 2); Pompey restored it to the Idumæans (ib. xiv. 4 4; BJ i. 7 7); Gabinius refortified it (Ant. xiv. 5 3); and finally the Parthians destroyed it (ib. 13 9). Eusebius (Onom. 279 27) describes it as in his time 'desert.' Its place in history is now taken by ELEUTHEROPOLIS [q.v.]. T. K. C.

MARINER occurs as a rendering of two Hebrew terms:—

1. מַלָּח, mallāḥ, Ezek. 27 9 Jon. 1 5.

2. In pl. שָׁטִים, šāṭīm, Ezek. 27 8; in RV and in v. 26 'rowers.' See SHIP.

MARK (μαρκος [Ti. WH]) is the surname of that John whose mother Mary (see MARY, § 27) according to Acts 12 12 had a house in Jerusalem.

1. Name. He is again referred to by both names in Acts 12 25 15 37, but only by that of John in 13 5 13, while in Acts 15 39 Col. 4 10 Philem. 24 2 Tim. 4 11 1 Pet. 5 13 he appears only as Mark (AV, thrice, MARCUS). The name of Mark, it is clear, had been assumed only for use in non-Jewish circles (cp BARNABAS, § 1, end; NAMES, § 86). That this name, selected to be borne in the Greek fashion as a sole name, should have been a

[1] 'Mareshah' ought to be read also in 1 Ch. 2 42*a*, where MT has Mesha; the context, as well as 𝔊BA, requires this. However, this correction is not enough. Either v. 42*b* is incomplete, or, 'the sons of Mareshah,' should be omitted. The second view is preferable. 'Mareshah' is a correction of 'Mesha,' and 'the sons of' is an insertion made after the marginal correction 'Mareshah' had intruded into the text. Thus neither 𝔊 nor MT is quite correct.

Roman prænomen need not surprise us; the name Titus also is so employed in the NT in the Grecian region, whilst the prænomen GAIUS [q.v.] is met with in three or perhaps even four cases. That of Marcus is met with in a similar way also in inscriptions (cp Swete, Expos. 1897 b, p. 81); it ought to be accented, not as in all editions of the NT, Μάρκος, but Μᾶρκος.[1]

In the 'captivity' epistles of Paul, Mark figures as the apostle's 'fellow-worker' (συνεργός, Philem. 24, Col. 4 11); he is commended to the good-will of the Colossians (Col. 4 10: 'Mark . . . touching whom ye received commandments; if he come unto you receive him') and in 2 Tim. 4 11, Timothy is bidden 'take Mark and bring him with thee; for he is useful to me for ministering' (εὔχρηστος εἰς διακονίαν).

2. Relation to Paul. This last statement is noticeable because we read (Acts 15 38; less precisely in 13 13) that on the apostle's first journey Mark had withdrawn from him at Pamphylia, for which reason he was not taken as a companion on the second journey (15 37-39). It is, however, quite possible that in the course of the years intervening between the journeys, this breach may have been healed and Mark have reinstated himself in Paul's confidence. Moreover, the story of the separation between Paul and Barnabas on Mark's account is not free from suspicion (see COUNCIL, § 3, end). Possibly, therefore, the cause of the separation between Paul and Mark on the first journey may not have been so serious as to cause lasting alienation. In any case the fact mentioned in Col. 4 10, that Mark was a cousin of Barnabas, would supply a sufficient explanation why Barnabas should have been willing to take Mark on the second journey, and ultimately did take him with him to Cyprus, in spite of his premature withdrawal on the first occasion (Acts 15 39).

The epistles to the Colossians and Philemon, which profess to have been both written at the same period, agree in what they say as to Mark's being with Paul; in 2 Tim., on the other hand, Mark is represented as at a distance from him. Even, however, if we assume the genuineness of these epistles,—or, at least, in Col., that of the personal notices in 4 7-15 and in 2 Tim. that of 4 9-18—we cannot here discuss, any more than in the case of Luke (see LUKE, § 1), the question as to the captivity to which they respectively belong.

That Mark was the constant companion of Peter seems to be vouched for by 'the old church teacher' (ὁ πρεσβύτερος) whose words are quoted by

3. Papias on Mark. Papias (ap. Eus. HE iii. 39 15): καὶ τοῦτο ὁ πρεσβύτερος ἔλεγε· Μᾶρκος μὲν ἑρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου γενόμενος ὅσα ἐμνημόνευσεν ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν, οὐ μέντοι τάξει, τὰ ὑπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἢ λεχθέντα ἢ πραχθέντα. οὔτε γὰρ ἤκουσε τοῦ κυρίου οὔτε παρηκολούθησεν αὐτῷ, ὕστερον δέ, ὡς ἔφην, Πέτρῳ, κ.τ.λ.[2] (cp GOSPELS, § 65 b). Perhaps the authority thus referred to by Papias may have been the 'presbyter' John (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 4), but possibly also he may have been some other person; for we do not possess the preceding context.

True, the words just quoted have sometimes been quite differently explained[3] as meaning that by writing his gospel Mark became ἑρμηνευτής of Peter, that is, the publisher of his oral communications regarding the life of Jesus. This view of the passage presents two great advantages for conservative theology. (1) It gives free scope for the supposition that Mark was for the greater part of his time the companion of Paul or Barnabas, a supposition which might otherwise seem difficult to reconcile with the belief that he was for very long the companion of Peter; (2) it obviates the necessity of inferring that Peter, owing to his ignorance of Greek, could not possibly have written —in Greek at least[1]—the two epistles attributed to him. Assuredly, however, this explanation is not the correct one. It is very forced to say 'Mark having become the publisher of the oral communications of Peter, wrote' etc. The participial clause, in fact, in such a case becomes wholly superfluous. The reverse order would be the only right one: 'By his writing Mark became publisher of the oral communications of Peter.' Moreover, such an interpretation would not enable us to dispense with the supposition that Mark had spent a long time in the company of Peter; for not only are we expressly told in the sequel that Mark did accompany Peter, but it lies in the nature of the case that Mark can have become the ἑρμηνευτής of Peter only by committing to writing discourses which he had repeatedly heard. The 'as I was saying' (ὡς ἔφην) would be decisive if only we could be sure that the expression is still part of the quotation from the 'presbyter'; in that case its reference could be sought only within the limits of the citation, since otherwise Papias would have omitted the two words. In fact, they could only be taken as referring to what he has stated at the beginning of the fragment before us (ἑρμ. Πέτρου γεν.), and that in turn would have the same meaning as the words by which the reference is made back to it: παρηκολούθησε Πέτρῳ (so Link). It is, however, better to suppose, with Zahn, that the words of the 'presbyter' close with πραχθέντα, and that those which follow belong to Papias, although he does not expressly indicate this. The supposition has indeed the disadvantage that according to it we cannot tell what it is that Papias is referring to by his 'as I was saying' (ὡς ἔφην); but as it is only a fragment that we have before us, this is intelligible enough. What ought to turn the scale in favour of this view is that only thus is justice done to the imperfect (ἔλεγε) 'the presbyter was wont to say.' According to Papias' own statement (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 4), the communications of the presbyter to him were exclusively by word of mouth, not in writing; the 'as I was saying' (ὡς ἔφην) would then be inappropriate if attributed to the presbyter.

[1] The length of the α is vouched for by the spelling Maarcus found both in Latin and in Greek inscriptions. See Dittenberger, Hermes, 1872, p. 136, n. 1; Viereck, Sermo graecus senatus Romani, 57 (Göttingen, 1888); Eckinger, Orthogr. latein. Wörter in griech. Inschriften, 8-11 (Zürich, 1892); Schweizer, Gramm. der pergamen. Inschriften, 42 f. (1898); Blass, Gramm. des neutest. Griech., § 4, 2, end.

[2] [And the 'presbyter' was wont to say this: Mark, who had been the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately as many things as he recalled to remembrance (or, repeated by word of mouth: see below, § 3 end)—not, indeed, in order—the things either said or done by Christ. For he neither heard the Lord, nor accompanied him, but afterwards, as I was saying, he accompanied Peter, etc.]

[3] Most recently by Zahn, Gesch. des Kanons, 1 878-882, Einl., § 51, n. 12-15 = 2 206-210 215-220. As against the first-cited of these passages, see Link, St. Kr. 1896, pp. 405-436.

The translation ought to run: 'Mark, who had been the interpreter of Peter, wrote,' etc. That γενόμενος can mean 'who had been' just as easily as 'who had become'—a rendering less suitable to the context—is shown by Link (420-425). Whether ἐμνημόνευσε means 'he recalled to remembrance' or 'he repeated by word of mouth' (see GOSPELS, col. 1811, n. 1) is not of decisive importance for the main question here.

As for the credibility of the statements of the 'presbyter,' the most important of them all—that our second gospel rests upon oral communications of the apostle Peter—does not stand, and the second, that it was written by Mark, remains doubtful (GOSPELS, § 148). But this does not necessarily involve our giving up the third, that Mark was an interpreter of Peter. It may have originated independently of the other two, and if the informant of Papias was a personal disciple of Jesus, or, at all events, a man of great age, he could very well have been adequately informed upon such a fact as this. Thus, 1 Pet. 5 13 seems to gain in probability when it says that at the time when the letter was being written, Mark was with Peter, and describes him as being Peter's son.

4. Mark's relation to Peter.

If this last expression is to be taken literally, the reference cannot be to the person named in Acts 12, for the house where Mark lived, and to which Peter betook himself on his deliverance from prison, would then have been described as Peter's, not as Mary's. It is, however, quite possible to take the word 'son' in a spiritual sense, in accordance with 1 Cor. 4 15 17 Philem. 10 Phil. 2 22 1 Tim. 1 2 18 2 Tim. 1 2 2 1 Tit. 1 4. On this view, one very willingly supposes that Mark as a youth, most likely in his mother's house, may have had opportunities of listening to Peter, and even may have been converted and baptised by him.[2] It is no serious objection to this last interpretation of the word 'son' (υἱός) that, in the other passages cited, it is 'child' (τέκνον) that is always used; yet the first—that Mark was a hearer of Peter—suffices, Swete (Expos. 1897 b, p. 86 f.) adding that Mark honoured Peter as a second father.

[1] Lightfoot's view (Apostolic Fathers, 1 2, revised ed. p. 494), that Mark translated the discourses of Peter into Latin is utterly improbable. According to Gal. 2 9, Peter directed his missionary activities to Jews, and doubtless continued to do so to the end of his life (COUNCIL, § 9); but the Jews even in Rome itself spoke Greek: Latin was necessary only in dealing with the lower classes in Italy. Moreover, even if Peter addressed himself at all to the Latin-speaking Gentiles, or visited Italy at all (see PETER), he did not do so exclusively; and Mark was his follower (παρηκολούθησεν)—that is to say, accompanied him on journeys to various places. Furthermore, the Second Gospel, even if not by Mark, is nevertheless, notwithstanding the fact of its being intended for Latin-speaking readers (GOSPELS, § 108, middle), written in the Greek language.

[2] This last is expressly said in the 'Præfatio vel argumentum Marci,' from the first half of the third century, given in Wordsworth and White's NTLat. 1 171; cp LUKE, § 5.

MARK

It has to be borne in mind, however, that the genuineness of 1 Pet. cannot be maintained, and that most probably it was not written before 112 A.D. (see CHRISTIAN, § 8; for a less definite date, PETER [EPISTLES], § 7). Thus, the statement that Mark was with Peter when the epistle was being written must be given up. Moreover, even if the doctrinal contents of the epistle should not be held to be due to the desire to effect a compromise between Paulinism and primitive Christianity, the Tübingen school may still possibly be right in holding that two well-known companions of Paul—Silvanus and Mark—are transferred to the society of Peter with the object of bringing into prominence that accord between Peter and Paul, of which Acts also is full (see ACTS, § 4). The designation of Mark as the 'son' of Peter has little independent value, even if there is no disposition to question it.

There is a difficulty in the statement of the 'presbyter' that Mark ever was a companion of Peter, even if we leave the epistle out of account. It is a difficulty that can be met, indeed, as long as it is regarded as chronological only. As we do not know for how long a time Mark was the travelling companion of Barnabas alone, there remains between his first and second association with Paul an interval of several years, in the course of which he might very well have been a companion of Peter, and there is no necessity even to assume with Swete (Expos. 1897 b, pp. 87-89) that he was not so till after the death of Paul. Still less are we compelled to interpret the 'presbyter' or the quotation of Eusebius (HE vi. 14 6) from the Hypotyposes of Clement of Alexandria to the effect that Mark had followed Peter πόρρωθεν (=from of old) in the sense that he had accompanied Peter on all his journeys. In fact, we learn from the same authority (Clem. Strom. vii. 17 106, end) that Peter had yet another interpreter, Glaukias by name. The question of the identity of the companion of Paul with the companion of Peter becomes more serious, however, when we take into account the well-known differences of temperament, of opinion, and even of practice, which separated the two apostles (Gal. 2 11-21; COUNCIL, § 3). Did Mark, when in the society of Paul regard himself as free from the law of Moses, and when in that of Peter as bound by it? In the one case did he teach that it had ceased to be valid, in the other that it had not? By way of softening this last difficulty it can indeed be urged that in Paul's society Mark took only a subordinate place, both according to Acts 13 5 (ὑπηρέτης), and according to 2 Tim. 4 11 (εἰς διακονίαν), and that thus he perhaps was not called upon to teach at all. Nevertheless, the identity of the companion of Paul with the companion of Peter remains surrounded with such difficulty, that one is readily inclined to suppose them to have been distinct persons, if unwilling to doubt the statement of the presbyter altogether.

5. More than one person?

For other reasons, most of them quite inadequate, scholars in the last centuries have sometimes assumed two, three, or four, persons of the name of Mark (see Lightfoot on Col. 4 10); indeed, at a much earlier date we even find in the list of apostles of the pseudo-Dorotheus (5th cent.), designated as A by Lipsius[1] (1 23, 202), as many as three distinct Marks—the evangelist, to whom, on account of his having been personally unacquainted with Jesus, it gives a place along with Paul and Luke between the twelve and the seventy disciples; next, the cousin of Barnabas, who, later, became bishop of Apollonias; and, lastly, John Mark, who subsequently became bishop of Byblos. The two last-named are both enumerated among the seventy (Lipsius, ii. 2 328).

Further statements regarding Mark, which apply to him only in so far as he can be regarded as author of the Second Gospel, in view of the uncertainty of his authorship (§ 4), need only be mentioned here, and do not call for discussion. He has been identified with the unnamed young man of Mk. 14_{51}f., or with the unnamed water-bearer of 14_{13}.

[1] For all that follows, cp Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-gesch., especially ii. 2 321-353; also Zahn, Einl. § 51, and Swete, Expos. 1897 b, pp. 268-277.

6. Mark as author.

This agrees with that interpretation of the opening words of the Muratorian fragment, which takes the words 'quibus tamen interfuit et ita posuit' as warranting the inference that Mark, though not in any strict sense a follower of Jesus, was present at certain incidents in his life. On another interpretation, however, it has been held that the incidents at which Mark was present, in the view of the author of the fragment, were events after the resurrection. On this view, the words 'et ita posuit' are taken as explaining why the account of the resurrection in Mk. 16_{9-20} constitutes an appendix to the Gospel, Mark as distinguished from Luke (l. 3: post ascensum Christi) having written his gospel before the ascension of Jesus. For other statements in the fathers regarding the composition of the Second Gospel see GOSPELS, § 147. Most difficult of all is a third interpretation of the Muratorian fragment—viz., that it was at the narratives (of Peter) that Mark was sometimes present, sometimes not.

Dionysius of Alexandria (ap. Euseb. HE vii. 25_{15}) being unable to attribute the Apocalypse to the apostle John, thinks of John Mark as a possible author, but rejects the supposition on the ground—a very insufficient one, it is true—that Mark travelled with Paul and Barnabas only so far as to Pamphylia, not as far as Ephesus. Hitzig (Joh. Marcus u. seine Schriften, 1843) would have Mark to be really the author of the Apocalypse. Spitta (Offenb. des Joh., 1889, see especially pp. 502-504) would make him author, at least, of one of the sources, which he calls 'Urapocalypse' (cp APOCALYPSE, § 29).

In the Περίοδοι Βαρνάβα, written according to Lipsius (ii. 2, p. 297) shortly after 485 A.D., Mark comes forward as the author, speaking in the first person.

In other lists of the 'seventy,' apart from that mentioned in § 5, the evangelist Mark is also enumerated (first in Adamantius; cp LUKE, § 4, n. 1). Epiphanius (Haer. li. 6 428*a*) reconciles the personal discipleship implied in this with Mark's filial relation to Peter by explaining that Mark had been one of the seventy-two disciples of Jesus, who according to Jn. 6_{66}, fell away from him, but that he was afterwards reclaimed by Peter. The ancient prologue given in Wordsworth-White (see above, col. 2939, n. 2) speaks of Mark as 'sacerdotium in Israel agens, secundum carnem Levita' (this is plainly an inference merely from his cousinship with Barnabas the Levite, Acts 4_{36}), and adds (p. 172 f.) that 'amputasse sibi post fidem pollicem dicitur ut sacerdotio reprobus fieret.' Doubtless the designation κολοβοδάκτυλος given to Mark in the nearly contemporary Philosophumena (7 30, begin.) has reference to this. According to the first preface in the Codex Toletanus (ap. Wordsworth-White, 171), the defect was a natural one. The view of Tregelles that the word means 'a deserter,' and is applied with reference to Mark's premature return from Pamphylia, is rightly rejected by Swete (Expos. 1897 b, p. 276 f.). The prologue first cited goes on to say that in spite of this mutilation, Mark became bishop of Alexandria. Eusebius, in reliance on older sources (Lipsius, ii. 2, pp. 323), gives the date of Mark's arrival there as 42 A.D. (Chron. ad ann. Abrah. 2057 [ed. Schöne, 2 152]; cp HE ii. 16_1). According to Epiphanius (l.c.), Mark was sent from Rome to Alexandria by Peter after he had written his gospel; according to the Περίοδοι Βαρνάβα (24-26), he went to Alexandria from Cyprus after the death of Barnabas (Lipsius, ii. 2, pp. 284 f.). Eusebius has it (Chron. ad. ann. Abrah. 2077 [ed. Schöne, 2 154]; HE 2_{24}) that Anianus, or Annianus, succeeded Mark in the see of Alexandria in 62 A.D. Jerome (Vir. ill. 8) places the death of Mark in the same year. He does not speak of any martyrdom. The earliest mention of a martyrdom is in the Acta Marci, which, according to Lipsius (ii. 2, pp. 344-346), were written in Alexandria towards the end of the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century. Mark is there spoken of as a native of the Pentapolis in North Africa, to which Cyrene belonged. The legend which names him as founder of the church at Aquileia first makes its appearance in the seventh century; the similar legend which associates him with Venice is still later (Lipsius, ii. 2, pp. 346-353). MARMOTH (μαρμωθι [B]), 1 Esd. 8_{62} = Ezra 8_{33}, MEREMOTH.

MAROTH (מָרוֹת; οδυνας [BAQ], η παραπικραινουσα [Symm.]), a place mentioned by Micah (1_{12}), and supposed by some to be near Jerusalem (so Hi., Now.), and by G. A. Smith to be in the maritime plain. Perhaps it is Jarmuth that is meant. The prophet's paronomasia has been misconceived; it is not 'bitterness' that the name of the place referred to suggests to him, nor can we infer from the following words that Jerusalem was close to Maroth.

Probably we should emend the text thus, 'Yea, sick unto death has Jarmuth's community become' (חָלְתָה לָמוּת יוֹשׁ' יַרְמוּת; so Che. JQR, July, 1898). G. A. Smith (ad loc.) renders the text, 'The inhabitress of Maroth trembleth for good, for evil has come down from Jehovah to the walls of Jerusalem.'

MARRIAGE

Legally considered, the marriage relation was formed by the act of betrothal—that is to say, by the payment, on the bridegroom's part, of the mōhar to the parent or guardian of the bride; with this she passed into the possession of her husband. To betroth a wife to oneself (אֵרַשׂ, 'ēraś), meant simply to acquire possession of her by payment of the purchase-money: the betrothed (מְאֹרָשָׂה, me'ōrāśā) is a girl for whom the purchase-money has been paid (see FAMILY, § 4; and cp We. GGN, 1893, p. 435). The betrothal once effected, the husband can take his wife home and celebrate his nuptials when he will (Gen. 24_{49} ff., Judg. 14_7 f.).[1] The girl's consent is unnecessary and the need for it is nowhere suggested in the law. Ordinary human affection would, no doubt, lead the parents generally to allow their daughters some voice in the matter (Gen. 24_{58}); but the arrangements about the marriage, and especially about the mōhar, belonged to the province of the father or guardian (Gen. 24_{50} ff., 29_{23} 34_{12}). The girl herself sometimes (but evidently not always) receives presents (מַתָּן, mattān) from the suitor.

1. Betrothal and mōhar.

In Eliezer's negotiation for Rebekah these gifts are given at the betrothal and before the actual union (Gen. 24_{53}); thus they have here the character of a gift made in confirmation of the betrothal contract (so also Gen. 34_{12}), not, like the ṣadāk of the Arabs, that of a morgengabe.[2] In Samson's case such a 'morgengabe' to the wife is also mentioned (Judg. 15_1), and there can be little doubt that such was originally the meaning of the 'gift' made to the bride.

As to the amount of the mōhar we unfortunately have but little information. Dt. 22_{29}, compared with Ex. 22_{15} [16] f., tells us that in the time of D the average was fifty silver shekels (about £4; see SHEKEL). The mōhar did not, however, require to be paid in money. It could be paid in personal service (so in Jacob's case, Gen. 29_{20} $_{27}$). Maidens were given in marriage to heroes for their prowess in war (Josh. 15_{16} Judg. 1_{12} 1 S. 17_{25}): David bought Michal for a hundred foreskins [unless this is due to corruption of the text; see MOSES, § 6 n.].[3]

The Homeric heroes paid in cattle; hence the complimentary epithet, 'oxen-bringing' as applied to maidens (παρθένοι ἀλφεσίβοιαι, Il. 18 593). The same may have been the practice with the nomad Israelites.

[1] Samson's marriage, however, was exceptional in various respects. See SAMSON, KINSHIP, § 8.

[2] Or 'morning gift,' referring to the German custom by which the bride receives a present from the bridegroom on the morning after the marriage.

[3] In view of this last narrative it is surely ill-judged on the part of Keil (Archäol. 541) and others to treat the mōhar as 'morgengabe' presented to the bride.

The mōhar in time gradually lost its original meaning of 'purchase money' as the custom arose of giving it, not to the father but to the wife herself. There was a similar development among the Arabs; in the Koran it is assumed to be usual to give the mahr to the wife. Even in E (Gen. 31 15) it is mentioned as a reproach against Laban that he had spent entirely upon himself the price paid for his daughters.

The requirement that the bride should bring something to her husband at her marriage or should receive a dowry from her parents is not according to ancient Hebrew custom. The case of Pharaoh's daughter is evidence only for Egyptian practice. At the same time, the genealogical legend of Josh. 15 16 ff. (cp Judg. 1 12 ff.) shows that parting gifts to the daughter on leaving her home were not unknown. Leah and Rachel receive their female slaves at their marriage (Gen. 29 24 29; cp 16 1). This, however, is no 'dowry' brought by the wife to her husband; such gifts remain the personal property of the wife. Conveyance of property through the wife cannot strictly be made, simply because daughters had no right of inheritance (see FAMILY, § 5); and even at a comparatively late date heiresses were subject in their marriages to certain restrictions designed to prevent the alienation of land to outside clans (see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 18). In post-exilic times a dowry somewhat in the modern sense seems to have been usual (Tob. 8 21 Ecclus. 25 22), and mention is also made of written marriage-contracts (Tob. 7 14).

2. Choice of Bride.

(1) In early times.—In ancient Israel the choosing of the bride was the business of the man's father or, rather, of the head of the family (cp Gen. 24 2 ff., 38 6 28 1 ff. 21 21). This is intelligible enough when we recollect that the person chosen was to become a member of the clan. It was regarded as unbecoming (though not impossible) that a son should be so self-willed as to insist on marrying a wife whom his family were unwilling to receive (Gen. 26 34 f. 27 46; cp Judg. 14 2). Now and then it did indeed happen that love-matches were made (1 S. 18 20 Judg. 14 1 ff.), and that the inclinations of the parties chiefly concerned were consulted. Esau marries as he does against the will of his parents (Gen. 26 34 f.); Rebekah is asked by her brother for her consent to the marriage (Gen. 24 58). Opportunities for the formation of romantic attachments were not wanting, the social relations of the sexes being under no specially severe restrictions. In the patriarchal history we find in this respect the same customs as are still to be seen amongst the modern Bedouins: women and girls are kept in no severe isolation. Meetings occur easily and naturally where the flocks and herds are being pastured, or at the wells.

The feeling of a certain degree of independence and of an equality of right with men to pursue their daily tasks gives the girls confidence and freedom; they do not shun conversation with a stranger, willingly accept useful help, and are ready to render reciprocal service (Gen. 24 15 ff. 29 10 Ex. 2 16 1 S. 9 11). Jacob's acquaintance with Rachel began at the well (Gen. 29 1 ff.). No doubt there are risks of rudeness or even of outrage (Ex. 2 16 ff. Gen. 34 1 ff.); but, on the whole, good manners and good morals are an effective safeguard (cp also Ex. 22 16 [15] Dt. 22 23 ff. 28 f.).

In these pictures the manners of the narrator's time are reflected; but passages like Judg. 14 1 ff. 1 S. 9 11 18 20 ff. show to what an extent nomadic customs continued to hold their ground among the settled Israelites.

It was in accordance with ancient custom for the man to look for his wife in the circle of his own family and clan. Such endogamy is not original in baal-marriages, which at an earlier time were marriages by capture (see KINSHIP, § 11); but it is easily explicable from the position of the woman, who became the property of her husband. To give away one's daughters into another tribe was equivalent to sending them beyond the protecting influence of their own family; and a wife married within her own clan might naturally be expected to enjoy a better position than as an alien abroad. The principle is clearly stated by Laban (Gen. 29 19): 'It is better that I give her to thee than that I should give her to a strange man.' Marriages outside the tribe occurred indeed, but were discouraged (Gen. 26 34 f. 27 46 Judg. 14 3). As the coherence of the tribe depended on the sense of kinship (see KINSHIP), it was also really best that marriage relationships should not be entered into with other tribes, at the risk of embarrassing one's feeling of relationship with one's own tribe. The marriage of Moses cannot be quoted against this; he was a fugitive and compelled to seek the shelter of another tribe. If, too, the genealogy-legend allows Judah and others to make marriages with Canaanites, this is in full agreement with what we know to have been the state of matters after the settlement, but proves nothing as regards ancient exogamy. The many instances of marriages of kinsfolk in the patriarchal history show that on this point the older views were different from those which afterwards became prevalent. Abraham married his half-sister on the father's side (not on the mother's; see KINSHIP § 5 f.), and even in David's time such a marriage in the king's family would, it seems, have been regarded as unusual, indeed, yet not as wrong or reprehensible (2 S. 13 13). Moses himself was the fruit of a marriage between nephew and (paternal) aunt (Nu. 26 59, P). On marriage with a father's wife (other than one's own mother) see below (§ 7). A cousin on the father's side was considered a particularly eligible bridegroom—a view that survives to the present day among the Bedouins and partly also among the Syrian peasantry. Compare the cases of Isaac and Rebekah (Gen. 24 4), Jacob and Leah-Rachel (Gen. 29 19).

(2) Later.—At the time when the patriarchal history came to be written, matters had indeed altered in one respect; the settlement, and the changes it had wrought in the tribal relationship, had altered the ancient custom in regard to marriages also, and alliances with Canaanites and other aliens soon came to be regarded as quite natural (Judg. 3 6).

In the post-exilic genealogy of David we find the name of Ruth the Moabitess; and David himself married a daughter of the king of the Geshurites (2 S. 3 3). Solomon is said to have married not only the daughter of Pharaoh but also Moabite and Ammonite princesses (1 K. 11 1); Ahab was the husband of the Phœnician Jezebel (1 K. 16 31); the two murderers of Joash were sons of an Ammonitess and of a Moabitess respectively (2 Ch. 24 26; see JOASH).

There are instances also of Israelite women marrying foreigners—in the recorded cases doubtless under some stipulation that the husbands should make Israel their adopted country. Thus Uriah was a Hittite (2 S. 11 3), Jether, the husband of David's sister Abigail, an Ishmaelite (1 Ch. 2 17 against 2 S. 17 25; see JETHER). We know of one instance—doubtless there were many unrecorded—in which an Israelite woman married abroad; Huram-abi, the Tyrian artificer, was the son of a Hebrew mother (1 K. 7 14; see HIRAM).

Here again with D there comes in a change, which allows marriage indeed with foreign women taken in war (Dt. 21 10 ff.), but forbids, on the other hand, any marriage-alliance with Canaanites (7 1 ff.) or with other heathen peoples (23 4 [3] ff.; Ex. 34 15 has probably been deuteronomistically redacted). The motives are religious; such women might seduce their husbands to idolatry. It is conceivable that in actual fact this objection to connubium with Canaanites may have arisen out of a change of feeling under the monarchy—friendly tolerance having been gradually superseded by fierce antipathy. Whether this be so or not, the prohibition in D cannot be dissociated from a certain particularistic narrowness. We are no longer in possession of the reason for the exemption of Edomites and Egyptians from the general condemnation (Dt. 23 7 f. [8 f.]). That the enforcement of the precepts of D met with much opposition, and in the first instance was a failure, is shown by the narrative in Ezra 9 f. (see EZRA).

D also seeks to introduce reforms with regard to the marriage of related persons. It expressly prohibits marriage with a father's wife (22 30 [23 1] 27 20), with a sister or half-sister (27 22), or with a mother-in-law (27 23). Here again the force of custom proved too strong for the law; in Ezekiel's day marriage with a stepmother, with a daughter-in-law, or with a sister, seems to have been frequent (Ezek. 22 10 f.).

P places among the prohibited degrees marriage with (1) mother, or father's wife generally; (2) sister and half-sister; (3) granddaughter; (4) maternal and paternal aunt; (5) uncle's wife on the father's side; (6) mother-in-law; (7) daughter-in-law; (8) brother's wife; (9) two sisters at the same time (Lev. 18 6-18; cp 20 11 ff.). The prohibition of marriage with a daughter has no doubt fallen out by a copyist's carelessness. Marriage is permitted between uncle and niece, between nephew and widow of uncle on the mother's side, and between cousins. On the whole these ordinances come very near the prescriptions of pre-Islamic Arab custom which were made statutory by Mohammed.

Here again the motives of the legislation are not quite apparent. From what has been said above on the custom of old Israel it is evident that the prohibitions cannot rest on the view that what they prohibit is destructive of the essence of blood-relationship; just as little can they rest on a perception of the injurious effects of marriage between near relations. Not to refer to other prohibitions with which they appear to be classed, it is enough to quote the words of Am. 2 7, a man and his father 'go unto the same maid, to profane the name' of Yahwè, which doubtless imply the formation of some unholy bond between father and son. With regard to levirate marriages (see below, § 8) no reason is apparent why they should have been abolished on moral grounds: here again it is highly probable that some religious idea was at work.

As to the marriage-festivities our information is but small. The central and characteristic feature was the solemn bringing of the bride to her husband's house, in which act the significance of marriage as an admission of the bride into the clan of her husband found expression.

3. Marriage Festivities.

In wedding attire (Is. 61 10; see DRESS), and accompanied by his friends (Judg. 14 11 f.; cp Jn. 3 29 and parall.), the bridegroom marched on the festal day to the house of the bride. Thence she was led, in bridal garments, but veiled (Jer. 2 32 Is. 49 18, etc.), accompanied by her companions as the bridegroom was by his (Ps. 45 14 [15]), to his parent's house (Jer. 7 34 16 9 25 10 Cant. 3 6 ff.). It was no doubt at eventide and by the light of torches that such processions were held (Mt. 25 1 ff.). Occasionally—but this was rare—the bride was led to meet the bridegroom (1 Macc. 9 37 f.). The custom now is for the guests in the procession to sing songs in praise of the bride and bridegroom, and this may well have descended from antiquity; indeed, the Song of Solomon may perhaps be formed out of a collection of such marriage lays (see, further, CANTICLES, DANCING), and in Ps. 45 we have a song composed for and sung at the marriage of a king. In the bridegroom's house was then held the great nuptial feast, which with the rich and great might last for seven, or even fourteen, days (Gen. 29 27 Judg. 14 12 17 Tob. 8 20). The same custom of fetching the bride existed also among the ancient Arabs, though as a rule without the pomp that was customary with the Israelites—a survival perhaps from the days of marriage by capture (Robertson Smith, Kins. 81). The consummation of the marriage was in the home of the bridegroom; among Hebrews and Arabs this was regarded as the more civilised arrangement; otherwise the bride was regarded as a mere captive about whom little ceremony was observed (We. GGA, 1893, p. 442).[1]

As a valuable chattel (to say the least) of her husband (see FAMILY, § 4) the wife was carefully looked after. Of the strict isolation observed throughout Islām we find, it is true, no trace in the ancient time.

4. The home.

The women had indeed in the innermost part of the house their own apartments to which access was not permitted to men (Judg. 15 1 16 9), or, in the case of wealthy people or people of rank, they had a separate house to themselves (2 S. 13 7 1 K. 7 8 2 K. 24 15 Esth. 2 3 14). This, however, does not hinder them from taking part in the ordinary duties of the household; they spin, sew, weave, make garments, fetch water, bake bread, and tend the flocks and herds (Gen. 29 9 Ex. 2 16 1 S. 2 19 8 13 2 S. 13 8 Prov. 31 10 ff.). They are not shut off from the outside world of men, and they even take part in feasts (Ex. 21 22 Dt. 25 11 Ruth 2 5 ff. 1 S. 9 11 2 S. 20 16 Mt. 9 20 12 46 26 7 Lk. 10 38 Jn. 2 1 ff. 4 7). Women and girls shared in public rejoicings with song and dance (Ex. 15 20 f. Judg. 16 27 1 S. 18 6 ff. Judg. 21 19 ff.). Whilst, however, fidelity on the husband's part was in no way enforced, law and custom were very strict as regarded the wife (cp Dt. 22 21). Adultery on her part was by very ancient usage punishable by stoning (Dt. 22 22 f.; cp Ezek. 16 40 Jn. 8 5 7), unless, indeed, the injured husband (as he was entitled to do) took the vindication of his honour into his own hand. A like punishment befell the wife who at her marriage was found not to have been a virgin (Dt. 22 21)—a custom which is to be interpreted in the same sense as the punishment for transgression on the part of a betrothed maiden (see FAMILY, § 4). How fierce was the jealousy with which men regarded their wives is shown by the laws which sought to protect women against false accusations, and by the very inadequacy of these laws. One of them punishes false accusations brought against a wife with a money fine and withdrawal of the right of divorce (Dt. 22 13 ff.); another, no less naively conceived, lets the man go free even after false accusation—he can compel his wife to submit to the ordeal of jealousy (see JEALOUSY), but, whatever the result, 'the man shall be free from blame' (Nu. 5 11-30). 'Mistrust and jealousy, not about love but about a property-right, are conspicuous characteristics of the Arabs' (We., l.c., 448). This is to a considerable degree true of the Hebrews also. Yet, in spite of all this strictness, the prophets have to raise a continual protest against the prevalence of adultery (Jer. 7 9 23 10 Hos. 4 2 Mal. 3 5, and often).

The man who owns his wife as a chattel can on the same principle own as many as he pleases—as many, that is to say, as he can afford to buy and keep.

5. Polygamy.

The luxury of a great harem was of course attainable only by the wealthy. These, so far as we can judge, made ample use of their privilege: witness the notices about Gideon's seventy sons (Judg. 8 30 9 2), David's wives (2 S. 5 13 etc.), Solomon's harem (1 K. 11 1 ff.), and the like. The law of the kingdom forbidding the possession of many wives has manifestly a side-reference to the actual king (Dt. 17 17). The Talmudists formulate the rule that no Jew may have more than four wives; kings may have at the most eighteen. The ordinary Israelite at all times, like the modern Syrian peasant, would doubtless have to be content with one secondary wife in addition to the principal wife, or at most with two wives. The last-named arrangement seems to receive the sanction of widely-diffused custom (1 S. 1 2 Dt. 21 15 2 Ch. 24 3; cp the case of Jacob). When the first wife proved childless, polygamy, to this extent at least, was regarded as a necessity. The examples of Sarah, of Leah, and of

[1] The naive method, employed even at the present day throughout the whole of the East, for satisfying curiosity as to certain physical details, dates from a very remote antiquity (Dt. 22 13 ff.).

Rachel, show how little the amour propre of the childless wife was wounded by any such arrangement.

To turn to the other side of the picture: polygamy carried with it its own hardships and inconveniences. The lot of the childless wife, when she had to live under the same roof with the mother of sons, was hard (1 S. 1 1 ff.). Even the concubine was sometimes known to exalt herself over the wife (Gen. 16 4 ff.; cp Gen. 30), and the situation was not always so simple as in the case of Sarah and Hagar, where the mistress could send her rival away; more usually she had no alternative but to submit. Very eloquent are the words that the language provides for the two wives—אֲהוּבָה, ăhūbāh, 'the loved one,' and שְׂנוּאָה, śĕnūāh, 'the hated one.' The later legislation found it necessary to intervene on behalf of the superseded wife (Dt. 21 15-17). The prohibition of the old practice of marrying two sisters at the same time (see above, § 2) is doubtless intended to obviate the subversion of sisterly relations through jealousy. Such also is the drift of the whole development towards the monogamy which, if never legally insisted on, was yet so extensively practised in the end. Gen. 2 18 ff. unmistakably discloses the view that monogamy, properly speaking, is the normal arrangement. When the prophets represent the relation of Yahwè to his people under the figure of a marriage, it is of course a monogamous marriage that is thought of; for Yahwè had entered into no similar relation with any other nation besides Israel. Finally, the praise of the virtuous woman in Proverbs and the many incidental references to woman and to marriage, both here and in Ecclesiasticus (Ps. 128 Prov. 12 4 18 22 19 14 31 10 ff. Ecclus. 25 1 8 26 1 f. 14 etc.), show that the practical wisdom of the later age had settled that monogamy was the only ideal kind of marriage.

6. Divorce. The woman being a man's property, his right to divorce her follows as a matter of course. As in doing so he must return the mōhar, no injustice is done either to her or to her family. The divorcée returns to her family and can, if circumstances favour, be married a second time from there. No moral stigma of any kind arises from the mere fact of her being divorced. Yet, we can well suppose that from the first the family of the woman would be disposed to look with disfavour upon such treatment, and the account which the husband was bound to take of the views and feelings of the wife's blood-relations (see above, § 2) laid from the very beginning a considerable restraint upon absolute freedom of divorce. The deuteronomic law has unmistakably the intention of limiting in some degree the liberty too frequently exercised, without at the same time curtailing in any respect the rights of the husband.

The expression עֶרְוַת דָּבָר, 'erwath dābār (AV 'uncleanness,' RV 'unseemly thing') can hardly be taken, with the stricter school of Shammai, in the ethical sense and interpreted as meaning unchastity (though this is certainly favoured by such a detail as the going forth with uncovered head); had the law intended such a very considerable curtailment of the general right of the man to dismiss a wife with whom he was dissatisfied, this ought to have been stated in much more definite terms.

Some restriction, however, was at the same time laid upon divorce by the mere fact that a writing ('bill of divorcement') was now required by law (Dt. 24 1 ff.). Further, it is enacted in D that the divorced wife, if, after divorce, she has married again and been separated from the second husband in turn by divorce or by his death, cannot again be taken back in marriage by her first husband. The old practice as to this was quite different (Hos. 3 3; cp 2 S. 3 14), and was similar to the old Arab custom; the Koran in fact lays it down as a condition that the wife can be taken back only if in the interval she has been the wife of another man. The manifest purpose of D and of the Koran alike is to put some kind of check upon rash and inconsiderate divorce. Lastly, D withdrew, as a penalty, the husband's right of divorce in two cases—those, namely, in which he had falsely accused his wife of not having been a virgin when he married her (Dt. 22 19), or in which he had been compelled to marry a virgin whom he had wronged (Dt. 22 28). This last innovation in the law is also directly contrary to the ancient practice, which did not even demand marriage as a compensation for the injury done. Here also we see the advance we have already noted, point by point, towards the securing of a higher position for the wife. Mal. 2 (see MALACHI, §§ 2, 4) condemns divorce in the strongest terms. The wife is the mother of 'seed of God': if there are children the end of marriage has been fulfilled. It is to Yahwè a hateful thing that a man should put away the wife of his youth and the mother of his children simply because she has grown old and has ceased to be personally attractive.[1]

The right of divorce belongs of course only to the husband. The wife has no means of freeing herself from her husband, apart from the means employed also by the Arabs—namely to make herself so objectionable to her husband as to force him to send her away. We do not know whether a thing of common occurrence among the Arabs ever happened also among the Hebrews—that a man sent his wife away at her own request or at the request of her relations on repayment of the mōhar. Salome the daughter of Herod might take the freedom of sending a bill of divorce to her husband Costabaros; but this was condemned as a foreign indecency (Jos. Ant. xv. 7 10).

7. Widows. Traces of evidence are not wanting that with the older Hebrews, as with the Arabs before Mohammed, a man's widow could be inherited exactly like his other property. The grasping Reuben—so ran the legend—sought to seize this inheritance even in his father's lifetime (Gen. 35 22); the rebellious Absalom comes forward publicly as heir and successor to his father by taking possession of his harem (2 S. 16 20 ff.)—an act which does not in itself at all shock the moral sense of the people. Abner by appropriating Saul's concubine Rizpah infringed the rights of Ishbosheth (2 S. 3 7 ff.); and when Adonijah asks the hand of Abishag he is asking a portion of the inheritance of Solomon, who at once infers his ulterior designs (1 K. 2 22; cp v. 15). As already said, in spite of the deuteronomic prohibition such marriages of son with step-mother were not unusual down to Ezekiel's time (Ezek. 22 10). The genealogical register of Chronicles mentions a further case: Caleb marries Ephrath, the wife of his father (1 Ch. 2 24 𝔊; We., De Gent. 14; see CALEB, EPHRATH, 3). On the kindred subject of levirate marriage, see below, § 8.

This inheritance of widows, however, was by no means a general custom in historical times. As a rule the lot of the widow is even harder than that of the divorcée. It was always open to her, indeed, to go back to her family; but it is not to be supposed that she could always count on a welcome there. D interests itself to the utmost on her behalf. Judgment must be executed for her justly, with fairness and promptitude (Dt. 10 18 24 17 27 19; cp the corresponding exhortations of the prophets, Is. 1 17 10 2 Jer. 7 6 22 3 etc.). Widows are to be bidden as guests to the sacrificial meals and feasts (Dt. 14 29 16 11 14 26 12 f.); the gleanings of the fields and vineyards and oliveyards are to be left for them (24 19-21; cp Ruth 2 2). Of their remarriage the law says nothing, except in the case of levirate marriage. Later usage seems, however, to have conceded to the widow certain claims over the property of her deceased husband; the rabbins laid down very exact rules as to this (cp Selden, De success. ad legem hebr. in bona defunct.; Saalschütz, Mos. Recht, 831 ff. 860 f.). On widows' garments see MOURNING CUSTOMS.

[1] This teaching, it must indeed be sorrowfully admitted, proved ineffective. We need only recall the practice in the time of Christ, which was entirely in accord with the school of Hillel in the interpretation of Dt. 24 1 ff. (see above), according to which divorce was left open to any man on any ground he chose, although specially (of course) on the ground of misconduct (cp also Ecclus. 7 26 25 26 42 9).

As a relic of the ancient right to inherit the widow—a right which belonged to the son or rather to the agnates —the custom of levirate marriage (which is not exclusively Israelitish) survived down even to post-exilic times. D, which elevates the custom into a law, enacts that when a man dies without sons (not without children, as the Jews afterwards read it, Mt. 22 24) his brother must marry the widow. The first son of this marriage shall be reckoned the son of the deceased brother, so that his name be not blotted out of Israel (Dt. 25 5 ff.). In this form the law essentially changes the old custom. The story of Judah and Tamar (Gen. 38, esp. v. 26) shows that in certain circumstances—namely, when there was no brother—it became the duty of the father of the dead man to come forward and marry his daughter-in-law. What seems plain from this narrative—that it relates to a duty involved in the right of agnates to inherit—is confirmed by the book of Ruth. The whole course of the story here rests upon the postulate that the agnate who claims the inheritance must take over the widow together with the land of the deceased; and in point of fact the story deals with somewhat remote kinsmen. This certainly is in accordance with the older use. The story, however, goes on to represent the whole as a right of inheritance which the man can relinquish if he choose. Over against this would be the corresponding right of the woman to refuse the marriage and to go back to her own relations instead (as Orpah does). Ancient custom, however, so far as exhibited in Gen. 38, would seem not to sanction withdrawal on any pretext whatever. Which of the two representations is the correct one we have no means of determining: they will harmonise in the end, if we are allowed to suppose that only the remoter agnates had the right of refusal. The origin of this compulsory character, which certainly did not attach to the original right of inheritance, will appear later.

8. Levirate marriage.

According to D, the purpose of the whole custom is that the man's name be not blotted out of Israel. This is certainly, in the sense which the law attaches to it, at the best but a secondary and subordinate consideration. For what D has in view is the preservation of the family property. When the first son of a levirate marriage is reckoned son of the deceased brother he becomes thereby his heir, he inherits the land, not of his actual father but, of the deceased. The effect of this is not only that the family property is prevented from passing into the hands of outsiders, but also, in particular, that it is preserved as such, and the family belonging to it does not die out. An interest of this kind—to secure the continuance of the property not only within the clan but also as an independent family property—can, of course, have come into being only in connection with questions of landed property, in other words, after the settlement. The same effort led on another side to this, that anyone who found himself compelled to sell his land always retained a right of redemption and preemption—which right also passed over to the agnates entitled to inherit (Jer. 32 8 ff.). In the story of Ruth this is also what we find; the near kinsman, the gō'ēl (see GOEL), must first buy back the alienated land in virtue of his right of inheritance and redemption (Ruth 4 3 ff.).

With P also this preservation of landed property within the family is the one consideration present in its revision of the older law (see below, § 2). It is noticeable that in Ruth a somewhat different matter is placed in the foreground as the object primarily aimed at. Naomi's purpose is not to secure posterity for her son, but to gain a husband for her step-daughter; not the continuance of the name of Mahlon, but the well-being of Ruth is her real desire (1 11 ff. 3 1). The first son of the marriage actually is in the end regarded, not as the son of Ruth's first husband, but as the son of his real father Boaz. Here too we doubtless have a correct reminiscence. In the old law about the right of heirs to widows of deceased men it was by no means contemplated that the heir should in all cases himself marry the widow; it was open to him to marry her to another man. To the right of inheritance, however, was always attached the corresponding duty of caring for the women so inherited. At the same time, the practice in old Israel will doubtless have been similar to that of Arabia: when the widow was not desirable, or was looked upon only as a burden, she was simply neglected. So with Tamar, and so with Ruth (We., l.c. 456, and compare what has been said already as to the lot of widows). Judah nevertheless—notwithstanding all his neglect—holds fast by his rights; if Tamar has gone astray with a man of another clan, she has been guilty of 'adultery' (Gen. 38 21 ff.).

The reckoning of the son of such a marriage to the deceased husband is nevertheless an ancient custom, not an innovation of D. In D, however, it has undergone a not-unimportant alteration; in Gen. 38 9 all the children (not only the first son) are to be reckoned to the dead man. Modern scholars explain this for the most part from ancestor-worship. The dead childless man has his right to have this ordinance observed (Gen. 38 8 f.), and it is for contempt of it that God slays Onan. What the dead man is defrauded of by its non-observance is the reverence and worship of his posterity (cp 2 S. 18 18). Stade (GI 1 394) points out that marriages of this kind are customary precisely among those peoples who have ancestor-worship also—Indians, Persians, Afghans, and so forth. It was when the religious consideration was added that the right of inheriting (which resulted from the very nature of baal-marriage) became also a duty. It is not necessary therefore to resort, with Robertson Smith, to an old form of polyandry for an explanation (see KINSHIP, § 10).

D, for whom the old religious meaning of the matter has become obscured, is able on that account to relax the stringency of the demand and give release from it under certain conditions. The refusal to comply with it brings, however, open shame to the unwilling brother-in-law. The practice here referred to, which is of very great antiquity and not quite rightly understood by D, again clearly exhibits the ancient connection with the right of inheriting. The contemned sister-in-law is to go up to the place of justice before the competent court (the elders of the city) and, loosing her brother-in-law's shoe from off his foot, is to spit in his face, saying 'So shall it be done unto the man that will not build up his brother's house,' and ever after his family is to be called the barefoot family. This loosing of the shoe was, according to Ruth 4 7, customary at every transaction in landed property. The seller gave his shoe to the buyer in token of renunciation of his right in the object sold (see SHOES, § 4). So, in the story, when the near kinsman divests himself of his title to the inheritance he plucks off his shoe. In D this no-longer-understood custom, which probably had survived only in connection with the matter of levirate marriage, is construed into an insult, ever to be remembered, not only against the renouncing kinsman but also against his whole family.

In process of time this class of marriages underwent still further restrictions, when daughters became capable of inheriting in default of sons. Henceforward they could be thought of only in cases where there were no children at all; for to marry the widow when the inheritance had fallen to the daughters was not in consonance with the meaning of the institution. The object of keeping the property within the clan was secured by prohibiting heiresses from marrying outsiders. Such becomes the law in P (Nu. 27 4), and marriage with a brother-in-law is forbidden as incestuous (Lev.

18 16 20 21 ; see above, § 2). Whatever the successes of P as a whole, however, it does not seem to have permanently triumphed at all points. In this respect in particular ancient custom seems to have been stronger than written law (cp Mt. 22 24).

MARTHA (μαρθα [Ti. WH], § 57 ; Aram. מרתא, 'lady,' 'mistress'), sister of Mary, and friend of Jesus (Lk. 10 38 ff. Jn. 11 1 ff. 12 2).

1. Name. 'Martha' is pretty common in the Talmud (Zunz, Ges. Schriften 2 14, Jastrow's Dict. 834 b, and cp Orig. c. Cels. 5 62, Epiph. Hær. 19 2). In the Aramaic inscriptions in Part II. of the CIS we find the proper names מריא and מרתי (Cook, Aram. Gloss. 78) ; the former of these would probably be Latinised as Marius, the latter as Martha. By a curious coincidence Martha was the name of the Syrian prophetess who accompanied Marius in his decisive campaign in Provence against the Cimbri and Teutones (Plut. Mar. 414). See Hall (Bullock), Romans on the Riviera (121), who adds that both Marius and Martha are still amongst the most popular 'Christian' names in Provence. The legends respecting St. Martha, with all their picturesqueness, cannot claim a share of our space. Cp LEPROSY, § 5, end, MARY, § 21.

2. Traditions. (a) In Lk. 10 38 ff., we are told that, as they journeyed, Jesus and his disciples arrived at a certain village (of course not Bethany, cp Lk. 19 29) where it was convenient to halt. Here there dwelt a woman who received Jesus into her house, and whose sister, named Mary, instead of helping Martha in preparing the meal, 'sat at the Lord's feet and heard his word.' WH (so, too, B. Weiss) give the following as the best supported reading of the answer of Jesus to Martha's complaint : 'Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things but there is need of few things, or of one (ὀλίγων δέ ἐστιν χρεία ἢ ἑνός· Μαριαμ γάρ), for Mary has chosen the good part, one which will not be taken away from her.' The TR, however, to which Tregelles and Tischendorf adhere, gives the central words in a different form, 'there is need of one thing' (ἑνὸς δέ ἐστι χρεία)—i.e., of only one thing. The latter reading seems to have been framed out of regard to Christian supernaturalism, which took offence at the suggestion of a few things (plural) being really needful. The reading, 'of few things, or of one,' which Plummer (St. Luke, 292) by no means makes probable, seems to stand midway between the original reading and the more definite reading which afterwards became prevalent, and the original text probably read, 'there is need of few things.' The idea that 'few dishes' are meant, though supported by many Greek and some modern interpreters, is unsatisfactory. The 'few things' must surely be those of which Jesus speaks in the 'Sermon on the Mount,' and of which he says that they are not to cause us any anxiety. Jesus was presumably, according to the intention of the evangelist, speaking of the kingdom of God. The passage is a gentle reminder that man's earthly wants are few, and that, having a Father in heaven, men need not be anxious about these wants, and the 'good part' chosen by Mary is a share in the kingdom of God. It is also probable that the answer assigned to Jesus is a combination of two sayings, one relative to the many and the few things, and the other relative to the truly good possession (cp Ps. 16 6). These sayings were both floating in tradition, when the story received its present form, and to understand Lk. 10 41 f. we must analyse it into its two component parts.

A Dutch critic, reviving a very old interpretation, supposes that, though very possibly historical, the incident was recorded in Lk. to emphasise the contrast between the Pauline doctrine of faith and a Judaising doctrine of works (Scholten, Het Paulinisch Evangelie, 334). But this presupposes the reading ἑνός.

(b) In Jn. 11 1 5 19, etc., we hear again of 'Martha and Mary' (v. 19) or of 'Mary and her sister Martha' (v. 1) ; but their house is in the 'village of Bethany.'

There is a certain similarity between the descriptions of Martha in Lk. and Jn. respectively. In both Martha appears as a devoted friend of Jesus, though there is nothing in Lk. to suggest that Martha regarded Jesus as more than a great teacher of the things concerning 'the kingdom,' whereas in Jn. she professes her belief in Jesus as 'the Christ, the son of God.' In both, too, Martha is the more forward of the sisters. 'Martha was distracted with much ministration.' 'Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him.' 'Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith to him, Lord, . . . he hath been dead four days.' And though nothing is said of hospitality in Jn. 11, the omission is repaired in Jn. 12 2, where we are told that 'they made him a supper, and Martha ministered.'

The great difference in the place of residence assigned to Martha and Mary by the respective narrators need not here be discussed. The question is complicated—for those at least who hold that there was but one anointing of Jesus in the primitive evangelical tradition—by the fact that Lk. and Jn., who differ so widely as to the place of residence of the two sisters, differ in exactly the same way as to the scene of the anointing of Jesus (cp Lk. 7 36-38 Jn. 12 1-3), which is placed by Lk. in Galilee and by Jn. at BETHANY (q.v.), not to refer here to other differences in the narratives. MARY

1. Etymology. μαριαμ, in the LXX the name of the sister of Moses (see MIRIAM), reappears in the NT as a woman's name. One Græcised form is Μαρία (see § 2), another is Μαριάμ(μ)η, used by Josephus. All forms agree in having a in the first syllable. According to the Massorah to the Targum of Onkelos (ed. Berliner, 1875) on Ex. 15 20, Mariam was also the Targumic pronunciation. Thus we have one of the many cases in which MT has preserved a later pronunciation (Miriam). Hebrew analogies point to the change from a to i, not conversely from i to a.

It was accordingly quite proper that, from the earliest Christian times, when the etymology of the name was being discussed, the form Mariam was assumed. A variety of interpretations are already met with in the Onomastica Sacra. As might be expected, they are almost all of them impossible, resting as they do on utter ignorance of Hebrew. We shall here briefly record only a few of the more important, referring for further details to the excellent monograph of Bardenhewer (see below, § 22).

The name is taken as a compound of adjective and substantive when rendered 'bitter sea' (מַר יָם); as a substantive with related genitive in the renderings 'drop of the sea' (מַר יָם; after Is. 40 15 where מַר=stilla), or 'star of the sea,' which in the form stella maris appears in all printed editions and almost all MSS of Jerome, and for which support has recently been sought in מְאוֹר יָם, cp Gen. 1 14 f. (although Jerome probably wrote stilla maris), or 'myrrh of the sea' (מֹר יָם), or 'teacher of the sea' or 'jaculatrix maris,' or 'early rain of the sea' (the last three renderings assume a derivation from מוֹרֶה יָם—in the first two cases appropriate, obviously, only to a man), or 'lady of the sea' (from Aram. מָר, the fem. of which is in fact Martha) or 'lady of the day' or 'lady of the sieve' (יָם in New Hebrew meaning cribrum) or 'seal of the master' (which would seem to demand a Persian etymology). The name was taken as a single word when some Rabbins interpreted it as meaning 'bitterness' (√מרר) or when others took it to mean 'lady' or 'mistress' (מָרְיָא, status emphaticus of Aram. מָר, masc.). Whilst in these two instances there are called into requisition roots which have also been employed to explain the word when its composite nature is assumed, the other interpretations of it as a single word have recourse to derivations not hitherto met with. The hiphil of ראה is suggested by the rendering 'the enlightener' or (with suffix) 'their enlightener';[1] the hophal by 'the enlightened.' רום is assumed in the rendering 'exalted,' possibly also in the rendering 'gift' (if תְּרוּמָה occasioned the suggestion).

There are but two alternative roots that can be seriously considered: מרה, 'to be rebellious,' and מרא, 'to be fat' (whence מְרִיא, 'fatling'; Job 39 18, the only place where the verb occurs, must be left out of account owing to the uncertainty of the sense). The א of מרא might, before the a of -ām, pass into י, which, in the case of מרה, is already the third consonant. The termination -ām indicates substantives of an abstract meaning as well as adjectives, and is especially common in the case of proper names. Mariam, then, might mean either 'the rebellious' or 'the corpulent.' Even apart from any theological interest that might seem to be involved, we may safely say that we can hardly conceive any possible motive for giving a name of the former meaning to a girl unless there were difficulties in her birth. The case would be different if the name had been bestowed on the sister of Moses expressly because it is recorded that she was rebellious on one occasion (Nu. 12 1-15); that, however, is by no means the only circumstance, nor yet the most prominent one, which we learn regarding her. The derivation from מרא, on the other hand, accords excellently with the whole analogy of Semitic names; it is associated with the Semitic idea of feminine beauty. Bardenhewer compares also the masculine name Mamre (מַמְרֵא).

Both forms, Μαριαμ and Μαρια, interchange frequently and with little seeming regularity in the NT texts.

2. Mariam or Maria in NT?

For the mother of Jesus, wherever the genitive is required (Mt. 1 16 18 2 11 Mk. 6 3 Lk. 1 41) Μαριας is invariably used. In the dative there is always an apposition with the article which makes the case clear; the name accordingly, both in Lk. 2 5 and in Acts 1 14, is given as Μαριαμ (Lachmann, however, has Μαρίᾳ in the latter passage). For the accusative in Mt. 1 20 WH give in their text Μαριαν; for the nominative in Lk. 2 19 all the editors enumerated in Weymouth, Resultant Greek Testament—except TR and WH on the margin—have Μαρια, in 1 38 Lachmann alone has it. In all other instances the nom. (Mt. 13 55 Lk. 1 27 34 39 46 56), acc. (Lk. 2 16 34), and voc. (Lk. 1 30) is Μαριαμ. Again, Μαρια is used for the mother of Mark, who is mentioned only in the genitive (Acts 12 12), and for the mother of James (the Less) and of Joses, who in all passages (Mt. 27 56 61 28 1 Mk. 15 40 47 16 1 Lk. 24 10) occurs in the nominative. For Mary of Clopas Ti. in Jn. 19 25 (nominative) has Μαριαμ, almost all the other editors have Μαρια; so also in the case of the Mary greeted by Paul in Rom. 16 6 (acc.). Mary Magdalene is generally Μαρια; but variants are wanting only in five of the fourteen passages where she is named (Mk. 15 47 16 1 Lk. 8 2 24 10 in nom.: Mk. 16 9 in dat.). She is Μαριαμ in the vocative in Jn. 20 16; elsewhere always in the nom.; in fact, in Jn. 20 18 (as also in 20 16) only TR and Lachmann have Μαρια, and on the other hand in 19 25 20 1 11 only Ti. has Μαριαμ, in Mk. 15 40 only WH have Μαριαμ, in Mt. 27 56 only WH have (on the mg.) Μαριαμ, in 27 61 WH Ti., etc., have Μαριαμ, in 28 1 WH (mg.) Ti., etc., Μαριαμ. Finally, the name of the sister of Martha is met with in the gen. Μαριας without variant only in Jn. 11 1; elsewhere she is usually Μαριαμ in acc. (in 11 19 28 31 45 where in each case only TR has Μαριαν), whilst in the nom. only WH in Lk. 10 42, only WH (text) in Jn. 11 20, only WH and Treg. in Jn. 11 2, 12 3 have Μαριαμ, and in this form WH and Ti. agree against Treg. and Lachm. only in Lk. 10 39, and with Treg. against Lachm. in Jn. 11 32.

Of course all the women named, with the possible exception of the Mary named in Rom. 16 6, were really known as Mariam in the Aramaic surroundings in which they lived. Any distinction between Mariam and Maria can at the earliest have been introduced by the evangelists; but hardly with the irregularity which our present texts display. Plainly we must reckon with the fact that one copyist preferred the one form, another the other, and that in the collation of any two codices the readings of the one were introduced into the other, yet without any fixed system being followed by copyists or collators.

It is open to us to conjecture that one evangelist may have uniformly preferred the form Mariam for all persons of the name, and another, similarly, that of Maria. Yet the conjecture cannot be said to be confirmed even after we have assumed a large number of later alterations by copyists. We might in like manner conjecture that the evangelists reserved perhaps the ancient form Mariam for the mother of Jesus, and bestowed the more modern form Maria upon all the others. But this, too, it would be difficult to carry out. What we can discern most clearly is rather this, that our best codices, in those places where two persons of the name are mentioned, for the most part call Mary Magdalene Mariam, and the mother of James and Joses almost invariably Maria, although the two women have already been sufficiently distinguished by the additions to their names (Mt. 27 56 61 28 1 and parallels). All that can be said to be made out with clearness is the rule, valid also for other indeclinable proper names, which makes the genitive declinable.

I. The mother of Jesus.—In the case of Mary the mother of Jesus our chief interest concentrates itself on the doctrine of the virgin birth.

3. Jesus on his own birth.

Let us first listen to Jesus himself. According to the first three gospels, to which we turn in seeking to ascertain his place in history, we find that he never makes any appeal to the manner of his birth. This, however, must not be pressed; for it can be urged that the silence arises from a delicate reserve which would be easy to understand. On the other hand, however, we find expressions used by him which seem directly to exclude the idea of a virgin birth. In Mt. 12 28 he declares that he casts out devils by the spirit of God. This rests upon the conception that the spirit of God fills his being, that it has been bestowed upon him, but not upon the conception that it is by the divine spirit that he has been begotten. Surely, too, the hard saying (Mk. 3 33 = Mt. 12 48), 'Who is my mother, and my brethren?' would have been an impossibility if Jesus had possessed the consciousness that his mother had been deemed by God worthy of a position so exalted and so singular as we are now speaking of; and it will hardly be suggested that his mother could have concealed from him until now the happy secret. In Lk. 8 20 f. the hard saying is no longer preserved; all the more certainly on this account must it be regarded as genuine, for no evangelist would have invented it (GOSPELS, § 131).

The saying of Jesus just referred to (Mk. 3 33 = Mt. 12 48)

[1] At this point may be registered the somewhat bold attempt of Rösch (St. Kr., 1888, pp. 265-297, especially 280-282) to explain such interpretations as 'enlightener,' 'myrrh of the sea' (according to him, due to confusion with 'myrtle of the sea'), 'star of the sea,' 'bitter sea,' 'lady,' as due to combination of Mary with the goddess Astarte.

stands directly connected with a circumstance preserved only in Mk. (3 20 f.), whilst in Mt. it is much disguised, and in Lk. altogether omitted.

4. Mk. on virgin birth.

The 'kinsmen' (οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ) of Jesus 'went out to lay hold of him; for they said, he is beside himself' (GOSPELS, § 139 and 116 b, end). Who these kinsmen exactly were we learn from Mk. 3 31 f. = Mt. 12 46 f. = Lk. 8 19 f.; they were his mother and his brethren. For the passage is the continuation of Mk. 3 21; they set out from Nazareth and reach Jesus immediately after he has had a controversy with the scribes (Mk. 3 22-30). Even should we choose to regard it as possible that Mary had kept a life-long silence with her son regarding the secret of his birth, and by this assumption to deprive Mk. 3 33 ('who is my mother, etc.?') of the force assigned to it in the preceding paragraph, 3 21 ('he is beside himself') would still be decisive; had Mary known of the supernatural origin of Jesus, as set forth in Lk. 1 35, could anything have induced her to say that he was beside himself? The 'family secret,' of which apologists speak, did not exist. The saying of Jesus in Mk. 6 4, 'a prophet is not without honour save in his own country and among his own kin and in his own house,' is also germane to the present subject. The words 'and among his own kin' (καὶ ἐν τοῖς συγγενεῦσιν αὐτοῦ) have very significantly been omitted by Mt. (13 57) and Lk. (4 24). We may also refer to the narrative of the baptism of Jesus. It involves the view, which we have already (§ 3) seen to be that of Jesus himself in Mt. 12 28, that he first received the holy spirit when he was baptized. It is a view that could never have arisen if that of the virgin birth had been in existence from the first (NATIVITY, § 15).

We are able, however, to advance a step further. Whole sections of the first two chapters of Lk. bear witness against the virgin birth.

5. Lk. 2 on virgin birth.

(a) Were it presupposed it would be indeed a very singular thing that, according to Lk. 2 33, the parents of Jesus should have marvelled at the words of Simeon (and according to 2 18 f. at those of the shepherds), and have been unable (2 50) to understand his words as a boy of twelve. Still more important is it to notice that in 2 27 41 43 his 'parents' (γονεῖς), and in 2 33 48 his father and his mother are mentioned.

It is very noteworthy that six old Latin codices in 2 41 have Joseph et Maria for 'his parents' (οἱ γονεῖς αὐτοῦ); most uncials in 2 33 substitute 'Joseph' ([ὁ] ιωσηφ) for 'his father' (ὁ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ); Syr. Cur. has 'we' instead of 'thy father and I' (ὁ πατήρ σου κἀγώ) in 2 48; and four old Latin codices omit the subject altogether.

(b) In 2 22 we read, further, that the days of their purification were fulfilled. This is based upon an archæological error; it was only the mother who was made unclean by a birth; in the case of a male birth, according to Lev. 12 1-4, the uncleanness lasted forty days. This error, however, serves to show that the writer regarded Joseph as the actual father of Jesus; otherwise he could not have thought of him at all as unclean.[1] Thus there is no occasion to lay stress upon the further consideration that there could have been no thought of any uncleanness on the mother's part if the birth had been brought about by supernatural means. (c) Still clearer on this point than either of the preceding considerations is the indubitably original reading of 2 5, 'with Mary his wife'—which is vouched for, not merely by old Latin codices, as well as by Syr. sin., but even more by the manifest impossibility of its ever having arisen by later correction (see NATIVITY, § 16, middle). The whole of Lk. 2, accordingly, not only knows nothing of the virgin birth, but rests upon the opposite presupposition.

Further, it has to be pointed out that even in Lk. 1, only two verses—vv. 34 f.—contain the idea of the virgin birth clearly and effectively; and these disturb the connection so manifestly that we are compelled to regard them as a later insertion.

6. Lk. 1 and virgin birth.

(a) In the first place, Mary's question, 'How shall this be, seeing I know not a man'? is on any assumption inappropriate. 'Know' (γινώσκειν) being here in the present tense, it cannot mean the act of concubitus for which the word is so often employed (mostly of the male—Gen. 4 1 Mt. 1 25 etc.—but sometimes of the female—Gen. 19 8 etc., and in Nu. 31 17 f., with full explanation of the euphemism). We are equally precluded, however, from taking it in the quite general sense which it has, for example, in Acts 19 15 ('Jesus I know . . . but who are ye'?), a sense which would be quite meaningless in the present context. The true interpretation is the intermediate one; I have no such acquaintance with any man as might lead to the fulfilment of this prophecy. But the exact opposite of this is involved in the actual situation; Mary is betrothed to Joseph (Lk. 1 27) and must necessarily have looked to the fulfilment of such a prophecy through her marriage with him—unless indeed her doubt had been not about the birth of a son, but about the high dignity that son was to attain in after life. This latter doubt, however, is precisely what she does not express.

(b) Another point which has to be noticed is that Mary takes the words of the angel as referring to a fulfilment in the way of nature. Had she interpreted them otherwise, then her objection 'I know not a man' would be meaningless. And the interpretation of the angel's words now suggested is not, as one might be tempted to think, unsuitable inasmuch as the angel is supposed in 1 35 to express only with greater clearness what he has already said in 1 30-33. On the contrary, vv. 30-33 admit without any difficulty of being understood as referring to the birth of the Messiah from a human marriage. In particular, 'son of the highest' (υἱὸς ὑψίστου, v. 32) need not mean a son of God in the physical sense, but only a son of God in the ordinary OT sense of one who places himself wholly at the service of the divine will, and is supplied and supported by God with special powers. This is also true of the Messiah. Also the endless duration of the dominion of the Messiah as an individual person, as distinguished from the reign of an endless dynasty, announced in v. 33, even if nowhere certainly set forth in any of the messianic prophecies when historically interpreted, at any rate lay very close at hand in such passages as Is. 9 5 [6] Ezek. 37 25 Sibyll. 3 49 f. (under Cleopatra, ἥξει δ' ἁγνὸς ἄναξ πάσης γῆς σκῆπτρα κρατήσων εἰς αἰῶνας πάντας). What, however, must never be lost sight of is that the notion of a supernatural birth never at any time attached to the idea of the Jewish Messiah. As late as in the Dialogue of Justin (circa 155 A.D.) we still find Trypho the Jew saying (49 begin.), 'We all expect the Christ to be a man of men' (πάντες ἡμεῖς τὸν Χριστὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐξ ἀνθρώπων προσδοκῶμεν γενήσεσθαι). The alternatives before us, therefore, are either to suppose that the author of the chapter as a whole has put a wholly inappropriate utterance into Mary's mouth, or to assume that in vv. 30-33 an unsupernatural birth—a possible interpretation—is actually intended, and that in v. 34 f. a supernatural birth has been substituted for it by another hand, and accordingly that 'son of God' (υἱὸς θεοῦ) (v. 35) is to be taken in a physical sense, otherwise than the 'son of the highest' (υἱὸς ὑψίστου) in v. 32. It is well worth noticing that Bernh. Weiss, on account of this difference, takes the words of 1 35*c* (διὸ καὶ . . . θεοῦ) to be an addition made by the redactor to his source. The same

[1] The expedient of taking the reference as being to the purification of mother and child does not hold. As no plural immediately precedes, 'their' (αὐτῶν) must be referred back to the subject of the verb (ἀνήγαγον), where unquestionably the father and mother are intended. Moreover, according to Lev. 12, no uncleanness attaches to the child any more than to the father. D, with 'his' (αὐτοῦ) for 'their' (αὐτῶν), makes the purification refer to the child, but in doing so comes into conflict with the sense of Lev. 12.

consideration must, however, be extended to 1 34 f., in which case the virgin birth disappears from the source altogether.[1]

(c) The words in 1 32 to the effect that David is the father of the son to be born of Mary (τὸν θρόνον Δαυὶδ τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ) could, on the presupposition of a virgin birth, have been written only if Mary's own descent were held to be from David. But as, according to 1 36, she is a kinswoman (συγγενίς) of Elizabeth, who in turn, according to 1 5, is a Levite, the words in 1 32 constitute an independent proof that the fatherhood of Joseph is presupposed. We are not in a position to say to what tribe it was that Mary really belonged; but that the author of Lk. 1 held her to be a Levite is certain. The conjecture has been hazarded, it is true, that she was Levite on the mother's side, but on the father's side a descendant of David. This, however, ought to have been expressly stated. Far from this being the case, the idea that Mary was a descendant of David is expressly excluded by what we read in 1 27 (the angel Gabriel was sent . . . 'to a virgin betrothed to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David'); for otherwise the continuation would not have run, 'and the virgin's name was Mary,' but simply, 'and her name was Mary' (καὶ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτῆς Μαρία). In 2 4, moreover, we are expressly informed of Joseph only that he was descended from David, though his descent was a matter of no moment on the assumption of the virgin birth. In this case, however, it is only Syr. sin. that substitutes the words 'because they were both of the house of David.' See further, NATIVITY, §§ 5, 9, end.

(d) Another circumstance that speaks for our regarding vv. 34 f. as an interpolation is the fact that Mary's speech expresses doubt of the truth of the angel's message, and yet she is not so much as blamed, whilst Zacharias is actually punished for a like doubt (1 20). Moreover, the case of Elizabeth to which the angel points in v. 36 is no evidence of the possibility of a supernatural conception; it has evidential value only if what has happened to Elizabeth is more wonderful than what is being promised to Mary—namely that she, in the way of nature, is to become the mother of the Messiah. Note, further, that apart from 1 34 ἐπεί ('since') is not met with either in the third gospel or in Acts.

7. Genealogies and virgin birth.

The two genealogies of Jesus in Mt. 1 1-17 and Lk. 3 23-38 (see GENEALOGIES ii.) differ so greatly that recourse has often been had to the supposition that they relate, one to Joseph, the other to Mary. Not only, however, is this in flat contradiction to the express statements which refer both of them to Joseph; the reference of either to Mary is further from the outset excluded as soon as it is observed that according to Lk. 1 36 Mary is a kinswoman of the Aaronite Elizabeth (§ 6 c). Even if, however, it were true that one of the two 'genealogies' related to Mary, the other would still be that of Joseph, and thus by the mere fact of its existence would furnish the proof which in reality both of them afford, that when they were drawn up there was no thought of the virgin birth of Jesus. Therefore within a gospel which teaches this doctrine the insertion of 'as was supposed' (ὡς ἐνομίζετο) (Lk. 3 23) was quite indispensable. But had such an insertion been contemplated from the outset, it would not have been worth while to construct the genealogy at all.[1] On Mt. 1 16, see §§ 13-15.

[1] The same result is arrived at, in a somewhat different way, when Kattenbusch (see below, § 22), and with him Weinel (Ztschr. f. NTliche Wissensch., 1901, pp. 37-39), takes only the last words of 1 34 (ἐπεὶ ἄνδρα οὐ γινώσκω) as editorial insertions, and assigns to the descent of the holy spirit upon Mary no other operation than that of making her child to be from the womb filled with the Holy Spirit—as in 1 15. In 1 35 'son of God' (υἱὸς θεοῦ), would then have the same OT meaning as 'son of the highest' (υἱὸς ὑψίστου) in 1 32, and Mary's question have the same meaning as we already (under a) have seen to be appropriate to the situation. Such an interpretation, however, of the words 'shall come upon' (ἐπελεύσεται) and 'shall overshadow' (ἐπισκιάσει) is difficult to carry through, especially as no similar expression is found in 1 13-17 with reference to Elizabeth.

8. Paul and virgin birth.

One testimony, that of Paul, is unquestionably older than that of our canonical gospels. (a) At the very outset, his statement in Rom. 1 3 that Jesus was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, is irreconcilable with the virgin birth. Otherwise reference must certainly have been made to the share which the Holy Ghost (who is also mentioned) had in his generation. Now, 1 4, the antithesis to 'according to the flesh' (κατὰ σάρκα) not being strictly adhered to, proceeds to define what Jesus has become in virtue of his resurrection. In this reference, however, the Holy Spirit does not figure as the author of the being of Jesus at his birth but as the higher and, strictly speaking, the abiding element of his being—in short, as what in an ordinary mortal constitutes the soul. (b) In Rom. 8 3 God sends forth his son 'in the likeness of sinful flesh' (ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας). Since the apostle in Rom. 5 12 traces the sinfulness of mankind to its descent from Adam, such a statement would certainly be impossible, the virgin birth being held. (c) The most important passage, however, is found in Gal. 4 4. Not indeed because the expression runs 'made of a woman' (γενόμενον ἐκ γυναικός) and not 'made of a virgin' (γενόμενον ἐκ παρθένου); for after all a 'virgin' (παρθένος) is also a 'woman' (γυνή) and it could reasonably be urged that Paul was under no compelling necessity to lay emphasis on the idea of παρθένος. The force of the passage for the present discussion lies in what follows: 'born under the law, that he might redeem them which were under the law.' Here what is shown is that in order to become their redeemer it behoved Jesus to be completely like those he came to redeem. Thus also the phrase 'born of a woman' denotes a birth differing in no essential particular from ordinary human births.

(d) It will perhaps be urged that, inasmuch as Paul attributes pre-existence to Jesus, the virgin birth has less interest for him, but that his silence in the matter does not prove that he was unacquainted with it. As against this it has to be pointed out that the doctrine of the pre-existence of Jesus is one that has not been handed down to him; on the contrary he is the first to formulate it—unless indeed one were to regard the utterances of the Johannine Christ regarding his pre-existence as historical. Now the pre-existence of Jesus, so far as Paul is concerned, is clearly an inference from his present exalted condition; the apostle therefore regards the pre-existent one also as a heavenly man, not as a divine being (cp the present writer's excursus on 1 Cor. 15 49 in HC). If, however, the doctrine of the virgin birth had been handed down to him, he would hardly have framed a doctrine of the pre-existent state so hard to reconcile with such a tradition received from the original apostles.

9. Ep. to Heb. and virgin birth.

The Epistle to the Hebrews in 7 14 gives prominence to the fact that 'our Lord sprang out of Judah, as to which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priests.' In this the sole object is to make out the inferiority of the OT priesthood as compared with the high-priesthood of Jesus. We have nothing to lead us to suppose that the author wishes any conclusion to be drawn with respect to the birth of Jesus; but for all who find themselves compelled to believe that Lk. rightly attributes a Levitical descent to Mary Heb. 7 14 testifies unquestionably and with emphasis against the doctrine of the virgin birth.

10. Fourth Gospel and virgin birth.

The Fourth Evangelist regards Jesus as being the externally existing Logos, and one could believe the doctrine of the virgin birth to have been of less importance in his eyes as predicating something far less exalted concerning Jesus. (a) At the same time, Jesus in this gospel says a great deal not only about his previous existence with God but also about his entrance into this earthly life in virtue of his mission by his Father. In this connection it would assuredly have been of great importance to have been able to say, in support of his exalted dignity, that he had been born in an altogether exceptional way. Instead of this, what do we find? That in Jn. 1 45 Philip, in 6 42 the Jews, call him the son of Joseph, that in 1 45 7 41 f. 52 Nazareth is spoken of as his birthplace, whilst yet Bethlehem is said to be of necessity the birthplace of the Messiah; and Jesus says nothing to the contrary. It is acknowledged that in the Fourth Gospel the objections of the Jews against Jesus continually proceed upon misunderstandings (see JOHN, § 25 c). But here the misunderstanding plainly lies not in any error as to the actual birthplace of Jesus or as to the manner of his birth, but only in the opinion that these facts exclude the Messiahship of Jesus.

[1] Should it prove to be the fact that Syr. sin. and D take the ὡς ἐνομίζετο as a correct supposition, and not, like the canonical texts, as a false one (GOSPELS, § 22 β), this would only be evidence of a reaction against the alteration of the original view caused by the insertion of the ὡς ἐνομίζετο; the ὡς ἐνομίζετο could never have been the insertion of any one who still held to the original view of the genealogy that Jesus was really the son of Joseph.

(b) No direct polemic, however, against the virgin birth of Jesus can be discovered in Jn. 1 13.

True, it would in fact have been in full accord with the subtle manner of the Evangelist if he had taken occasion to declare of all the elect that they are born 'not of blood nor of the will of man but of God' precisely in order to hint that he did not find it applicable to Jesus alone, in whose case it had naturally and of necessity to be taken literally. As, however, he makes the declaration with regard to all the elect, who nevertheless are born as men, his purpose cannot have been to exclude a human birth; rather must we take him to mean that they are born 'not so much of . . . the will of man as, rather, of God' (Winer, § 55 8*b*); that is to say, it is not their human birth that matters so much as their provenience from God, in other words their election. But on this interpretation the saying loses all polemical force against the supposition of the virgin birth of Jesus.

(c) Nevertheless it is not impossible that the Fourth Gospel contains a tacit rejection of the doctrine in question. It would be quite in accordance with the spirit of its author if the doctrine appeared to him too slight and too external for the Logos—if only we may suppose that he knew it. In favour of the supposition is (i.) the fact that the doctrine is already in full currency in Justin's time (152 A.D.) although he gives some details differently from the canonical form (see e.g., below, § 21 a, n.); and, further (ii.), the point registered under GOSPELS, § 151, end, even though it does not treat directly of the passage on the virgin birth. On the other hand the view put forth in NATIVITY, § 12, is also very attractive, that Jn. 7 41 f. 'reveals the hidden path by which Bethlehem had found its way into the gospel tradition' as the birth-place of Jesus. We shall do best perhaps if we combine both views by the supposition that an older, perhaps oral, form of this manner of reasoning gave occasion to the relative portions of Mt. and Lk. and laid the foundation for Jn. 7 41 f.

What has been said in § 3 f. renders it antecedently probable that from Mt. as well as from Lk. the theory of the virgin birth of Jesus was originally absent.

11. Mt. and virgin birth. The expression in Mt. 13 55 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' points in the same direction. Unless the phrase is to be understood in the first of the senses suggested under JOSEPH (ii., § 9) as being exactly equivalent to the parallel in Mk. 6 3 'Is not this the carpenter?'—and we may perhaps point to the continuation in Mt., 'Is not this his mother called Mary?' as favouring the view that his father is really intended—then the passage [which is here assumed to represent in the main rightly what was originally told of the questionings of those in Jesus' 'own country'] directly contradicts the theory of the virgin birth.[1] Nay, more, even chap. 2 itself admits of a complete understanding without the presupposition of the virgin birth. The fact that Bethlehem is not mentioned at all till 2 1 is reached thus becomes significant. 1 18-25 thus appears not only to be later than chap. 2, but also to have been somewhat heedlessly introduced, otherwise Bethlehem would have been mentioned at an earlier point.

On Mt. 1 18-25 all that need here be said is that in it the theory is set forth from first to last with full deliberation. The only somewhat indeterminate expression in it is the word 'wife' (γυναῖκα) in vv. 20 24, since it is still in question whether Joseph is to take (παραλαβεῖν) Mary or not. For this expression does not refer to concubitus (see, rather, 1 25) but to the completion of the marriage. Yet after all the word 'wife' (γυνή) instead of 'betrothed' (ἐμνηστευμένῃ; cp 1 18) is not more unprecise than ἀνήρ (1 19) for bridegroom; both alike rest upon the fact that betrothal already constitutes an obligation binding in law, even before the marriage has been concluded in due form (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 1[10] 149 f.).

We are now in a position to sum up and complete the results arrived at regarding the composition of Mt. 1 f. and Lk. 1 f.

12. Composition of Mt. 1 f. and Lk. 1 f. (a) The narrative of Mt. 1 18-25 is not by the same hand as 1 1-17 (§ 7), and in fact is later than the genealogy, which could never have been drawn up after Joseph had ceased to be regarded as the real father of Jesus. Moreover, 2 1 ff. would seem to have been written without being preceded by 1 18-25 (§ 11). In chap. 2, further, according to the statement given in GOSPELS, § 151 (end), the story of the Magi does not seem to have been originally present. Further, the words 'in those days' (ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις) in 3 1 have absolutely no relation to anything contained in chaps. 1 2, the contents of which relate to a period thirty years earlier. Hillmann (JPT, 1891, 259 f.) conjectures that originally immediately before these words there stood some note as to date similar to what we now have in Lk. 3 1 f., which was afterwards removed when Mt. 1 2 were prefixed. That the author of Lk. should have made use of Mt.—according to GOSPELS, § 127, a very probable hypothesis—becomes all the easier to believe if at that time the first two chapters of our Mt. were still wanting, and entirely so; otherwise Lk. who so often coincides verbally with Mt. would not have diverged from him in 1 f. so completely as he does.

(b) The statement of the virgin birth in Lk., as well as that in Mt., was introduced last of all—by the insertion of 1 34 f. (or only 1 34*b*) and of 'as was supposed' (ὡς ἐνομίζετο) into 3 23 (§ 6 f.). Whether the insertion is due to borrowing, or to an oral source, need not be discussed. In Lk. 2 the contents of Lk. 1 are not presupposed, except in 2 21*b*: 'which was so called by the angel before he was conceived in the womb.' This backward reference to 1 31 can easily have been inserted when the two chapters were being joined together. On this hypothesis we can imagine more readily—what in itself is in accordance with the nature of things—that the glorification of the Baptist by means of a narrative of his birth took place at a later date than the similar glorification of Jesus. This would hold good also if with Völter (see below, § 22) we were to assume the kernel of the 'Benedictus'—i.e., 1 68-71-75 76 f. 79*b*—to be drawn from an 'Apocalypse of Zacharias' in which Zacharias sang the praises of his son John as forerunner of the day of Yahwè (not of the Messiah). As in the case of Mt. with regard to chap. 2, so also in that of Lk. with regard to chap. 1 particularly, the question has to be asked (though it cannot be exhaustively discussed here) whether certain portions may not have been later additions.

An indication pointing in this direction may perhaps be seen in the fact that the marriage of Mary with Joseph, and the date of the conception of her first-born son are nowhere mentioned. Both ought to come between 1 38 and 1 39. With this supposition agrees also 2 21. In 1 27 which requires no textual change[1] Mary is still betrothed, in 2 5 she is wife (§ 5 c; NATIVITY, § 16, middle).

1 [In JOSEPH ii., § 9, an attempt is made to go behind the Aramaic phrase for 'Jesus the carpenter.' The supposition that Jesus was a carpenter might have arisen out of a misapprehension of 'Jesus the Nazarene' which really meant, neither 'Jesus the Nazarene' nor, as some supposed, 'Jesus the carpenter,' but 'Jesus the Galilæan' (cp NAZARETH, § 3).]

1 Harnack (Ztschr. NTliche Wissensch. 1901, p. 56) would delete 'virgin' (παρθένον) (and also τῆς παρθένου?) by the side

Finally, as in the case of Mt. so also in that of Lk. we must conjecture that the gospel once was without the first two chapters (1 5-2 52). Lk.'s proem (1 1-4) speaks in favour of this presumption (see NATIVITY, § 13) as also do the facts that the Baptist is in 3 2 introduced like a person who has never yet been mentioned, and that Jesus at Nazareth (4 16-30) appeals in his own vindication simply to his possessing the gift of the Holy Spirit; so also the further fact that the Baptist (7 18 f.) allows the question to be raised whether Jesus be the Messiah or not, without knowing anything of the complete information which, according to 1 41-45, his mother possessed. See, especially, Thomas (below, § 22), 364-400.

As in the Third Gospel it is in 3 23 (§ 7), so in the First Gospel it is in 1 16 that the theory of the virgin birth had, well or ill, to be brought into harmony with the presupposition of the genealogies.

13. New readings in Mt. 1 16*b*.

(a) When the text of Syr. sin., 'Joseph, to whom was espoused Mary the virgin, begat Jesus who is called the Christ,' was first made known, great surprise at such a departure from the canonical text was expressed.

Some thought that we had suddenly come into possession of a text which completely changed the entire situation. In this they were mistaken. No doubt, Syr. sin. contains the words 'Joseph . . . begat Jesus,' but not without a parenthesis. Similarly, it reads in 1 21: 'she shall bear to thee a son' and in 1 25 'and she bore to him a son,'—this too in place of the longer phrase 'and knew her not till she had brought forth a son,' so that the birth of the son connects itself directly with the words 'and took unto him his wife.' Syr. sin., however, contains at the same time the canonical text of 1 18-20. Taken as a whole, accordingly, this recently discovered translation brings in no new era; of an older text it contains only traces, and these are overlaid by the canonical text.

The error would, however, be equally great if with others we were to imagine that all we had to do in order to save the ecclesiastical dogma was to dispose of these innovations in Syr. sin. either by holding them for heretical falsifications or by taking the 'begat' (ἐγέννησεν) in 1 16*b* in a different sense from that in which it is taken in 1 2-16*a*. Apart from the consideration that all such methods are illegitimate, Syr. sin. is not the only document with which we have to deal. Long ago it was known that there was a mass of variants; only, no attention was paid to them. This is hardly to be wondered at when it is remembered that even Ti. in his editio critica major disposes of them all in two lines, partly with a mere 'similiter.' Long ago critical theology had insisted that the original text was this: 'and Joseph begat Jesus' (Ἰωσὴφ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν).[1]

(b) This original text was first actually discovered in the 'Dialogue of Timothy and Aquila' edited by Conybeare in Anecd. Oxon. Class. ser. 8, 1898, p. 76 (fol. 93 r of the Codex); cp pp. xix-xxii: Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus who is called Christ, and Joseph begat Jesus who is called Christ. (Ἰακὼβ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσήφ, τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός, καὶ Ἰωσὴφ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν).

This is expressly cited by Aquila the Jew as being the text of Mt.'s gospel, and as Timothy the Christian immediately afterwards declares that it does not escape his vigilance when the Jew seeks to conceal anything, we are bound to assume with Conybeare that the text as given above actually stood in the author's gospel according to Mt. Conybeare goes farther and maintains this to have been the basis from which all existing readings started. The canonical text arose by omission of the second half, the other variants by omission of the first half and alteration of the second (see below, § 14). In the opinion of the present writer an altogether different construction ought to be put upon the facts. How can we suppose that an evangelist deliberately added the second half to the first? Why say twice over that Jesus had been begotten? Why twice over call him 'who is called Christ' (ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός)? Why say 'and' (καί) before 'Joseph,' when what follows is something not additional but explicative? True, the Jew adds an explanation of this double statement of the same fact: φησὶν ἐγέννησεν ἐκ τῆς Μαρίας—i.e., by the word 'begat' the evangelist means 'of Mary.' By this, however, is explained not the addition of the second half to the first, but rather the insertion of the words 'of whom was born, etc.' (ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός),—as Conybeare also (p. xxi) has quite clearly perceived: 'in order to make it clear that it was out of Mary and not out of any previous wife that Joseph begat Jesus.' But was the idea of a previous wife really so very likely to suggest itself (cp § 21 c)? And if it required to be set aside was such an elaboration necessary?

In a word, in the view of the present writer, the Mt. used by the author of the dialogue contained not one text of Mt. 1 16*b* but two, of which one may have been supplemented out of a second copy. And, in fact, it is precisely the youngest text and the oldest which in this manner have found a place peaceably side by side in one and the same line.

Let us now attempt to arrange the existing forms of the text in the order in which they may be supposed to have arisen out of one another in logical sequence,[1] irrespective of the question as to whether they belonged to a form of Mt. or to a source of Mt.

14. Genealogy of text of Mt. 1 16*b*.

a. And Joseph begat Jesus (Ἰωσὴφ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν). Dial., ut supr., 76, fol. 93 r. On the continuation (τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν), see col. 2961, n. 1.

b. Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary (cp below, f), who of her begat Jesus. Vat. MS of Diatess.[2]

c. And Joseph, to whom was espoused Mary the virgin, begat Jesus. Syr. sin. This form would be still more ancient without the addition 'the virgin,' yet this is wanting only under d α and f.

d. (Jacob autem genuit Joseph)

- α. cui desponsata [without erat] Maria genuit Jesum. Old Lat. q.
- β. ᾧ μνηστευθεῖσα παρθένος Μαριαμ ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν. Five MSS of the Ferrar group, 346, 788, with 543, 826,[3] 828,[3] (Gregory) = 556, 624,[3] 626[3] respectively (Scrivener), and Old Lat. a, g^1, k.
- γ. to whom was espoused the virgin Mary, who (fem.) begat Jesus. Syr. cur.
- δ. cui desponsata [without erat] virgo Maria, Maria autem genuit Jesum. Old Lat. c.
- ε. cui desponsata erat virgo Maria, virgo autem Maria genuit Jesum. Old Lat. b.

In d α β by the participial construction with μνηστευθεῖσα, in d γ by the relative pronoun, in d δ ε by the repetition of her name, Mary is made the subject of ἐγέννησεν or genuit. As these verbs may indeed be used in speaking of a woman, but strictly speaking are applicable to a man, two corrections arose.

e. (Jacob autem genuit Joseph) cui desponsata virgo Maria peperit (Christum) Jesum. Old Lat. d.

ᾧ μνηστευθεῖσα Μαρία, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς. Dial., ut supr., 76, fol. 93 v. (Modified from d α, hence μνηστευθεῖσα for ἐμνηστεύθη).
- β. (Ἰακὼβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσὴφ) τὸν μνηστευσάμενον Μαριαμ ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη ὁ Χριστὸς (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ). Dial., ut supr., 88, fol. 113 r.

of 'betrothed' (ἐμνηστευμένην), in the mistaken presupposition that ἐμνηστευμένη ought to be read in 2 5 and here—consequently also in 1 27—means 'wife.'

[1] Whether or not there were added the words 'who is called Christ' (τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν) or some such addition is comparatively unimportant, and we therefore leave this difference out of account both here and in what follows.

[2] According to Hogg (cited in col. 1779, n. 4), this is the only possible translation of the Arabic text (as 'who' is masculine), but since Syriac, from which language this Arabic version was made, does not distinguish gender in the relative pronoun, the meaning may also be: of whom (fem.) was born Jesus (unvocalised WLD = 'begat' or 'was born'). This would be the canonical form. Even in this case, however, it would be remarkable that the Arabic translator [or scribe?] should not have shrunk from writing a word which diverged from the accepted meaning so markedly.

botching due to a reviser of the dialogue' in the period previous to the definitive fixation of the text, in order to avoid the 'husband' (ἄνδρα), which he found offensive. We must explain the word in the same way as the 'husband' (ἀνήρ) of 1 19 in § 11.

Epiphanius (Hær. 30 14) tells us that Cerinthus and Carpocrates endeavoured to prove from the genealogy in Mt.'s gospel that Christ was of the seed of Joseph and Mary (ἐκ σπέρματος Ἰωσὴφ καὶ Μαρίας εἶναι τὸν Χριστόν). According to Eusebius (HE 6 17) the Ebionite Symmachus in his writings seems to rest upon Mt.'s gospel his heresy that Christ came of Joseph and Mary (τὸν Χριστὸν ἐξ Ἰωσὴφ καὶ Μαρίας γεγονέναι). Eusebius uses the expression 'seems' (δοκεῖ) manifestly because he had not himself seen the writings in question; he mentions Origen as stating that he had received them for a certain Juliana. All these indications serve to confirm the conclusion we have reached, that Mt. 1 16*b* originally described Joseph as the actual father of Jesus.

15. Ebionitic alteration of Mt. 1 16?

At the same time it is open to anyone to attempt to draw from these very indications an argument against the originality of this reading. Those who maintain the view in question are Ebionites. What if it was they who first introduced the reading into the text of Mt. by falsification? It is possible to think in this manner as long as we refrain from considering seriously who the Ebionites were. The Church fathers describe them as a 'sect,' and with the word 'sect' we traditionally associate the idea of that which is erroneous and objectionable. Just as we have already long ago learned, however, to recognise as regards the Montanists that they merely adhered to the original arrangements of the Christian Church, and in particular to that in virtue of which every member had the right to speak who could claim to be moved by the Spirit, and that they were unable to acquiesce in the innovation which reserved this right exclusively to certain Church officials, so also we shall have to recognise with regard to the Ebionites that they merely represent the continuation of one of the earliest tendencies of Christianity. Before the end of the second century no one ever heard of the Ebionites as a sect, for the simple reason that they still represented a party or tendency within the Church itself. Even Justin (Dial. 48, end) says: There are of our number some who admit that he is Christ but declare that he was a man born of men (εἰσί τινες ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡμετέρου γένους ὁμολογοῦντες αὐτὸν Χριστὸν εἶναι, ἄνθρωπον δὲ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων γενόμενον ἀποφαινόμενοι). What occasion, we may ask, moreover, could have led in the second century to the rise of new opinions such as theirs, if the Church had never taught anything else than the Godhead of Jesus, and that, too, in the most thorough-going manner?

As soon as we have satisfied ourselves, however, how gradually and step by step the Church arrived at the doctrine of the Godhead of Jesus, and in particular how neither Jesus, nor his mother, nor Mark, nor the author of Mt. 3-28 or of Lk. 3-24, nor yet the authors of Lk. 2 or of 1 5-33 36-80 or of Mt. 1 1-17 or of chap. 2 were acquainted with the virgin birth, it were indeed too absurd an anachronism to attribute to falsification by a sect the fact that in Mt. 1 16 Joseph figures as the father of Jesus; or shall we say that the Ebionites with their falsifications are responsible also for the 'parents' (γονεῖς) of Lk. 2 27 41 43 or for 2 33 48 and for Mk. 3 21 33 Mt. 12 48, etc., as we now find them in our canonical text?

Rather must it be our task to explain how it was that the old view preserved by the Ebionites came to be given up and the doctrine of the virgin birth put in its place. See, as to this, NATIVITY, §§ 12, 14 f., 17, 20. Paul being unacquainted with the doctrine, scholars long reckoned it to be Jewish-Christian. That, however, was a mistake.

16. Origin of theory of virgin birth.

However freely the OT may speak of sons of God in the figurative sense (cp SON, FATHER), the loftiness of the OT conception of God precludes the supposition of physical sonship. In point of fact, in the NT it is not God who is represented as the father of Jesus, but the Holy Ghost. This representation, however, is merely an expedient, for we have no analogous instance in which the Holy Spirit is said to beget a man in a supernatural way.[1] And, in fact, the proposed expedient is not Jewish Christian, for in Hebrew the Spirit is generally feminine, on which account he appears in the Gospel of the Hebrews as the mother of Jesus (GOSPELS, § 155). Nor would Is. 7 14 have been sufficient to account for the origin of such a doctrine unless the doctrine had commended itself on its own merits. The passage was adduced only as an afterthought, in confirmation. Moreover, it is fitted to serve the purpose at all only in the LXX, and the rendering 'virgin' (παρθένος) must be rejected all the more because pregnancy before marriage is punishable with death according to Dt. 22 20 f. 23 f., a law which certainly is not later than Isaiah's time (cp, further, IMMANUEL). Thus the origin of the idea of a virgin birth is to be sought in Gentile-Christian circles. For numerous analogies see Usener, Rel.-gesch. Unters. 1 (1889) 70-75; Seydel, Evang. von Jesu, 1882, pp. 110-133; J. M. Robertson, Christianity and Mythology, 1900, pp. 317-319, and passim (the last-named author rejects the historicity of Jesus altogether).

Whilst, however, it was to be expected that the Church's worship would naturally lead onwards on an ascending line from the general idea that as Messiah Jesus must have been the son of David to the genealogies, and from the general idea that he was in an ethical sense the son of God, and belief in his having been filled with the Holy Spirit at his baptism to the idea of the supernatural birth, next to that of his pre-existence, and lastly to his identification with the Logos, we have seen that pre-existence (from Paul onwards) and possibly identity with the Logos (§ 10) were attributed to him earlier than a supernatural birth. Both together are first met with in Justin (see below, § 17 a) and Ignatius (ad Magn. 6 1 8 2; ad Eph. 7 2; ad Smyr. 1 1, etc.); the NT writers have, all of them, still the correct consciousness that the two theories are incompatible. He who has already lived the life of a divine being in heaven does not need to be ushered into the world in any such manner. To state the point more precisely: the theory of the virgin birth and the theory of the pre-existence must be regarded as attempts on parallel lines; the virgin birth, however, does not raise Jesus so high in the sphere of the divine as the pre-existence does. As, nevertheless, the theory of the virgin birth came into being at a later date, it must have arisen within circles to which the idea of the pre-existence was unknown, or to which (for it could not always remain unknown) it was not acceptable, that is to say in circles which were not affected with Paulinism. Here once more, as formerly in the case of the Council of Jerusalem (COUNCIL, § 12), we arrive at a point where we can clearly perceive the number of tendencies in early Christianity to have been greater than the Tübingen school once believed. Amongst Gentile influences, those of Buddhism must also be taken into account as possible (GOSPELS, § 124 d).

The Church assigns the highest value to the doctrine of the virgin birth. (a) Why it did so may be best seen, perhaps, in Justin. He declares, for example (Apol. 1 54 or Dial. 70), that the myths regarding the multitude of sons of gods, and especially the myth regarding the virgin's son Perseus, had been invented by the demons in order to rob the manifestation of Jesus the true Son of God of its importance. In Apol. 1 21 he insists that with their doctrine of the virgin birth of Jesus, of his passion, and of his ascension, the Christians were affirming nothing new as compared with what was alleged of so-called sons of Zeus, just as in Apol. 1 22 he says that if the Christians called Jesus the Logos, here, too, was another point which they had in common with the Gentiles who also called Hermes the word of Zeus. Such arguments may have impressed many people who heard them at that time; but they also show to what a level Jesus can be (not raised but) lowered by the doctrine of his virgin birth.

17. Value of theory of the virgin birth.

(b) A value for the doctrine was sought in quite another direction when it was connected with the sinlessness of Jesus. In a general way it is possible that, even at an early date, satisfaction may have been found in some such contemplation as that adduced from Philo elsewhere (GOSPELS, § 21, ii.[1]). In this connection there was present also the notion, found also in Rev. 14 4, that sexual intercourse is in itself sinful. But it was not until the doctrine of original sin had been fully developed that the theory of the virgin birth became important with regard to Jesus. It was not enough, however, that a human father should have no part in his generation; for sin could also be transmitted through his mother. The only logical consequence of this line of thought is that which appears in the dogma promulgated by Pope Pius IX. on 8th Dec. 1854 to the effect that Mary herself was conceived immaculately by her mother—not, of course, in the sense that she had no human father, but in the sense that original sin did not pass over to her, or rather, to be more precise, in the sense that the Holy Ghost at the moment after conception forthwith cleansed the resultant embryo from its original sin. Nevertheless, in the Roman doctrine, the body of Mary did bear the stain of original sin, however short the period. Cp Hase, Polemik, ii. 3 B, (4), 331-341.

[1] Not even in Job 33 4. Cp the exhaustive survey of Briggs in JBL, 1900, pp. 132-145.

[1] Reference may perhaps also be made to the passage in the Neuentdeckte Fragmente, ed. Wendland, p. 68, quoted (Acad.

The other points in the narrative of the birth of Jesus, in so far as they relate to Mary, must now be briefly considered.

18. Other points in the birth-history.

(a) If we may venture upon any affirmation at all as to the place of the birth,[1] it must be that it was at Nazareth (NATIVITY, § 11 f.; GALILEE i., § 5), which, according to Lk. 2_{39}, was for the parents of Jesus 'their own city' (πόλις ἑαυτῶν). In Lk.'s narrative they are brought to Bethlehem only by means of the narrative about the census of Quirinius (2_{1-5}), which in every point is untenable (see QUIRINIUS; CHRONOLOGY, § 59 f.; NATIVITY, § 10; GOSPELS, § 22, col. 1780, n. 2). (b) As to the day, see NATIVITY, § 10, end. (c) If Bethlehem was not the birthplace, essential motives in the stories of the wise men and the flight into Egypt (Mt. 2_{1-15} $_{19-23}$) fall away. Even apart from their connection with Bethlehem, however, their historicity is open to the gravest doubts (NATIVITY, § 18 f.; GOSPELS, §§ 22, and 151, end). The passage (Hos. 11_{1}) cited in Mt. 2_{15} has reference to the exodus of Israel (LXX rightly, τὰ τέκνα αὐτοῦ, not τὸν υἱόν μου) from Egypt under the leadership of Moses. (d) The presentation of the new-born son in the temple (Lk. 2_{22-24}) is nowhere enjoined in OT (GOSPELS, § 124 d). This affects what we read regarding Simeon and Anna (Lk. 2_{25-38}). (e) So much having already been shown to be untenable it will perhaps be the more readily conceded that the story of the shepherds (Lk. 2_{8-20}), though one of great poetic beauty, cannot be regarded as historical. (f) Mary's journey to Elizabeth, her salutation by the latter, and the leaping of the unborn babe in his mother's womb (1_{39-45} $_{56}$) belong to the same category, and are, moreover, irreconcilable with Mk. 3_{20} f. (see § 4). (g) The Magnificat (Lk. 1_{46-55}) has absolutely no relation to the situation of Mary; but even as regards Elizabeth, to whom in accordance with the 'noteworthy rejected reading' of WH it has recently been again assigned by Völter, Harnack (see below, § 22), and Conrady (see § 21, begin.), it can at best be said to be somewhat more appropriate so far as 1_{48} is concerned, though on the other hand 1_{51-55} are quite as unsuitable to her case as to that of Mary. Hillmann (whose contribution to our present question is of primary importance throughout) has rightly perceived here also (JPT, 1891, pp. 197-206) that the song fits best the case of a Jewish mother whose son has returned from successful war for his country. Yet Hilgenfeld's suggestion (ZWT, 1901, pp. 205-215) also deserves to be considered,—that 'Judith' (6_{19} 8_{32} 9_{3} 15_{6}, etc.) is the model (of Hannah's song [1 S. 2_{1-10}], the Magnificat in reality has but few echoes), and that the warlike deeds in the poem ought thus to be attributed to the singer herself in so far as she personifies the Jewish people.

In close association with the birth-narrative we have (a) that of the finding of the boy Jesus in the temple.

19. Other incidents in life of Mary.

Although containing nothing inherently impossible, the story very readily suggests the conjecture that it too may owe its origin to pious legend. The astonishment manifested at the appearance of Jesus in the synagogue of his native town (Mk. 6_{2} f. = Mt. 13_{54-57} = Lk. 4_{22}) would be very remarkable if the incident of his twelfth year had been known. (b) It is thoroughly credible on the other hand that Mary, after the birth of her first-born son (Lk. 2_{7}), became the mother of other sons and daughters (CLOPAS, §§ 3-5). (c) The only other absolutely authentic scene in Mary's life is that recorded in Mk. 3_{20} f. $_{31-35}$, with regard to which see above (§ 3 f.) (d) If, as we see from this, she failed to recognise Jesus as the Messiah when in the heyday of his activity, it still remains a possibility that she did so soon after his death, as we are expressly informed (1 Cor. 15_{7}) her son James did. Much less confidence is to be placed in the statement of Acts 1_{14} that before the first feast of Pentecost Mary was already present in Jerusalem. Acts is entirely dominated by the idea that the primitive Church consolidated itself in Jerusalem immediately after the death of Jesus. This hangs together with the representation of Lk. that the apostles remained in Jerusalem after the death of Jesus and there beheld their risen Lord. In reality, however, the first appearances were in Galilee (GOSPELS, § 138 a). This being so, there is little likelihood that the disciples and adherents of Jesus would forthwith have left house and home and betaken themselves to the capital where the danger of persecution was so great. (e) What is related in Jn. 19_{25-27} about Mary at the cross being committed to the care of John the son of Zebedee is utterly irreconcilable with the synoptic parallels set forth under CLOPAS (§ 2), as also with the fact that Mk. (15_{34}) and Mt. (27_{46}) know only one saying of Jesus spoken from the cross. In Rev. 12_{1} f. $_{5}$ f., in accordance with OT ways of thinking, the Church figures as mother of the Messiah. The narrative in Jn. is thus an expression, as beautiful as it is transparent, of the thought that the departing Messiah committed to the beloved disciple the care of his Church. It is of course true that no similar allegorical meaning can be given to the presence of the other women at the foot of the cross (CLOPAS, § 2, end). If it is deemed necessary on this account to set aside the possibility of allegory in the case of the mother of Jesus, we shall have to assume that the intention of the author was to exhibit in a beautiful light the concern of Jesus for his earthly mother. Such concern, however, was unnecessary; for Mary had other surviving sons (Acts 1_{14})—among them James, the future head of the Church in Jerusalem. (f) The miracle of the wine at Cana is shown at once to be unhistorical by the express statement that Jesus definitely refused to work 'signs' (σημεῖα) such as this is expressly called in Jn. 2_{11} (GOSPELS, § 140 a). On the symbolical meaning of the narrative, and the part taken in it by the mother of Jesus, see GOSPELS, § 54 a; JOHN, § 35 e.

(g) Along with this narrative must also be given up the notice in Jn. 2_{12} that Jesus removed along with his mother, his brethren, and his disciples, from Cana to Capernaum. (h) There remains, lastly, the indirect mention of the mother of Jesus by the woman whose words are given in Lk. 11_{27}. The answer of Jesus in 11_{28} is a counterpart to that which he gave when his mother held him to be beside himself (Mk. 3_{34} f. and parallels).

If any attempt is to be made to sum up in a few words the character of Mary, it is obvious in the first place that we must set aside from the outset any traits, however beautiful, which are discovered only in passages ascertained to be legendary. Even within NT times legend was busily occupied in glorifying the mother of Jesus. By way of compensation, however, we are, on the other hand, absolved from any obligation to decide on the question whether the words of Jesus in Jn. 2 4, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee'? in any way go beyond the limits of filial piety. We are on firm ground only as regards what we read in Mk. 3 20 f. 31-35, from which passage we learn at least this: that, at a time when many had already come to recognise the greatness of her son's mission, Mary, at all events, had still failed to understand it; and we hardly need his own blunt word 'Who is my mother?' in order to feel how deeply this must have grieved him. Indeed, it is impossible, however much we may desire it, to think otherwise than that, if he had the feeling of homelessness, the responsibility for this must in a great measure lie with her.

20. Character of Mary.

June 29, 1895, p. 547) by Conybeare, who finds it very significant.

[1] [For a consideration of the question of the birthplace of Jesus from another point of view, see NAZARETH.—ED.]

This once said, it by no means follows that none of Jesus' utterances had any attraction at all for his mother. It still remains conceivable that what repelled her and suggested to her the suspicion of mental disorder was not so much the substance of his teaching as his appearance in public, his rôle of teacher, his air of authority and the risk of persecution involved in this, or else the unsettled life, the association with questionable people, the carelessness with regard to daily bread. It is nevertheless possible, however, that Mary resolutely closed her mind also against all that was new in his teaching. Yet, even on this last assumption, we are not precluded from supposing that, although confined within the ancient forms, her piety was nevertheless deep and genuine, and exercised an effective influence upon her child. In proportion as this simple woman, sprung from the people, above all in Galilee, may be supposed to have been untouched by any of the evil aspects of the Pharisaism of the day, it becomes the easier to believe that her religion, with all its intense conservatism, may have been genuine and pure. From some source or other we must believe Jesus to have derived alike that holy severity and that triumphant joyousness of a deep faith in God which, in the end, made him great; and however large the share of this which we must attribute to his own spiritual personality we still find it necessary to seek for it some source within his immediate surroundings.

21. Later traditions.

Of the extra-canonical accounts of Mary (a) the most important would be the Protevangelium Jacobi (APOCRYPHA, § 27, 1; NATIVITY, § 6) if Conrady (Quelle der kanonischen Kindheitsgeschichte, 1900; cp St.Kr., 1889, 728-784) were right in his assertion that it was written in Hebrew in Hadrian's time and that it constitutes the sole source of Mt. 1 f. and Lk. 1 f. This, however, is a view which cannot be maintained. According to Harnack (ACL ii. [= Chronologie] 1 598-603) it dates from the end of the second, or even from the beginning of the third, century.[1]

In the Protevangelium it is related how Anna, the wife of Joachim, after long barrenness received the promise of a child. From her third to her twelfth year her child (Mary) is reared in the temple, and then she is handed over to the protection of an aged widower and father of several sons, Joseph, after a white dove has flown out of his staff and thereby indicated him out of many others as the proper guardian. During an absence of Joseph from home an angel announces to her in the words of Lk. 1 35 the birth of Jesus. On his return Joseph finds her pregnant, and is minded to put her away secretly from his house, but is enlightened by an angel in the words of Mt. 1 20. Brought before the high-priestly council, both purge themselves of the charge of immoral intercourse by drinking, unharmed, of the water of jealousy (Nu. 5 11-31). On account of the census decreed by Augustus they set out for Bethlehem. On the way Mary brings forth Jesus in a cave which is lighted by a miraculous light. A woman who arrives, Salome by name, satisfies herself by tactual examination that Mary is still a virgin. The hand of Salome is burned, but is healed when it touches the child. And so forth. That Mary brought forth Jesus utero clauso is stated also in the latest interpolation in the Ascensio Isaiæ (11 9), which Harnack (573-579) assigns to a period before the middle of the third century (Charles, however, Asc. Isa. xxii., xlv., thinks that the whole of the 'very important passage 11 2-22' is derived 'from the archetype G,' which he regards as 'belonging to the close of the first century').

[1] The coincidences with Justin pointed out by Zahn (Gesch. d. NTlichen Kanons, 1 485 499 502 504 539; cp 2 774-780) are easily accounted for, some of them by the existence of oral tradition, others by the priority of Justin. The cave mentioned by Justin, in agreement with the Protevangelium, but inconsistently with Lk. 2 7 16, is even (in Dial. 78), inconsistently with what is said in the Protevangelium (below, § 21 a), selected only after it has been found that no other lodging is obtainable in Bethlehem. Still less weight ought to be given to Zahn's assertion that on account of its priority to the Thomæ evangelium the Protevangelium must be assigned to the beginning of the second century. See Harnack, 593-595.

(b) Other writings relating to Mary are the Evang. Pseudo-Matthæi (= de ortu beatæ Mariæ et infantia salvatoris), and the Evangelium de nativitate Mariæ, both in the main further decorations of what is contained in Protev. Jac. The gnostics possessed a γέννα Μαρίας, Great Questions of Mary, and Little Questions of Mary, on which see Epiphan. Hær. 26 8 12. Regarding an Evang. Mariæ (= apocryphum Johannis) found in a Coptic translation, Carl Schmidt (SBAW, 1896, 839-847) reports that it is the same gnostic writing as was used—but in a very unsatisfactory manner—by Irenæus (1 27-29 [= 29-31]). The latest stratum of the Ignatian literature (5th cent.) contains a Latin letter of Ignatius to Mary in a few lines as also an equally brief answer by Mary. The most important writing still remaining to be mentioned is Ἰωάννου τοῦ θεολόγου λόγος εἰς τὴν κοίμησιν τῆς θεοτόκου and two different Latin adaptations of it under the title Transitus Mariæ. The apostles, in the second year after the death of Jesus, are miraculously brought, some of them on clouds, from the distant lands where they are carrying on their missions, to the deathbed of Mary. She is buried in Gethsemane. Three days later her body is no longer to be found, only a sweet odour. In some recensions her assumption, here hinted at, is directly stated. Moreover, she receives from Christ immediately before her death the assurance 'whosoever invokes thy name shall not be put to shame.'[1] Other traditions (in Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-Gesch. 1 13) specify the eleventh, fifteenth, twenty-second, or twenty-fourth year instead of the second after Jesus' death. According to Ephesian tradition (Lipsius, 448) Mary followed the apostle John to Ephesus. According to the Acts of Prochorus (first half of 5th cent.), on the other hand, when the other apostles dispersed on their various missions John remained at Jerusalem with Mary until her death (Lipsius, 366 f. 406 f.).

(c) In the church fathers the most important stages are as follows. None of Justin's predecessors makes mention of Mary at all, and even by Justin (see above, § 17 a) she is mentioned, not on account of herself, but simply in connection with the birth of Jesus. So also with Ignatius (see above, § 16) and Irenæus, with special reference to the Docetæ. At the same time, however, Irenæus (iii. 32 1 [= 22 4], end) ascribes to her obedience, a redeeming power from the effects of the disobedience of Eve; so also Tertullian (de carne Christi, 17): 'quod illa credendo' (i.e., by believing the word of the serpent) 'deliquit, hæc credendo delevit.' Irenæus means the same thing when he says (v. 19 1): 'si ea (Eva) inobediret deo, sed et hæc suasa est obedire deo, ut virginis Evæ virgo Maria fieret advocata'; the last word, therefore, is not intended to designate her as intercessor. For the rest, the whole of this antithesis between Eve and Mary, which is found also in Justin (Dial. 100), is certainly intended to be taken rhetorically rather than in all dogmatic seriousness. Tertullian (de carne Christi, 20) declares against the birth utero clauso, stating his physiological reasons with vigour. On the other hand, Clem.Alex. (Strom. vii. 16 93 end, p. 889 end; Potter) attaches value to the fact that, as we are informed by some, Mary was found still a virgin after she had been delivered. Origen[2] declares the 'brethren of Jesus' to have been sons of Joseph by a former marriage. Whilst Chrysostom allows the human features of Mary to come into view, Augustine declares her to have been free from actual sin and employs the false reading of Vg. in Gen. 3 15 'ipsa [for ipse] conteret caput tuum' to prove her the devil's conqueror. With the introduction of the designation θεοτόκος for Mary, as against Nestorius who wished to designate her as Χριστοτόκος only, may be said to begin an endless Mariology which need not be pursued further here. See Benrath (below, § 22).

(d) According to the Talmud[3] and according to Celsus[4] Jesus was the child of the adulterous intercourse of Mary with a soldier Stada or Pandera (Πάνθηρ, Πανθήρας). 23. Mother of James.

2. Mary, the mother of James (the Less) and of Joses appears among the women at the cross in Mt. 27 56 Mk. 15 40 and, under the shorter designation, 'Mary of Joses,' in Mk. 15 47, or, 'the other Mary' (with Mary Magdalene) Mt. 27 61, as observing the burial place of Jesus; as 'Mary of James' in Mk. 16 1 Lk. 24 10 or 'the other Mary,' in Mt. 28 1, she beholds the empty grave. In Syr. Sin. she is always called 'daughter of James' (Mk. 15 40: James the Less); in Mt. and Mk. besides, 'Mother of Joseph.' As to the historical character of the events of the resurrection day see GOSPELS, § 138 e, f. As has been shown under CLOPAS, this Mary's sons were neither 'brethren of Jesus' nor apostles, and she herself is known only as mother of her sons, unless, indeed, she be identical with

24. Mary of Clopas.

3. Mary of Clopas.—This Mary who appears in Jn. 19 25 at the foot of the cross is not to be identified with the sister of the mother of Jesus mentioned immediately before in that passage, nor with the mother of the sons of Zebedee, mentioned in the like situation in Mt. 27 56, who, according to Mk. 15 40, is Salome (CLOPAS, § 2). All the more certainly, therefore, does she appear to be identical with the only remaining one of the women at the cross—Mary the mother of James (the Less) and Joses (see above, § 23). This identification, however, can be carried out only if we may regard Clopas as a person otherwise unknown. In that case, Jn. would be recording the name—not given by the synoptists—of the father or grandfather of James (the Less) and Joses (according as we take Mary to be the wife or, what accords better with linguistic use, as the daughter of Clopas). It is much more likely, however, that Clopas is the brother of Joseph and thus the uncle of Jesus (cp CLOPAS, § 3 f.); in which case Mary also, whether she was the wife or the daughter of Clopas, was a near relation of Jesus. As the synoptists, however, do not speak of the mother of James and Joses as being a kinswoman of Jesus, it must be doubted whether Jn. was correct if he sought to identify the two (Mary of Clopas and the mother of James and Joses). Perhaps he was following another tradition here also, as well as when he named the mother of Jesus and her sister (CLOPAS, §§ 2-5) as witnesses of the crucifixion. If so, Mary of Clopas is known to us only from Jn. 19 25.

25. Sister of Martha.

4. Mary, sister of Martha, appears in Lk. 10 38-42 as the eager listener at the feet of Jesus, in Jn. 11 as the sister of Lazarus. As the raising of Lazarus cannot be regarded as history (JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, §§ 20 a, 35 b, 37 a; cp LAZARUS) what is stated regarding Mary in that narrative must also be set aside. The statement that Bethany was her home is also contrary to the representation of Lk., who assumes (9 52 13 22 17 11) that this is to be sought in Samaria. As, however, Lk.'s account of the Samaritan journey is untrustworthy throughout (GOSPELS, § 133 a), one might be inclined in this point to give the preference to Jn. In this evangelist, however, the naming of Bethany rests upon the fact that he identified (12 1-8) Mary with the woman who, according to Mk. 14 3-9 Mt. 26 6-13 anoints Jesus in Bethany. He does not name the house of Simon the leper; but he clearly shows that he has in mind the same scene as Mk. and Mt. when he designates Lazarus, not as the master of the house, but only as one of the guests. Nevertheless, it might still be conceivable that Jn. had correctly supplemented Mk. and Mt., were we not precluded from this supposition by the fact that he combines their narrative also with that of the sinful woman of Lk. 7 36-50, in so far as he represents her as anointing not Jesus' head but feet and wiping them with the hair of her head.[1] Furthermore, Jn. says very infelicitously that Mary wiped the ointment from Jesus' feet, whereas the only fitting version is that of Lk. 7 38, which says that she anointed the feet of Jesus after having wiped from them her tears. Even if it be assumed, therefore, that the same event underlies the narrative of Lk. as underlies those of Mk. and Mt.—and the point does not require to be discussed here; see GOSPELS, § 10—the two forms of the narrative, as they now run, differ fundamentally as to time, place, purpose, and details of the anointing. If, then, we are compelled to recognise that the narrative of Jn. is composed of portions that cannot be united, it becomes impossible for us to be certain on the one point that the woman who anointed was Mary, and thus that her home was Bethany. Possibly, even before the evangelist's time, some one may have formed the conjecture that the unnamed woman in Bethany, who wrought so significant a work upon Jesus, and received from him such high commendation, may have been no other than this most prominent of his female disciples; but this does not establish the fact (cp JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 35 a g). Legend has it that in consequence of the persecution mentioned in Acts 8 1 Mary (with Martha and Lazarus) removed to Provence, where she lies buried at St. Baume. See MARTHA.

26. Mary Magdalene.

5. Mary Magdalene appears at the cross and at the grave of Jesus in all the passages where we find the mother of James and Joses (see above, § 23), also in the parallel Jn. 19 25 and 20 1, where, however, she goes to the grave alone. There Jesus appears to her (20 11-18). This narrative goes a step farther than the already unhistorical account of the synoptics (GOSPELS, § 138 e f). In the later appendix to Mk. (16 9) there is a reminiscence of the Johannine account, and, at the same time, of Lk. 8 2. According to this last thoroughly credible passage Mary Magdalene belonged to the number of those women who accompanied Jesus and ministered to him. As for the seven devils which had been exorcised from her see GOSPELS (§ 144 end). Her designation 'Magdalene' implies Magdala as her place of origin. See MAGDALA.

As Magdala in Mt. 15 39 (for Magadan) and still more in Mk. 8 10 (for Dalmanutha) is read only by inferior MSS, and as no such place is named anywhere else in the NT, Lagarde (GGN, 1889, pp. 371-375) hazarded the conjecture that the second name was derived not from a place but from a misunderstanding of the Aramaic magd^e lānyā = braider of hair (from the participle magd^e lā = a braider [fem.]). In the Talmud (see above, § 21 d) the designation is applied to the mother of Jesus. This might be due to a confusion of persons. Lagarde's hypothesis must, however, be set aside, being neither probable nor necessary. Even if no Magdala is found in the NT there are many places in Palestine which derive their name from a tower (migdal).

[1] Assuredly Jn. thinks of Mary much too highly to intend that she should personally be identified with the sinner. Strictly, it is true, he appears to do this in 11 2 which reads, 'Mary was the woman who anointed,' etc. Such a woman had up to this point nowhere been mentioned in any of the gospel histories apart from Lk. 7 36-50. There need, however, be no difficulty in believing—in the case of an author who says in 3 22, and denies in 4 2, that Jesus baptized—that in 11 2 Jn. intends to refer to an event which was chronologically later and which he himself does not describe till chap. 12 is reached. Jn. means, accordingly, not 'the woman who had anointed the Lord on an occasion previous to the time with which I am now dealing,' but 'the woman who is known to have once upon a time anointed him.' It would not have been in keeping with the tone of his gospel to have said (as would have been correct) 'concerning whom I shall presently have to describe how she anointed the Lord.' It should be added that Naber, Mnemosyne, 1881, p. 287, maintains Jn. 11 2*a* (ἦν to αὐτῆς) to be a gloss.

The identification of Mary Magdalene with the sinner of Lk. 7 36-50 cannot be called felicitous. Its sole foundation lies in the circumstance that the name of Mary Magdalene occurs soon after the mention of the nameless woman. The penitent Magdalene has a large place in art, but in history none whatever. Even less happy, however, is the identification of Mary Magdalene with the sister of Martha. It is simply due to the identification of both with the sinner in Lk. It is in this way that, for example, Kaulen[1] weaves the whole romance of her life. She had been the handmaid of sin in Galilee, had repented and received forgiveness from Jesus, and thenceforward had ministered to him; in Bethany, whither she had betaken herself from Galilee, she anointed him a second time, and she was the first to see him after his resurrection.

27. Mother of Mark.

6. Mary, mother of Mark, according to the only passage (Acts 12 12) in which she is named, possessed a house in Jerusalem which served as a meeting-place for the early Christians. From this it would seem that she had a distinguished place in the church there. Evidently her husband was no longer alive, otherwise he would have been named as master of the house. Since the fourth century the scene of the Last Supper, of the meeting on the evening of Christ's Ascension, and of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost has been laid in the house of Mary (Mk. 14 14 Acts 1 13 2 2; cp Zahn, Einl., § 51 7).

28. Mary of Rom. 16 6.

7. A woman named Mary is greeted by Paul in Rom. 16 6. According to the readings 'on you' (εἰς ὑμᾶς) (ℵABC*) or 'among you' (ἐν ὑμῖν) (DG) she laboured much in the interests of her companions; the reading 'on us' (εἰς ἡμᾶς) of C²L Chrys. suggests that she laboured equally in the interests of Paul. To judge by her name she was by birth a Jewess. We are not precluded from this inference by the mere fact that after her name we do not find an addition similar to that which we find in 16 7 11 21 ('my kinsmen'), by which, on account of the largeness of their number, we ought in all probability to understand Jews merely, not actual blood relations of the apostle. In the case of Aquila and Prisca also (16 3, cp Acts 18 2) this addition is wanting, because Paul had something more special to say regarding them. According to a very probable conjecture Rom. 16 3-16 is a fragment of an epistle addressed to Ephesus. If Mary is to be looked for in Ephesus the reading 'on us' (εἰς ἡμᾶς) will mean that she had interested herself in the welfare of Paul during his three years' sojourn in that city (Acts 19 8 10 20 31). MASALOTH (μαισαλωθ [ℵV]), 1 Macc. 9 2 AV; RV MESALOTH. See ARBELA.

MASCHIL (מַשְׂכִּיל; συνεσεως or εις συνεσιν [BℵART]; Aq. ἐπιστήμονος, ἐπιστήμης, ἐπιστημοσύνης; Symm., Theod. σύνεσις; Tg. שכלא טבא [cp 2 Ch. 30 22]) is a term found in the headings of Pss. 32 42 44 (om. A but insert in 43) 45 (om. A) 52 (ψαλμός [R]) 53-55 74 78 88 (with שִׁיר and מִזְמוֹר) 89 142 (תְּפִלָּה follows); also 47 7 [8] (EV 'with understanding,' συνετῶς [BℵART]; Aq. Sext. ἐπιστημόνως; Jer. erudite).

To render the term 'didactic poem' (Ges.) is inconsistent with the subject-matter of most of the psalms to which it is prefixed; 32 and 78 alone would be suitably thus described. As a rule the participle Maśkīl is an attribute of persons; it is applied in 2 Ch. 30 22 to the Levitical musicians. Hence Grätz considers Maśkīl to be an epithet even in the psalm-headings; taking it with lam-mᵉnaṣṣēaḥ, למנצח, he renders 'To a skilled precentor'; his version of Ps. 47 7*b* [8*b*] is 'sing praise, ye that are skilled in song' (משכילים). This is at any rate more plausible than the rendering of RVmg. and of Wellhausen in SBOT, 'sing ye praises in a skilful song [psalm].' Cheyne (Psalms(2)), however, reads for משכיל in Ps. 47 7 [8] לְמַלְכֵּנוּ,[1] 'Sing ye praises to our king' (similar errors abound in the Hebrew Psalter), and regards משכיל (Maśkīl) in the headings referred to as an alternative to למנצח, and as, equally with this, a corruption of מְשֻׁכָּן, 'deposited.' See MUSICIAN [THE CHIEF].

It is worth noticing that in the titles of Ps. 44 45 54 55 88 משכיל is separated from למנצח by some intervening words, that in Pss. 54 55 משכיל לדוד is one of two rival headings, that in Ps. 88 משכיל להימן is one of three rival headings, and that in Ps. 32 𝔊B's heading συνέσεως τῷ Δαυειδ (משכיל לדוד) is more correct than MT's לדוד משכיל. MASH (מַשׁ; μοσοχ [AEL]; MES), an Aramaic people, mentioned together with Uz, Hul, and Gether, in Gen. 10 23, and also (as Ki. thinks) in 1 Ch. 1 17. See GEOGRAPHY, § 20, where Dillmann's view is adopted. Perhaps, however, 'Gether' should be 'Geshur'—i.e., GESHUR (2). 'Hul' is a fragment of 'Jerahmeel.' 'Uz' is explained elsewhere (see UZ). The 'Meshech' of 1 Ch. is probably more correct than 'Mash,' and like Shechem in Ps. 60 8, probably comes from Cusham (see CUSH, 2, CUSHAN, SHECHEM). T. K. C.

MASIAS (μεισαιας [B], μασιας [A]), a group of children of the 'servants of Solomon' (see NETHINIM) in the great post-exilic list (EZRA ii., §§ 9, 8*c*), one of eight inserted in 1 Esd. 5 34 (om. L, or ?=αμεει) after Pochereth-hazzebaim of ∥ Ezra 2 57 = Neh. 7 59. [In the light of the article SOLOMON'S SERVANTS, we can hardly help emending Masiah or Misaiah (see 𝔊B) into Ishma'eli (Ishmaelite). Cp. Amasa, Amasiah, Maaseiah. T. K. C.]

MASREKAH (מַשְׂרֵקָה; μασεκκα [ADEL], in Ch. 𝔊B om., 𝔊L μασερικα; Theod. in Gen. [εκ] μασσηφας), the home of the Edomite king SAMLAH (q.v.), Gen. 36 36 1 Ch. 1 47. The name should mean 'place of choice vines' (cp SOREK), but is probably corrupt, Samlah being probably a doublet of Šaul (m and v interchanged), and Šaul's city being Rehoboth, Masrekah very possibly comes from מִצֻּר רקם, Miṣṣur of Reḳem or Jeraḥme'el. T. K. C.

MASSA (מַשָּׂא; μασση [AEL]), a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25 14, μανασση [D]; 1 Ch. 1 30, μανασση [B], μασσα [L]). See ISHMAEL. For the Massa of Prov. 30 1 (RVmg.) and Prov. 31 1 (RVmg.) see AGUR and LEMUEL.

MASSAH AND MERIBAH (מַסָּה וּמְרִיבָה; 𝔊 generally translates πειρασμος or πειρα, etc., λοιδορησις, or αντιλογια or παραπικρασμος, etc.), a place in the wilderness of wanderings, the scene of a miracle (Ex. 17 7).

1. Ex. 17 and Nu. 20.

In its present position the episode stands wedged in between the sweetening of the waters of Marah, the giving of the Manna (Ex. 15 22-16), and the fight at Rephidim (17 8-16), where it is actually located by P (17 1). The position is not wholly fortuitous. The tradition relates that the bnē Israel, thirsty and murmuring, demand water. Moses is commanded to take with him [seventy ?] of the elders of Israel and to strike the rock in Horeb upon which Yahwè stands, and water shall come forth. This Moses does, and the place receives the above names, 'Temptation' (or 'Proving') and 'Chiding' (or 'strife'), because of the 'striving' (ריב) of the people, and because they 'tempted' (עַל־נַסֹּתָם) Yahwè.

Closely related to this is the tradition preserved in Nu. 20 1-13 (almost wholly P). The people are at Kadesh, and suffer from want of water. They 'strive' (וירב, v. 3*a*) and murmur against Yahwè. Moses and Aaron go to the tent of meeting where 'the glory of [1] The letters were disarranged, and נו mistaken for שׁ.

Yahwè'[1] appears unto them. They are bidden to speak to the rock (here mentioned for the first time). Moses addresses the Israelites as 'rebels' (הַמֹּרִים), strikes the rock twice, and water flows in abundance. Hence the name 'waters of Meribah' (v. 13) because of the 'striving of Israel.'[2]

2. Two distinct traditions. With the solitary exception of Ex. 17 7, the names Massah and Meribah never denote one place. They stand in parallelism in Ps. 95 8 (cp Dt. 33 8 Heb. 3 8), but, elsewhere, are mentioned separately (viz. Massah, Dt. 6 16 9 22, Meribah, Ps. 81 7 [8] 106 32). It is, therefore, highly probable that the two names are to be kept distinct, and that their fusion in Ex. 17 7 is due to editorial conflation of two sources.

The Meribah story is located at Kadesh (Nu. 20 1); note the fuller name MERIBATH-KADESH (מְרִיבַת קָדֵשׁ), Nu. 27 14 Dt. 32 51[3] Ezek. 48 28 (βαριμωθ καδης [BA], but μαρ. κ. [QΓ]), once MERIBOTH-KADESH, Ezek. 47 19 RV (μαριμωθ καδημ [B, but καδης AQ]), and the probable allusions to Kadesh in Nu. 20 12 f. (ויקדש להקדישני), Dt. 32 51 (קדשתם). The site of Massah is not clearly indicated (see Dt. 9 22). The context points to Horeb (Ex. 17 6, if not a gloss), or Rephidim (Ex. 17 1 8). For the view that the story of the manna, which Yahwè gave that he might prove (Ex. 16 4) Israel, belonged to Massah, see MANNA, § 3. It is not improbable that other episodes were connected with the name. In Ex. 15 25*b* Bacon find's E's account of the origin of the name Massah. The verse may be already conflate, the giving of a statute and ordinance may well refer to Ex. 20 (cp esp. v. 20: 'Elōhīm is come to prove [נסה] you'), the covenant traditionally placed at Horeb.[4]

3. Other references. From a critical consideration of the OT references to these names it would seem that they played a far more important part in the early traditional history of Israel than appears on the surface. If it is Israel who contended against Yahwè at Meribah (Ex. 17 7), and tempted him at Massah (ib. 3, 7), it is Yahwè on the other hand who proved them at the former place (Ps. 81 7 [8]), and tested them at the latter (Ex. 15 25 16 4).[5] With this tradition, where Yahwè is the subject, we must probably connect Dt. 33 8, where the two names are in some way connected with the earliest history of the Levites. The language is obscure; it is evident that the reference is creditable.

Further, it is not so easy to account for the tradition that Moses and Aaron sinned at Meribah and were prohibited from entering Canaan (Nu. 20 12). The tradition is elsewhere referred to by P (Nu. 20 24 27 14 Dt. 32 51), and a curious allusion is made to it in Ps. 106 33; nevertheless, so thoroughly has P abbreviated his older sources in Nu. 20 1-13, in his endeavour to soften the guilt of the leaders, that he has omitted to record its origin.

The whole story of Massah and Meribah forms one of the most complicated problems in JE's account of the Exodus. This account, as modern criticism has proved, passes from Ex. 34 to Nu. 10 29 ff., and, as has been elsewhere indicated, has suffered considerable adjustment (EXODUS i., § 5, JETHRO, n. 2, col. 2455). Moreover, it has been argued that underlying Ex. 32-34 is the account of a theophany and law-giving at KADESH [q.v. § 2].[6] One of the most striking incidents in it is the reluctance of Moses to take charge of the people, and a fragment of his speech seems to have found its way into Nu. 11 10*b*-15 (see Bacon, and Oxf. Hex., ad loc.). The reason for the adjustment may be easily guessed: a redactor found the words (originally, perhaps, as Bacon suggests, after Ex. 33 3 and before 33 12) so distasteful that he transferred them to a context where the expostulation of Moses (which really amounts to a renunciation of his responsibility) might appear more excusable. If now our view that Ex. 32-34 was originally placed at Kadesh (i.e., Meribah) be correct, it may be conjectured that it is to this 'babbling' that the difficult words of Ps. 106 33 (ויבטא, EV, 'and he spake unadvisedly') refer. It is noteworthy that the fragment (Nu. l.c.) has been transferred to a context which in all probability is to be connected with a 'Massah' tradition. Is it, moreover, a mere coincidence that an editor should have found the present context a convenient one for introducing E's account of the institution of the seventy elders to lighten Moses' burden (Nu. 11 16 f.), or that the judicial organisation which Jethro institutes in Ex. 18 should be placed immediately after the story of Massah and Meribah (Ex. 17)?

1 Perhaps originally 'Yahwè' alone.

2 Bacon, noting the command in v. 8*b* (speak to the rock), compared with v. 11 (Moses . . . smote the rock), finds traces of a double tradition (Triple Trad. of the Exodus, 196 f.).

3 Also Dt. 33 2 [3] (Ew., Di., Wellh., Dr., etc.).

4 It is also possible that the name JEHOVAH-NISSI given to the altar on the 'hill' at Rephidim was popularly associated with Massah.

5 For these references see end of § 2, and cp MANNA, § 3.

6 Cp the emended text of Dt. 33 2 '[Yahwè] came to Meribath-Kadesh.' Massah and Meribah, too, seem to have been noted for a theophany (Ex. 15 25 Nu. 20 6).

Granted that the sin of Moses (that Aaron was later included in the charge is only natural) lay in repudiating his responsibility, the antecedents of this act have yet to be ascertained. In the absence of direct evidence it must suffice to indicate what appear to be faint traces of traditions which may be associated with the episode. In the first place, since we can scarcely sever the old torso Ex. 32 25-29 from Ex. 32-34, we may conjecture that the oldest tradition placed the selection of the Levites[1] at Kadesh, and that allusion to this is made in Dt. 33 8 f., where the renunciation in v. 9 seems to be connected with the severance of family ties in Ex. 32 27. That the oldest tradition of the selection of the Levites had anything to say about the golden calf is improbable for several reasons. Taken in the light of Dt. 33 8 f., it seems more likely that the narrative (Ex. 32 25-29) recounted a contending on behalf of Yahwè, a separation of his worshippers from idolaters. What this may have been must naturally be the purest conjecture. It is possible, too, that the sending of the spies from Kadesh (Nu. 13) once belonged to this narrative; the promise to Caleb alone suggests a connection with the 'Levitical' tradition,[2] and, indeed, according to D's tradition, it was owing to the people's disobedience on this occasion that Moses incurred guilt (Dt. 1 37 cp Dr. Deut. 27). But the absence of the name of Moses (and of Aaron) seems to imply that the order prohibiting them from entering the promised land had already been made. Finally, the name Meribah may give us another clue. May it not, on the analogy of HEPHZIBAH and OHOLIBAH [qq.v.], be an abbreviation of some such form as Merib(b)aal, in which case (cp Judg. 6 31 f.) we may suppose that the sanctuary Kadesh was the scene of a contending on behalf of Yahwè, a separation of the 'Levites' from the servants of Ba'al?[3] The supplanting of such a tradition by the later not distantly-related episode of the calf-worship would be intelligible. For another treatment of the traditions in Nu. 20 1-13, see MOSES (§ 15, etc.). S. A. C.

Among the Semites (§ 3).	Significance of Maṣṣēbahs (§ 6).

Maṣṣēbāh (see below, § 1 b) is the Hebrew name for an upright stone, stele; specifically for such a stone as the abode or symbol of a numen or deity. It has been found convenient to include in the present article the other aniconic stone agalmata mentioned in the OT obelisks, bætyls, cairns, cromlechs.[4]

We proceed to a survey of the Hebrew words in use.

1. Names. a. The common word 'ében, pl. 'ăbānīm (אֶבֶן, אֲבָנִים),[5] 'stone,' is frequently used in connections where the context or the history shows that a holy stone is meant. Thus Joshua sets up a great stone under the holy tree (אֵלָה) in the sanctuary of Yahwè at Shechem (Josh. 24 26), probably the same stone which in Judg. 9 6 is called a maṣṣēbāh (MT מֻצָּב). The twelve stones set up by Joshua at Gilgal after the passage of the Jordan (Josh. 4 3 8 20) are the stones of the cromlech which gave the place its name (see below, i).

1 On the probable significance of the term 'Levite,' see GENEALOGIES i., § 7 [v], KADESH, § 3.

2 Caleb was the most important of the clans which ultimately settled in S. Judah. There were others, indeed (see JERAHMEEL, §§ 1, 3), but they never attained to the same prominence. Another narrative which turns on selection and contention is the complicated narrative of the revolt of Korah, phases of which appear to have been traditionally located at Kadesh. The burning in Nu. 16 35 suggests that it may once have been connected with TABERAH (q.v.). The murmuring of the people certainly presupposes an early stage in the march from Kadesh.

3 The later story of the sin of Moses, however, would hardly find a place in this tradition.

MASSEBAH

Cp, further, 1 K. 18 30-32 with Ex. 24 4; and see also Dt. 27 2 ff. Josh. 8 30 ff. In Ex. 24 4 𝔊 and Sam. substitute 'ăbānīm as a harmless word for the original maṣṣēbōth; the same change may, in some instances, be suspected in Hebrew. Proper names of places such as Eben-ha-'ezer (1 S. 4 1 5 1, cp 7 12), Eben-ha-zōḥéleth (1 K. 1 9, at a sanctuary), Eben-bohan (Josh. 15 6 18 17; see BOHAN),[1] may attest the presence of an old holy stone, perhaps a natural rock of singular form rather than a maṣṣēbāh. The great stone at Beth-shemesh (1 S. 6 14-18) was doubtless a sacred stone; so also probably the great stone at Gibeon (2 S. 20 8).

In the prophets, stone (ében) is sometimes used opprobriously for stone agalmata (maṣṣēbāhs) or idols; thus in Jer. 2 27 the people say 'to the stock (עֵץ, masc.), Thou art my father, and to the stone (אֶבֶן, fem.), Thou hast brought me forth'; see also 3 9 Hab. 2 19 2 K. 19 18 Wisd. 13 10 14 21, Sibyll. 4 7 f. etc.

b. Maṣṣēbāh (מַצֵּבָה, 𝔊 στήλη, Pesh. ḳāyemthā, stele, image, Tg. ḳāmā, ḳāmĕthā; Vg. in the patriarchal story and in Ex. 24 4 2 S. 18 18 Is. 19 19, titulus; in the laws, historical books, and prophets, where the stigma of idolatry attaches to the word, statua, rarely simulacrum); AV, following Vg. in its discrimination, 'pillar,' 'image,' respectively; RV consistently 'pillar,' with mg., 'or obelisk,' in the second class of passages.

The word maṣṣēbāh, from נצב (Niph., Hiph., cogn. יצב), 'stand or set upright, erect,' is properly an upright object (cp στήλη, statua), in usage always of stone,[2] 'standing stone.' Derivatives of the same root with the same or similar meanings are found in most of the Semitic languages.

Cp Phœnician and Punic נצב, מצבת, cippus, grave-stone, often votive stele; Aram. (Zenjīrli) נצב, stele, statue, cp n. pr. Nisibis (in Assyr. inscriptions Naṣibina, Syr. Naṣībīn), Philo Bybl. Σημαίνει δὲ . . . Νάσιβις τὰς στήλας (FHG 3 571)[3]; Palmyr. מצבא, statue; S. Ar. נצב, מצב, stele (Hommel, Südarabische Chrestomathie, 128); Ar. naṣiba, monument, grave-stone (Goldziher, Muham. Studien, 1 234), nuṣb or nuṣub, pl. 'anṣāb, standing stone as an object of worship, stone idol (Lisān, s.v.).

The word was thus variously applied to the upright stone block or post as an object of worship; as a votive stone, with or without a dedication; as a boundary stone, especially around a sacred place; or as a gravestone. It continued to be employed when the primitive rude stone gave place to the obelisk or other geometrical form, or by the statue (see below, § 2).

In the OT the maṣṣēbāh is most frequently a holy stone at a place of worship (high place). It may, however, be a sepulchral stele, as in Gen. 35 20, where Jacob erects a maṣṣēbāh over the tomb of Rachel, and in 2 S. 18 18, where the name (maṣṣébeth) is applied to the monument (yad, cp 1 S. 15 12 [note the verb maṣṣīb] Is. 56 5, and see HAND, a) which Absalom is said to have erected in his lifetime to perpetuate his memory.[4] [Cp Lagrange, Études, 19 f.] Several recent scholars think that Gen. 35 14 in its original form followed immediately after v. 8; Jacob set up a maṣṣēbāh at the grave of Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, just as in v. 20 at the grave of Rachel;[5] the interest of this conjecture lies in the fact that, if it be correct, the verse bears witness to the custom of offering a libation at the tomb.[6] We may also note the use of the word nĕṣīb in the story of Lot's wife who became 'a pillar of salt' (Gen. 19 26), and the columns (στύλοι, עמודים) at the graves of the Maccabees (1 Macc. 13 29).

The maṣṣēbāh may also mark a boundary, as in Gen. 31 45 [see GALEED, GILEAD, § 4], where Jacob sets up such a stone in Gilead on the Aramæan frontier (cp v. 52); in this sense many interpret Is. 19 19*b*. The sacredness of boundary stones is well known.[1]

Later the word maṣṣēbāh sounded of idolatry, and where the erection of a maṣṣēbāh by a hero of religion is narrated scribes sometimes substituted a less obnoxious term.

Thus in Ex. 24 4, as remarked above, Sam., 𝔊 have merely 'stones'; in Gen. 33 20 the verb shows that מַצֵּבָה has been supplanted by מִזְבֵּחַ. In 1 K. 18 31 f., also, an altar has taken the place of twelve maṣṣēbōth (below, § 7). In Hos. 3 4, 𝔊 Pesh. read 'altar' instead of maṣṣēbāh. Other instances in which this substitution is suspected are Gen. 35 7 (Wellh.), 2 K. 12 9 [10] (Stade; cp 𝔊ᴬ αμμασβη, etc.). The converse change is suspected in 2 K. 3 2 10 27. It is likely that in some cases the change is accidental rather than deliberate.

c. Ḥammānīm[2] (חַמָּנִים, the sing. does not occur in OT, 𝔊 τεμένη [Ezek. 6 4 6, so Aq. Symm. Theod. in Is. 27 9], ὑψηλά [2 Ch. 34 4 7], elsewhere ξύλινα χειροποίητα [Lev. 26 30], εἴδωλα, βδελύγματα; Vg. delubra, simulacra, statuæ; Pesh. 'idols' [deḥlāthā, pĕthakhrē, gĕlīphē]; Tg. חֲנִיסְנַיָּא, a word not satisfactorily explained; AV 'images,' RV uniformly 'sun-images.' The passages in which the word occurs are Ezek. 6 4 6 Lev. 26 30 [dependent on Ezek.] Is. 17 8 27 9 2 Ch. 14 5 [4] 34 4 7[3]).

The ḥammānīm are associated with the high places, and the altars of the baals, and are named, together with the sacred posts ('ăshērīm) and graven images (pĕsīlīm), as adjuncts of an idolatrous worship; like the maṣṣēbāhs and 'ăshērahs they are to be shattered (שבר), or hewn or cut down (כרת, גדע); they were, therefore, like these, objects of stone—or possibly of metal or wood[4]—which stood at the holy places. Since the ḥammānīm are mentioned in connections in which we elsewhere find the maṣṣēbāhs, while the two words never occur in the same context, it is a probable inference that the ḥammānīm were a species of maṣṣēbōth, perhaps of peculiar form or specific dedication; and inasmuch as the word is found first in Ezekiel and appears not to be of Hebrew formation, it may be surmised further that the ḥammānīm were introduced in the latter part of the seventh century from some foreign cult.

Outside the OT an inscription of the year 48 A.D. on a Palmyrene altar dedicates 'this ḥammānā (חמנא) and this altar' to the sun (שמש);[5] the ḥammānā was presumably an obelisk or stele which stood by, or upon, the altar (cp 2 Ch. 34 4). In Mechilta the word ḥammānīm is used repeatedly with apparent reference to Egyptian idolatry;[6] not improbably the obelisks, which in Jer. 43 13 are called maṣṣēbōth, are meant. Siphra speaks of ḥammānīm on the roofs of houses.[7] Many scholars have connected the word with the ἀπόκρυφα ἀμμουνέων γράμματα in the adyta of Phœnician temples from which, according to Philo of Byblos, Sanchuniathon derived his authentic wisdom,[8] the ἀμμούνεοι being conceived to be inscribed ḥammānīm;[9] but this is not probable.

Jewish scholars in the Middle Ages derived the name ḥammānīm from the (poetical and late) Heb. ḥammāh, 'sun,' and interpreted, images or other objects of idolatrous veneration belonging to the worship of the sun (Rashi), or shrines of sun worship (Ibn Ezra).[10] This etymology, which does not seem to have suggested itself to ancient interpreters, has been widely accepted,[11] and the word ḥammānīm is accordingly translated 'sun images,' 'sun pillars'—i.e., obelisks

Older Jewish explanations are 'divinations' (Siphra on Lev. 26 30, Tg. Jer. 1, ib., Leḳach Ṭōb, ib.); 'divining arrows' (gloss in Abulwalid, s.v., cod. R.); 'idols' (Saadia), etc.

11 Among recent authors who have rejected it may be named Halévy and E. Meyer.

dedicated to the sun,[1] or steles with the solar disk in relief,[2] and the like.

Others, deriving the name directly from the root חמם, 'be hot,' explained ḥammānīm as equivalent to πυραθεῖα,[3] πυρεῖα, shrines of sacred fire, which, as among the Persians, were associated with the worship of the sun.[4] It has more recently been suggested that the ḥammānīm may have been a kind of metal candelabra or cressets, such as are represented on some Assyrian and Phœnician reliefs,[5] for example, on the stele of Lilybæum, CIS 1 138, Pl. xxix.,[6] and on coins of Paphos showing the temple of Aphrodite.

The ḥammānīm are thought by many modern scholars to belong specifically to the worship of Ba'al-ḥammān (or -ḥammōn),[7] a god whose name appears on hundreds of Carthaginian votive steles in the stereotyped formula 'to the Mistress TNT and the Lord Ba'al-ḥammān,' and without the companion goddess in many inscriptions from the dependencies of Carthage.[8] In Phœnicia itself the name Ba'al-ḥammān or El-ḥammān has thus far been found in only the two inscriptions from 'Umm el-Awāmīd[9] and Ma'ṣūb;[10] the name of the place Ḥammōn in Asher (Josh. 19 28) is perhaps connected in some way with that of the god (see HAMMON, and BAAL, § 3). The common opinion is that the ḥammānīm were so called because they were sacred to Ba'al-ḥammān;[11] some scholars, however, entertain the contrary view, that the name of the god is derived from the steles, signifying 'the deity to whom the ḥammān belongs.'[12]

d. Bēth'ēl (בֵּיתְאֵל). The oldest object of worship at Bethel was a holy stone, which, according to the sacred legend, had been discovered by Jacob, who set it up as a maṣṣēbāh and poured oil upon it (Gen. 28 11 f. 17 f. 22; cp 35 14). The name bēth'ēl, which afterward was given o the sanctuary and the city (Gen. 28 19 35 6 48 3 etc.), primitively belonged to the holy stone itself as the abode (ἕδος) of a numen, as in 33 20 where Jacob erects a maṣṣēbāh[13] and gives it the name El-ĕlōhē-Israel; cp also Gen. 35 7 Ex. 17 15 Judg. 6 24. If the text of Gen. 49 24 be sound, the words 'the stone of Israel'[14] may naturally be understood of the holy stone at Bethel; so also in Jer. 48 13, where Bethel, the confidence of the Israelites, corresponds to Chemosh in whom the Moabites put their faith, the holy stone (bēth'ēl) itself may perhaps be meant, rather than the golden bull idol at Bethel, as it is usually explained.

In the OT only indistinct and ambiguous traces of this primitive meaning of bēth'ēl—a stone in which dwells a numen—have survived; fortunately we have indubitable evidence from other quarters.[15] In Phœnicia the name baityl (בתאל*, βαίτυλος, βαιτύλιον)[16] was given to certain 'animated stones' (λίθοι ἔμψυχοι) invented by 16 The ancient etymology which derives βαίτυλος from Cretan βαίτη, 'goat,' 'goat-skin,' though revived by Svoronos and Maximilian Mayer, is untenable on historical grounds.

Ouranos;[1] in Sanchuniathon's theogony Βαίτυλος is a son of Ouranos and Gē, brother of El (Kronos), Dagon, and Atlas.[2] Descriptions of such stones are given by Pliny, NH 37 135 (from Sotacus of Carystus), and especially by Damascius, Vita Isidori (in Photius, Bibl. Codicum, cod. 242, p. 348 Bekker; see also p. 342). The Lebanon region was noted for the numbers of bætyls found there. Another name for the bætyl is abaddir (Priscian, 6 9; August. Ep. 17; cp Zonaras, 371), also a word of Phœnician origin ('majestic father?'). The bætylia, at least in the period from which all our descriptions come, were small stones, which were believed to have fallen from heaven; they were probably sometimes aerolites, but it has been proved that they were often prehistoric stone implements.[3] Such stones were perhaps enclosed in the Israelite ark (see ARK OF THE COVENANT, § 10); the connection of the ark with the oracle would then be clear.[4]

e. Ṣīyyūn (צִיּוּן; σημεῖον [Ezek.], σκόπελον, σκόπελος [𝔊L], σκοπός, σκοπιά [Aq., Sym. 𝔊 in Jer. σ[ε]ιων; Vg. titulus, specula [Jer.]), 2 K. 23 17 Ezek. 39 15 Jer. 31 21; RV 'monument,' 'sign,' 'waymark.' In the first two passages the ṣīyyūn marks a tomb, or the spot where an unburied body lies; in Jer. it is a waymark. The word is used in MH of the whitewashed stone which shows where there is a grave (cp Mt. 23 27), and has developed a denominative verb צַיֵּן, 'mark a grave.' The root, which is not otherwise represented in Heb., is found in Syr. ṣĕwāyā, heap of stones, cairn, Arab. ṣūya, 'waymark' in the desert (monolith or cairn), pl. ('aṣwā') also, in a tradition, 'graves.'[5] Probably the older meaning is 'cairn'; at a grave and as a waymark the stone or stone heap had originally religious significance.[6]

f. Gal (גַּל; βουνός [Gen.], σωρός; Vg. tumulus [Gen.], acervus; Pesh. yagrā; Tg. dĕgōrā; EV 'heap'), a pile of loose stones, cairn;[7] cp GALLIM, the name of more than one place in Palestine. In Gen. 31 46 ff. the cairn in one source serves the same purpose as the pillar (maṣṣēbāh) in the other (see v. 45); v. 54 supposes a sacrifice. In Josh. 7 26 8 29 2 S. 18 17 a heap of stones is reared over the bodies of Achan, the king of Ai, and Absalom respectively (cp ṣīyyūn, 2 K. 23 17 Ezek. 39 15, above, e). Here also the cairn serves the same purpose in marking the grave as the maṣṣēbāh in Gen. 35 20 (above, b);[8] it is probable, however, that the heaping of stones upon the body of the traitor, the hated foe, and the sacrilegious man who had fallen under the ban, originally not only expressed aversion and contumely, but was meant to prevent their wicked spirits from wandering and doing more harm.[9]

Heaps of stones of various significance are common in the religions of the ancient as of the modern world. In Greek they were called ἑρμαῖα, ἑρμαῖοι λόφοι, ἕρμακες, words closely connected with the ἑρμῆς pillar.[10]

In the Talmud they are frequently mentioned under the name markūlīs—i.e., Mercurius = Hermes—which term includes also table-stones (dolmens); see 'Abōdā-zārā, 50*a*. Cairns at the crossways seem to be chiefly meant; the traveller passing by threw his stone upon the heap:[11] as a religious act this falls under the condemnation of idolatry (M. Sanhedrīn, 7 6). i. Gilgal (הַגִּלְגָּל, always with the article [except Josh. 5 9 in an etymology]; treated by the versions as a proper noun, 𝔊 Γαλγαλα, cp גַּלְגַּל, 'wheel'), a stone circle, or 'cromlech,' such as has given its name to several places in Palestine (see GILGAL). The origin of the most famous of these, near Jericho, is told in Josh. 4 3 8 20; Joshua, after crossing the Jordan, set up at Gilgal twelve stones taken from the bed of the river (cp GILGAL, § 2; QUARRIES). Numbers of stone circles are found E. of the Jordan,[4] many of them megalithic—though not often of colossal size—and, like the menhirs and dolmens of the same region, monuments of a prehistoric population;[5] others erected by the Arabs in recent times around graves.[6] Cromlechs are found also in Galilee, but are very rare in other parts of western Palestine (see GILGAL). A diminutive circle, only 7 ft. in diameter, the stones standing little more than 1 ft. high, was discovered by Schick at 'Artūf.[7]

2. Holy stones and stone worship.

The worship of holy stones is one of the oldest forms of religion of which evidence has been preserved to us, and one of the most universal.[8] It has frequently persisted in venerable cults in the midst of high stages of civilisation and in the presence of elevated religious conceptions, while its survivals in popular superstition have proved nearly ineradicable, even in Christendom.[9]

The holy stone was primitively a rude block, ordinarily oblong, roughly cylindrical or rectangular in section, frequently rounded or pointed at the top;[10] sometimes a prehistoric megalith, sometimes of inconspicuous dimensions. Later, the tapering rectangular block became an obelisk or a pyramid, the cylindrical pillar was shaped to a cone with rounded top (meta) or an omphalos.[11] As the conception of deity became more anthropomorphic, rough outlines of members of the human body were carved upon the stone as attributes, or a natural likeness was worked out more or less completely into a head and bust;[1] simple indications of drapery on the lower part of the cylindrical or conical stone prepared the way for the final development, the statue of the god in human form. On the other hand, the rectangular cippus or the column might become a monolithic altar, as the cairn or dolmen became an altar of loose stones.[2] Columns of metal sometimes took the place of columns or obelisks of stone.[3]

A sanctuary might have but one holy stone, or a pair[4] or triad,[5] or a greater number standing in a group or ring. The presence of several such stones does not imply that as many different deities were primitively worshipped at the place,[6] though this was doubtless the prevailing explanation in later times.[7] Especial holiness attached to certain small stones of peculiar form and colour which were believed to have fallen from heaven, and to possess the power of motion and—sometimes, at least—of speech, with many other marvellous properties (bætylia).

3. Among the Semites.

On no race has this form of idolatry had a deeper or more lasting hold than on the Semites. Among the nomadic branches of the stock the sacred stone was the universal object of veneration. 'The Arabs worshipped a stone,' writes Clement of Alexandria in an often-quoted passage,[8] and his words are abundantly confirmed by the testimony of early Moslem authors concerning the religion of their forefathers.[9] Besides the rude or partly fashioned blocks which bore the names of particular gods, the nuṣb (pl. 'anṣāb: see above, 1 b) or, as it is also called, gharīy, was found everywhere. About the Phœnicians in the mother-country and the colonies, we have not only the testimony of the OT (see Ezek. 26 11, 'thy mighty maṣṣēbāhs') and of Greek and Roman writers, but also that of the native historian, Philo of Byblos ('Sanchuniathon'),[10] and considerable monumental evidence besides. In Phœnician temples the old sacred stone was not, even in later times, superseded by an anthropomorphic idol.

Thus, at Paphos the goddess (Aphrodite-Astarte) was a round stone tapering upwards like the turning-post in the circus.[11] On the island of Gozo, near Malta, such a stone has been found about a metre high, shaped like a sugar loaf; it stood between two upright posts which supported a slab.[12] A coin of the age of Macrinus shows the principal temple at Byblos; in the court is a conical stone upon an altar-like basis.[13] Similar stones appear on many coins of cities in the Lebanon and on the Syrian coast.[14]

A stone obelisk found in Cyprus bears on its base an inscription beginning: 'This maṣṣébeth, etc.'[15] From the OT we know that the māṣṣēbāh was regularly found at the holy places of the Canaanites (e.g., Ex. 34 13; see below, § 7): two such stones have recently been discovered standing in situ by the ascent to the high place at Petra. The prohibition of cutting the stone of an altar in the old law Ex. 20 25, doubtless applied equally to the maṣṣēbāh. It expresses partly a religious scruple—the use of a tool upon the sacred stone was, as it were, an assault on the numen,—partly religious conservatism in opposition to the artificial altars and obelisks of the Canaanites.

4. Cultus.[1]

The rites of stone-worship were preserved in their most primitive form among the Arabs. Victims were slaughtered at the sacrificial stones (nuṣb, pl. 'anṣāb),[2] upon which blood was smeared—whence their other name ghariy. At the foot of the stone, or near it, was, at least in some cases, a hole into which the blood was poured or allowed to flow (ghabghab);[3] votive offerings were also cast into it—we read of garments, silver and gold, and incense being found in such a pit. The flesh was cooked and consumed in a feast;[4] the god had no part but the blood. Meal was thrown into the pit of Al-Uḳaiṣir, together with an offering of hair at his feast.[5] The anointing of certain stones at Medina with oil was, of course, a foreign rite. When no offering was made, reverence was shown the sacred stone by stroking it with the hand (tamassuḥ). Votive offerings, particularly garments or weapons, were hung upon the stone, or deposited in the pit or well beneath it.

Elsewhere oil was poured or smeared upon the holy stones (hence λιπαροὶ λίθοι, Theophrast. Char. 16; Clem. Alex. Strom. 7 4, p. 843 Potter); this was the custom at Bethel, initiated by Jacob (Gen. 28 18 31 13, cp 35 14), and it was general in the Greek and Roman world.[6] A libation is made by Jacob, Gen. 35 14 (? at a tomb). At some sanctuaries the stones were decorated at festivals with garlands and fillets (see, e.g., Pausan. x. 24 6—raw wool), and they are frequently so represented on coins; they were sometimes draped or swathed in garments.[7]

5. Maṣṣēbāh and Altar.[8]

We have seen in our examination of Arab customs that the rites of sacrifice attached to the sacred stone (nuṣb). In the OT these rites are performed at the altar,[9] upon which the victim's blood is smeared or dashed, in a sink at the foot of which the rest of the blood is poured, while the maṣṣēbāh stands beside the altar without any clearly defined place in the cultus. There can be no doubt that this difference is to be ascribed to the prevalence among the settled population of Canaan of offerings by fire; but the course of the evolution is a matter of uncertain speculation, for the differentiation was complete long before our earliest testimony. The altar may be conceived as merely a table of offerings or a sacrificial hearth before the deity represented by the old standing stone (maṣṣēbāh). Or the altar may itself have been a primitive holy stone, the monolithic altar having developed out of a flat-topped block, others out of dolmens or cairns, the form of which permitted their being used to burn the fat of the victim on, as well as to receive its blood;[1] the maṣṣēbāh upon this hypothesis being the tapering or pointed stone which could not be so used.[2] The peculiar holiness of the altar—as seen, for example, in the right of asylum—together with the fact that the blood was, so far as we are informed, applied exclusively to it, never to the maṣṣēbāh, makes it probable that the latter alternative is the true explanation of the origin of the altar; whilst it may be regarded as certain that the former view was the one commonly entertained by worshippers in the times in which the OT books were written. It is not without importance to observe that the comparative detachment of the maṣṣēbāh from the cultus made it easier to interpret the old holy stones at Israelite sanctuaries as mere monuments (see below, § 7).

9 It should be borne in mind that the Hebrew word for 'altar' (mizbēaḥ) denotes only 'slaughter-place.' An example like 1 S. 14 32-34 shows that the stone might be designated ad hoc, but that it was indispensable; the offering by fire was not.

6. Significance of the maṣṣēbāhs.

Two theories which have had some currency may be briefly dismissed. The opinion that the holy stones are representations or symbols of sacred mountains,[3] probably suggested by such examples as the conical stone of Zeus Kasios on coins of Seleucia Pieria, is an inference vastly too wide for the facts on which it relies, even on the supposition that they are correctly interpreted, and is connected with an untenable theory of primitive religion (see NATURE-WORSHIP). Nor—for the latter reason—is the view much more acceptable that standing-stones and cairns erected by men are the representatives of natural rocks which were regarded as divine.[4] An explanation which has found much wider currency and tenacious adherence, particularly among amateurs in the history of religion, is that the stone pillars, obelisks, cones, and the like, as well as the wooden posts or poles (see ASHERAH) are phallic emblems.[5] Aside from the awkward fact that the standing stone may be a goddess as well as a god, the notion that religion begins with a symbol of the reproductive power in nature is singularly wide of the mark. That a late writer like the author of the Dea Syria describes the twin columns before the temple at Hierapolis as phalloi can hardly be seriously offered as evidence of the ideas of the worshippers at the temple, much less, of those of their remote ancestors when they set up their rude stone pillars.[6] For an explanation of stock and stone worship upon the general premises of animism (fetishism) the reader is referred to Tylor;[7] for one adapted to the totemistic hypothesis, to Jevons.[8]

It hardly falls within the scope of this Encyclopædia to discuss the ultra-empirical question. It must suffice to observe that in some instances the stone was undoubtedly believed to be alive. The bætyl, as we have seen, was an animated stone; late writers discussed the doubt whether divine or demonic. On the other hand, it is probable that when men set up a maṣṣēbāh it was not because they had discovered by some sign that a numen dwelt in it, but rather to furnish an abode or resting-place for the spirit or deity, that it might thus be present at the place of sacrifice, receive the blood of the victim, and fulfil the wishes of the worshippers.[9] It was thus an artificial sanctuary,[10] the rude precursor of the temple and the altar as well as of the idol.

In the patriarchal story maṣṣēbāhs are erected by Jacob at Bethel (Gen. 28 18-22, cp 31 13) and near

The maṣṣēbāh in the sanctuary of Yahwè at Shechem was set up by Joshua (Josh. 24 26 f., cp Judg. 9 6), the stone at Ebenezer by Samuel (1 S. 7 12).

7. Holy stones in the OT.

Moses, before the covenant sacrifice at Horeb, erects twelve maṣṣēbāhs at the foot of the mountain, beside or around the altar (Ex. 24 4);[1] the cromlech at Gilgal was attributed to Joshua (Josh. 4 20); Elijah set up twelve stones on Carmel in the name of Yahwè (1 K. 18 31 f.).[2] It has been noted that all these instances are in Ephraimite sources; they make it clear that down to the eighth century the maṣṣēbāhs stood unchallenged at the sanctuaries of Yahwè. Hosea speaks of the maṣṣēbāh[3] as an indispensable part of the furnishing of a place of worship (3 4); when their land prospered the Israelites made fine maṣṣēbāhs, which shall be destroyed with the altars (10 1). There is no reason to think that it was otherwise in Judah.[4]

Of the prophets, Amos and Isaiah do not speak of the maṣṣēbāhs, though the latter inveighs against idols; Hosea's words have been cited above; Mic. 5 11-13 predicts the destruction, in the coming judgment, of idols (pĕsīlīm), maṣṣēbāhs and 'ăshērāhs, together with magic and sorcery; but it is doubtful whether the passage is by the eighth century prophet.[5] Jeremiah speaks only of Egyptian obelisks (43 13); Ezekiel of the mighty pillars of Tyre (26 11); the same prophet begins the denunciation of the ḥammānīm. Is. 19 19 (late) foretells the erection of a maṣṣēbāh to Yahwè in the border of Egypt. Is. 57 6, as generally interpreted, gives evidence of the persistence of the old rites of stone worship in the Persian period.

The laws in Ex. 34 13 23 24[6] command the destruction of the Canaanite maṣṣēbāhs with the dismantling of their sanctuaries (see also Dt. 12 3 7 5). The seventh century legislation further prohibits the erection of 'ăshērāhs and maṣṣēbāhs to Yahwè (Dt. 16 22 Lev. 26 1). The deuteronomistic historians set at the head of their catalogue of the sins which brought ruin on the northern kingdom the 'ăshērahs and maṣṣēbāhs which the Israelites had reared on every high hill (2 K. 17 10); Judah was in the same condemnation (1 K. 14 23); it is a mark of wicked kings that they erected maṣṣēbāhs (2 K. 3 2, cp 1 K. 16 32); good kings removed or destroyed them (2 K. 3 2 10 26 18 4 23 14).

MATTAN (מַתָּן [common in Ph.], cp NAMES, §§ 15, 50; ΜΑΤΘΑΝ [BAL]).

1. The priest of Baal slain by the people at the instigation of Jehoiada (2 K. 11 18, μαγθαν [B], μαχαν [A]; 2 Ch. 23 17). His full name was possibly Mattan-ba'al ('gift of Baal'), a well-known Phœnician name (cp Muthum-balles [Plautus, Poen. v., 2 35] and Schr. KAT(2), 104). At the same time, in the light of the present writer's theory of the original ethnic affinities of Nathan, Nethaneel, Nethaniah, and many other names which as they now stand, admit of a religious meaning, it is more probable that Nathan is a modification either of Ethan or of Temani (from which indeed Ethan may perhaps come). Observe that MATTAN, 2, is the father of a Zephathite; note also the ethnic relations of the Nethaniahs. T. K. C.

2. Father of SHEPHATIAH [q.v.] (Jer. 38 1, ναθαν [BℵA], μαθθᾱ [Qmg.]).

MATTANAH (מַתָּנָה, 'a gift'; ΜΑΝΘΑΝΑΕΙΝ [BAF1L], ΜΑΝΘΑΝΙΝ [A in v. 18], μανθανεν [F* and Fmg.]), if the text is right, a station of the Israelites between BEER and NAHALIEL (Nu. 21 18 f.). The definition of its situation in the Onomastica (277 82 137 30) as on the Arnon, 12 m. E. of Medeba, is useless, because the Arnon flows S. of Medeba, and modern identifications are purely fanciful. For several reasons, however (note, for instance, that 𝔊L omits καὶ ἀπὸ μανθαναειν in v. 19), it is not improbable that Mattanah is not a proper name at all, but belongs, with the meaning 'a gift,' to the last line of the Song of the Well, which was misunderstood. The initial misapprehension led to a tampering with the text of the itinerary in vv. 18*b* 19, which should perhaps be corrected as proposed by Budde (see BEER, 1; NEBO). T. K. C.

μαθανια [B], -ς [L], μαθθανιας [ℵ c.a A]). He appears as the chief singer in the post-exilic temple,[1] the second and third places being occupied by BAKBUKKIAH and Abda (see OBADIAH, 9) respectively. By a conventional fiction each is traced back to one of the three chiefs of the Davidic singers (see ETHAN, 2, etc.; cp GENEALOGIES, § 7 [ii.]), though an attempt seems to have been made to incorporate two of them at least with the b'ne Heman (see 5; and cp ABIASAPH). The enumeration of these three among the door-keepers in Neh. 12 25 (μαθθανιας [ℵ c.a mg. sup. L, om. Bℵ*A]) is clearly not original, as a comparison of 1 Ch. 9 17 Ezra 2 42 Neh. 7 43 will show. The mention of them ought to precede v. 24 (ואחיהם לנגדם וגו׳). A great-grandson of Mattaniah is mentioned in Neh. 11 22 (μαθθανιου [ℵ c.a (mg.) L]) as the overseer of the Levites (see UZZI), and another appears among the sons of the priests at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12 35; see ZECHARIAH, 13, 26). The obvious irreconcilableness of the supposed dates of the passages in which this famous singer appears (e.g., Neh. 12 8, time of Zerubbabel; Neh. 11 17, time of Nehemiah) may warn us of the instability of the post-exilic genealogies, and of the uncertainty of the name-lists in Ezra-Neh. (see GENEALOGIES i., § 7; EZRA ii., §§ 5, 6).

3. An Asaphite Levite, the great-grandfather of Zechariah the father of JAHAZIEL (2 Ch. 20 14, του μαθθανιου [L], -νθ. [B]). The number of links between Mattaniah and Zechariah agrees with Neh. 12 35 (cp 2 above). This, perhaps, is not accidental, and we may suppose that Jahaziel is the name of one of the Chronicler's famous contemporaries (see GENEALOGIES i., § 6, and § 7 [ii. c]).

4. Another Asaphite Levite, mentioned together with ZECHARIAH (2 Ch. 29 13, ματθανιας [Bab]).

This, however, disregards the strong indications of overgrowth in the text. יהודה (𝔊 ℵ c.a mg. MATTHEW (ΜΑΘΘΑΙΟΣ [Ti. WH], ΜΑΤΘΑΙΟΣ [TR]), according to our earliest gospel (Mk. 3 18) one of the Twelve Apostles, and placed there seventh in order, between Bartholomew and Thomas.

1. Name.

The writer of the first gospel (Mt. 10 3) transposes Matthew and Thomas and adds 'the tax-gatherer' (ὁ τελώνης) after 'Matthew.' This must be taken in connection with the fact that for the Levi son of Alphæus of Mk. 2 14 Mt. (9 9) substitutes Matthew. It is clear that the writer of the first gospel intended his readers to understand that Matthew the apostle was that Matthew the publican whom Jesus called from the receipt of custom. If we do not fall back upon the theory of corruption in the text of Mk. from which Mt. was copying we must acquiesce in the identification Matthew the apostle = Matthew the publican = Levi the publican. There is abundant justification for the double name. The meaning of 'Matthew' (Μαθθαῖος) is uncertain.

Dalman (Gram. 142, Worte Jesu, 40) connects the name with the late Jewish מתיה, מתתיה, מתתיהו; cp the Palmyrene מתבול (בעל=בול), מתא. Nöldeke, however (GGA, 1884, p. 1023), with Ewald, Hitzig, Schmiedel, takes it to be the abbreviated form of אֲמִתַּי or אֲמִתְּיָ. Grimm (Clavis Nov. Test.) derives it from מַת = 'man.' In any case it is probably, like Levi, a Semitic name. But there are analogies for the bearing of two Semitic names, e.g., Simeon = Cephas.

In Lk. 6 15 Matthew comes seventh in the list as in Mk.; but in Acts 1 13 he has fallen to eighth as in Mt.

The only other fact in the Gospels about Matthew Levi is contained in Mk. 2 15 = Lk. 5 29 = Mt. 9 10. It has been much debated whether the house here spoken of belonged to Jesus or to Levi. Lk. says plainly that it was the house of Levi; but he has, probably, misinterpreted Mk.'s narrative.

2. Mk. 2 15 = Lk. 5 29 = Mt. 9 10.

The συνανέκειντο τῷ Ἰησοῦ of Mk. 2 15 b is practically equivalent to 'sat at table in the house of Jesus.' Cp Lk. 14 10 τῶν συνανακειμένων σοί = 'thy guests,' Mk. 6 22 τοῖς συνανακειμένοις = 'his (Herod's) guests.' The αὐτόν in Mk. 2 15 a = τὸν Ἰησοῦν.

It is quite in accordance with Mk.'s style to begin a narrative without specifying the subject of the sentence; cp 2 23 where 'him' (αὐτόν) again = 'Jesus' (τὸν Ἰησοῦν). There Jesus is the speaker of the preceding words; but in 2 14, and frequently, the subject of the verb is ὁ Ἰησοῦς understood, though the preceding words referred to others than Jesus. If Mk. leaves it doubtful whether the house was that of Jesus or of Levi, Mt. seems certainly to have interpreted him in the former sense. For Mt. omits 'his' (αὐτοῦ) after 'house' (οἰκίᾳ) just because, being equivalent to 'of Jesus,' it seemed superfluous. Moreover, Mt. who in 4 13 speaks of Jesus as settling in Capernaum, and in 9 1 of Capernaum as 'his own city,' can hardly mean by the simple 'in the house' (ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ) of 9 10 any other than Jesus' own house. It seems probable, therefore, that the scene of Mk. 2 15-17 was the house of Jesus in Capernaum, and that this narrative has no connection with the account of Levi's call other than the common subject of Jesus' familiarity with 'tax gatherers' (τελῶναι).

3. Post-biblical literature.

In the post-biblical literature Matthew and Levi are sometimes distinguished. Heracleon, quoted in Clem. Strom. iv. 9 71, says that Matthew, Philip, Thomas, and Levi died natural deaths. The same distinction is found in Orig. c. Cels. i. 62. Origen says that Levi (ὁ Λευής, ed. Koetschau) the publican was not of the number of the twelve except in some of the copies of the Gospel according to Mark. Since no known authorities have the name Levi in Mk.'s list of Apostles, it would seem that Origen read 'James' for 'Levi' in Mk. 2 14, where this reading is found in D a b c e ff.(2) g(1). Matthew and Levi are also distinguished in Ephrem, Ev. Conc. exp., ed. Mösinger, 287, apparently in the Arabic Diatessaron 6 46 7 9 (cp Hamlyn Hill, Earliest Life, 67, n. 4), and in the Syr. Didascalia, ed. Lag., 89 1, where it is said that Christ appeared 'to Levi and then he was seen also by us all'—i.e., by the apostles. Amongst modern writers Resch (Paralleltexte, 3 829 f.) identifies Matthew Levi with Nathanael (cp MATTHIAS), but on insufficient grounds.

4. Literature.

For the Acts of Andrew and Matthew (Matthias, q.v.), cp Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-gesch. 1 546 ff. (Acts and) Martyrdom of Matthew have been re-edited by Bonnet in Lipsius, *Acta Apost. MATTHIAS. 1. (ΜΑΘΘΙΑϹ [B*D Ti. Treg. WH], ΜΑΤΘΙΑϹ RV, abbrev. from ΜΑΤΤΑΘΙΑϹ, ΜΑΤΘΑΘΙΑϹ, ΜΑΘΘΑΘΙΑϹ = מַתִּתְיָה, Mattithiah) was elected by drawing or casting of lots to supply the place of Judas Iscariot (Acts 1 23-26). Zeller (Contents and Origin of the Acts of the Apostles, 1 168) denies the historical character of this narrative on two grounds: (a) its assumption that the apostles remained at Jerusalem; (b) its connection with the account of the Feast of PENTECOST (q.v.). The latter objection cannot be dealt with here. In answer to the first it has sometimes been urged that the Galilee of Christ's appearances was not the northern province, but a district near Jerusalem. So, recently, Zimmermann, Stud. u. Krit. 1901 447. Resch (Paralleltexte 1 381 ff.) has attempted to strengthen this theory by supposing that Galilee in the gospel narratives of the Resurrection is a transliteration of the Heb. גלילה = περίχωρος.

Resch appeals to the gospel of Peter ἀπὸ Ἰερουσαλὴμ καὶ τῆς περιχώρου, to Tertullian, Apol. 21 (Galilæam Judææ regionem), to the Acta Pilati, and to the tradition of a Galilee near the Mount of Olives, which is frequently found in the Itineraria. To the references given by Resch may be added the following from the publications of the Pal. Pil. Text Society. Felix Fabri, 1 482 (Galilee, a village on the Mt. of Olives); Saewulf, 19; Anonymous Pilgrim, 5 1; Theoderich, 41; Fetellus, 4 (Galilee, a chapel on Mt. Sion); John Poloner, 8, 9; Guide-Book to Palestine, 16, 17 (Galilee, a mount near Jerusalem). John of Würzburg, 29. Cp also Itinera Hierosolymitana, ed. Geyer 155.

The Acta Pilati, however, and these Itineraries are too late to be valid as evidence; cp Keim, Jesu von Nazara, ET, 6 380. It is unlikely that Tertullian had in mind any other Galilee than the northern province. And proof is required before it can be admitted that גלילה in a first-century writing could have any other meaning than that of 'Galilee' the northern province. It is noticeable that the LXX never translates גליל or גלילה by περίχωρος. But Zeller's objection is without good ground. Even if the author of Acts 1 supposed that the apostles remained in Jerusalem, and even if he were wrong in this supposition, nevertheless his statement that they were there not long after the death of Christ may be true in point of fact. The NT tells us nothing further of Matthias. Eusebius (HE 1 12) supposed him to have been one of the 'Seventy.' Clement (Strom. iv. 6 35) says that some identified him with Zacchæus. In the Clem. Recogn. (1 60) he is identified with Barnabas (Syr. ed. Lag., Barabbas). The Syriac translator of Eusebius four times substitutes Tholmai for Matthias. Amongst modern writers Hilgenfeld (NT Ext. Can. 105) identifies him with Nathanael.

The following were ascribed to Matthias: (a) a gospel, cp Orig. Hom. 1 in Luc., Eus. HE 3 25; (b) παραδόσεις Clem. Strom. ii. 9 45 iii. 4 26 vii. 13 82; (c) according to Hippol. Philos. 7 20, Basilides and his son Isidore appealed to λόγοι ἀπόκρυφοι of Matthias. Zahn (Kanon, 2 751 ff.) identifies all three. Cp against this Harnack (Chronol. 597 ff.).

The Acts of Andrew and Matthias have been edited by Bonnet (Acta Apost. Apoc. 2 1, 1898), in Syriac by Wright (Apoc. Acts). For the MSS and translations cp Harnack, Gesch. Altchrist. Lit. 127. Lipsius thinks that Matthias has been confused with Matthew; cp Apokr. Ap.-gesch. ii. 2 258-264. In the Greek Acts, Matthias journeys to the city of the Cannibals. He is there cast into prison, and Christ promises to send Andrew to deliver him. In accordance with this promise Andrew is miraculously brought to the city of the Cannibals. He frees Matthias by a miracle and causes him to be removed on a cloud to a mountain where Peter was. Andrew, meanwhile, remains in the city and is imprisoned and tortured. At length Christ appears to him and heals him; and after founding a Christian church in the city, he finally leaves it in peace.

MAUZZIM, GOD OF (אֱלֹהַּ מָעֻזִּים; ΜΑΩΖΕΙ[Ν] [Theod. BAQ], ΙϹΧΥΡΑ? 'fortresses' (RV). Most moderns have taken the reference to be to Jupiter Capitolinus (so Gesenius, Lengerke, Driver, Marti), in whose honour Antiochus began to build a temple in Antioch (Livy, 41 20). G. Hoffmann (Ueb. einige Phön. Inschriften, 29), on the other hand, thought of Ζεύς Πολιεύς, and Che. (SBOT 'Is.' Heb. 92) suggests the easy reading mĕḥōzīm (מְחוֹזִים) 'cities.'[1] But since mā'uzzīm means primarily 'refuges' (cp Sym. confugia) it may be more probable that the true reference is to Jupiter Hospes (Ξένιος); cp 2 Macc. 6 2*b*, and see HOSPITALITY, JUPITER.[2]

Prof. Cheyne points out that the curious rendering 'God's protectors' (AV^mg.) is explained by Matthew Poole's remark, 'It signifies demons, or gods' protectors, whom the Romans would worship with Christ, such as saints and angels.'

A fresh line is taken by E. R. Bevan, Journal of Hell. Stud. 20 26-30 (1900), who argues that Antiochus Epiphanes assumed divine honours, and finds in the 'god of Mauzzim' Zeus Olympios, with whom the king identified himself; cp Eng. Hist. Rev. 1901, pp. 625-639.

MEALS

No universally recognised early Hebrew term for 'meal' seems to have been in use. 'At meal-time' in Ruth 2 14 (EV) is, literally, 'at food time' (לְעֵת אֹכֶל); to 'dine' (Gen. 43 16), is literally to 'eat' (אכל); more frequently the word 'bread' (לֶחֶם) is added (e.g., Gen. 43 25 Ex. 2 20). 'Dinner of herbs' in Prov. 15 17 should according to RVmg. and BDB be rather 'a portion of herbs' (i.e., a slender meal); but Che. (Exp. Times, Aug. 1899), pleads for the rendering 'meal.' Post-biblical literature, however, uses sĕ'ūdāh (סְעוּדָה) for 'meal,' and the word may have been known earlier, its root sā'ad (סָעַד) 'to sustain,' being a good OT word (see Gen. 18 5 Judg. 19 5). In the NT EV speaks of dining and dinner[1] (Mt. 22 4 Lk. 11 37 f. 14 12—cp Jn. 21 12 15), of supping and supper[1] (Lk. 14 12, etc.); but RV gives a more correct rendering in one of these passages—'break your fast' (Jn. 21 12 15, AV 'dine').

As to the time of the meals, the principal one was postponed to the period just before or after sunset.

1. Division of the day. Thus, in the Gospels, master and servant alike take their meal after they are 'come in from the field' (Lk. 17 7 ff.; cp Ruth 3 7), which, in the seasons of harvest and vintage at least, would hardly be before sundown. In like manner the noon-tide heat, which suspends all out-door work, suggests a simple meal for the resting labourer (Ruth 2 14), and not for him alone (cp Joseph's dinner 'at noon,' Gen. 43 16). If we add to these the morning 'snack,' a morsel of bread and some simple relish, with which the peasant still breaks his fast, we have the ordinary meals of the population of early Palestine.

In the second Christian century the immemorial custom of three meals a day, even on the Sabbath, is illustrated by a provision of the later Jewish law. On the outbreak of a fire on the Sabbath, the Jews were allowed to rescue sufficient provisions to furnish three meals (מְזוֹן שָׁלֹשׁ סְעוּדוֹת) if the fire takes place in the night seasons of the Sabbath (בְּלֵילֵי שַׁבָּת); sufficient for two meals, if it takes place in the forenoon; for one meal only, if it takes place in the afternoon (Shabbāth 16 2). The first of the three was a slight refreshment, scarcely constituting a meal in the proper sense of the word, to which Kamphausen (in Riehm, HWB(2) 955*a*) finds a reference in Prov. 31 15 (in the 'Praise of the Virtuous Woman').[1] The Talmud calls this the פַּת שַׁחֲרִית, the 'morning morsel.' It is the ἄριστον πρωϊνόν or early breakfast of classical writers; it is referred to in Jn. 21 12 15, and nowhere else (see RV).

The two proper meals of the day (cp Ex. 16 12 1 K. 17 6) were taken, the one about noon, the other and more elaborate of the two, about sunset. The former is the Greek ἄριστον, the latter the Greek δεῖπνον.[2]

2. The principal meals.

These were the meals to which guests were generally invited (Lk. 14 12; cp 11 37 14 16, etc.). To 'eat no bread,' is synonymous with partaking of μήτε ἄριστον μήτε δεῖπνον (said of Ahab 1 K. 21 4 = Jos. Ant. viii. 13 8; Niese, § 356).

(a) The ἄριστον. It is scarcely possible that there was a uniform hour for the ἄριστον, despite the odd reading of 𝔊 (1 S. 14 24; see HONEY, col. 2104, n. 4), 'all the land was breakfasting.' The duties of the market (Mk. 7 4) and the synagogue had first to be attended to. There is a Talmudic statement (Shabbāth 10*a*) that 'the fourth hour' (about 10 A.M.)[3] 'was the meal time of ordinary persons, the fifth hour, of labourers, the sixth hour, of the learned.' The noontide meal at which Joseph entertained his brethren (Gen. 43 16 25) is called by the Greek translators (about 250 B.C.) 'breakfast'; this was also, in their opinion, the meal to which a sovereign would invite a guest after the morning service at the altar of Bethel (1 K. 13 7, 𝔊 'come and breakfast with me': Heb. סְעָד, EV 'refresh thyself'; see above).[4]

It was to breakfast rather than to dinner (as EV) that Jesus was invited by the Pharisee of Lk. 11 37 ff. In ordinary cases it was a very simple meal; for field labourers, bread dipped in vinegar with a handful of parched corn (Ruth 2 14) or 'pottage and bread broken into a bowl' (Bel 33; 𝔊87 adds 'a cruise of wine'), or bread with fish, dried or roasted, as relish (Jn. 21 9 13; cp Tob. 6 6 [𝔊BℵA], and see FISH, FOOD).

(b) Evening meal.—The principal meal of the day, however, was undoubtedly the evening meal (δεῖπνον), which was taken by rich and poor when 'the burden and heat of the day' were past (cp Judg. 19 21 with v. 16), that is in the late afternoon, before or just after sundown (see above, § 1). It would naturally fall later than 'the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice' (1 K. 18 36 41 Ps. 141 2); in NT times this took place daily about the ninth hour, which was consequently 'the hour of prayer' (Acts 3 1). The Hebrews are represented as having their chief meal in the evening as early as the time of the Exodus (Ex. 16 12), and the passover was from the first an evening meal. Josephus represents the spies dining with Rahab 'a little before sunset'—which was also the royal dinner hour (Ant. v.

[1] [The words וַתָּקָם בְּעוֹד לַיְלָה, 'and she rises while it is night,' make the first line of the ו distich overlong; Bickell may be right in omitting them: note Paseḳ. The sense then becomes clear, 'Having obtained a good supply of provision, she assigns to each his due amount of food.']

[2] The renderings 'dinner' and 'supper' respectively, adopted by EV, obscure the relative importance of the two meals, which would be better expressed by 'breakfast,'—'lunch' we fear is too modern—and 'dinner' corresponding to the French déjeuner and diner, with 'breakfast' and 'dine,' in place of 'dine' and 'sup' for the corresponding verbs. Delitzsch, we may add, is obliged in his Hebrew NT (e.g., Lk. 14 12), to make use of the circumlocutions סְעוּדַת צָהֳרַיִם (noontide meal) and ס׳ עֶרֶב (evening meal).

[3] Precisely 10 only at the equinoxes, at other times varying from about 9.40 to 10.20 A.M. according to the season of the year.

[4] Cp Susanna 7 13; also 2 S. 24 15, in 𝔊 ('till breakfast time'), where Pesh. renders 'till the sixth hour.' Josephus (Vit. 54) tells us that the Jews of his day felt bound to breakfast (ἀριστοποιεῖσθαι) at noon on Sabbaths. The practice of the Essenes was to work from sunrise till the fifth hour (about 11 A.M.), when they repaired, after an interval spent in the bath, to breakfast in the common dining-hall (δειπνητήριον) of the brotherhood (Jos. BJ ii. 8 5).

1 2). The meal (δεῖπνον, ibid. vi. 4 1) referred to in 1 S. 9 13 was late in the afternoon when the maidens were fetching water from the village fountain; it was a sacrificial meal (see SACRIFICE). When the meal was over it was time to retire to rest (κοίτης ὥρα Ant. l.c.; cp 1 S. 9 25 [𝔊] and Driver's note), as many instances besides this clearly show (Tob. 8 1 ff.; Jos. Ant. ii. 6 7 xiv. 15 11; Vit. 44; cp Eccl. 5 12 [11]). The time of the first miracle of the loaves and fishes was 'when the evening had come' (Mt. 14 15; cp Lk. 9 12), and it was 'toward evening' that Jesus reclined at dinner with the two disciples at Emmaus[1] (Lk. 24 29 f.).

3. Posture.

(a) Tables.—In the earliest times, the Hebrews, like their Bedouin kinsmen, must have sat upon the ground at meals, as in the idyllic scene, Gen. 18 1 ff. (so Judg. 6 19, 'under the oak'; cp Judith's attitude, Jud. 12 15). This was the custom also in the lower ranks of the ancient Egyptians, among whom several varieties of the posture were in vogue (see illustrations in Wilk. Anc. Eg., 1878, 1 419, cp 2 44). The Bedouins in some parts first spread on the ground a small mat of plaited straw or grass, or a round disc of leather (sufra; cp WRITING), round the edge of which a string has been inserted. By drawing the atter, the sufra becomes a bag, like a schoolboy's satchel, to hold the provisions for subsequent meals. On the outspread sufra is placed a large wooden bowl in which the meal is served; the guests sit round[2] and help themselves with the right hand from the steaming mess. Now the etymology of the ordinary Hebrew word for 'table' (šulḥān)[3] shows that it was originally identical with the sufra, a fact which throws light on the early Hebrew customs at meals. In course of time, however, it was found more convenient to raise the bowl or bowls in which the food was placed a few inches from the ground by means of a stand.

The stand must have resembled the stand or table composed of a tapering shaft about six inches high (Erman, Anc. Eg. 193, fig. 185) supporting a flat circular top largely used by the Egyptians, since the name of the round leather 'šulḥān' was extended to it (for illustrations, see dining scene in Wilkinson, loc. cit.). This circular table, when introduced into Rome from the East, received the name monopodium (illustr. and reff. in Rich's Rom. and Gk. Antiq. s.v.). All the tables of the ancients strike us as uncomfortably low (for Jewish tables note the table of shewbread on the arch of Titus, which according to the measurements in Reland's plate [De Spoliis Templi, 70] is twenty inches in height).

(b) Seats.—From the time that they came under Canaanitish influence the Hebrews appear to have sat at meals on chairs or stools (mōšāb, EV 'seat,' 1 S. 20 25); probably these differed but little in style from those in use in Egypt (see Wilk. op. cit. 1 408 ff.) and Assyria. The place of honour in Saul's time was the 'seat by the wall' (מוֹשַׁב הַקִּיר, 1 S. 20 25)—i.e., probably, by the wall opposite the entrance (as usually now). The fashion of sitting, however, gradually gave way before that of reclining on couches or divans (see BED, § 5).

'Reclining at meals was apparently not usual among the Assyrians (any more than among the Egyptians or the Homeric Greeks). In the famous garden scene (Brit. Mus. Assyrian sculptures) Asur-bâni-pal reclines on a rich couch . . ., but this is an exceptional luxury. Even his favourite queen is seated on a chair of state. Another monument represents four guests seated at a table (Bonomi, Nineveh and its Palaces, 191; Ragozin, Story of Assyria, 403 f.). Reclining was, however, general among more luxurious peoples, such as the Syrians and [1] Josephus dined after nightfall (Vit. 63), and on one occasion was still at table two hours (ὥρα νυκτὸς δευτέρα, ibid. 44) thereafter. The Essenes, like the rest of their countrymen, worked till evening (μέχρι δείλης), when they dined. At Alexandria the Jewish translators are represented as working till the ninth hour, after which came relaxation and dinner (Jos. Ant. xii. 2 13; cp the notice as to the dinner hour at the court of Ptolemy Philopator, 3 Macc. 5 14).

[2] Heb. סבב in OT = 'recline at table' only 1 S. 16 11 (לֹא נָסֹב), but frequently in later Hebrew in the Hiphil (see Levy, s.v.). Hence מֵסַב, Cant. 1 12 of the king's round table (see Del.; RV 'table'), מְסִבָּה, a feast; מְסֻבִּין, guests, etc.

MEALS

N. Israelites (in Amos's time; see Am. 3 12 6 4, and cp Hoffmann, ZATW, 1883, p. 102, and the engraving in Cesnola, Cyprus, its Cities, etc., 149), the Persians (Esth. 1 6 7 8), and probably the Babylonians, on whose luxuriousness see Is. 47 8 Jer. 51 39.'[1]

Reclining has become the usual position at meals for the writers of the Apocrypha (ἀνακεῖμαι, 1 Esd. 4 10; κατακλίνομαι, Jud. 12 15 [also 𝔊 in 1 S. 16 11, and four times in Lk.], ἀναπίπτω, Tob. 2 1 [Bℵ] 7 8 [ℵ], etc). It need hardly be said that in NT times the practice of reclining at meals (ἐπ' ἀγκῶνος δειπνεῖν) was universal throughout the peoples around the Mediterranean.[2] Among the Jews, however, as among the Greeks and Romans of the best period, it was only the men who reclined; the wives, we may be sure, continued to sit, either on the couch (κλίνη) at the feet of their husbands—Lk. 10 39, however, is not a case in point—or on chairs or stools (cp, again, the relief of Ašur-bāni-pal and his queen). The children sat on stools beside their parents (Mk. 7 28), as represented on various monuments of classical antiquity, dependents and slaves either on the ground (cp Judith 12 15) or, as at Rome, on benches (in subselliis, MH, ספסל mentioned along with couch, chair, and table, Kēlim 23) with a rest (ראש) at either end (ibid. 22 3).

The law, in later times, demanded that even the poorest Jews should enjoy the luxury of reclining at the festive Passover meal (Pĕsāchim 10 1, cp Columella, De Re Rust. xi. 1 19). This association of reclining with festivity rendered it natural for the Jews on the occasion of a death to overturn their couches and sit at meals while in mourning, a practice observed, according to Plutarch, by the younger Cato.

The women of the family, as has been implied, took their meals with the men (1 S. 1 4 ff. Ruth 2 14 Job 1 4; cp Ex. 12 3 ff. [Passover], Dt. 16 14 [Succoth]), except when strangers or distinguished guests were present (see Gen. 18 6 ff. [Sarah 'in the tent'], Judg. 19 6 ff. [only the two men of the party], 2 S. 13 23 Est. 1 9 ff.).[3]

4. Procedure: order of feast, etc.

Let us now follow the course of an imaginary entertainment in NT times, noting, as we proceed, the historical development of customs. The occasions for merry-makings were as numerous as among ourselves (see FAMILY, FEAST, MARRIAGE, BIRTHDAY, CIRCUMCISION). It was usual to send invitations early (to invite is 'to call'[4]; 1 S. 9 13 Lk. 14 9, etc.) through servants (Mt. 22 3; cp Prov. 9 3). On the appointed day, it was not unusual to send a messenger (vocator) with a reminder (Mt. 22 4 Lk. 14 17), or even to conduct the guests to the place of entertainment (Est. 6 14). This custom still prevails in the East (see Plummer's note on Lk. 14 18 21).

Arrived at the host's residence, the guest is received with a kiss (Lk. 7 45), and probably conducted to the anteroom or vestibule of the dining-room[5] (see HOUSE, col. 2131). Here the welcome attention of washing the guest's feet—doubly welcome if performed by the host or hostess in person (1 S. 25 41 1 Tim. 5 10; cp Jn. 13 4 ff.)—and anointing his head (see ANOINTING, § 2), is offered.[6] Or, if the space of the house is too limited for

[2] The late Heb. term is הֵסֵב (in OT, in the sense of sitting at table, 1 S. 16 11), hence מֵסַב in Cant., a product of the Greek period, may well be 'table' as EV (1 12). The favourite NT terms are ἀνακεῖμαι and κατακεῖμαι, but not the simple verb; ἀνα- and κατακλίνομαι, ἀναπίπτω; συνανακεῖμαι (οἱ συνανακείμενοι, the guests, Mt. 14 9, etc.; cp οἱ συγκατακείμενοι, Jos. Ant. xii. 4 9); Josephus also supplies προκατακλίνω, Ant. xv. 9 4; -κλίνομαι, vi. 4 1, 'to take a higher place at table'; ὑποκατακλίνομαι, 'to take a lower place, xii. 4 9. Cp Lk. 14 7 ff., and below.

[3] Dan. 5 2 ff. cannot be cited for the normal Jewish practice.

[5] We infer this from the well-known aphorism in Pirḳē Ābōth (4 23, ed. Taylor).

[6] The custom of washing the feet has not yet died out in the East. See Robinson, BR [1841], 3 26; Doughty, Ar. Des. 2 136.

this, the guest is ushered at once into the dining-room. 'Ten cubits by ten' (עֶשֶׂר עַל־עֶשֶׂר) is given in the Mishna (Bābā Bathrā, 6 4) as the dimensions of an average triclinium (טְרִיקְלִין), or dining-room, which gives a room from 15 to 18 feet square.[1] If its owner is inclined to follow the Roman fashion, doubtless adopted at the court of Herod, and, as the above-mentioned loan-word shows, already familiar to the people, the room is furnished with three very wide couches—each sufficient to accomodate three guests reclining full-length at right-angles to the table—ranged round three sides of a square table, the fourth side, towards the door, being left free for the service.[2] In most Jewish houses, however, it must be assumed that there still prevailed the Greek custom, according to which the couches were much narrower, each holding only two guests as a rule, who reclined at an acute angle to the small oblong tables. Of these one was provided for each couch. If the party was small or the room very large, each guest might have a couch and table, as at the Egyptian court (Jos. Ant. xii. 4 9: τὴν παρακειμένην αὐτῷ τράπεζαν).

Before the arrival of the guests, their respective claims to precedence have been duly weighed by the host. The 'chief places' (RV for πρωτοκλισίαι, Mt. 23 6 Mk. 12 39 Lk. 14 7 20 46; cp τὴν πρώτην ἀνάκλισιν, Aristeas, ed. Wendland, 187) were demanded as a right by the priestly aristocracy; but these claims were, in the time of Jesus, continually called in question by the more democratic Pharisees. If the guests were all of the same social status, arranging them was a simple matter. Precedence went according to age (אחר זקנה, Bābā Bathrā, 120 a), as in Joseph's entertainment (Gen. 43 33), and at the court of Ptolemy (Aristeas, loc. cit.). As long as sitting at meals was customary, the seat of honour (καθέδρα δόξης, Ecclus. 7 4) was at the right hand of the host. But which were the πρωτοκλισίαι (literally, the chief reclining-places) in the later period? Putting aside those houses into which the triclinium, with its strict etiquette, had been introduced, we may suppose that the older custom of separate couches and tables, as explained above, was still observed.

It was in such a house that Jesus observed how the Pharisees 'chose out the chief seats' (Lk. 14 7), which were doubtless the places at the head of each couch—i.e., at the end provided with the arm-rest (ἐπίκλιντρον; רְפִידָה=ἀνάκλιτον [𝔊] or reclinatorium [Vg.], Cant. 3 10). To prove this we need not refer to the analogy of the Roman triclinium. In a Jewish treatise—of somewhat late date, it is true—the question is asked: 'What is the etiquette of reclining at table' (Tōseftā, Bĕrākh. 5 5)? The answer runs thus: 'When there are two couches, the most honourable (guest) reclines at the head of the first couch (מֵיסֵב בְּרֹאשׁ שֶׁל רִאשׁוֹנָה), and the next to him (in rank) on the couch on his right. But when there are three couches, the most honourable (guest) reclines at the head of the middle couch, the next to him (in rank) above him [i.e., in the corresponding place on the couch to his left], the third (in rank) on the couch to his right.'[3] The place of the host was no doubt, as in Greece and Rome, close to the principal guest, most probably the second place on the centre couch.

Before leaving this part of our subject, we may refer briefly to the much debated question as to the relative positions of Jesus and his disciples at the Last Supper. From the narratives in the Gospels and from our knowledge of contemporary Jewish practice, it may safely be said that the little band reclined in the usual way round a single table. On this particular occasion they may have occupied four separate couches. Jesus and John, we know for certain, reclined on the same couch, the former, we can hardly doubt, in the place of honour at the head of the principal couch—perhaps the second from the left, facing the entrance to the upper room (ἀνάγαιον,[1] Mk. 14 15 Lk. 22 12) in which they met—with the beloved disciple below him on his right (ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, Jn. 13 23). Judas must have been within easy reach of the Master (see ibid. v. 26), either in the third place on the same couch (the second), or in the corresponding place on the couch (the first) above.[2] Peter, finally, must have reclined some places below John, on the third or fourth couch, from either of which he could easily be seen by John (see ibid. v. 24). Beyond this all is pure conjecture.

The vexed question of precedence settled, the guests take their places on the mattress (in Mishna כַּר),[3] on the couch assigned to them. These places are indicated by the cushions (kĕseth, προσκεφάλαιον; see CUSHION, BED) on which each leans his left elbow (cp Ezek. 13 18 𝔊, προσκεφάλαια ὑπὸ πάντα ἀγκῶνα χειρός) leaving the right hand and arm free. In the houses of the rich, mattress and pillows were covered with silk (Am. 3 12, RV), in those of the poor with leather (Miḳw. 10 2 Kēl. 26 5). At this stage water was brought for the important ceremony of the 'washing of hands' (נְטִילַת יָדַיִם).

5. 'Washing of hands.'

This 'washing of hands' must be clearly distinguished from ordinary washing (רְחִיצָה), being, strictly, not a washing at all, but an affusion or pouring of water from a vessel on the hands, as is indicated by the usual Hebrew phrase just given, which is shortened from נְטִילַת מַיִם עַל הַיָּדַיִם (lit. 'a lifting up of water upon the hands').[4]

This practice of pouring water on the hands before meals is not mentioned in the OT (but see Tobit, 7 9, text of א); it would be rash on that account to regard the ceremony as of late origin, in view of its universal observance by the civilised nations of antiquity (for Egypt see Erman, 179-181; Wilkinson, 1 425; for Greece, the Homeric poems passim; cp Æn. 1 705). By the first century of our era the greatest importance was attached to its observance, as we see from various passages of the NT (see esp. Mk. 7 1-4), especially by the adherents of the Pharisees. It is described as 'a tradition of the elders' (l.c., v. 3): in other words it was not claimed as a Mosaic institution. At least two attempts to justify the practice from the Pentateuch, however, are found in the Talmud, one authority basing it on Lev. 15 11 (so Chullīn, 105 a), another on Lev. 20 7 (Bĕrākh. 53 b).

The passage Lev. 20 7 affords a characteristic example of Rabbinic exegesis: 'Sanctify yourselves therefore; this is the washing of hands before meals; and be ye holy: this is the [1] According as the cubit is reckoned at eighteen or at twenty-one inches.

[2] See arts. Lectus and Triclinium in the Dicts. of Classical Antiquities.

[3] This is clear and explicit enough. Nevertheless even good scholars (see, e.g., Thayer, sub πρωτοκλισία and Plummer on Lk. 14 7) have been misled by Edersheim (see Jesus the Messiah, 2 207 f.), who unwarrantably (as the present writer thinks) renders מִטָּה, in a Talmudic passage (Bĕrākh. 46 b) similar to that above quoted, by 'cushions,' with the result that on a given couch 'if there are three cushions, the third worthiest lies below him who has lain down first (at his right), so that the chief person is in the middle (between the worthiest guest at his left hand, and the less worthy one at his right hand.') By this mistaken rendering the πρωτοκλισίαι are wrongly transferred by Edersheim to the middle places on each couch—i.e., from the locus summus to the locus medius;—or are we meant to infer that the three chief guests at a banquet were all accommodated on one couch?

[1] Not necessarily the same as the 'guest-chamber' (τὸ κατάλυμα), according to Plummer, in loc.

[2] It is doubtful if Judas' proximity to Jesus can be based on Mt. 26 23 (ὁ ἐμβάψας μετ' ἐμοῦ τὴν χεῖρα ἐν τῷ τρυβλίῳ; cp Mk. 14 17 20) since there may have been only one such 'dish,' viz., that containing the ḥaroseth (see PASSOVER, § 17). If we could be sure that there was one 'dish' for each couch, as some suggest, then Judas' position would be decided in favour of the first of the two alternatives given above.

[3] Perhaps in Is. 21 5, צָפֹה צָפִית, 'they spread the mats' (for the grounds see Che. Intr. Is. 126). [But cp OBADIAH (BOOK), where this difficult phrase is emended in the light of the theory mentioned in Crit. Rev. 11 (1901) 18.]

[4] Hence ῥαντίζομαι, the reading of אB adopted by WH and others, is a much more appropriate term for the ceremony than βαπτίζομαι of TR in Mk. 7 4. The latter corresponds exactly to the Heb. הִטְבִּיל, to dip the hands in water, as required in certain circumstances before eating. For further details of this distinction between נְטִילָה and טְבִילָה, see Maimonides' preface to the treatise Yādāyim (Surenhusius' Mishna, vol. vi. p. 480, and Meuschen, Nov. Test. e Talmude illustr. 239).

washing of hands after meals; for I am the Lord your God: this is the blessing.' A large part of the Mishna treatise Yādáyim (hands) is devoted to discussing the minimum quantity of water necessary, which was fixed at a quarter lōg (=1½ 'egg-fuls'), the kind of water admissible, and other minutiæ. Similar prescriptions are given in Chăgīgā 2 5; 'Before partaking of common food (חוּלִין), the tithe and the tĕrūmah, water must be poured (נטל) over the hands; before consecrated food (קוֹדֶשׁ, i.e., portions of the sacrificial victims) the hands must be dipped (טבל) in water' (cp Chullīn, 106*a*).

As among the people of classical antiquity and in the East at the present day, an attendant made the round of the guests with a small ewer and basin, both generally of brass (see illust. in Lane's Mod. Egyptians), the ewer containing water which had been kept from possible defilement in large stone jars, the ὑδρίαι of Jn. 2 6 ff. The hands were held over the basin, and the water allowed to run to the wrist (עַד־הַפֶּרֶק, Yād. 2 3, Chull. 106 a, b). This, after all, seems the simplest interpretation of the words in the second Gospel: ἐὰν μὴ πυγμῇ νίψωνται τὰς χεῖρας, οὐκ ἐσθίουσιν (Mk. 7 3 [ℵB, etc.]).[1] Originally a single ablution sufficed; but by the end of the second century, the process was repeated, the hands now being held downwards so that the water (distinguished as מַיִם אַחֲרוֹנִים, or second water, from the first water מַיִם רִאשׁוֹנִים) might carry off the defilement supposed to be contracted by the water of the first washing (for details see Yād. 2 1-3 and Edersheim, Life and Times, 2 11 f.). The Hebrew termini technici just quoted have often, with doubtful propriety, been applied to the washing before and after meals respectively. A napkin (מַפָּה, mappah, Bĕrākh. 8 3: מִטְפַּחַת יָדַיִם, Kēl. 9 3 24 14) was used to dry the hands, after which it might be laid on the table (so the school of Shammai) or on the cushion (so Hillel—see Bĕrākh. loc. cit.).

The washing of hands after meals, which may be here mentioned by anticipation, was more a matter of convenience than of ritual to people to whom the use of knives and forks was unknown. The description of Elisha as the prophet 'which poured water on the hands of Elijah' (2 K. 3 11) has in all probability a reference to the washing of hands after, if not also before, meals.

In later times, the more fastidious were wont to wash after each course, regarding which the Talmud holds that while 'the washing of hands before and after meals is a duty, washing during a meal, between one course and another, is a matter of choice' (Chull. 105 a). There was an order of precedence in this matter of washing also, the most honoured guest washing first (Bĕrākh. 46*b*).

The company having performed the required ablutions in due order, the host gives the sign to 'bring in the tables' (εἰσφέρειν τραπέζας; cp παρέθηκε τράπεζαν in the figurative sense of setting food), for before the introduction of the fixed table of the triclinium, the attendants carried in and placed before each couch a low table on which (to use a modern expression) the covers were already laid. Such was the 'spread table' (שֻׁלְחָן עָרוּךְ) of Ezek. 23 41, ערך 'ārak being the word used for preparing the domestic table (Is. 21 5 Ps. 23 5 Prov. 9 2), as well as for arranging the sacrifice upon the altar, 'the table of Yahwè' (Ez. 41 22 44 16 Mal. 1 7 12).

6. Serving.

In the more modest households, the meals were served, as well as prepared, by the women of the family (Mt. 8 15 Mk. 1 31), although exceptions are occasionally found (2 K. 4 43 Lk. 17 7 f.). In the houses of the rich, the waiting (Esth. 6 3 5 [A]) was done entirely by men, who were in most cases no doubt slaves. The standing expression in Hebrew is šērēth (שֵׁרֵת) (διακονέω, ministro), of which the participle mĕšārĕthīm (1 K. 10 5 2 K. 4 43 Esth. 1 10 2 2 etc.; NT διάκονοι [EV 'servants'] Jn. 2 5 9) is the equivalent of our 'waiters,' a word used by AV only in Judith 13 1 as the rendering of οἱ παρεστῶτες (but RV 'them that waited'; cp ἡ παράστασις 'attendance,' 1 Macc. 15 32). The Hebrew historians (see 1 K. 10 5 2 Ch. 9 4) have given us a life-like picture of Solomon's table, the king presiding, flanked on either hand by 'the gentlemen of the household' on chairs (מוֹשַׁב עֲבָדָיו), the waiters standing in attendance (מַעֲמַד מְשָׁרְתָיו, στάσις λειτουργῶν), dressed, like the cupbearers, in the royal livery (מַלְבּוּשׁ). In later Hebrew a waiter is שַׁמָּשׁ (Bĕrākh. 7 1 Pĕsāch. 7 13) from שִׁמֵּשׁ (Ābōth 1 3), the equivalent of the older שֵׁרֵת.

At the stage of the dinner which we have now reached, the host, following ancient custom, says 'grace' (בְּרָכָה; lit. 'a blessing'). The first trace of a 'grace before meat' is usually detected in the incident recorded in 1 S. 9 13, where the people delay partaking of the sacrificial meal until the arrival of Samuel to 'bless the sacrifice.' The village feast here described, however, is not in any sense an ordinary domestic meal. The earliest mention of a grace in the ordinary acceptation of the term seems to be in the letter of the Pseudo-Aristeas ('not later than 200 B.C.; Schürer), in which is given an account of the reception by Ptolemy Philadelphus of the Jewish scholars professedly sent to translate the Hebrew Scriptures for his library.

7. The Blessing.

At the royal table one of the delegates, Elisha by name, a priest, was requested to say grace (ποιήσασθαι κατευχήν, Aristeas, ed. Wendland, 184, cp Jos. Ant. xii. 2 12), which he did standing. In the Gospels the blessing or thanksgiving before a meal has the repeated sanction of Jesus (εὐλογέω Mt. 26 26 Mk. 8 7 Lk. 9 16; εὐχαριστέω Mt. 15 36 26 27 Mk. 8 6 Lk. 22 17 etc.), as in Acts 27 35 it has that of Paul (cp 1 Tim. 4 3 f.). Of the contemporary Essenes, we are informed by Josephus that 'a priest says grace (προκατεύχεται) before meat, and it is unlawful for any one to taste food before grace' (πρὶν τῆς εὐχῆς BJ ii. 8 5).

For the practice of saying grace after meat, which later Judaism finds enjoined in Dt. 8 10 ('when thou hast eaten and art full, then shalt thou bless Yahwè thy God for the good land which he hath given thee'), we have no biblical evidence. From this fact, and from the stress laid by Josephus (loc. cit.) on the fact that the pious Essenes offered prayers both before and after meat, we gather that a second grace was not yet customary in the first century. By the end of the second, however, as the treatise Bĕrākhōth (blessings) clearly proves, a grace, not only before and after a meal but also at various stages of it, had become the rule in orthodox households.

A considerable part (chaps. 6-8) of the treatise Bĕrākhōth is devoted to discussing the various forms of grace appropriate to wine and different kinds of food, such as bread, fruit, etc., and at what points in the progress of the meal the various blessings should be said. Among the more noteworthy injunctions are the following:—'To say grace is incumbent on women, slaves and children' all of whom were exempted from wearing the phylacteries and from certain other religious duties (Bĕrākh. 2 3). 'If several people sit at table, each says grace for himself, but if they recline one says grace for all' (6 6). 'Whoso has eaten and has forgotten to say grace, must, the school of Shammai maintains, return to his place and say grace; but the school of Hillel holds that he may say grace in the place where he remembers [the omission]' (8 7). 'Amen is to be said after an Israelite has said grace (cp 1 Cor. 14 16), but not after a non-Israelite, unless one has heard the whole blessing' (8 8). As specimens of these early graces, it must suffice to quote those to be said over bread and wine respectively. Over the former the 'blessing' runs—'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who bringest forth bread from the earth'; over the latter—'Blessed, etc. (these words being common to all the blessings), who createst the fruit of the vine' (cp Mt. 26 29 and parall.). To these may be added this specimen of a grace after meat—'Blessed be the Lord our God the God of Israel, the God of hosts, enthroned upon the Cherubim, for the food which we have eaten' (7 3).

An entertainment such as that now being described consisted among the Jews, as among their Gentile contemporaries, of two parts, the δεῖπνον or dinner, at which wine was taken sparingly or not at all, and the following 'banquet' mišteh (מִשְׁתֶּה, from שתה 'to drink,' = συμπόσιον) which was chiefly devoted to the pleasures of the wine-cup.[1] This twofold division corresponds to the 'first' and 'second tables' of classical antiquity. The 'first table,' to which we now proceed, consisted of various courses according to the wealth and inclination of the host, who, on weekdays but not on the Sabbath, might have drawn up for him a list of dishes (cp γραμματίδιον, menu-card, Athen. 2 33), as well as of his guests (see Shabb. 23 2). The dinner of the Essenes, according to Josephus, consisted of a single course (ἐξ ἑνὸς ἐδέσματος); but that of the average middle-class household probably consisted of two or three. The first course, corresponding in the main to the gustatio of the Romans, was composed of light, appetising dishes of the nature of hors-d'œuvre.[1] Among these were salted fish (see FISH, § 7) without bread, eggs boiled or beaten with oil (Shabb. 8 5), preserved vegetables of all sorts, olives, and piquant sauce or vinegar into which the 'morsel of bread' might be dipped, etc. Appetisers like the caper (see CAPER-BERRY) were for special occasions or special needs.

On this followed the deipnon (cœna) in the narrower sense of the word, consisting of a varying number of courses of vegetables, fish, fowl, and flesh, as described in detail in the general articles FOOD, FISH, FOWL. The more substantial courses were varied, on great occasions, by a number of side-dishes or entrées, for which various names are found in later Jewish literature. Wine was handed round 'in the course of the meal' (בְּתוֹךְ הַמָּזוֹן Bĕrākh. 6 6).

9. The Plate. The dishes in which the viands were served—the כְּלֵי תַשְׁמִישׁ or 'vessels for the service (of the table)' of the Mishna—naturally varied according to the wealth and social position of the household, vessels of earthenware and wood predominating in the houses of the poor, of brass, silver, etc., and even gold (see below) in the houses of the rich. The small size of the ancient table, however, did not allow of the same display of 'plate' (Judith 12 1), as is customary in modern times. Thus, of the Greek table it has been said, 'the name πίναξ (besides signifying 'tray') is also given to the plates (see below), which, with the bread baskets and the small vessels to hold seasoning and hors-d'œuvre, compose the whole table service' (Daremberg et Saglio, Dict. des Antiq., s.v. 'Cæna,' 1275*a*), a statement confirmed by many representations on Greek vases and elsewhere. Bread, which formed a conspicuous feature of every meal, was served in shallow wicker baskets (סַל OT and Mishna passim—e.g., Gen. 40 16-18; סַל הַפַּת Kēl. 23, סַלֵּי כְפָרִים Shabb. 16 3 𝔊 κανοῦν); cp BASKETS. In ancient times a similar basket of closely plaited grass, reeds, or straw was even used to serve meat in (Judg. 6 19), and such trays are still common in the East (Palgrave, Cent. Arab. 1 52 ff., Landberg, Prov. 62). One of the most frequently mentioned of table dishes is the ḳĕʿārāh (AV 'dish'; 'charger' in Nu. 7 13 where mention is made of silver 'chargers' of 130 shekels weight; 𝔊 generally τρυβλίον; cp also Ecclus. 34 14 Jos. Ant. iii. 8 10). This is 'the dish' mentioned in the accounts of the Last Supper (Mt. 26 23 Mk. 14 20). It must have been a round, deep dish not unlike the catinum[2] of the Romans, by which Vg. renders in Mk. 14 20. In the Mishna we very frequently find associated with the kĕʿārāh a dish termed tamḥûy (תַּמְחוּי, Shabb. 3 5 Nĕd. 4 4 etc.), which appears to have been round like the keʿārāh but much shallower. This we infer from the fact that, when made of metal, the tamḥûy was capable of being used as a mirror (Kēl. 30 2). It may, therefore, be identified with the πίναξ, the 'charger' of Mt. 14 8 11 Mk. 6 25 28 (see under Lanx in Rich). The πίναξ is also 'the platter' of Lk. 11 39, for which the parallel passage Mt. 23 25 has παροψίς (AV also 'platter'; Vg. paropsis)—originally a four-cornered[1] dish for entrées, as the etymology shows, but later a name for table dishes in general. It may be that tamḥûy is a later name for the older ṣallaḥath (CRUSE, 3), the 'dish' into which the sluggard thrusts his hand but is too lazy to bring it again to his mouth (Prov. 19 24 RV, 26 15 2 K. 21 13). In the Mishna we also find an interesting variety of the same dish (תַּמְחוּי הַמְּזוֹנוֹן Kel. 16 1), evidently a large wooden tray with various compartments (a sort of compotier, Levy) in which several viands could be served at once. These 'service-vessels,' as we have seen, were of very varied material, only the rich and high-placed, like Holofernes, having a service of 'plate' (τὰ ἀργυρώματα, Jud. 12 1 15 11 AV; but RV 'silver vessels'). Wealthy monarchs like Solomon and Ahasuerus may really have had all their plate of gold (1 K. 10 21 2 Ch. 9 20 Esth. 1 7). A service of gold plate (χρυσώματα καὶ διακονίαν—a hendiadys, 'golden vessels to be served in' as AV) was sent by the young King Antiochus VI. to Jonathan the Asmonæan (1 Macc. 11 58). Wealthy Romans were fond of displaying their plate on a species of sideboard known as abacus [see illust. in Rich]; something very similar is intended by the κυλίκιον (EV 'cupboard') in or on which Jonathan's successor Simon displayed his 'gold and silver vessels,' to the admiration of the Syrian envoy (1 Macc. 15 32). Such, too, was 'the κυλίκιον of thirty talents' weight,' presented by Ptolemy Philadelphus to Eleazar, according to Aristeas (Wendl. 320).[2]

10. Cutlery. Knives and forks were used chiefly in the kitchen and for carving (see KNIFE, COOKING UTENSILS, § 5). The former, however, were also used for peeling fruit, as we see from the dramatic incident of Herod's attempted suicide recorded by Josephus (Ant. xvii. 7, BJ i. 33 7 μαχαίριον). 'Spoons' is hardly a correct rendering in Ex. 25 29 etc.; see ALTAR, § 10. The real spoon (tarwād, תַּרְוָד) is first mentioned in post-biblical literature, but even then, like the cochlear of the Romans, chiefly in connection with medicine. It might be of metal (Kēl. 17 12), glass (ibid. 30 2), or bone (Shabb. 8 6).[3] Even among the most civilised nations of antiquity, as in Eastern lands to this day, it was the universal custom to eat with the fingers without the aid of their modern substitutes, the first two fingers and the thumb of the right hand being used for this purpose (see reff. above, § 5, also close of article). The 'broth' of Judg. 6 19 Is. 65 4, sauces, and the like, were eaten by dipping in them a piece of bread, the 'sop' (ψωμίον) of Jn. 13 26 ff. (cp Ruth 2 14). Each guest had his 'portion' (מָנָה, 1 S. 1 4 f. 9 23) or 'mess' (מַשְׂאֵת, Gen. 43 34 μερίς [𝔊], 2 S. 11 8 ἄρσις [𝔊BA]; cp Lk. 10 42 the 'good part' or portion) placed before him by the attendants, a guest whom the host wished specially to honour being helped to some special delicacy, as in Saul's case (1 S. 9 23—by Josephus called μερὶς βασιλική, Ant. vi. 4 1), or receiving a more ample portion than the others (Gen. 43 34 1 S. 1 5: read 'double portion' as AVmg.). 'Portions' might also be sent, as a further token of honour, to the house of the recipient (2 S. 11 8; cp Neh. 8 12).

11. Symposium. At the close of the deipnon proper came the second washing of hands (see above), after which—if we may judge from contemporary usage elsewhere—'the first tables' were removed (αἴρειν, ἐκφέρειν τραπέζας: Plut. Symp. 8 4). This custom, however, cannot have been universal among the Jews, for according to the Mishna it was often the practice to wash the tables with a sponge (Shabb. 21 3, cp Od. 1 111), at the same time that the crumbs (ψίχια, Mt. 15 27) which had fallen 'between the couches' were swept up (Bĕrākh. 8 4, Bēṣā 2 7). In the former case the 'second tables' were brought in, and the attendants proceeded to place on them the dessert, consisting for the most part of some of the many varieties of fruit, fresh or preserved, for which Syria has been at all times famous (see FRUIT). Over the fruit was said an appropriate blessing: 'Blessed art Thou, etc. who createst the fruit of the tree' (Bĕrākh. 6 1). Whether the fruit was sent to table in 'baskets of silver' (Prov. 25 11 RV) is doubtful. See BASKETS.

[1] This course might, accordingly, be reckoned as purely hors-d'œuvre, i.e., as preliminary to the proper meal (cp פַּרְפֶּרֶת שֶׁלִּפְנֵי הַמָּזוֹן, lit. a side dish before the meal, Bĕrākh. 6 5), and offered to the guests even before they reclined at table, accompanied by a cup of wine. These being handed round as the guests were still seated in the 'vestibule' or in the dining-room itself, grace (as we have just seen) was at this stage said by each guest individually, as distinguished from the common blessing when all had reclined. See the Gĕmārā in Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds to the above Mishna.

Various designations for this part of the entertainment are found in the Talmud. One of these, מְרוּנִיָּמָא, is merely a naturalised form of the Greek word for dessert, τραγήματα, while another, אַפִּיקוֹמָן, by its etymology (probably ἐπὶ κῶμον, ad commissationem; cp κῶμος EV 'revelling,' 1 Pet. 4 3 Rom. 13 13 Gal. 5 21) indicates that dessert formed the transition to the second main division of the entertainment, the mišteh or symposium.

Before the symposium proper began, however, the guests anointed afresh, wine and ointments being naturally associated. With ointment is also associated incense (קְטֹרֶת, Prov. 27 9 Ezek. 23 41), and in later times a special kind of incense or aromatic spice, known as מוּגְמָר, was laid upon charcoal and handed round after the meal (Bēṣā 2 7). A special blessing was even said over it by the orthodox (Bĕrākh. 6 4). With it the guests perfumed their clothes (Ps. 45 8 [9] Cant. 3 6) and probably their beards as well (see Lane, Mod. Eg. chap. 8, with illustr., Palgrave, East. and Cent. Arab. 26). Nor, we may be sure, was it only among the Jews of Alexandria that the summons of the author of the Wisdom of Solomon found a ready response; 'Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and perfumes; and let no flower of spring pass us by; Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds before they be withered' (Wisd. 2 7 f. RV).

Although the Hebrews may not have had the same fondness, amounting to a passion, for flowers, that characterised their Egyptian contemporaries (Wilk. 1 426-9 with illust., Erman, 193 f., 255), the custom of wearing flowers either as chaplets (Is. 28 1 ff.) or otherwise at their banquets was one, as we see, of considerable antiquity. The crown (στέφανος) which it was usual to award to the successful symposiarch (Ecclus. 32 1 f.) was probably no more than a special garland of flowers. By the first century the custom in question had spread under Hellenistic influence to the common soldiers in the army (Jos. Ant. xix. 9 11, στεφανούμενοι καὶ μυριζόμενοι; cp CHAPLET).

Although there is evidence (see above, § 8) that wine was not denied to the guests during the first part of the entertainment, still the Jews, like the Greeks, regarded the second part as the proper period for enjoying 'the fruit of the vine.' It was usual to appoint one of the guests to be 'ruler [or governor] of the feast' (ἡγούμενος Ecclus. 35 1 [AV 32 1]; probably also Lk. 22 26) whose duty it was to take measures for the conduct of the feast, as arbiter bibendi to regulate the manner and quantity of the drinking, and to enforce penalties in the case of any breach of etiquette. There has been much discussion among the learned as to whether the ἀρχιτρίκλινος of Jn. 2 8 f. is to be identified with the symposiarch in the sense indicated by Ben-Sira, or with the functionary, generally a slave, known as the τρικλινιάρχης or head waiter who arranged the tables and couches and superintended the service generally. The distinction between the ruler and the 'servants' in v. 9 and the tone of equality which characterises the remarks of v. 10 seem to decide for the former alternative.[1]

In the palaces of royalty, however, we find a special set of attendants who brought the wine to table—the מַשְׁקִים (οἰνοχόοι) or 'cupbearers' (1 K. 10 5 AVmg.), over whom was set the 'chief butler' (see CUPBEARER). At an Egyptian banquet, according to Wilkinson, while the men had male attendants, the women were waited upon by females, a custom which the Greek translators of Ecclesiastes evidently considered as obtaining at the court of Solomon (Eccl. 2 8 οἰνοχόον καὶ οἰνοχόας).[1]

The Jews of the Greek and Roman periods certainly drank their wine mixed (see Bel 33 in 𝔊, 2 Macc. 15 39, Bĕrākh. 7 5). It must, however, be left an open question whether this practice was customary in earlier times, since the biblical references to māsak, 'mingling' (מָסַךְ, Is. 5 22 Prov. 9 2 5) are rather to be understood of the addition of aromatic herbs (but see Prov. 9 2 𝔊). The use of hot water, also, is proved both by the mention of the heating apparatus (מֵחַם) in Pĕsāchīm 7 13, and by the express testimony of Ma'ăśĕrōth 4 4.

12. Use of wine.

From the scanty biblical data and from Assyrian and Egyptian analogies we may presume that the drinking-vessels of the Hebrews had different shapes, some being shallow, others deep. To the former class—the kōs (כּוֹס)—belong such cups as are held by Ašur-bāni-pal and his queen in the famous garden-scene relief. Larger than the kōs was the mizrāḳ (מִזְרָק), as we may infer from its being used to catch the blood of the sacrificial victims. Large bowls were used by the Assyrians, and also, no doubt, by the Hebrews, for mixing wine with pounded aromatic herbs. Out of these bowls (the גְּבִיעִים of Jer. 35 5) the drinking-vessels appear to have been filled (i.e., not, as the Greek custom required, by means of a kyathus). See also BASON, BOWL, CUP, FLAGON.

We have no means of knowing the drinking code by which, under the presidency of the 'ruler of the feast,' a Jewish symposium was regulated. As our earliest evidence of this officer does not go beyond 200 B.C. (see above, § 11), the laws by which he ruled were probably modelled on those of the Greeks (for which see art. 'symposium' in Smith's, and 'commissatio' in Daremberg and Saglio's Dicts.). The existence of such a code as we refer to among the Jews of the Greek period is further confirmed by the statement in Est. 1 8, the true meaning of which undoubtedly is (see 𝔊, Vg.) that on this occasion the code was relaxed and the drinking proceeded 'according to every man's pleasure.' The same freedom characterises the picture drawn by Josephus of the Jewish soldiers toasting each other when celebrating by a debauch the death of Herod Agrippa (Ant. xix. 9 1). It was customary for the host to drink to the health of his guests (προπίνειν, διὰ τῶν προπόσεων, Aristeas, ed. Wendland, 235, 261, 274).

No banquet such as we have had in view throughout would have been complete, if it did not provide some higher form of entertainment than the mere emptying of wine-cups. Music, in particular, from the earliest times, was a never-failing accompaniment of the social feast. Thus Amos (6 5 f., see DAVID, § 13, n. 3) and Isaiah (5 12) upbraid their contemporaries for their luxurious feasts, of which music was an element. David, according to 2 S. 19 35 [36], had already a choir of 'singing men and singing women,' an institution which a late Hebrew writer represents as also flourishing at the court of Solomon (Eccl. 2 8). Not much later, in all probability, is the testimony of Ben Sira (Ecclus. 32 [35] 3-6; note the enthusiastic eulogy of a 'concert of music,' σύγκριμα μουσικῶν). With music, as a matter of course, went dancing, which was performed by the attendants (see DANCE), and since 'a feast is made for laughter' (Eccl. 10 19), we find, as we might expect, riddles and conundrums propounded, such as that given by Samson (Judg. 14 12 ff.),[1] and those with which the Talmud abounds. To these varied forms of entertainment were probably added feats of agility, and jugglers' tricks, similar to those in which the Egyptians delighted (see illustr. Wilk. 253 ff., Erman, 248 f.), the whole being comprised under the general name ἀκρόαμα (Ecclus. 32 [35] 4), a term as comprehensive as the Eastern fantasia of to-day (see 'Acroama' in Daremb. et Saglio). An ideal philosopher's banquet rather than a picture from real life has been sketched for us in great detail by the Pseudo-Aristeas, whose famous letter is now (1901) accessible to all in the editions of Wendland (Aristeæ ad Philocratem epistula, 1900, translated in Kautzsch's Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen, vol. ii.) and Thackeray (in Swete's Introd. to the OT in Gk., 1900, pp. 499 ff.).

13. Entertainments.

[1] The second of the above alternatives (τρικλινιάρχης) is suggested by the 'steward' of RVmg.

[1] [שדה ושדות is probably a corrupt repetition of שרים ושרות. Cp ECCLESIASTES, § 2, n.—T. K. C.]

This article may fitly be brought to a close with some remarks on what may be termed the manners of the table,[2] in addition to what has been already said on certain points of etiquette in connection with the 'chief seats,' etc. It is hardly necessary to advert, even in a sentence, to the well-known ἐγκράτεια (Ecclus. 18 30 in title 𝔊) of the Hebrews with regard to the pleasures of the table. It is not merely that they condemn such excesses as aroused the indignation of an Amos (4 1 6 4 ff.) or an Isaiah (5 12 28 1-8); we find throughout a wise moderation as regards eating and drinking recommended both by precept (Prov. 23 20 f.) and by example (cp the justifiable pride of Josephus in his countrymen's σωφροσύνη; c. Ap. 2 23 32, and Pseudo-Aristeas, 223). Where exceptions are mentioned, as Gen. 9 20 ff. 1 K. 20 16 ff., they are 'for warning and reproof.' We would rather call attention, as above indicated, to sentiments on a minor key, so to say, like those of Ḳōhéleth on eating 'in due season' (Eccl. 10 16 f.), and to such sound advice as that of Prov. 23 1 f. The chief authority, however, on the 'minor morals' of the dinner table is Ben Sira, the author of the two loci classici Ecclus. 31 12-18 32 3-12. In the latter passage the theme is mainly the etiquette of conversation at dinner (see vv. 3 4 7-9), in the former the reader is warned against greediness and unseemly haste at table (31 14 RV; cp vv. 12 16). He is further recommended not to be overscrupulous as to his diet (v. 16; cp Lk. 10 8). There is also sage advice regarding moderation in eating: 'Be first to leave off for manners' sake,' etc. (v. 17, cp v. 20 in praise of 'moderate eating,' also 32 11), and in drinking: 'Wine is as good as life to a man, if thou drink it in its measure' (v. 27; for the converse, see v. 29 f.). It is pleasant to find (see Ecclus. 31 21 in RV compared with AV) that Ben Sira does not stamp with his approval the habit of the later Romans, by which their capacity for the pleasures of the table was increased. The emetic mentioned in the Mishna (Shabb. 22 6) is purely medicinal.

14. Etiquette.

We have already seen that good manners required all food to be eaten with the right hand; this is still one of the strictest laws of etiquette in the East. It was a difficult task to teach the young Greek how to use his fingers properly at meals, 'to touch salt fish with one finger, fresh fish, bread, meat with two, etc.' (Mahaffy, The Greek World, etc., 325, basing on Plutarch); it was no doubt equally difficult in the case of the young Jew.

As a curious trifle under this head it may be mentioned that the Jewish doctors did not disdain to legislate on the subject of toothpicks (see Bēṣā 4 6, 'a man may lift up a splinter of wood to pick his teeth withal' [לַחֲצֹץ שִׁנָּיו]; cp Tōseftā ib. 3 18, Jer. Shabb. 8 end, 11 c).

Finally the privacy of an eastern house is in some respects greater (e.g., as regards the women's apartments), in others much less than that of a western; hence, as we see from more than one incident in the life of Jesus (e.g., Lk. 7 37), a stranger might enter unbidden even while a meal was in progress. If it were desired to add the late comer to the party, and the couches were full, he might be accommodated with a chair or stool (cp the incident related in Jos. Vit. 44).

The word must contain the preposition מ=מן 'from,' and the name of some Sidonian city, the initial ו being a mere accretion. 𝔊 read, or conjectured, 'from Gaza' (מֵעַזָּה); but Gaza was a southern city (ἀπὸ γάζης [L], or ἐναντίον γάζης [B]; A om. γάζης). Buhl and Steuernagel, improving a poor suggestion of Dillmann's, propose מִמְּעָרָה, 'from Mearah'; but no such place as Mearah is known. Bennett (SBOT) suggests מֵאַרְוָד, 'from Arvad,' which is plausible (see ARVAD). But though Arvad was colonised from Sidon, it would hardly have been described as 'belonging to the Zidonians.' The right reading seems to the present writer to be מִצָּרְפַת, 'from Zarephath.' Cp 1 K. 17 9 'to Zarephath which belongs to Zidon'; even if 'Zidon' here is incorrect, a Sidonian Zarephath is presupposed by the phrase. Cp ZAREPHATH. T. K. C.

MEDEBA (מֵידְבָא, Moab. מהדבא [MI, l. 8], § 15, 'water of rest'?).

Nu. 21 30 Μωαβ [BAFL]; Josh. 13 9, δαιδαβαν [B], μαιδ. [Ba?b], μαιδαβα (β sup. ras. Aa) [A], μεδαβα [L]; Josh. 13 16 μεδαβα [L], BA om.; 1 Ch. 19 7 μαιδαβα [B], βαιδ. [ℵ], του μηδ. [A], μηδ. [L]; Is. 15 2, τῆς μωαβ(ε)ιτιδος [BℵAQΓ] or omit?; 1 Macc. 9 36, μηδαβα [AℵV]; Medaba; Pesh. usually transliterates [מארבא], but reads מדבר 'desert' in Nu. [מדברא], מערב 'west' in Josh. 13 9 [מערבא], דיבא ib. v. 16. MI, l. 3 is perhaps to be vocalised מְהֶרְבָא.

A city on the tableland (mīšōr) of MOAB, S. of Heshbon (Josh. 13 9 16); according to Nu. 21 30 (if the text is correct) a city of the Amorites. Although the whole tableland—Medeba to Dibon—is assigned to Reuben by D and P in Josh. 13 9 16, the Chronicler is aware that it was not Israelite in David's time (1 Ch. 19 7). Medeba was seized by Omri; but after forty years of Israelitish occupation, it reverted to Moab in Mesha's time (MI, l. 8); certainly it was Moabite when the elegy of Moab in Is. 15 f. was written (6th or 5th cent. B.C.?). It was an important fortress during the Maccabæan period, and its people succeeded in capturing John, the brother of Jonathan the Jewish prince (1 Macc. 9 35-37), for which treacherous act they were afterwards made to suffer (Jos. Ant. xiii. 1 4 9 1 10 2-3). Medeba (Μηδαυα) is mentioned by Ptolemy (v. 17 6) as a town of Arabia Petræa between Bostra and Petra (viii. 20 20); by Eusebius (μεδδαβα, μηδαβα) and Jerome (Medaba), in OS 138 32 279 13, as still known in their time under its ancient name; and the name occurs also among the episcopal cities of the province of Arabia (Rel., p. 217). A mosaic map of Christian Palestine and Egypt found at Medeba and described by Clermont Ganneau in Recueil d'Archéol. orient. xi. (1897), p. 161 has deservedly excited much attention. See PEFQ, July 1897 (a translation from Cl. Ganneau, Recueil d'Archéol. orient. xi. 161, and 1897, p. 239; 1898, pp. 85, 177, 251).

The ruins survive and bear their old name, under the Arabic form Mādebā. They lie 2940 ft. above sea-level, about four m. S. by W. of Heshbon, with which they are connected by an ancient paved road. The city occupied a low hill a mile and a half in circumference. The whole site is covered with ruins, for the most part dating from early Christian times. Outside the walls (the line of which can be distinctly traced) is a large pool, 108 yds. long, 103 yds. wide and 10·13 ft. deep; it is at present dry. The plain around Mādebā, though now desolate, is fertile, and thickly dotted with ancient cities (Burckhardt, Syr. 366; Irby and Mangles, 471; Porter, Handbk. 303; Schumacher, ZDPV 18 113 f.; Baed. Pal.(3) 175 f.; PEFQ, July 1895, and 1901, pp. 235-246).

MEDIA AND PERSIA. See PERSIA.

MEDIATOR and UMPIRE. The words are synonymous. Cruden, in his Concordance, defines

1. In OT. 'mediator' as 'a person that manages, or transacts, between two contending parties, in order to reconcile them.' This might also be given as a definition of 'umpire,' which is the word suggested by our translators (in preference to the too theological term 'mediator') in mg. of Job 9 33 (=מוֹכִיחַ) as an alternative to the archaic DAYSMAN [q.v.].

It should be noticed that though 𝔊 here gives μεσίτης, the word represents, not מוֹכִיחַ (as Adeney in Hastings, DB 3 311 n., supposes), but בינינו; apparently 𝔊 is thinking of אִישׁ הַבֵּנַיִם (EV a champion), 1 S. 17 4, which Driver (TBS 107) explains as 'the man of the μεταίχμιον, who came forward as the μεσίτης to bring the warfare to a close.' 𝔊's words are, εἴθε ἦν ὁ μεσίτης ἡμῶν καὶ ἐλέγχων (εἰ γὰρ . . . ὁ διελ. [A]).

The passage in Job is of great religious interest. The afflicted Job is struggling after a worthier conception of God, and can at first only express it thus, 'O that there were an umpire between us, who might impose his authority (lit., lay his hand) upon us both'—i.e., upon the imperfect God of Job's theology and upon the much perplexed man himself (see JOB [BOOK], § 6, col. 2473). In Is. 2 4 EV's 'shall reprove' might with advantage become 'shall be an umpire to' (Che. Proph. Is., 'shall arbitrate for').

The idea that the divine anger is liable to be excessive finds similar expression in 1 S. 2 25, which in the Bible of 1551 is thus rendered, 'If one man synne agaynst another, dayseman may make hys peace; but yf a man sinne agaynst the Lord, who can be hys dayseman'? This is at least preferable to EV's rendering; 'entreat for him' (cp 𝔊) obscures the play upon words, on which see Driver, TBS 27 f. The passage implies the use of מְפַלֵּל as a term for 'umpire.'

The NT word is 'mediator' (μεσίτης, also in Polyb., Lucian, etc.), which occurs in Gal. 3 19 f. 1 Tim. 2 5 Heb. 8 6 9 15 12 24 †. The verb, μεσιτεύω,

2. NT references. occurs in Heb. 6 17 † ('wherein God interposed with an oath'). In the last passage the idea is that the divine oath fills up the space between the promise and its intended recipients. In 1 Tim. 2 5 (RV) Christ Jesus is called the 'one mediator between God and men, (himself) man'; 'man' (ἄνθρωπος) is without an article, to emphasise the human nature spoken of. In Heb. ll.c. the phrase is 'the mediator of a new covenant,' which distinguishes Christ from Moses. In Gal. 3 19 f., the reference is again to the distinction between the Law and the Gospel. The Law, we are told, was ordained through angels by the hand of a mediator. Now a mediator is not (a mediator) of one, but God is one. (διαταγεὶς δι' ἀγγέλων, ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου. ὁ δὲ μεσίτης ἑνὸς οὐκ ἔστιν, ὁ δὲ θεὸς εἷς ἐστίν.) The commentator Winer reckoned over 300 different explanations of this hard passage. Amidst such discord we cannot wonder that some (Michaelis and Straatman) have rejected the whole passage as an interpolation. This is certainly an arbitrary procedure. The chief difficulty lies, not in the words 'is not of one' (ἑνὸς οὐκ ἔστιν), but in the next clause (ὁ δὲ θεὸς εἷς ἐστίν), regarded as a sequel to the former words, and, accordingly, P. D. Chantepie de la Saussaye proposes to expunge them (Studien, edited by de la S., 3 374 ff.). It is conceivable that an early reader of the words, 'Now a mediator is not (a mediator) of one,' may have stumbled at them; 'God is one,' how then can it be said that 'a mediator is not a mediator of one'? Most commentators, however, disapprove even of this plausible solution of the problem. But what explanation can be called more than plausible? For the difficulty here meets a fresh difficulty in the context. What is the force of the words 'ordained through angels' (διαταγεὶς δι' ἀγγέλων), which, it would seem to us moderns, add nothing to the argument? There is no reason at all for expunging them; but perhaps we may be allowed to pass them over as merely inserted out of deference to Midrashic speculation (see ANGELS, § 9). We then seem to get a clear argument, viz., that God requires no mediator (such as Moses)[1] to make his promise (the Gospel) legally binding, since it is essential to the conception of a promise that it depends on the will of a single person.

The law, therefore, is inferior in dignity to the promise because the latter was given to Abraham directly, not ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου. Apparently the writer is thinking of Lev. 26 46, where 𝔊 renders, ὁ νόμος ὃν ἔδωκε κύριος ἀνὰ μέσον αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀνὰ μέσον τῶν υἱῶν Ισραηλ ἐν τῷ ὄρει Σεινα ἐν χειρὶ Μωυσῆ. The words ἐν χειρὶ M. correspond to ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου in Gal. (The reference is from Lipsius, HC 2 2(2), 42 f., and Holtzmann NT Theol. 2 [1897], p. 31, n. 1)

Orello Cone (Paul, 1898, 192 f.), however, remarks, 'Paul seems to have written, not with immediate reference to the account of the Sinaitic legislation in Exodus, but rather with the Jewish tradition about the Law as "ordained by angels" before his mind.' He adds very truly that in the account of the giving of the law in Exodus nothing is said about 'angels'; God speaks directly to Moses, and even plans the transanction thus for the sake of the safety of the people (Ex. 19 24 Dt. 5 5). It is not clear, however, that any argumentative stress is laid upon 'through angels' (δι' ἀγγέλων). The idea is that the law, not being communicated to the people directly, is inferior to the evangelical promise. To express this it would have been enough to say 'by the hand of a mediator' (ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου). The weakening words, 'ordained through angels,' may plausibly be taken as a purely conventional reference.

Ramsay (Historical Commentary [1899], 380) takes a different view. He 'cannot avoid the suspicion that Paul here is betrayed into a mistake, and is thinking of the other and infinitely more important sense of the words, 'God is one,' as in Rom. 3 30,—'He is one and the same God in all His acts, one God makes both the Promises and the Law.' In other words, the argument of Paul is a fallacy.

[1] The view that the mediator is Christ (Origen, Chrysostom, Augustine, and most of the fathers) seems to be clearly wrong. Schmider's theory (1826) that the angel of the law is meant (cp Acts 7 38, cp 53) is much more plausible. But Moses could not have been left out altogether in this connection. Talmudic and Rabbinical names for Moses as mediator are סרסור, אמצעי, and שליח.

MEDICINE. The most primitive references are to the obstetric art; see FAMILY, § 9 ff. Four cases have special points. In two of these (Gen. 35 17 1 S. 4 19) the mother dies in childbed after giving the infant an appropriate name. The other two are to bring out a subtle point as to the seniority of twins; Esau is the first-born, but he is (symbolically) seized by the heel by the second twin, Jacob, whose usurpation began, as it were, in the womb (Gen. 25 26). Again, in the birth of Tamar's twins (Gen. 38 27), the arm of one protruded and was marked by the midwife with a red thread; but, in the event, the child so marked as the elder was the second born.

1. Practitioners.

A prolapse of the arm may occur; but unless it had been replaced, and some turning operation performed on the twin thus presenting, the other twin could not have taken precedence of it. The Talmud shows an acquaintance with the Cæsarean section, to save the child in the death of the mother.

In Ezek. 16 4, salting of the new-born, as well as washing before swaddling, is mentioned (cp FAMILY, § 10). In the Talmud the excessive redness of the infant, or a yellowish or greenish hue, is an indication for delaying circumcision. In 2 Macc. 7 27, a mother includes in an appeal to her son that she had given him suck three years.[1] The nurse (מֵינֶקֶת) of Rebekah (Gen. 24 59 35 8) was probably a foster-mother (אֹמֶנֶת); the nurse of the lame child Mephibosheth an ordinary attendant (2 S. 4 4); cp NURSE.

There are few references to surgical practice. In Ex. 21 19 one who maims another in a quarrel has to pay for the loss of the hurt man's time as well as, in modern phrase, the surgeon's bill. In 2 K. 8 29 Joram, wounded in battle, goes to Jezreel for his cure. A unique reference to physicians as a class occurs in 2 Ch. 16 12, where Asa, in his sickness, sought not to Yahwè but to the physicians—a remark possibly suggested by the king's name, which perhaps means 'physician' (see ASA). Prognostics of sickness, as part of the prophetic function, appear first in the cases of Nathan (2 S. 12 14) and Ahijah (1 K. 14); but it is not until Elisha (and of this the Talmud makes a point) that medical skill is prominent among the prophet's abilities—in the cure of Naaman (2 K. 5 3), in the prognostic of Benhadad (2 K. 8 7 ff.), in the recovery of the Shunammite's son from sunstroke (2 K. 4 18-35), in medicating the unwholesome water at Jericho (2 K. 2 20), and in correcting the poisonous effects of the pottage of wild herbs (2 K. 4 41). To Elijah also is ascribed (2 K. 1 4) a prognostic of the death of Ahaziah from a fall (the king himself having sent to consult the oracle Baal-zebub [see BAAL-ZEBUB] at Ekron), and the restoration to vitality of a widow's son (1 K. 17 17), nearly identical with Elisha's. The one great instance in the later history of prognosis and treatment by a prophet is that of Isaiah in the case of Hezekiah (2 K. 20 1 5 7).

That the priestly class were the depositaries of medical knowledge seems to follow from the Levitical ordinances for 'leprosy,' for although some of these were wholly ceremonial, and not at all utilitarian, they imply on the part of the priests a skill in diagnosis or in discriminating one disease from another. They were themselves, it seems, so subject to illnesses arising from their frequent bathing and bare feet that a special physician was attached to their service in the temple (Mishna, Shĕḳālīm, 5 1 f.).

The period of the Wisdom literature is the one in which medicine as an art becomes most prominent.

Solomon's knowledge of the vegetable kingdom was traditionally said (Midrash) to include that of drugs, and there are also references in the Talmud to a 'book of cures' (סֵפֶר רְפוּאוֹת) attributed to the same king, and said to have been withdrawn by Hezekiah from the use of the people because it alienated them from the Lord (the nearest parallel to this in the OT is Hezekiah's removal of the brazen serpent, 2 K. 18 4).

The honour of the physician is set forth at length in Ecclus. 38 1-15. Those were doubtless the physicians of whom the woman with the issue of blood had 'suffered many things' (Mk. 5 26), or on whom she had 'spent all her living' (Lk. 8 43). In his healing of the sick Jesus revived that part of the prophetic office with which none but Elisha, in the earlier history, is closely identified. The Essenes (whose name, according to some, means 'physician') are specially mentioned by Josephus (BJ ii. 8 5) as given to the collecting of medicinal roots and minerals.

Of medical theory there was little native to the Jews, unless perhaps the doctrine of demoniac possession; but the Greek teaching of the humours and qualities became known among them in the Alexandrian period. The Talmud shows some anatomical knowledge, giving the bones of the skeleton at 248, which must include the teeth. One of the greatest of physiological mysteries, how the bones of a child in the womb do grow, is propounded in Eccl. 11 5, the date of which is held to be post-exilic (see ECCLESIASTES).

We are, of course, better instructed respecting the late than about the earlier periods. In the rabbinical medicine Wunderbar finds ordinary curative methods, by drugs or the like, less frequently in use than occult methods, involving astrology, the wearing of parchment amulets or charms, and sympathy in a generic sense. This is what might be expected, and accords with the gradual spread of Babylonian medicine. Without renouncing the traditional spells for driving out the demons of sickness, the Babylonians superadded to them genuine medical receipts (Sayce, Hibb. Lect. 317); cp also MAGIC, § 2 b, 2.

2. Therapeutic methods.

The following are among other Talmudic cures of an issue of blood (uterine hæmorrhage from fibroid tumour):—'Let the patient sit at a parting of the ways with a cup of wine in her hand, and let some one, coming up behind her, startle her by calling out, "Be healed of thine issue of blood!" Or, take three measures of onions, boil in wine and give the patient to drink, at the same time calling out suddenly, "Be healed of thine issue of blood!"'

The greater number of the cures in the Gospels and Acts are by the Word, usually addressed to the patient, but in three instances (Jn. 4 50 Mt. 8 5 15 21) addressed to the parent or master of the patient.

This belief in the power of a sacred word appears also outside the biblical records, but scarcely without an element of superstitious formula. It is found among the gnostic doctrines and is implied by the pretensions of the ESSENES [q.v.]; and it is stated without ambiguity in the Zend Avesta (SBE 23 44):—'One may heal with Holiness, one may heal with the Law, one may heal with the knife, one may heal with herbs, one may heal with the Holy Word; amongst all remedies this is the healing one, that heals with the Holy Word; this one it is that will best drive away sickness from the body of the faithful; for this one is the best healing of all remedies.'

In some cases of wonderful healing in the Gospels the sick person is touched. In two instances the blind or bleared eyes are simply touched (Mt. 9 27 20 34), in another instance they are touched with saliva (Mk. 8 23), in another with saliva mixed with clay (Jn. 9 6; cp B. Weiss, ad loc.). The folk-lore of curing sore eyes was widely spread (Epit. in Plin. HN 28 7). The use of the morning or fasting saliva for bleared eyes persists in some parts to the present time. In the Talmud the saliva of an eldest son is preferred. A special virtue pertained to the saliva of a royal or imperial personage, as in the case of a poor man in the crowd at Alexandria who besought Vespasian so to touch his eyes; the emperor inquired of his physicians whether the case were a curable one, and being answered in the affirmative, he rubbed his saliva on the man's eyes with curative effect (Tac. Hist. 4 8 1). The fish gall of Tobit (6 4 8 11 11, cp EYE, DISEASES OF), is found, with modifications, in Pliny (HN 32 24) and Bontius (De med. Indorum, 16). Several of the cures of fever given in the Talmud clearly contain the idea of transference to animate or inanimate objects. When the doctrine of magnetic or sympathetic transference of disease was revived in the seventeenth century, Bartholin cited the cases of the scape-goat (Lev. 16 21) and of the Gadarene demoniac and the swine (Mk. 5 13) as precedents (De transpl. morb. 24 [Hafn., 1673]). In Ecclus. 38 9-11, as well as in the Talmud, prayer and offerings are to precede the services of the physician. Intercession is explicitly mentioned in Elijah's (1 K. 17 20) and Elisha's (2 K. 4 33) restoration of the widow's son, and in the raising of Lazarus (Jn. 11 41 f.); also impliciter in the case of the epileptic (Mk. 9 29) concerning whom the disciples asked, 'Why could not we cast him out'?

Medicinal waters.—The waters of the Jordan valley are in many places of a saline and bituminous character, and those of the Jordan itself are said to give a black deposit containing a resinous matter. The bitumen found floating on the DEAD SEA (Jos. Ant. iv. 8 4) was useful not only for caulking ships, but also for the cure of men's bodies, being an ingredient of many medicines. It contains sulphur, and to the presence of bitumen was probably due the sulphureous water of many hot springs, of which those of Tiberias and Callirrhoe were the most famous (see TIBERIAS; MOAB, § 5). The pools of SILOAM [q.v.] and BETHESDA [q.v.] were reputed as curative.

The most valuable native product was the BALM OF GILEAD [q.v.]. The aromatic substances such as myrrh, frankincense, cinnamon, cassia, aloes, calamus, galbanum, spikenard, camphire, are mentioned in OT or NT only as ingredients of incense, anointing-oil, and perfumes, or for embalming; but their medicinal uses also are referred to in the Talmud (see SPICES). In like manner the art of the apothecary (Ex. 30 35), the powders of the merchant (Cant. 3 6), and the like expressions, relate always to these substances as used for other than medicinal purposes. The MANDRAKE is given in Gen. 30 14 ff. as a philtre or a cure for sterility. Perhaps the only prescription proper is the poultice of figs for the plague-boil (2 K. 20 7).

3. Materia medica.

There is no clear reference to the great narcotics of the East, opium and hashish or Indian hemp; but in the opinion of the present writer it is not improbable that the 'honey-wood'[1] of 1 S. 14 27 and of Cant. 5 1, as well as the 'grass' of Dan. 4 25 33, is the latter. Two other obscure substances which have been the subject of much conjecture, and have sometimes been adduced in the same sense, are BDELLIUM and PANNAG [qq.v.].

Criminal poisoning is not mentioned, unless in the ambiguous metaphor of Zech. 12 2—the 'cup of trembling (cp Jer. 51 7), which Jerusalem was to become to her enemies. The Chaldæans had an elaborate knowledge of poisons. Hemlock as a weed in ploughed land occurs in Hos. 10 4.

In Dt. 23 12-14 we find a primitive law for the disposal of excrement, from which had probably grown a more complex system involving cloacæ suited to a city such as Jerusalem. The disposal of the dead was extramural. Ordinary earth burial, with or without coffins, was perhaps the commonest; but rock tombs or vaults also were used, not only after the manner of Egypt, the body being embalmed (as in Gen. 50 2-13 26; cp 23 4-11), but also more generally, the aromatic substances being applied externally to the winding sheet or the bed on which the corpse was laid (2 Ch. 16 14 Mk. 15 46 16 1). Several references to burning (2 Ch. 16 14 21 19 Jer. 34 5 Am. 6 10) are of obscure meaning; but they seem to refer only to the remains of kings or princes, and to have been subsequent to entombment, and they may apply to the bones only (although Gesenius and others would discover in them cremation of the usual kind). Burial to cleanse the land, in Ezek. 39 12-16, probably refers to the well-known risk of pestilence from the dead unburied in war, famine, or other calamity. The distinctive Jewish practice of burying within a very short time after death occurs as an ordinance in OT only in Deut. 21 22 f., and there only for the special case of malefactors hanged on a tree, the object being to prevent the indefinite exposure and neglect of the corpse, which has occurred often in other countries. See DEAD, § 1.

4. Sanitary practices.

The water supply was naturally of the first importance. Elisha's treatment of the water of Jericho is enlarged upon, in a rational sense, by Josephus (BJ iv. 8 3). The same writer remarks that the pool of Siloam was often so low that water was sold from it by measure, whereas during the siege by Titus, that and all the other springs were copious, to the advantage of the besiegers (ib. v. 9 4). In the story of Judith (7 7 12 21) the capture of the sources of the town's water is made of central importance. Strategic changes in the water supply of Jerusalem were among the greater achievements of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 32 3 f. 2 K. 20 20, perhaps also Is. 22 11).

To what extent the Jewish ceremonial law may have grown out of utility, or may have been originally a sanitary code concealed behind religious sanctions, is a question whereon opinions differ. John Spencer (De leg. Heb. ritual.), in his exhaustive discussion of what the laws meant, almost ignores a medical or sanitary intention. On the other hand, nearly all the writers on Medica Sacra discover a hygienic purpose in circumcision, in the prohibition of swine's flesh, if not also in the much debated rules as to abstaining from blood and from things strangled, as well as in some of the rules for uncleanness of the person—puerperal, menstrual, conjugal, gonorrhœal, spermatorrhœal, leprous, and cadaveric. For circumcision, other than as a sign and seal, various advantages have been claimed.

Philo (2 211) says that the removal of the foreskin obviated the risk of 'a malady, severe, and ill to cure, called anthrax,' and Josephus (c. Apion. 2 13) adduces Apion himself as one who, having reviled the Jewish rite, actually had to submit to it in the surgical treatment of an 'ulcer' of the prepuce from which he eventually died 'in great torment.' Neither the 'anthrax' of Philo, nor the ἕλκος of Josephus is quite intelligible; certainly nothing of the nature of a simple boil becoming an ulcer, perhaps from retained secretion, is common among the uncircumcised of warm or hot latitudes. But it need not be said that the circumcised are exempt from the ordinary inflammations, phymosis and paraphymosis, which are usually complications of something else, and that they are little liable to balanitis. On antecedent grounds it is held that the cutaneous or epidermic surface, which alone remains after the fold of mucous membrane has been excised, would be less apt to take up and retain infection from impure sexual commerce. Spencer's proposition, 'circumcisionem adversus idololatriam plurimum valuisse,' if it be true, must apply to the particular forms of idolatry, especially Baal-worship, which were the peculiar trouble of guardians and censors of the public morals in Israel. Maimonides held that circumcision diminished lust; but it would be as reasonable to maintain that it ministered to it. Others have sought to show that it favoured procreativeness, or that it has somehow harmonised with the 'principle of population.'

That the custom was not peculiar to Jews, is shown elsewhere (see CIRCUMCISION).

Like circumcision, the prohibition of swine's flesh is Mohammedan as well as Jewish. Tacitus (Hist. 5 4) says that the Jews had learned to avoid the flesh of the pig from having contracted a scabies to which that animal is subject. Spencer himself admits, among the 'unclean' aspects of the pig, the fact that he is an unclean feeder. It is only within the last generation or two that the formidable trichina parasite of the pig, communicable to man in the disease trichinosis, has become known to science.

The larva of the trichina is a minute worm, immense numbers of which become encysted in the muscles within minute white capsules or cells shaped like a lemon. Unless destroyed by cooking, the larvæ penetrate from the human intestine to the muscles, giving rise, during their active phase, to severe symptoms, sometimes fatal, not unlike those of enteric fever. The pig is also very much subject to the larva of a tapeworm, Tænia solium, which is common among mankind in proportion as swine's flesh is used.

In warm countries the parasitic worms are a peculiar trouble, so that the motive for some general dietetic prohibition becomes stronger.

5. Purifications. There are seven forms of personal uncleanness requiring purification: (a) puerperal (Lev. 12); (b) menstrual, normal or abnormal (Lev. 15 19-24 25-30); (c) gonorrhœal (Lev. 15 2-15); (d) spermatorrhœal (Lev. 15 16 f.); (e) concubital (Lev. 15 18); (f) cadaveric (Lev. 21 1-3 11; especially Nu. 19 11-22, cp Nu. 5 2 96 f.); (g) 'leprous' (Lev. 13 f.). As to (a) the curious point is that the term of purification after a male birth is forty days, after a female birth it is eighty days. Some have tried to find a rational ground for this distinction (Maimonides and Grotius, that the male child is of hot and dry, the female of cold and moist qualities, the latter taking longer to be cleansed); but there is no real difference between the puerperium masculinum and the p. fœmineum; cp Benz. HA 150. As to (b) no peoples are indifferent to these states of the female, but few besides the Jews (e.g., in Persia and Ceylon) have thought fit to make rules. The levitical laws as to (a) and (b) were copied in the early English penitentials, the church being substituted for the temple, and the sacrament of Communion for the Passover. In later times the ecclesiastical purifications of women have been restricted to (a). The somewhat long period of menstrual separation (seven days), on which Michaelis remarks (4 24), is a limit reached habitually in some constitutions, but is, on the whole, excessive.

The uncleanness of (c) is real, in the sense of contagiousness; that of (d) is imaginary, and of ceremonial import only.

It is only in rare circumstances, such as perhaps plague, that contact with a corpse (f) can possibly imperil the health; it is, however, not improbable that the rule grew to be applicable to all corpses from some such small root of utility. Tob. 2 9 is a case of sleeping apart after burying the dead. The uncleanness of (g) was real inasmuch as under 'leprosy' are comprehended several forms of highly contagious parasitic diseases of the skin, hairy scalp, and beard, as well as spreading moulds in the walls of houses, and mildews and moths in clothes or the like. It is doubtful whether true leprosy is meant in any verses of Lev. 13 f.; but in later times it was only to true leprosy, or to cancerous or other ulcerous affections mistaken for it, that the uncleanness of those chapters pertained (cp LEPROSY).

There are many rabbinical aphorisms on the preservation of health and the attainment of old age by regular habits.

6. Health and longevity. The Nazarites are an early instance of persons abstaining from wine and strong drink (Nu. 6); the Essenes embraced austere habits and simple diet, and attained to extreme old age (Jos. 28 10). Length of days was one of the usual blessings invoked. Years prolonged beyond three score and ten were labour and sorrow (Ps. 90 10). On the details of the elegy upon the troubles of old age in Eccl. 12 1-7 see special articles, CAPER-BERRY, GRASSHOPPER, etc. See, further, DISEASES.

7. Literature. The best treatise is that of R. J. Wunderbar, Biblisch-talmudische Medicin, Riga and Leipsic, 1850-1860. A miscellaneous bibliography is appended by Ebstein to his Die Medicin im alten Testament (Stuttgart, 1901), from which Wunderbar's work is omitted. C. C.

MEDITERRANEAN. The Hebrew terms for the Mediterranean are given elsewhere (GEOGRAPHY, § 4, i. col. 1687 f.); one of them (הַיָּם הָאַחֲרוֹן, EV 'the hinder sea') was, we may infer, unknown to the pre-exilic Israelites, for it has probably arisen partly out of an accident, partly out of an editorial process.

The fact is that in the early documents the boundaries of the Land of Promise were very narrow. 'From the wilderness of Jerahmeel,' it was said in the original text of Dt. 11 24, 'from the river, the river of Ephrath,[1] as far as the Jerahmeelite Lake, shall be your region.' The word ירחמאלי, however, became corrupted, the word אפרת, too, lost its initial letter, and, under the influence of a desire to produce a correct description of the ideal boundaries of the Land of Israel, a great but daring editor reconstructed the passage thus, 'from the wilderness and Lebanon (?), from the river, the river Pĕrāth (Euphrates), as far as the hinder sea, shall be your region.' The fragments of the word ירחמאלי were conjecturally read אחרון ('hinder' [sea]); similar fragments elsewhere (Ezek. 47 18) were misread קַדְמוֹנִי 'front' [sea]). In this way a contrast was produced between the eastern and the western sea—i.e., the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean (cp EARTH ii., § 1). The prospect which Moses enjoyed from 'Pisgah' (Dt. 34 2) was recast in a similar way (see NEBO, MOUNT), and so the way was prepared for the unsuspicious adoption of the two novel terms 'front sea' and 'back sea' in Joel 2 20 Zech. 14 8. For a parallel case, see SALT SEA.

The truth is, however, that no comparison is possible between the lake called the Dead Sea and the sea fitly styled 'the great.'

From its size[2] the Mediterranean is fully entitled to rank among oceans; to the Hebrew it was 'the ocean' (הַיָּם, and by a peculiar idiom יַמִּים, Judg. 5 17; cp Ps. 46 3 [2]). 'Planted' in it (Ecclus. 43 23, note the readings of Heb. and 𝔊) were those mysterious 'islands' (איים) of which merchants spoke, and from it came the cloud 'no bigger than a man's hand' which brought the longed-for early rain. To the traveller the strip of blue bounding the horizon on the W. as he gazes from some height in western Palestine is a familiar and a pleasing sight. The inhospitable character of the coast, however, together with other circumstances, made the 'great sea' far less dear to the Israelites. North of Carmel 'nature has so far assisted man by prompting here a cape, and dropping there an islet, that not a few harbours have been formed which have been, and may again become, historical.' S. of this headland, the possibilities of harbourage are limited to 'a forward rock at 'Athlīt, two curves of the beach at Ṭanṭūrah, twice low reefs—at Abu Zabūrah and Jaffa—the faint promise of a dock in the inland basin of 'Askalān, with the barred mouths of five or six small streams'[3] (cp ASHKELON, DOR, JABNEEL, JOPPA, MAGDIEL). 'Barred' is no idle term; the few estuaries are nearly choked by sand. Sand-hills, too, are a source of serious danger to agriculture. The westerly winds continually carry clouds of sand far inland (see GAZA, col. 1651), and only by artificial means, such as are not now adequately used, can great detriment be averted. It is intelligible that the figure of sand by the sea-shore became a habitual mode of speech to the Israelites (Gen. 32 12 Jer. 5 22 15 8 Ps. 78 27 Ecclus. 18 10 Rev. 12 18 [13 1]).

On the phrase, 'he shall be for an haven (?) of ships,' Gen. 49 13, see ZEBULUN, and on the Mediterranean coast in general, see also PALESTINE. T. K. C.

of Megiddo' (Judg. 5 19) in a 'plain' (see VALE, 2)
1. History. (בִּקְעָה, πεδίον; 2 Ch. 35 22, 1 Esd. 1 27 [29]; cp Zech. 12 11, but this passage may perhaps have nothing to do with Megiddo; see HADAD-RIMMON). The place is at least as old as the time of Thotmes III. who won a victory over the Canaanites here [on Breasted's researches, see below, § 2, end]; it is mentioned also in the Amarna Tablets. Down to the exile it retained its importance; but from that date onwards it totally disappears from history. It is not mentioned in the NT (cp ARMAGEDDON). The site can only be conjecturally determined. It is mentioned in the OT as the residence of a Canaanite king (Josh. 12 21) and as one of the strong places situated in the region of the plain of Jezreel which, though assigned to Issachar, Asher, and Manasseh, were not taken possession of by any of these tribes (Josh. 17 11 Judg. 1 27 1 Ch. 7 29). Megiddo continued to be a stronghold of the earlier inhabitants till at least the time of Deborah, but became Israelite in or before the time of Solomon, who fortified it (1 K. 9 15), and made it the seat of one of his prefects (1 K. 4 12). The supposition has been put forward that it had again shaken off the Israelite yoke in the period of the dynasty of the house of Omri—which would explain why Ahaziah sought refuge in Megiddo (2 K. 9 27); but it seems preferable to suppose that the fugitive king counted on finding the place in the hands of a faithful adherent of the house of Ahab. Megiddo is usually mentioned along with Taanach; and as the site of the latter is perfectly certain (see TAANACH) it is natural to look for the former in that neighbourhood. Such a position would harmonise completely with what we read in 2 K. 9 27 23 29 f. (cp 2 Ch. 35 22) of the death of Ahaziah in Jehu's revolt and of Josiah's fatal encounter with Necho[1] (see AHAZIAH, JEHU, JOSIAH).

If this assumption be correct Megiddo must have lain on the route of trade caravans and military expeditions
2. Site. from the Philistine littoral and from Egypt; it must have commanded the passage of Carmel or rather of its SE. prolongation (er-Rūḥah) for anyone coming from the S. whose objective was the Jordan Valley, the Sea of Galilee, Damascus, or Mesopotamia. Now, we know that, in the Roman period, a fortified camp, or rather town, of great importance[2] was established at Legio, the modern Lejjūn,[3] 4 m. N. from Taanach; and since the time of an anonymous writer in 1835 (see Münchner Gel. Anzeiger, Dec. 1836, p. 920), and still more since Robinson, the generally-accepted view has been that Lejjūn is the ancient Megiddo. This identification, which also has the support of R. Parchi (14th cent.), is merely conjectural indeed, but has great plausibility. Eusebius and Jerome, however, supply no precise indication and seem to have been completely ignorant of the site, though Jerome, speaking of the plain of Esdraelon, calls it the plain of Megiddo, and elsewhere, like Eusebius, calls it the plain of Legio. Legio, again, ought in all probability to be identified with Maximianopolis (see the Bordeaux Pilgrim, the lists of bishops, and the data of Jerome). In the neighbourhood there are springs which might be intended by the 'waters of Megiddo' in Judg. 5 19, unless we are to understand the Kishon (cp Judg. 4 6 13 5 21) which flows at no great distance and which, in the opinion of some, preserves an echo of the name Megiddo in its modern designation of Nahr el-Moḳaṭṭa'. Near the ruins of Lejjūn (which include those of a khān well known in the Middle Ages) are two mounds, one of which, called Tell el-Mutesellim (Prefect's Mount),[1] may possibly have been the acropolis of Megiddo-Legio. Excavations here would probably be remunerative.

Other sites for Megiddo have been sought, farther to the N., in the plain of Jezreel, at el-Mujeidil, 1¼ h. SW. from Nazareth (Spruner-Sieglin, Atlas); at Mejdel near Acre (Ewald, GVI(3) 3 762 f.); or at Jedda or Jēdā (Schlatter); this last proposal would have at least something to be said for it if it could be shown that in Josh. 17 11 Dor and En-dor are doublets (see EN-DOR), and that in no geographical text dealing with the strong places of the plain of Jezreel is Dor-Tanturah, to the SW. of Mt. Carmel, intended, but always En-dor. This being assumed Megiddo alone could be Asherite and it would become more difficult to place it at Lejjūn; but, on the other hand, Megiddo must have been strategically important, and this fits Lejjūn better than Jedda.

Lastly, Conder has sought to identify Megiddo with Mujedda', 3 m. S. from Bēsān (Beth-shean); but this hypothesis leaves unexplained the close connection between Megiddo and Taanach; it creates difficulties in the stories of Ahaziah and Josiah; it harmonises badly with the order in which the strongholds are enumerated in more than one passage; it neglects the leading authority of Judg. 5 19, while interpreting Judg. 4 12-16 (cp v. 7) after Josephus in the sense that lays the scene of Deborah's battle with Sisera at the very base of Tabor; it has nothing in its favour but an obscure passage of an Egyptian text 'The travels of the Mohar' where, according to WMM (195), there is a manifest confusion between the Kishon and the Jordan. G. A. Smith (HG 387) and G. F. Moore (Judg. 47) have argued against Conder's view in a manner which seems to the present writer decisive. Moore with reason declares that 'the situation is impossible.' On the other hand Birch (PEFQ, 1881, p. 232) goes too far in claiming to have made it out as 'certain that Megiddo was situated at or close to Lejjūn.' All that can be said is that the supposition is a very reasonable one. Petrie (Syria and Egypt, 176) holds that the campaign of Thotmes III. proves the site of Megiddo to be at Tell el-Mutesellim (see above). Breasted (PSBA 22 [1900] 95-98) writes as follows:—'A Syrian army which is defending Megiddo, is posted with the south wing at Taanach (Ta'annuk), and a small advanced force harassing an enemy advancing northward through the mountains along the Megiddo road.' 'These operations will not suit Mujedda'; on the other hand, they suit the location of Megiddo at el-Lejjūn in every particular. Indeed, if we had no other data for the identification of Megiddo, these facts would decisively locate it in the vicinity of el-Lejjūn.'

Arabian of Muṣri (see BELA, MATRED, ME-ZAHAB). Marquart (Fund. 10) would read 'from Me-zahab' (𝔊's υἱοῦ in Gen. = בן, a corruption of מן). This, however, implies that 'Matred' is not a corrupt form of the name of a country.

[1] Herodotus, however (2 159), places Necho's fight at Μαγδολον, and Josephus (Ant. x. 5 1) at Mende (μενδην, al. μηδην); on both statements see JOSIAH. It should also be noted that the Book of Kings need not necessarily be taken as speaking of a battle between Necho and Josiah; it might equally well be interpreted as referring to an interview ending in a murder. Chron., it is true, describes a battle. See JOSIAH.

If Meholah is a corruption of Jerahmeel [Che.], a fresh light is thrown on the designation 'Adriel the Meholathite.' See SAUL, § 6 (end); MERAB, PALTI, 1.

MEHUJAEL (מְחוּיָאֵל, מְחִיָּיאֵל [Kre, מְחִיָּאֵל]), fourth in descent from Cain, Gen. 4 18† (J). Not improbably from 'Jerahmeel.' To explain the name as a participle—Piel (Budde, Urgesch. 128) or Hiphil (Nestle, Marg. 7)—is inexpedient. See MAHALELEL, and cp CAINITES, § 7.

ME-JARKON (מֵי הַיַּרְקוֹן, 'yellow, or yellowish green, water'; 𝔊BAL, presupposing מִיָּם הירקון, gives απο θαλασσης ιεραкων), a place in Dan (not far from Joppa; Josh. 19 46), which apparently derived its name from some large spring or fountain that formed a marsh. The only striking spot of this kind in the specified neighbourhood is at Rās el-'Ain (11 m. E. by N. from Joppa), the 'fountain-head' of the Nahr el-Aujā, which, in beginning its course, forms a marshy tract covered with reeds and rushes (Rob. BR 4 140). Beside the springs, which are the largest in Palestine, stands the mound, crowned by mediæval ruins, which Sir C. W. Wilson identifies with ANTIPATRIS (q.v.). The importance of the site must have been early noticed. More than this cannot with certainty be affirmed. The reading is not absolutely certain.

Rakkon (strictly, ha-Rakkon), which follows, appears to be a variant for Jarkon (ha-Jarkon), and both names may be corrupted from 'Jerahmeel,' cp Judg. 1 35, 'the Amorites (=Jerahmeelites [see Crit. Bib.] would dwell in Mount Heres, Aijalon, and Shaalbim.' May not the Nahr el-'Aujā have been originally known as the 'waters of Jerahmeel'? See RAKKON, also MAKAZ. T. K. C.

MELCHIZEDEK (מַלְכִּי־צֶדֶק, § 21; μελχισεδεκ, the name, if genuine [see below, § 3] would mean originally either 'Ṣedeḳ is king,' or 'Ṣedeḳ is Mālik,'[1] but in later times meant 'king of righteousness' [Heb. 7 2]. Ṣedeḳ may have been a Canaanitish god; cp συδυκ [Philo Bybl.]; Ṣedeḳ-melek [צדקמלך] occurs on coins, and similar S. Arabian names are quoted [Prätorius, ZDMG 26 426]; see Baudissin, Stud. Sem. Rel. 1 15). King of Salem, and priest of El Elyōn, the Most High or Supreme God, in the time of Abram (Gen. 14 18-20).

1. OT and NT references. Melchizedek is thought to be referred to also in the traditional text of Ps. 110 4*b* as resembling in his royal priesthood the king celebrated by the psalmist — 'Yahwè hath sworn and will not repent; Thou art a priest for ever after the order (?) of Melchizedek' (EV). Certainly this idea was taken up, in connection with the full Messianic interpretation of Ps. 110, by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who treats the short account of Melchizedek in Gen. 14 as a mine of suggestions for the right comprehension of the nature and office of Christ. Recent students, however, who seek for traces of the early Semitic religion have found the story of Melchizedek suggestive in other directions. Here is Abram (Abraham), the ideal and in a sense Messianic patriarch, accepting the benediction of a Canaanite priest-king, whose religion appears to have resembled his own, and offering him tithes of the spoil. Even apart from Christian associations, it is surely a fascinating theme.

2. Real character. Is this story historical? or does it at any rate enclose some kernel of genuine tradition? It is held by many that the Melchizedek-passage, Gen. 14 18-20, has been interwoven with an independent narrative which is more intelligible without it. The evidence of this interweaving is found in v. 22, where, in the middle of the declaration, 'I lift up my hand unto Yahwè that I will not take a thread or a shoe latchet,' the editor is thought to have inserted from the speech of Melchizedek the words 'the Supreme God, Producer (see col. 3015, n. 2) of heaven and earth.' From this point of view it is a natural and plausible conjecture that Melchizedek, whose functions and refined religious ideas place him quite apart from the king of Sodom and his companions, is a purely fictitious personage, introduced for some object which has yet to be discovered. His name is apparently modelled on that of ADONIZEDEC [q.v.], a traditional Canaanitish king of Jerusalem, and was probably explained 'king of righteousness.'

3. His city and office. Next it may be asked, where did the writer of the Melchizedek-passage suppose the city of his hero to have been situated? It was evidently a sacred city. But none of the three Salems which have been suggested N. of Jerusalem[2] had a reputation for sanctity. Jerusalem, however, would do excellently; in post-exilic times it would be important to find an early attestation of its pre-eminent sanctity (so De Wette, Dillm., and most). Moreover, if the King's Vale spoken of in Gen. 14 17 (see SHAVEH i.) is the same as that mentioned in the story of Absalom (2 S. 18 18), and if Josephus is right in placing this valley two stadia from Jerusalem, it would seem that the equation of Salem with Jerusalem ought to be correct. It is, however, not at all certain that the statement of Josephus is correct. Absalom would surely have erected his monument on his property at Baal-hazor, which Robinson well identifies with Tell Aṣūr, situated between Shiloh and Bethel. Besides this, the writer had no obvious motive for half-concealing the name of Jerusalem. The name Salem (or rather Šalem) for Jerusalem is found only once elsewhere (Ps. 76 2 [3]), and in that passage may have been dictated by a misinterpretation of Gen. 14 18. The best solution which remains is to read שלה—i.e., Shiloh—for שלם.[1] Shiloh, which was so long the religious and even the political centre of the land, had a strong claim to be consecrated by a connection with Abraham. There was a Ruth among the Moabites; why should there not have been a Melchizedek among the Canaanites?

[1] Cp Uru-mālik, the name of a governor of the land of Amurru (Syria and Palestine) under king Sargon of Agadè (Dangin); mālik might be the Canaanite god Melek, even if originally Uru-malik came from 'Jerahmeel.'

[2] The places in question are—Sālim near Nāblus on the SE. (Baed.(3), 257; see SALEM 2), the Salim in the plain of Esdraelon, NNW. of Ta'annuk (Baed.(3), 263), and the Salem or Salumias 8 R. m. from Scythopolis mentioned by Jer. (OS 149 17), and wrongly identified by him with the Salim of Jn. 3 23 (see SALIM). Ewald thinks that the Salem referred to was 'a city on the other side Jordan, which must be traversed on the return route from Damascus to Sodom' (Hist. 1 307).

If the text of Gen. 14 is approximately correct, this is perhaps the best view that can be offered. Still there are difficulties. The priest-king Melchizedek in Canaan, whether at Jerusalem or at Shiloh, is a startling phenomenon; Jethro was a priest and prince of N. Arabia. More important, however, is the fact that a removal of what tho present writer holds to be errors in the text of Gen. 14 reveals an underlying story of a very different character.

'Melchizedek king of Salem' is surely a late editor's attempt to make sense of a badly written text. ומלכי־צדק סלך has arisen out of ומלך ציקלג, and שלם which follows is probably לשם, according to Josh. 19 47, the original name of Dan—i.e., the southern not the northern Dan. Now 'Lesham' and 'Ziklag' are both corruptions of Ḥalūṣah. It was according to the first narrator, the priest-king of the sacred city of Ḥalūṣah (see SHECHEM, ZIKLAG) who came out to meet Abram, and blessed him, and to whom Abram (the hero of the Jerahmeelite tribe, see JERAHMEEL) paid tithes.

The matter is treated more fully elsewhere (SODOM). According to the view here advocated, Melchizedek has the singular fate not only of being an imaginary personage, but of owing his ideal existence to a scribe's error. If so, the use made of Melchizedek in Heb. 6 f., becomes mere temporary rhetoric — a typology which has lost even its apparent basis in the letter of the OT, and the Melchizedek passage in the MT of Gen. 14 can only be used as a monument of that post-exilic theology, in which the divine creatorship, not unknown before the Exile, but not fully recognised, played so great a part.[2] As such, let no one presume to undervalue it!

It must unfortunately be added that the reference to Melchizedek in Ps. 110 4*b* is not less doubtful than that in Gen. 14 18. The text of Ps. 110 is admittedly difficult, and probably corrupt, and there is good reason to suspect that v. 4*b* should run thus—הֲכִינֹתִיךָ לְעוֹלָם עַל־בְּרִית חֲסָדַי, 'I establish thee for ever because of my covenant of lovingkindness.'[3] All that can be said to clear up the enigmatical words of the received text has been well summed up by Delitzsch and Baethgen. Cp also Che. OPs. 20-25, and see PSALMS.

The OT references to Melchizedek exercised both Jewish and Christian doctors. The omission of any reference to his story in the Book of Jubilees suggests a very early reaction against its religious comprehensiveness.[4] Talmudic passages also permit the conjecture that some Jewish teachers disliked the use made of it in the Epistle to the [3] See Che. Ps.(2). (1) Metrical considerations show that there is some accretion on the text. (2) על־דברתי is intolerably prosaic. (3) The other so-called royal psalms contain no certain references to historical personages such as Simon the Maccabee or John Hyrcanus, each of whom has been not unplausibly suggested as the hero of Ps. 110. Duhm remarks, 'How the reference to Melchizedek came to be introduced, I do not know; perhaps it is the marginal note of a reader.' See PSALMS, § 29.

Hebrews. In Nĕdārīm 32*b* we have, according to Friedländer,[1] a reply to what is said on Melchizedek in Heb. 7. The Christian theologian called Melchizedek 'without father, without mother, without genealogy.' The Talmud, however, states that Melchizedek is no other than Shem (so also Targs. Jon., and Jerus., Jer. on Is. 41 and Ephrem Syr. on Gen.). The Christian writer applies the words of Ps. 110 to Jesus. The Talmud replies that, owing to Melchizedek's inconsiderateness in mentioning Abraham before God, God transferred the priesthood from Melchizedek to Abraham. (The words, 'and he was priest of the Supreme God,' are taken to mean that his descendants were not priests.) Cp also Sanhedr. 108 b, Ber. rabba, 44.

On the arguments in Heb. 5-7 see Bishop Westcott's commentary, where it is well pointed out that the writer is unconcerned with the historical character of Melchizedek, and confines himself to drawing suggestions from the language of the narrative. In this he reminds us somewhat of Philo (De Leg. Alleg. iii. 25 26, Mangey, 1 102 f.). Cp G. Milligan, Theology of the Ep. to the Hebrews, 118, 210.

The recent attempt of Hommel to prove the historical character of the account of Melchizedek can hardly be called plausible (AHT 153 ff.), and would probably be modified now by the learned author. Kittel's statements in Hist. 1 179 f. also seem to require some reconsideration. He admits that the passage on Melchizedek has been 'very largely revised by the redactor,' but thinks that 'the balance of evidence is in favour of its historical character.'

See also Rösch, 'Die Begegnung Abrahams mit Melchisedek,' Th. St. Kr., 1885, pp. 321-356. Rösch supposes a tradition of the Jerusalem priesthood in pre-Israelitish times. This was accepted as probable by Hommel, GBA 162, n. 2 (1885).

MELITA (μελιτη, TR; μελιτηνη, WH after B and Vv. Acts 28 1). The question as to the identity of the island upon which Paul was shipwrecked (Acts 28 1) may be regarded as finally settled. The indications in Acts stamp the account of the entire voyage as that of an eye-witness, and give it great value. The view (first found, but without arguments, in Const. Porphyr. De Admin. Imp. 36) that the Melita of Acts is the island now called Meleda off the Dalmatian coast, possesses now merely historical interest.

1. Identification with Malta.

The 'typhonic wind,' which 'struck down from' the lofty peaks of Mt. Ida (Acts 27 14), would have driven the vessel, as she scudded before it (v. 15 ἐπιδόντες ἐφερόμεθα), on the coast of Africa had not her course been changed. Under the lee of Cauda the ship was laid to on the starboard tack (i.e. with her right side to the wind), and 'the gear' was lowered (v. 17, χαλάσαντες τὸ σκεῦος). By this phrase the author means that the mainyard and mainsail were sent down. This, to a landsman, was the striking operation, and he omits to mention that the ship stood on under storm sails. Such a ship as Paul's, close-hauled on the starboard tack, with a gale from ENE., would make a course about 8° N. of W., at a mean rate of 1½ m. an hour; this would bring her to Malta in the time stated (Acts 27 27). For the details of the calculation, see James Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul(4), 124 ff. (1st ed. 1848).

The many conditions of the narrative are satisfied only by Malta, and more particularly by the 'bay of St. Paul' (di S. Paolo), about 8 m. NW. of Valetta, which has always been pointed out by tradition as the scene of the wreck. The subsequent voyage to Italy by way of Syracuse (Acts 28 12) confirms this result. The view that the ship was driven to the Dalmatian coast rests upon an erroneous interpretation of [1] REJ, April-June 1883, p. 191.

Acts 27 27 (see ADRIA). It also necessitates the assumption of a complete change in the wind from its original direction, whilst the view that Melita = Malta involves the supposition that the wind blew steadily from one point of the compass.

With a north-easterly wind, the sea breaks violently on the low rocky point of Koura which juts out to form the eastern side of St. Paul's bay. A ship driving as was Paul's must inevitably pass within a quarter of a mile of this point, which, owing to the southward trend of the shore in the neighbourhood of Valetta, would be the first land made, and the breakers would give notice of its 'drawing near.' In Acts 27 27 '(the shipmen deemed) that they drew near to some country' (AV), 'that they were drawing near' (RV), should be, 'that some land was nearing them' (προσάγειν—an ordinary idiom).[1] The soundings here vary from 17 to 25 fathoms, shoaling to 15 fathoms at a distance of half-an-hour in the direction of the vessel's drift (v. 28). The anchors held through the night, for the bottom of sand and clay is so good that 'while the cables hold there is no danger, as the anchors will never start' (Sailing Directions, quoted by Smith, op. cit. 132). In the morning they were cut away, and abandoned (v. 40, εἴων εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν· not as in AV 'committed themselves unto the sea': RV is correct).

2. Criticism of narrative.

The final element in the scene is scarcely understood. The intention was to run the ship ashore, and it is usually assumed that this was successfully accomplished. The difficulty lies in the words 'falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground' (AV v. 41, περιπεσόντες δὲ εἰς τόπον διθάλασσον ἐπέκειλαν τὴν ναῦν: 'lighting upon a place,' RV). It is clear that the words describe something unexpected,[2] which balked the intention of running ashore.

It is a mistake to hold (with Rams. St. Paul the Traveller, 340) that ἐπέκειλαν must imply purpose. Equally erroneous is the view of Smith (op. cit. 142 f.), that the ship drove on to the beach. It is clear from vv. 43 f. ('they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea' . . . . 'some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship') that some space of sea, too deep for wading, intervened between the spot on which the vessel was aground and the shore. Smith interprets the 'place where two seas met' as the narrow sound between the mainland and the island of Salmonetta (Salmun) which shelters St. Paul's Bay on the north-west. This channel, not more than one hundred yards broad, a 'Bosporus in miniature,' connects the bay with the outer sea (cp the description of the Bosporus by Strabo, Πέλαγος ὁ καλοῦσι Προποντίδα· κἀκεῖνο εἰς ἄλλο τὸ Εὔξεινον προσαγορευόμενον πόντον, ἔστι δὲ διθάλαττος τρόπον τινὰ οὗτος). Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 340 f.), takes it to be 'the isthmus between the island and the mainland'; but the chart does not show any such isthmus or 'neck of land projecting towards the island.'

Taking everything into consideration, we can have little doubt that by τόπος διθάλαττος we should understand a bank covered with water (cp Dio Chrys. 5 83 τραχέα καὶ διθάλαττα καὶ ταινίαι), or a reef. The chart shows a patch of shoal water (soundings, 9-12 fathoms) bearing SW from the approximate place of anchorage. The bottom is 'rocky and foul,' and this may be the remains of a submerged rock formerly lying here. It is to be noted that Smith (op. cit. 142) relies upon the 'wasting action of the sea' to account for the fact that the traditional scene of the wreck has now no sandy beach (v. 39, κόλπον . . . ἔχοντα αἰγιαλόν, 'a certain creek with a shore,' AV). Far more likely is it that the sailors would head the ship for the other creek, into which the Mestara valley opens, where there is at the present day a beach. In order to reach this creek, the ship must necessarily have passed over the shoal above mentioned.

No island so small as Malta has had so great a history. It has been a small edition of Sicily. Its earliest historical inhabitants were Phœnicians (Diod. 5 12); to them succeeded Greeks, and in 218 B.C. the island was seized by the Romans, and became part of the Province of Sicily (Cic. Verr. ii. 4 18 46). The language of the βάρβαροι (see BARBARIAN) spoken of in Acts was probably Punic (bilingual—Greek and Punic—inscriptions in Bœckh, CIG 5752 f.). Subsequently the shipwrecked party found those who could speak Greek or Latin, or both, at the governor's seat (? at Città Vecchia, 5 m. from the scene of the wreck).

3. History of Malta.

The governor bore the title πρῶτος (Acts 28 7) 'chief man of the island' AV (cp ACTS § 13, end). The title is confirmed by an inscription from the neighbouring island of Gaulos (Gozzo), which runs Λ[ούκιος], Κλ[αυδίου] υἱὸς Κ., Προύδηνς, ἱππεὺς Ῥωμαίων, πρῶτος Μελιταίων κ.τ.λ. (CIG 5754. Cp CIL 10 7495, municipii Melitensium primus omnium).

The island lay on the track of ships trading between the E. and the W. (cp v. 11); but this is not inconsistent with the failure of the sailors to recognise an unfrequented part of the coast (Acts 27 39). W. J. W.

MELONS (אֲבַטִּחִים; πεποκες [BAFL]) are mentioned among the various kinds of pleasant food which the Israelites had enjoyed in Egypt (Nu. 11 5†). The reference is almost certainly to the water melon Citrullus vulgaris, Schrod.

The Hebrew word, which, according to Lagarde (Uebers. 10), may be connected with a conjugation (of the Sem. verb) which is lost except in Ethiopic, is perhaps related to √מבח (in Ar. 'to cook'; cp the etymology of πέπων). The same word is found in Samar., Syr. (paṭṭīḥā) and Arab. (biṭṭīḫ);[1] the Arab. word reappears in Sp. albudeca, Fr. pastèque.

The Hebrew ăbaṭṭīăḥ is mentioned not unfrequently in Mishn. and Talm., and is distinguished from the מלפפון (μηλοπέπων), by which apparently the melon proper Cucumis melo, L., is intended.[2] Whilst there is no clear proof that Cucumis melo was cultivated by the ancient Egyptians, the water melon on the other hand, which Livingstone found to be indigenous in tropical Africa, is represented on extant Egyptian monuments (De Candolle, Origines, 209). See Hasselquist, Travels, 255 f. See FOOD, § 5. N. M.

MELZAR (הַמֶּלְצַר; Theod. αμελcαδ [B], αμερcαρ [A]; 𝕲 [87], however, has αβιεcδρι, which in Dan. 1 3 it gives for MT's Ashpenaz; ܡܠܨܪ in v. 11; ܡܠܨܪ in v. 16; Malasar), the name, personal or official, of the courtier set over Daniel and his friends at the beginning of their court life, Dan. 1 11 (αμεcαδ [Q*], αμελc. [Q[a]]), 16. AV treats the name as personal in the text, but as official in the margin; RV takes the marginal rendering of AV ('the steward') into the text.

The course adopted by King James's translators in the text can be justified only on the supposition that the definite article which is prefixed to מֶלְצַר in MT arose out of a very early incorrect theory that מלצר was an official title, whereas in reality it was a personal name. Certainly none of the ancient versions took the initial ה to represent the article.

If however the witness of the versions be disallowed, how shall we explain מלצר, taking it as a corrupt form of some Babylonian word? Schr. (COT 2 126) and Frd. Del. (Glossæ Babylonicæ in Bä.-Del., Daniel [1880]) derive מלצר from Ass. maṣṣaru, 'guardian.' This, however, is in more than one respect improbable.[3] It would be better to correct המל into אמל (cp Theod.),[4] and to explain the name as a compound of amel or amil, 'man of,' and the name of some God (cp EVIL-MERODACH). But the fact that 𝔊 has αβιεσδρι both in 1 11 16 and in 1 3 points most probably to the right explanation. Read in 1 11, 'and Daniel said to Belshazzar, prince of the eunuchs, who had been set over Daniel,' etc. Belšarezer was a favourite name (see ASHPENAZ).

Here there is first a slight transposition, next a change of a point (מָנָּה for מָנָה), and thirdly a correction of המלצר into בלשאצר. Note the š in the form given in Pesh., and for further details see ASHPENAZ. [Since the article ASHPENAZ was published, Professors Prince and Driver, and Dr. J. Taylor in Hastings' DB, have commented on 'Melzar.' None of these scholars, however, has explained the word, which, being the product of textual corruption, is in fact inexplicable. But Prof. Prince (Daniel, 196) has unconsciously advanced towards the explanation of αβιεσδρι given already under ASHPENAZ.]

(see CHRONOLOGY, § 34), 2 K. 15 14-23. He is one of the usurpers referred to by the prophet Hosea (7 4-7), and was enabled by Tiglath-pileser's help to plant himself so firmly that he transmitted his crown to his son Pekahiah. Tiglath-pileser himself (see KB 2 31) speaks of having received tribute from states ranging from Cappadocia to Palestine, and apparently places this event in 738 B.C., though Guthe (GVI 232) on theoretical grounds doubts the accuracy of the date. One of the tributary states, according to the general opinion, is Samaria. The first king mentioned is Kuštašpi of (city) Kummuḫ (in the Kommagene of classic writers); then comes Raṣunnu of (country) Gar-imíri (i.e., Aram-Damascus), and next Mí-ni-ḫi-(im)-mí (cp col. 2921, begin.) of (city) Samírina and Ḫirūm of (city) Ṣur—i.e., Tyre. It is most natural to identify the third king with Menahem of Samaria. Still, considering that just before Tuba'lu, king of Sidon, Sennacherib in the Taylor cylinder mentions Minḫimmu, king of (city) Šamši-muruna, the doubt arises whether the Assyrian scribe may not here have given the name Samírina to some other city, such as Shimron or Shimron-Mĕrōn, with which the Ass. Šamši-muruna has been identified[2] (see Zimmern, ap. Rühl, 'Chronol. der Könige,' Deutsche Zt. f. Gesch.-wiss. 12 68, but cp SHIMRON). If the ordinary view is correct, Tiglath-pileser refers in his inscription to the event which is thus related in 2 K. 15 19 '[In his days] came Pul king of Assyria against the land, and Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of silver, that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his possession' (see PUL). Unfortunately the Assyrian inscriptions appear to know nothing of an advance on the part of Tiglath-pileser so far south as Samaria at the period referred to.

However this question be settled, the account of Menahem's payment of tribute in 2 K. 15 20 is historically interesting. It would seem that in Menahem's time the landed proprietors shared the burdens of the state as well as military service among themselves. If we reckon the talent at 3000 shekels, the assessment spoken of in the Hebrew text permits the inference that there were then in the Northern Kingdom 60,000 families possessed of heritable lands (Meyer, GA 1 449; Kittel, Hist. 2 334).

Menahem was doubtless a rough, relentless warrior, probably a Gileadite, for GADI [q.v.] can hardly be his father's real name. This may help to account for his barbarity towards the inhabitants of Tappuah—certainly not Tiphsah—at the opening of his career (2 K. 15 16; see TAPPUAH).

MENAN, RV MENNA (μεννα [Ti. WH], cp perhaps Nab. מענא, מענו; in Gk. inscr. μανος), a name in the genealogy of JESUS, Lk. 3 31. See GENEALOGIES ii., § 3.

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN (מְנֵא מְנֵא תְּקֵל וּפַרְסִין; μανη [i.e., ηριθμηται 87, εμετρησεν Theod.], θεκελ [i.e., εσταται κατελογισθη 87, εσταθη Theod.], φαρες [i.e., εξηρται 87, διηρηται Theod.] 𝔊BA Theod.; note too μανη φαρες θεκελ in introd. to chap. 5 in MS 87; mane thecel phares), mysterious Aramaic words in Dan. 5 25 (cp 26-28). Belshazzar and his lords, as they banqueted, and drank wine from the golden vessels of the old Jewish temple, were startled to see these mysterious words traced by the fingers of a man's hand on the wall. The wise men of the Chaldæans were summoned to interpret what was written, but failed to do so. Then Daniel was called, who interpreted the words to mean that God had numbered Belshazzar's kingdom; that he had been weighed, and found wanting; and that his kingdom had been divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. It will be noticed that Mene is not repeated in the interpretation (v. 26), and that Peres is there substituted for Upharsin. On both points Theod. agrees with the interpretation. Whether vv. 26-28 give the true meaning of the words—in fact, whether the words stand in their original context—has been much discussed. As Bevan and Marti point out, תְּקֵל and פְּרֵס cannot mean 'weighed' and 'divided,' as the interpretation in vv. 27 f. seems to require; the form ופרסין too, has no apparent sense. This seems to them to show that the phrase מנא מנא תקל ופרסי׳ was not invented by the author, but borrowed from some other source, the interpretation in vv. 26-28 being an attempt to extract a suitable meaning from the words in defiance of grammar. Bevan and Marti, therefore, agree with Clermont-Ganneau (JA viii. series 8 36 ff.), who explains 'a mina, a shekel, a half mina'; cp Nöldeke (ZA, 1886, p. 414), and see MINA, SHEKEL. For פרס = half mina, note the late Jewish usage (Levy's NHWB 4 123) and in particular an Assyrian weight now in the Brit. Mus. which bears the Aramaic inscription פרש (see Cook, Aram. Glossary, 99). Hoffmann (ZA, 1887, pp. 45 ff.) takes תקל as in apposition to the second מנא = the mina in shekel-pieces—i.e., darics or gold-staters. It would be better, however, with Haupt (Kamph., 'Daniel,' SBOT) to render, 'There has been counted (מְנֵא) a mina, a shekel, and half-minas.'[1] The mina might mean Nebuchadrezzar; the shekel, Belshazzar; and the half-minas the power of the Medes and Persians. This use of weights to denote persons is found in the Talmud, where an inferior son of a worthy father is called 'a half-mina, son of a mina,' and so on. Prince (Mene, mene, etc., a dissertation [1893], 8; Bk. of Dan. 113 [1899]) suggests further that there may be a historical background for the statement about 'Mene,' etc., though this is a matter of pure conjecture. J. P. Peters (JBL, 1896, p. 116), however, thinks (with Behrmann) that these combinations are too fanciful, and would read in v. 25 (following Theod., but omitting the points), מנא תקל פרס, these roots meaning simply, 'Number, weigh, divide (or, Persian),' which Daniel has to fit with an interpretation suitable to the circumstances, whilst D. S. Margoliouth (Hast. DB 3 341 b) proposes 'he has counted, counted, weighed, and they assess' (v. 25), and 'he has counted, weighed, assessed' (vv. 26-28).

[2] If our Menahem is meant, why does not Tiglath-pileser call him 'king of Bit Ḫumri,' Bit Ḫumri being the usual designation of the land of Israel?

To sum up. The ordinary interpretation of the mysterious sentence (see RVmg.) is plainly inadequate. All the learning in the world, however, will not make Clermont-Ganneau's or even Haupt's theory more than moderately plausible. It has been suggested by J. Marquart (Fund. 73) that the legend of the writing hand has its origin in the account of the apparition seen by HELIODORUS in 2 Macc. 3 24 ff. As Niese has shown, Jason of Cyrene's history, which forms the basis of 2 Macc., is the work of a contemporary of the events related; this shows that the writer of Dan. 5, if of the Maccabean age, may well have known of the story of Heliodorus's vision. It does not appear that Marquart emends the text of the mysterious sentence in Dan. 5; but with 2 Macc. 3 25 before us, it is difficult not to read מחא [מחא] קטל פרש[א], 'smite, [smite], slay, thou horseman' (Che.). This theory is surely of interest, and so too, is the explanation which it suggests, of the method pursued by the editor of the story in Daniel. For we can hardly doubt that the sentence originally stood in Daniel as emended, with the alteration פרס, 'O Persia,' for פרש 'horseman.' Now we can see why it is said in v. 30, 'In that night was Belshazzar . . . slain' (קְטִיל; cp קטל in the sentence on the wall). On a further question see Crit. Bib.

Boissier points out that predictions traced by a mysterious hand are referred to in a cuneiform soothsaying tablet (Brit. Mus. no. 4030; see PSBA 18 237 f. [1896]). Line 3 says, 'If in the middle of the ēkallu (היכל) a finger describes a figure, brigands will rule the land.' T. K. C.—S. A. C.

MENELAUS (μενελαος [AV]), a Hellenising form of the Heb. Menahem; cp Eliakim and Alcimus, Jesus [Jeshua] and Jason, etc.), brother of Simon the Benjamite (cp 2 Macc. 3 4), and probably one of the sons of Tobias (We. IJG 200, n. 1); according to another (and less likely) tradition given by Jos. (Ant. xii. 5 1) he was Jason's brother. See ONIAS, § 10. He was sent to Antioch bearing tribute, and while there was able by means of a bribe to supplant the high priest JASON (q.v.) (2 Macc. 4 23 ff.). Although nominated, his task was not an easy one. Jason, who had the popular support, was indeed forced to fly; but lack of funds, and the consequent non-payment of tribute, rendered it necessary for him to appear before the king. Antiochus, however, was away engaged in quelling a petty insurrection, and Menelaus by presents of vessels stolen from the temple at Jerusalem was able to subvert ANDRONICUS (q.v.), the king's deputy; and when the faithful Onias III. (then at the temple of Daphne near Antioch) threatened to divulge the arrangement, he was persuaded to leave his sanctuary and was treacherously murdered by the deputy (on the accuracy of this report, see further ONIAS, § 7 f.). The popular indignation was shared by Greeks and Jews alike (4 36), and complaint having been made to Antiochus the murderer suffered a well-merited punishment. In Jerusalem, moreover, the repeated spoliation of the temple treasures under LYSIMACHUS (q.v.), the brother of Menelaus, and the knowledge that the money so obtained was put to the basest uses, incited the people to revolt, and Lysimachus met his death at the hands of the mob. An accusation was laid against Menelaus and three witnesses were sent by the senate to the king at Tyre. Menelaus soon saw the hopelessness of his case, and, following out his usual habit of bribing, won over Ptolemy Dorymenes, who induced the king to discharge the case. The wretched witnesses were put to death, a fate which they would not have met with even at the hands of the rude Scythians (as the writer relates, 4 47). See, generally, ONIAS.

We hear but little more of Menelaus. When Jason attacked Jerusalem, he took refuge in the citadel (5 5 ff.), and after the city had been put to the sword, it was he (τῶν νόμων καὶ τῆς πατρίδος προδότης, v. 15) who guided Antiochus in his plundering expedition in the temple, and after the short reign of terror was over, Menelaus was left in charge with a Phrygian (v. 23).

At the time of Lysias' treaty with the Jews, Menelaus is unmentioned, and the high-priesthood is in the hands of ALCIMUS (q.v.). At all events he does not seem to have been idle, for, when Antiochus Eupator was proceeding on his campaign against Judæa, Menelaus is depicted in his familiar character as sedulously flattering the king, in the hope of ultimately being placed over the government. Lysias, however, warned the king, and Menelaus was put to death miserably (2 Macc. 13 3-8).

It was a point that could be seen from Shechem: 'one company,' said Gaal from the gate, 'cometh by the way of the oak of Meonenim.' Perhaps we should read יְרַחְמְאֵל, 'Jerahmeel,' a place-name which may also appear in the distorted forms Arumah (v. 41) and Tormah (v. 31). MEONOTHAI (מְעוֹנֹתַי; μαναθ[ε]ι [BA], μαωναθει [L]), the father of Ophrah, according to 1 Ch. 4 14. MEPHIBOSHETH (מְפִי[ב]שֶׁת, § 42; μεμφιβοcθε [B], -θαι [A], μεμφιβααλ [L]).

brother Armoni (rather Abinadab? see SAUL, § 6), was given up to the Gibeonites for their blood vengeance (2 S. 21 8 ff.). See RIZPAH.

2. Son of Jonathan, and grandson of Saul (2 S. 9 1 etc.), also called Meribaal (?). See MERIBAAL.

3. According to 𝔊^{BAL} in 2 S. 3 f., (but Ιεβοσθε, A[? a?] in 3 7, A[? (mg.)] in 3 8), the name of Saul's son and successor, commonly known as Ishbosheth or Eshbaal (Ishbaal?).

The historic trustworthiness of the names Ishbosheth and Eshbaal is altogether doubtful; the name Mephibosheth appears to conceal the true, original name, for which textual criticism has to seek.

1. Name.

According to the prevalent theory, the latter part of the traditional name is a substitute of bōsheth, 'shame' for 'Baal' (cp ISHBAAL, ISHBOSHETH); the former part is admitted to be obscure. This theory, however (viz., that names compounded with baal were so repugnant to later editors that baal was changed to bōsheth) is very difficult when we consider that it is in the late Book of Chronicles that we find the forms Esh-baal, Meri-baal, and Merib-baal, whilst Jastrow's theory that there was a deity known by the name of bašt (=bosheth), however learnedly defended, could be accepted by critics only as a last resource. A searching textual criticism appears to suggest a more probable explanation.

מפבשת (commonly read Mephibosheth) can be traced back to an original form ירחמ[א]ל; cp פיכל, Gen. 26 26, i.e., ירחמאל. The stages of corruption and expansion are (a) פפמח, (b) פסח, (c) פשח, (d) פ[י]בשת, (e) מפ[י]בשת. In (d) and (e) it will be noticed that מ and ב are inserted, the מ under the influence of מריבעל, the ב to produce a possible sense (pî-bōšeth, 'mouth of shame'). In (a) פ represents רי. (b) and (c), however, are the most interesting, because these stages are closely connected with the legend (as we must call it) of Saul's grandson.[1]

In 2 S. 9 3, when David inquires for a surviving representative of Saul, he is told of a son of Jonathan, called Mephibosheth, who is lame, פִּסֵּחַ (on both his feet, 9 13). The story, which is told in 4 4 to account for this lameness, evidently has a romantic character. The probability is that Mephibosheth (if that was the youth's name) was said to have been lame in order to account for his name, which was given in the record to which the narrator had access as Pissēaḥ (cp PASEAH=Jeraḥme'el in a Calebite genealogy). In a later state Pissēaḥ became first Pi-bosheth and then Mephi-bosheth; but the anecdote which had arisen when the name was given as Pissēaḥ remained. It is remarkable that Saul's successor was also called Mephi-bosheth by some (see above, 3). This suggests that Ishbosheth is probably an expansion of I-bosheth (the sh being repeated to produce an etymology), where 'I' is a relic of 'Mephi,' and consequently that the tradition of the lameness of the bearer of the name referred originally not to a grandson but to a son of Saul. The true name of Saul's successor, however, was probably either Jerahme'el or an easy popular distortion of it such as Maḥriel. We do not happen to find the form Meribaal (a corruption of Maḥriel?) applied to Saul's successor; it is, however, applied to Saul's grandson in 1 Ch. The true name of the grandson of Saul and son of Jonathan may very well have been forgotten.

As to 'Eshbaal' ('Ishbaal'?), the name which is thought to take the place of the 'Ishbosheth' of 1 K. in 1 Ch. 8 33 and 9 39, it is most probably a corrupt variant of Malchishua, which, however, is itself also corrupt (see MALCHISHUA). Possibly the scribe who produced it may have been confirmed in his error by a reminiscence of Meribaal; but that Eshbaal or Ishbaal is an interpretation of Meribaal cannot plausibly be held.

The result obtained above with reference to the name Mephibosheth casts a light on the singularly premature statement respecting Saul's grandson 'Mephibosheth' in 2 S. 4 4. According to Budde, 2 S. 4 4*b* should be placed after 2 S. 9 3, since it relates the cause of the lameness referred to by Ziba (Ri.-Sa. 248). This is plausible; but how shall we account satisfactorily for the misplacement? Probably 2 S. 4 4 has been recast by an editor; i.e., it has taken the place of an explanation (now lost) of the name of Pissēaḥ (see above) borne by Saul's son and successor. The passage may originally have run, 'Now Saul's son was lame of his feet. He . . . fell, and became lame; and his name was called Pissēaḥ.' The lameness of Saul's son may well have been referred to in order to account for the ease with which the poor weak king was assassinated. It is very possible that the original story of the assassination was not exactly that which we now read in 4 2 f. 5-12.[1]

We have already touched on some historical points in dealing with the name; names, in fact, often help to make or mar historical traditions.

2. History.

Here, we need speak only of the person best known (however incorrectly) as Mephibosheth. When David sent for him, he was residing probably at Beth-jeraḥme'el, the centre of his father's clan, also known as Beth-gilgal (see SAUL, § 1). The impression conveyed by the MT of 2 S. 9 4 f. that he was at the time in the house of an unknown private individual, whose name and family are remembered, in an obscure Gadite town, can hardly be correct. We may accept the tradition that David (on politic grounds?) guaranteed to 'Mephibosheth' the lands which had belonged to his grandfather, but appointed Ziba, a servant of Saul, whom David had probably won over to his side, as 'Mephibosheth's' steward. This fact, however, has been decorated, so to speak, by an admirer of David, by whom this king is represented as basing his act on the sacred covenant between himself and Jonathan, and as expressing the kindliest solicitude respecting the house of Saul, although from another source we learn that David deliberately handed over seven of Saul's descendants to the blood-thirsty Gibeonites (2 S. 21 1-14). The truth probably is that David sent for Mephibosheth, not on account of his covenant with Jonathan (which is too probably, as Winckler has shown, an 'idealisation of history'), but with the view of putting him under surveillance, lest he should assert his claim to his grandfather's crown.

The narrative in 2 S. 21 just referred to should probably be prefixed to 2 S. 9; v. 7, however, which states that David spared 'Mephibosheth' on this occasion, is evidently an interpolation which arose after the transposition of the section. The passages relative to David's covenant with Jonathan are also most probably of later origin (see S. A. Cook, AJSL, April 1900, p. 169 f.).

Saul's grandson is also mentioned in connection with Absalom's revolt (2 S. 16 1-4 19 24 [25] ff., and perhaps elsewhere). According to Ziba, he neglected to join David because he had conceived hopes of being made king by the 'house of Israel.' For this David is said to have dispossessed 'Mephibosheth,' and made Ziba lord of Saul's lands. Later, 'Mephibosheth' came to meet David, and sought to explain his conduct. David, however, does not appear to have been entirely satisfied, and directed 'Mephibosheth' and Ziba to divide the land. Such, at any rate, is one tradition.

It is remarkable, however, that, according to another tradition, which survives only in a distorted form, it was 'Mephibosheth,' not Ziba, who brought supplies to David when he left Jerusalem on his way to the passage of the Jordan, in acknowledgment of which David invited 'Mephibosheth' to become one of the guests at his table (i.e., a member of his court). Obviously this is due to an admirer of David, who would not have his hero accused of having ill-treated the son of Jonathan. We may at any rate assume, on the basis of this passage (2 S. 19 33), that the invitation or rather command which now stands at the end of 2 S. 9 7 should properly form part of the narrative of David's second interview with 'Mephibosheth.'[2] Ziba, in short, probably took all the lands of Saul (cp 2 S. 19 30), and 'Mephibosheth' was ordered to a disguised imprisonment at the court.

2 S. 17 27 is evidently based on a corrupt and misunderstood original, which may with high probability be restored thus, 'And it came to pass that Mephibosheth ben Jōnathan [from

[1] (b) may also be connected with a passage in the early history of Jerusalem. 'Blind' (עורים) and 'lame' (פסחים) in 2 S. 5 6 8 are apparently fragments of 'Jerahmeelites' (ירחמאלים). For fuller details see Crit. Bib.

Beth-jerahmeel, from Beth-gilgal, from Gibeah of Shalishah],[1] the Gilgalite, from Beth-gilgal. . . .' In 19 31 ff., מִגִּבְעַת שָׁלִשָׁה, 'from Gibeah of Shalisha,' has become ברזלי BARZILLAI, a purely imaginary name, which the writer must have derived from a corrupt form of 2 S. 17 27. It is certainly attractive—this familiar story of Barzillai—but it is neither more nor less than a romantic decoration based upon misunderstanding. The reference in 17 27 to Machir, Ammiel, and Lo-debar apparently comes from 9 4 f. לא דבר, might be a corruption either of יבש גלעד (Jabesh-gilead) or of ביה גלגל (Beth-gilgal); but underneath the corrupt words which precede we can detect בית ירחמאל (Beth-jeraḥme'el = Beth-gilgal). See, further, SAUL, § 6.

In 2 S. 9 12 we hear of a son of 'Mephibosheth' called Micha; but the name and the genealogy in which it finds place (1 Ch. 8 3 ff. 9 41 ff.) are both suspicious (SAUL, § 6). Both Micha and Chimham (2 S. 19 37 ff.) may quite naturally be traced to Jeraḥme'el.

T. K. C.

MERAB (מֵרַב, § 74; μερωβ [BAL], 'increase'?—but see below) is represented as Saul's elder daughter (1 S. 14 49, om. A), who, though promised to David, was finally given to ADRIEL to wife (18 17 19). Her five sons were said to have fallen at the hands of the Gibeonites, as representatives of Saul's house, to remove the blood-guiltiness of the land (2 S. 21 8, where 'Michal' is generally taken as a scribe's error for 'Merab'). The whole of the Merab paragraph (1 S. 18 17-19), however, together with some neighbouring passages (parts of 21 26 29 f.) is wanting in 𝔊. Its genesis can not improbably be traced.

The name Merab may have grown out of a corrupt variant of the name of Saul's daughter, which elsewhere appears as Michal and probably also as Abiḥail, but which was really Jeraḥme'elith (cp Mahalath). The names of the persons to whom Merab and Michal respectively are said to have been transferred are also probably corruptions of shortened forms of Jeraḥme'el, or rather 'Adriel [Maḥriel], son of Barzillai [citizen of Gibeah of Shalisha] the Meholathite [Jeraḥme'elite],' and 'Palṭiel [Maṭriel], son of Laish [Shalishah], who was of Gallim [Beth-gilgal],' are the same person—a member of a clan called (from its origin) Jeraḥme'el.

All that the old tradition knew was that Saul's daughter married within her father's clan. See SAUL, § 1, LAISH, PALTI, MEHOLATHITE. Cp, however, H. P. Smith or Budde on the passages concerned.

MERAIAH (מְרָיָה, on name, see below), head of the priestly b'ne Seraiah in the days of Joiakim, Jeshua's successor, Neh. 12 12 (μαρεα [B], μαραια [א], μαρια [A], αμαριας [L]).

As the text stands, the root of the name is מרה, 'to withstand'; see NAMES, §§ 35, 53. But Gray's suggestion (HPN 295, n. 1) that Meraiah comes from AMARIAH (q.v.) is very plausible (cp 𝔊L), and when we consider the number of post-exilic names arising (in our view) out of 'Jerahmeel,' one of which is MERAIOTH = Jerimoth, it is even probable. For Amariah is certainly Jerahmeelite; cp Zeph. 1 1 (Cushi and Amariah near together; cp CUSHI) 1 Ch. 6 6 f. (Zerahiah, Meraioth, Amariah, Ahitub[2]—all probably from ethnic names).

2. In Neh. 12 15 Meraioth (Bא*A om., μαριωθ [א c.a mg. inf.], μαριμωθ [L]) seems to be a false reading for Meremoth. See MEREMOTH (3).

MERAN, RV Merran (μερραν [BAQΓ]), Bar. 3 23. Probably a misreading for Mĕdan = Midian. To look for Arabian names of similar sound is a profitless undertaking. The 'merchants of Midian and Teman' is a natural combination (so Hi., Kneucker, Ball, J. T. Marshall).

1. The smallest of the three divisions of Levites (Gen. 46 11 Ex. 6 19, etc., only in P and Ch., see GERSHON, GENEALOGIES i., § 7, KOHATH, LEVITES). The Merarites (הַמְּרָרִי, ὁ μ.) are frequently mentioned in the priestly writings (cp Nu. 3 17 4 29 7 8 1 Ch. 6 1 9 14, etc.); their cities are placed in Zebulun, Gad, and Reuben (Josh. 21 7 34-40). The two sub-divisions bear the names MUSHI and MAHLI [qq.v.]. Both Mushi and Merari seem to be corruptions of Miṣri—i.e., belonging to Muṣur or Muṣri (cp MIZRAIM, § 2*b*), on the N. Arabian border—whilst Mahli = Jerahmeeli (Che.). Apparently the original seats of the LEVITES [q.v.] were in the Miṣrite or Jerahmeelite region (Che.). See MOSES, § 6.

2. The father of JUDITH [q.v.] (Judith 8 1, μεραρει; 16 6, μαραρει [א]). From a comparison with Gen. 26 34 it was an old conjecture that Merari was a corruption of Beeri (the Hittite), cp Ball (Jud. ad loc.).

3. Family in Ezra's caravan (see EZRA i., 2, ii., 15 [1] d), Ezra 8 19 (υἱοὶ Μεραρ[ε]ι [BAL]) = 1 Esd. 8 48 CHANNUNEUS (υἱοὶ χανουναίου [BA]).

The vowel-points suggest the meaning 'double rebellion' [so RV mg.; AV mg. 'the rebels'] (cp Cushanrishathaim), as if the name were a symbolic description of Babylonia, but since Pekod (in the parallel clause) is a geographical designation, 'Merathaim' must have been so too. Frd. Delitzsch (Par. 182), with Schrader's assent, explains m-r-t-m (the consonants of the text) from Ass. māt marrātim, 'the sea-country'—i.e., S. Babylonia; cp 'Bit-Yakin, which is on the shore of the sea' (marrāti, i.e., the Persian Gulf), in Sargon's Khorsabad inscr. 1 22 (KB 2 55; KAT(2) 423).

Cheyne, however, who regards Jer. 50 f. as (in its original form, traces of which still remain) directed against the Jerahmeelites or Edomites, who abetted the Babylonian invaders, and long continued to commit outrages on the Jews (see OBADIAH [BOOK]) reads thus: 'Go up against the land Jerahmeel, and against the inhabitants of Rehoboth, saith Yahwè, and do according to all that I have commanded thee.'[1]

MERCY SEAT

(ΕΡΜΗΣ), was the customary attendant of Jupiter (Zeus) when he appeared on earth (Ov. Fast. 5_{495}, Metam. 8_{621}), and is spoken of by Iamblichus (de Myst. Æg.) as θεὸς ὁ τῶν λόγων ἡγεμών. In Acts 14_{12} it is said that the people of Lystra took Barnabas (the older man) for Zeus, and Paul for Hermes 'because he was the chief speaker' (ἐπειδὴ αὐτὸς ἦν ὁ ἡγούμενος τοῦ λόγου). Details regarding Hermes and his Roman counterpart can be found in many easily accessible works. It will suffice here to refer to what has been said under JUPITER, col. 2648, and to remark that Hermes is also the Greek equivalent of NEBO. See also BARNABAS, § 3, and cp, on the sources, ACTS, § 10.

MERCY SEAT (כַּפֹּרֶת, kappṓreth; ἱλαστήριον; propitiatorium), corresponding to Luther's Gnadenstuhl.

1. The problem. 'Mercy-seat' is, of course, not an exact translation of kappṓreth and ἱλαστήριον, nor does the context suggest it. The phrase would do better for 'throne of grace' (θρόνος τῆς χάριτος) in Heb. 4_{16}. Our first task, then, must be to try to ascertain what the much-discussed word kappṓreth actually does mean (§§ 2-5); our next to make a similar endeavour as to the word ἱλαστήριον, and to ascertain whether the idea underlying the kappṓreth of the MT and that underlying the ἱλαστήριον of the LXX are coincident (§ 6 f.); our last to inquire what is the meaning of the word in the locus classicus, Rom. 3_{25} (§ 8).

2. Use of kappōreth in OT. In the OT kappṓreth occurs only in P (Ex. 25_{17-22} 26_{34} [𝔊 otherwise] 30_{6} [𝔊 om.] 31_{7} 35_{12} 37_{6-9} 39_{35} [𝔊 om.] 40_{20} [𝔊 om.] Lev. $16_{2\,13-15}$ Nu. 7_{89}) and in 1 Ch. 28_{11} (𝔊^{BA} ἐξιλασμός).

If in these passages we are content in the meanwhile to leave the word kappṓreth untranslated and to treat it purely as an unknown quantity, we obtain the following data towards a determination of the idea involved. In P the kappōreth denotes a concrete object (it is of gold and of definite dimensions); more precisely, it is a gold plate laid upon the ark of the covenant, rectangular in form, and in its measurements coinciding exactly with those of the ark. Upon this plate are fixed two cherubs of beaten gold, under the outspread wings of which Yahwè has his dwelling. On the great day of atonement the high priest sprinkles this gold plate with the blood of the animals sacrificed.[1]

The inference drawn from the facts by many ancient[2] and modern scholars—that kappṓreth means covering—was not unnatural. It was fallacious, nevertheless. If upon a bronze goblet we lay a disc that fits its upper rim, the word 'disc' does not therefore mean a 'covering' or 'lid,' although in point of fact in this particular case the disc actually is a 'lid.' In like manner here, though the kappṓreth actually does cover the ark, the name does not therefore necessarily mean a covering. There is this difference indeed between the two cases that whereas the words 'disc' and 'lid' have etymologically nothing in common, kappṓreth is actually derived by the supporters of the inference just mentioned from √כפר, kāphar, to cover. Now, whilst the connection of kappṓreth with √kāphar is undeniable, it must not be overlooked that it is a 'nomen actoris' derived from the Piel, and means literally 'she who wipes out,'[3]—'wipe out' in fact here having that pregnant sense of sühnen, expiare, which always characterises the Piel. Since this feminine noun shows a natural tendency to become an abstract one we may well adopt Merx's conjecture that probably it was originally associated with some such word as כְּלִי, so that our kappṓreth will be an abbreviation for כְּלִי הַכַּפֹּרֶת and will mean 'instrument of cleansing,' 'instrument of propitiation.'

The renderings of Pesh. (ḥūsāyā, Sühnung), Vg. (propitiatorium), and Arm. (in Ex. 25_{17} χawouthiun, expiatio) come very near this meaning of kappṓreth; that of the LXX will be considered later (see § 8). Thus on etymological grounds the interpretation of 'covering' is to be rejected, although in point of fact the kappṓreth actually did serve as a lid covering the ark. Whether the ark had a special covering of its own upon which the kappṓreth rested, so that the kappṓreth, as maintained by Dillmann and, among others, by Nowack (Arch. 2_{60}), is to be thought of as a kind of penthouse for the ark, cannot be made out; we have no information. In any case the meaning of kappṓreth in the OT is not 'covering,' nor yet 'atoning covering,' but, as we have seen, 'instrument of propitiation.'

In agreement with this is the important observation of Lagarde 'that an Arabic kaffārat, in daily use as

3. Kaffārat in Arabian law. a technical expression in legal procedure, corresponds formally and exactly to the Hebrew כַּפֹּרֶת.'[1]

Lagarde begins (231 f.) by showing how the Arabic verb kafara, 'cover,' is used: a cloud covers the sky, night covers by its darkness, the wind covers the traces of an encampment, the sower covers the seed, for which reason he is actually called kāfir (he who covers up). Next, Lagarde (232 f.) explains wherein it is that the kaffārat of Arabian law consists. 'Whosoever has deliberately left unfulfilled a naḏr (vow) or promise, must make a kaffārat [=כַּפֹּרֶת]. The kaffārat, moreover, is obligatory on everyone who has engaged in certain proceedings of law, especially the taking of an oath; the object of the kaffārat in this case being to make good any illegalities that may perchance have occurred in such proceedings. Further, it is obligatory upon every one who has reproached his wife . . . who has unintentionally killed a man [one school of law says 'a Moslem'] or by any negligence on his part occasioned the death of a man, who has not fasted duly according to rule, or who has failed to keep the fast of Ramaḍān. Some schools of law accept kaffārat also in expiation even of wilful manslaughter for which other schools . . . demand blood-revenge. The latter view is the only one really in consonance with the fundamental principles of Mohammedan law. The kaffārat required consists either in . . . the emancipation of a Mohammedan slave, or in fasting, or in ṣadaḳa (δικαιοσύνη, Mt. 6_{1} = ἐλεημοσύνη), which can be exercised only towards really needy persons.' Now, in Sunnite law there are four schools: everything which is common to all four may safely be taken as an original and integral element in Mohammedan law. And kaffārat is common to them all (Lag. op. cit. 233).

Lagarde states that the kaffārat is also usual among the Arabs in everyday life. He quotes (236), besides an interesting passage from Lane's Mod. Egypt. on funeral rites, a story of Ṭarṭūšī: a female slave had brought a dish of broth to table in too great a hurry, had let the dish fall, and scalded her master and his guests with its contents. Her master consoled her with the words: 'Thou art free: perhaps this may be to thee a kaffārat for thy fright.' See also Lagarde's Register u. Nachträge, 69_{1}; but cp GGN, 1891, pp. 135 ff.

That the OT kappṓreth and the Arab. kaffārat are in some way connected with each other is more than

4. Relation between OT kappōreth and Arab. kaffārat. probable. Lagarde[2] insists upon this. The two words, he says (235 f.), coincide exactly; 'and as the Arabs have ā for the Heb. ō, kaffārat cannot possibly be a loan from the Hebrew. The existence of this lautverschiebung makes it certain that the words are, each in its own place, original.' The ideas in both go back to a common primitive Semitic legal origin: the conception of kappṓreth is plainly a fundamental Semitic conception, though, of course, capable of being adopted by the authorities of an organised religion, like the early Judaism.[3]

How Lagarde himself pictured to himself the connection between the OT kappōreth and the primitive Semitic legal idea referred to he has not set forth in any detail. He only says that he is 'led more and more to the conclusion that כַּפֹּרֶת in the Pentateuch means the ark of the covenant in so far as atonement and the ark were connected,' and his statement shows that he agrees with Merx in the theory already mentioned, that kappṓreth is an abbreviation, presumably for some such expression as kelî hakkappōreth. One is surprised, however, that Lagarde should consider the ark itself, not the gold plate upon it, to be the kappōreth, contrary to the express words of the Pentateuch.

The present writer will only venture to say that the Arabic usage described by Lagarde, if accepted as illustrative of the primitive Semitic conception, seems to him to make for the explanation given above in § 2. Kappōreth, like kaffārat, means 'propitiation'; it is used, however, in the OT with reference to the thing which subserves the purpose of propitiation. Similar abbreviations (Lagarde compares אֲפֹד) are not unfrequent in technical expressions connected with worship, as, for example, in the popular designation of feast days.

Thus the word kaffārat-kappōreth has been very tenacious of its meaning during its age-long history.

5. History of the OT kappóreth-worship.

The meaning of propitiation, which came down from primitive Semitism, it continued to retain in the OT and in the Koran, and still possesses among modern Jews[1] and Arabs. In the case of the Jews this is all the more noteworthy because the passages in their law, which continually reminded them of a kappóreth, had from an early date come to have only theoretical validity. Whether the kappōreth-worship associated with the ark of the covenant had ever been actually practised may be left an open question here. What is certain, in any case, is that in the time of Jesus and the apostles the temple in Jerusalem no longer possessed the ark,[2] and, therefore, the kappōreth-worship connected therewith. As regards the offering of the high priest on the great day of atonement[3] in Herod's temple we have two notices: that of Josephus (Ant. iii. 10 3) and that of the Mishna (Yōmā). The high priest sprinkled the blood of the sin-offering, according to Josephus, towards the roof and floor of the holy of holies; according to Yōmā, towards that spot in the holy of holies, marked by a stone, where the ark of the covenant ought to have stood. This stone was called ében šathyā or ében šethiyyā (ATONEMENT, DAY OF, § 7). After the destruction of Herod's temple, even this shadowy worship ceased, and the kappōreth-cultus connected with the ark by the law became no more than a pious memory. The idea of kappōreth, however, was too natural to pass away.

Passing to the Greek form, we have first to establish its meaning in Greek generally.

(a) The adjective ἱλαστήριος, etymologically considered, has the meaning of 'propitiatory,' 'serving for propitiation.'

6. ἱλαστήριος and ἱλαστήριον in Greek.

Apart, however, from the LXX and Christian literature we know of only two ancient passages which certainly exemplify the use of this adjective. Among the Faiyūm MSS, discovered by Grenfell and Hunt,[4] is a fragment (No. 337) of a philosophical work, by an unknown author, concerning the gods. It is unfortunately much mutilated; still we are able to make out an expression which has great interest for our present inquiry (1 3-5): τοῖς θεοῖς εἰλαστη[ρίο]υς (sic) θυσίας ἀξιω[θέ?]ντες ἐπιτελεῖσθαι. The actual fragment dates from the second century A.D.; but the text itself may of course be older.

Here we find ἱλαστήριος as an adjective (of two terminations) qualifying θυσία: ἱλαστήριος θυσία = propitiatory sacrifice. No one can imagine here that the conception of sacrifice is already latent in the word ἱλαστήριος: ἱλαστήριος by itself means simply 'propitiatory,' the idea of sacrifice is given by θυσία.

The other passage is 4 Macc. 17 22, which need not

1 We cannot here investigate the history of the current German colloquialism, 'kappores gehen,' 'to go kappores'—i.e., to be destroyed. The word kappōres used in the language of modern Jewish worship is the old word kappōreth and means properly 'propitiation.'

here be quoted. Here the reference is to the Maccabæan martyrs.

𝔊ℵ has (διὰ) τοῦ ἱλαστηρίου τοῦ θανάτου, thus taking ἱλαστηρίου as a substantive; but even if we suppose this to have been the original reading (which does not seem likely) the existence of the adjective is proved for the philologist by the other MSS (AV).[1]

Of Christian date we have been able to discover with the aid of the Thesaurus Græcæ Linguæ no more than a single example: Niceph. Antioch. 'Vita Symeon. Stylit.' in Acta Sanctorum Maii, v. 335 17: χεῖρας ἱκετηρίους, εἰ βούλει δὲ ἱλαστηρίους, ἐκτείνας θεῷ, where again ἱλαστήριος means 'propitiatory.'

(b) Adjectives in -ήριος are, as we know, often made into substantives,[2] e.g., θυματήριον, φυλακτήριον, and many others; in inscriptions χαριστήριον and εὐχαριστήριον are of frequent occurrence. τὸ ἱλαστήριον can mean nothing else than 'that which propitiates,' 'the propitiating thing.' What the particular thing is must be determined in each case by the context. It is wholly arbitrary to assert that ἱλαστήριον means 'propitiatory sacrifice.' A sacrifice, if it was propitiatory in its intention, might once and again indeed be designated as a ἱλαστήριον; but the word itself does not on that account forthwith require the special meaning 'propitiatory sacrifice'; it still can be used equally well of any other thing connected with propitiation. Of this last various examples can be adduced, whilst, strange to say, no instance of ἱλαστήριον being used in the sense of 'propitiatory sacrifice' has as yet been discovered.[3] Of our examples, which are all drawn from the early imperial period, two are found in recently discovered inscriptions, one in a pagan author, and two in Jewish texts.

Upon a statue, or the base of a statue—at all events upon a votive gift set up to the gods by the people of Cos for the welfare of Augustus, 'son of God,'—stands the following inscription:[4]

ὁ δᾶμος ὑπὲρ τᾶς Αὐτοκράτορος
Καίσαρος
θεοῦ υἱοῦ Σεβαστοῦ σωτηρίας θεοῖς ἱλαστήριον.

The word is used in a similar way in another inscription of Cos (no. 347),[5] which certainly belongs to the imperial period, though it cannot be more precisely dated. It is found upon the fragment of a column:

[ὁ δᾶμος ὁ Ἀλεντίων]
[. . . . Σε]βα-
σ[τ]ῷ Διὶ Σ[τ]ρατίῳ ἱλασ-τήριον δαμαρχεῦν-τος Γαΐου Νωρ-βανοῦ Μοσχίω-νο[ς φι]λοκαίσα-
ρος

We find exactly the same use of the word in Dio Chrysostom (Or. 11 355 [Reiske]): καταλείψειν γὰρ αὐτοὺς ἀνάθημα κάλλιστον καὶ μέγιστον τῇ Ἀθηνᾷ καὶ ἐπιγράψειν· ἱλαστήριον Ἀχαιοὶ τῇ Ἰλιάδι. Here also may be adduced the passage of Josephus already given under (a); see n. 1. More interesting still than

1 To the above two passages we should have to add Jos. Ant. xvi. 7 1: περίφοβος δ' αὐτὸς ἐξῄει καὶ τοῦ δέους ἱλαστήριον μνῆμα λευκῆς πέτρας ἐπὶ τῷ στομίῳ κατεσκευάσατο, if here ἱλαστήριον and μνῆμα are to be taken together; but it is more than probable that ἱλαστήριον is used as a substantive and predicatively; 'he set up as a ἱλαστήριον τοῦ δέους a μνῆμα λευκῆς πέτρας'—the view communicated to the present writer by H. Brede (cp Deissmann, Bibelstud. 127, n. 2). The phrase ἱλαστήριον τοῦ δέους is elliptical: 'as propitiation for his crime that was filling him with fear.'

3 The reference to Theophanes Continuatus in Winer(7), 91, and Winer-Schmiedel, 134, is a mistake. See below, n. 13, col. 3031.

5 Paton and Hicks, 225 f., cp Deissmann, 128. We learn by private communication from Dr. R. Herzog of Tübingen that this inscription has since, unfortunately, disappeared. It is a happy circumstance that it had already been published by the English editors.

the passage just referred to is the fact that Symmachus[1] in his translation of Gen. 6 16 [15] twice designates Noah's ark as ἱλαστήριον, plainly because he regarded it as a means of propitiation; whosoever found refuge in the ark, to him God showed his mercy.

(c) The examples hitherto adduced all give the general sense of 'means of propitiation,' 'propitiatory thing,' the context in each case showing the special meaning (never, however, that of 'propitiatory sacrifice'). Several of a later date have now to be added. The passage from Nonnus, indeed (Dionysiaca, 13 517: 4th-5th cent. A.D.), cited by Cremer ((8), 474), is uncertain; the current reading would appear to be ἱκαστήρια Γοργοῦς, which Falkenburg altered into ἱλαστήρια Γοργοῦς and Cunæus into ἱερὰ ῥεύματα Γοργοῦς.[2] Even should the conjecture ἱλαστήρια be right, the passage still remains unintelligible; according to the context the ἱλαστήρια Γοργοῦς must mean a district of country.[3]

Hesychius, the lexicographer, explains ἱλαστήριον as καθάρσιον, θυσιαστήριον, i.e., he gives a synonym ('that which purifies' and 'that which propitiates' are nearly related ideas) and adds a special meaning which, of course, is possible only in a particular context,[4] that of 'altar,' which Cyril, the lexicographer cited by Schleusner,[5] explains quite rightly when he says: ἱλαστήριον· θυσιαστήριον, ἐν ᾧ προσφέρει (προσφέρεται?) περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν.

Menander the historian (6th-7th cent. A.D.) in Excerpt. Hist. 352 12 f.[6] alludes to τὸν μοναστήριον οἶκον τὸν λεγόμενον Σεβανὸν and afterwards (16) designates this monastery as a ἱλαστήριον (τείχει τε κατησφαλισμένων τὸ ἱλαστήριον)—a designation which might on occasion be quite appropriate.[7]

From Du Cange[8] we learn that Sabas[9] in the Typicum (Venice ed.), chaps. 1 and 5, gives the name of ἱλαστήριον to the place of the altar, the choir (bema, cancellis inclusum); e.g. (chap. 5), θυμιᾷ τὴν ἁγίαν τράπεζαν σταυροειδῶς ὡσαύτως καὶ τὸ ἱλαστήριον ἅπαν.

In Joseph Genesios (10th cent. A.D.) 103 21[10] a monastery is called ἱλαστήριον, just as in Menander: ὡς δὲ παρεστήκει τοῖς τοῦ ἱλαστηρίου προθύροις.[11]

Theophanes Continuatus (10th cent. A.D.) in two places (326 21 f. 452 14)[12] calls a church ἱλαστήριον.[13]

How this use of the word is to be explained can be well seen in a passage of Johannes Kameniates (10th cent. A.D.), who says of sumptuous ecclesiastical buildings (502 10 f.)[14] that they are 'as it were propitiatory gifts dedicated by the community to the deity' (ὥσπερ τινὰ κοινὰ πρὸς τὸ θεῖον ἱλαστήρια). Here ἱλαστήριον has its old meaning 'propitiatory thing,' more particularly 'propitiatory gift.' If it was possible with 12 Ed. Bekker (Bonn).

13 According to Winer(7) 91, and Winer-Schmiedel, 134, ἱλαστήριον should here be taken in the sense of propitiatory sacrifice; but this does not suit. The index of the Bonn edition gives εὐκτήριον as the meaning; but this is not sufficiently exact.

14 Ed. Bekker (Bonn). Leo Allatius in his edition (Cologne, 1653) has ἐξιλαστήρια for ἱλαστήρια. The word ἐξιλαστήριον is met with also in the Scholiast to Apollonius of Rhodes, 2 485 f. (ap. Rhod. Argonautica, rec. R. Fr. Ph. Brunck, 2, 1813, p. 165) in interpreting λωφήϊα ἱερά, of which the scholiast says τουτέστιν ἐξιλαστήρια καὶ καταπαυστήρια τῆς ὀργῆς. In this connection it is offerings that are so designated.

Johannes Kameniates to liken a church to a ἱλαστήριον, it was also possible even to call a church or a cloister by that name, as Theophanes Continuatus, Joseph Genesios, and Menander actually do.

(d) From what has been said we see how baseless is the assertion that to the word ἱλαστήριον it is necessary to supply θῦμα. Hitherto not a single passage has been adduced where this is the case,[1] and in all the places where ἱλαστήριον is read with certainty, some other word than θῦμα is demanded as a supplement. τὸ ἱλαστήριον signifies 'the propitiatory thing,' 'the means of propitiation.' What the propitiatory thing that is actually intended may be has to be determined in each case by the context.

7. ἱλαστήριος and ἱλαστήριον in LXX, Philo, and Heb. 9 5.

(a) The LXX uses in the first instance the adjective (Ex. 25 16 [17]): καὶ ποιήσεις ἱλαστήριον ἐπίθεμα[2] χρυσίου καθαροῦ. Here ἱλαστήριον ἐπίθεμα renders kappōreth. The present writer formerly held[3] kappōreth to mean 'covering,' and accordingly took ἐπίθεμα as the translation of the word kappōreth and the whole expression ἱλαστήριον ἐπίθεμα as rendering the idea kappōreth. After what has been said above (§ 2) it will be seen that he is no longer of this view. It seems rather that the LXX took up the idea of kappōreth quite rightly, and saw the expression to be elliptical; only, in the first passage where the word occurred, they filled up the ellipsis, giving ἱλαστήριον ἐπίθεμα for [kᵉlī hak-]kappōreth, because, in point of fact, the object to which the word was applied was a sort of plate which in some way or other served as a lid to the ark. In all subsequent passages the ellipsis of the original is adhered to; 𝔊 regularly has ἱλαστήριον for kappōreth.[4] If, therefore, as has been shown above, kappōreth (§ 2 ff.) and ἱλαστήριον (§ 7) both mean 'propitiatory thing,' 𝔊 has rendered the meaning of its original quite correctly.[5] It is, unfortunately, by no means superfluous once more to insist that, accordingly ἱλαστήριον in 𝔊 does not mean 'the lid of the ark.' That, on the contrary, the meaning 'propitiatory thing' was alone present to the minds of the translators is shown by the fact, almost invariably overlooked in the theological commentaries, that Ezek. 43 14 17 20 𝔊 renders also the עֲזָרָה, the ledge (RV 'settle') of the altar, by ἱλαστήριον. This also had to be sprinkled with the blood of the sin-offering, and therefore had something to do with propitiation.[6]

(b) Philo also shares the view of 𝔊 as to ἱλαστήριον. In all the places where he alludes to or quotes the OT kappōreth-passages, ἱλαστήριον can only be translated 'propitiatory thing.'

Thus: De vit. Mos. 3 8 (Mang. 150) ἡ δὲ κιβωτὸς . . . ἧς ἐπίθεμα ὡσανεὶ πῶμα τὸ λεγόμενον ἐν ἱεραῖς βίβλοις ἱλαστήριον; ibid., a little lower down, τὸ δὲ ἐπίθεμα τὸ προσαγορευόμενον ἱλαστήριον; De profug. 19 (M. 561) . . . τὸ ἐπίθεμα τῆς κιβωτοῦ, καλεῖ δὲ αὐτὸ ἱλαστήριον; De cherub. 8 (M. 143) καὶ γὰρ ἀντιπρόσωπά φασιν εἶναι νεύοντα πρὸς τὸ ἱλαστήριον ἑτέροις (allusion to Ex. 25 20 [21] 𝔊). In every case it is only the connection that shows the 'propitiatory thing' associated with the ark to be intended.

1 The only instance that could be mentioned would be the ἐξιλαστήριον of the Scholiast to Apollonius of Rhodes mentioned in the preceding note; but here, too, the meaning 'propitiatory sacrifice' lies not in the word itself, but in the connection.

2 ἐπίθεμα is wanting in Cod. 58 only; in Codd. 19, 30, etc., it stands before ἱλαστήριον. See further, Deissmann, Bibelstud. 122, n. 1.

3 Bibelstud. 122. The views there stated, as also in the English translation (Edin., 1901), are to be modified in the sense of the present article.

4 Only in 1 Ch. 28 11 is 'house of the kappōreth' rendered ὁ οἶκος τοῦ 'ξιλασμοῦ, where τοῦ ἐξιλασμοῦ cannot be taken as essentially different from τοῦ ἱλαστηρίου. In Ex. 26 34, where MT has kapp reth, 𝔊 has τῷ καταπετάσματι, showing that it read pārōketh; in Am. 9 1 again, 𝔊 read kappōreth for kaphtōr and rendered ἱλαστήριον. See further, Deissmann, Bibelstud. 124.

5 The other versions that rest on the LXX (cp § 2) also hit the right sense.

6 It is here perhaps that we should look for the explanation of the application of the word ἱλαστήριον by Hesychius, Cyril, and Sabas referred to above (§ 6 c).

MERCY SEAT

(c) The same holds good of Heb. 9_{5}, ὑπεράνω δὲ αὐτῆς χερουβεὶν δόξης κατασκιάζοντα τὸ ἱλαστήριον, where it is not the word ἱλαστήριον but the whole connection that recalls the ark.

(d) We are now in a position to form an opinion regarding Ritschl's extraordinary assertion[1] that 'everywhere both in the OT and in the NT' the word ἱλαστήριον means 'that remarkable piece of furniture over the ark of the covenant in the holy of holies.' The proposition must in point of fact be so altered as to run: ἱλαστήριον invariably means 'propitiatory thing'; what the thing is in each individual case—whether the structure above the ark of the covenant, or the ledge of the altar (or the ark of Noah, or a votive offering, or a church, or a cloister, or the like)—must always be determined by the context. If further Ritschl goes on[2] to draw a hard and fast line between Greek usage and that of 𝔊 and NT, this is not in accordance with sound philological method, but is merely the arbitrariness of dogma.

Our scientific interest in the word ἱλαστήριον and our whole investigation in the course of the foregoing sections, find their ultimate importance in the light they shed upon the celebrated locus classicus, Rom. 3_{25}: whom God set forth (προέθετο) a ἱλαστήριον through faith in (διὰ πίστεως ἐν) his blood.

8. ἱλαστήριον in Rom. 3_{25}.

(a) One possibility suggests itself, that of taking ἱλαστήριον as accusative of ἱλαστήριος: 'whom God hath set forth as a propitiating one.' The more obvious course, however, is to take it as a neuter; the adjective is but rare, the neuter substantive is of frequent occurrence. In either case the meaning is essentially the same.

(b) That Paul is here using the neuter is, according to the statistics of the word, the more probable supposition. This being assumed, three questions have to be carefully distinguished in the exegesis of the passage: (α) What is the meaning of the word ἱλαστήριον as such; (β) in what connection is it elsewhere employed; (γ) has it in its present context any recognisable special meaning, or has it not?

Many interpreters have mixed up all three questions, have ignored the first altogether, or have overlooked the multitude of various answers which are possible in the case of the second.

(c) The answers to α and β respectively will be found in §§ 6 and 7. (α) ἱλαστήριον, wherever it occurs, always and invariably means 'that which propitiates,' 'the means of propitiation,' 'the propitiating thing.' (β) Any object whatever, as long as a propitiatory significance is attached to it, can be designated as a ἱλαστήριον.

The following instances are met with in ancient texts:—

1. Votive offerings to deities or to the deity are most frequently of all so designated (Cos inscriptions, Josephus, Dio Chrysostom, Johannes Kameniates).
2. The golden plate above the ark, on which the blood of sacrificial animals was sprinkled, prescribed by the law for the worship of the temple is called ἱλαστήριον ἐπίθεμα, or for brevity's sake ἱλαστήριον (the LXX and quotations from or references to it in Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews).
3. The ledge of the altar (𝔊).
4. The place of the altar (Sabas).
5. The altar (Hesychius, Cyril).
6. Noah's ark (Symmachus).
7. A monastery (Menander, Joseph Genesios).
8. A church (Theophanes Continuatus).

All these can receive the name ἱλαστήριον.

That a sacrifice should be called ἱλαστήριον is not in itself impossible; but we have not as yet been able to discover any actual instance, although in one solitary case we meet with ἐξιλαστήριον in that sense (Scholiast to Apollonius of Rhodes). Thus we meet with a great variety of special applications of the word ἱλαστήριον; but the variations are not so much 'usual' as 'occasional' in their character.[3] It is therefore very unwise to come to the text in the Epistle to the Romans with any dogma in one's mind as to the meaning of the word, such as that ἱλαστήριον 'means' the propitiatory covering on the ark, or that it 'means' a propitiatory sacrifice. The one proposition we can safely bring with us to the interpretation of the passage in question is that stated above under α and anew reinforced by the examples enumerated under β: ἱλαστήριον signifies 'propitiatory thing,' 'means of propitiation.'

γ. As for the nature of the 'means of propitiation' referred to in the text, where it is said that God has openly set forth (προέθετο) the Lord Jesus Christ as a ἱλαστήριον, or as to whether perhaps Paul may here have attached no special meaning at all to the word, we need not turn for help to any alleged 'biblical' use of the word, but must look solely to the context itself.

(d) At the outset, of the explanations that have sometimes been given we may at once set aside two: (1) mercy seat (see above, § 1), and (2) propitiatory covering of the ark.

The connection does not offer a single point for this assumption to lay hold of. Apart from the absence of the article, the peculiar stiffness and inappropriateness of the figure suggested[1] is against it. 'Were the cross so designated the image could, at all events, be understood; used of a person it is both inelegant and unintelligible;[2] moreover that Christ, 'the end of the law'—Christ of whom Paul has been saying immediately before that he is the revealer of a righteousness of God apart from the law (χωρὶς νόμου δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ) should in the next breath be described as the 'covering' of the ark of the covenant, would furnish an image as un-Pauline in its character as it could possibly be.'[3]

It is further to be observed that Ritschl with his interpretation of the expression as meaning the 'utensil above the ark' is inconsistent with himself. Whilst affirming in the first instance[4] that ἱλαστήριον here has 'precisely that meaning of the word, and that meaning alone' (to wit, 'utensil above the ark'), he afterwards[5] says that ἱλαστήριον without the article has 'of course the force of a general conception. It denotes, not the individual material thing so designated in the LXX, as such, but the ideal purpose which the Israelite connected with the conception of that thing.' This practically deprives Ritschl's own interpretation of all its force; for the whole present question turns upon the utensil.

(e) The interpretation 'propitiatory sacrifice' is not to be set aside summarily. Although we have no other instances of the employment of the word in that sense, such a use might yet be discovered in some particular connection, and in the present instance it is conceivable; where blood is spoken of, a sacrifice can also be spoken of. The final determination, however, can only be reached after a thorough examination of the entire context.

(f) Equally possible is the interpretation 'propitiatory gift,' which elsewhere is met with most frequently. It suits the connection admirably: God has openly set forth the crucified Christ in his blood before the eyes of the world, to the Jews a stumbling-block, to the Gentiles foolishness, to us by faith a ἱλαστήριον. The crucified Christ is the votive gift set up by God himself for propitiation of sins. In other cases it is human hands that set up a lifeless image of the deity as a propitiation for guilt; here it is God himself who has set up the propitiatory monument.[6]

(g) In both of the foregoing special interpretations which have been put forward as possible, it has hitherto been assumed that 'in his blood' (ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι) has reference to the actual blood of Christ shed at Golgotha. If this assumption were absolutely secure, we should have to make our choice between one or other interpretation. Secure, however, it certainly is not. Once before we find Paul speaking of 'redemption' (ἀπολύτρωσις), not as of a past fact concluded once for all, but as of a present condition subsisting 'in Christ Jesus' (ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ)—i.e., in the communion and fellowship of the exalted spiritual ('pneumatic') Christ.[7] Thus the apostle is acquainted with a conception of the 'blood of Christ' wholly different from that of the physical blood shed at Golgotha. It is not the physical but the 'spiritual' blood[1] of the exalted Christ that the believer drinks in the eucharist as he also partakes of the spiritual body of Christ. Whoso eats of that bread and drinks of that cup enters into a communion of body and blood with the spiritual Christ (1 Cor. 10 16). It is in this sense also that Paul, as is shown by comparing 1 Cor. 10 16, takes the word of Jesus in 1 Cor. 11 25: this cup (ποτήριον) is the new covenant (διαθήκη) in my blood; he thinks of the spiritual blood of the exalted Saviour, in the same manner as Jn. 6 53-56 (cp also 1 Jn. 1 7 and 5 6 8) speaks of a drinking of the blood and an eating of the 'flesh' of Christ. With Paul, therefore, 'in the blood of Christ' (ἐν τῷ αἵματι Χριστοῦ) can mean 'in blood-fellowship with the exalted spiritual Christ' (cp also Χριστῷ συνεσταύρωμαι, Gal. 2 20 and other similar terms of expression).

It cannot be disputed that this spiritual interpretation of the formula 'in his blood' (ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι) in Rom. 3 25, admirably suits the entire context.[2] Redemption is continuously at work 'in' Christ and faith comes to know, by experience of the blood-fellowship with Christ, that Christ has been sent into the world by God as an enduring ἱλαστήριον. On this interpretation Paul would here be attesting precisely the same experiences as are recorded, the one by himself, with respect to the exalted Christ, in 1 Cor. 1 30, and the other by the author of 1 Jn. 2 2 in the words 'and he' (αὐτός—namely, the Christ who is 'with the Father,' the exalted spiritual Lord) 'is the propitiation for our sins' (ἱλασμός ἐστιν περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν). On this interpretation of 'in his blood' the view that ἱλαστήριον here represents a propitiatory sacrifice becomes less probable than that it has the meaning—so abundantly attested for the imperial period—of 'propitiatory gift.'

(h) Is it necessary, however, to seek for any special meaning at all? The connection does not demand it; the general sense 'means of propitiation' is quite sufficient. Thus in the end the simplest explanation gives us substantially the same meaning as we should have if we took ἱλαστήριον as accusative masculine: 'Christ, the exalted spiritual Lord, in whom the believer lives, moves, and has its being, is, as faith in blood-communion with him proves him to be, given to us by God as our ever-present propitiator, our continual propitiation.'

That, according to this view, the expression 'righteousness of God' (δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ) in all four places (Rom. 3 21 f. 25 f.) denotes, not the attribute of God, but the quality of the justified believer in Christ, cannot be shown at length in this place, but ought at least to be indicated.

MERED (מֶרֶד), one of the sons of Ezrah (cp EZER, i.) in the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch. 4 17, πωρaλ [B], μωρaλ [A]; βaρaλ [L]; 4 18†, νωρωηλ [B], μωρηλ [A], μaρω [L]). On Mered's name and on his wives' names, see BITHIAH, where מרד (Mered) is traced to an original ירמות (Jarmuth); for another corruption of this word, see MAROTH. Of course the later editor and his readers explained the corrupt מרד as 'rebellion' (cp Josh. 22 22); similarly 'Nimrod' was doubtless supposed to be derived from √מרד, 'to rebel' (see NIMROD). If, however, we think that we can trust the correctness of MT, and regard 'Mered' as a clan-name, we may not unplausibly explain '(heroic) resistance' (see NAMES, § 67); or if we view it as a place-name, we may compare the Ar. mardā, which is connected with several places by Yākūt (4 492 f.), and means 'a place devoid of vegetation.'

If 'Mered' is really a corruption of 'Jarmuth,' we can well understand the triple account given of the so-called Mered's family, and that in two of the accounts the important place Eshtemoa, and in the third the not less well-known places Gedor, Soco, and Zanoah, have their connection traced to him. MEREMOTH (מְרֵמוֹת; μaρ[ε]ιμωθ [L]; no doubt of ethnic affinities = Jeroham = Jerahmeel [Che.]; cp JERIMOTH).

1. B. Uriah, a priest, temp. Ezra (see EZRA i., § 2; ii., § 15 [1] d), Ezra 8 33 (μερειμωθ [B], μαριμωθ [A vid.]) = 1 Esd. 8 62, EV MARMOTH (μαρμωθι [B], -μαθι [A]); in list of wall-builders (see NEHEMIAH, § 1 f.; EZRA ii., §§ 16 [1], 15 d), Neh. 3 4 (ραμωθ [BℵA]); 3 21 (μεραμωθ [BℵA]); signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7), 10 5 [6] (αμεραμως [B], -θ [ℵ], μεραμωθ [A], μεριμ. [L]).

2. B. Bani, a layman, in list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i., § 5, end), Ezra 10 36 (ιεραμωθ [Bℵ], μαρεμωθ [A]) = 1 Esd. 9 34, EV Carabasion (καραβασ[ε]ιων [BA], L om.).

3. A priest in Zerubbabel's band (see EZRA ii., § 6 b), Neh. 12 3 ([Bℵ*A om., μαριμωθ [ℵ c.a.mg.]). This name should probably be read for MERAIOTH in Neh. 12 15 also.

4. In 1 Esd. 8 2 MEREMOTH, RV MEMEROTH (μαρερωθ [A], B om., μαραιωθ [L]) seems to represent MERAIOTH (1).

MERES (מֶרֶס), in Esth. 1 14 (𝔊 BℵAL aβ om.), one of the 'seven princes' at the court of Ahasuerus. The letters of the name are also the three first letters of MARSENA (q.v.). See also ADMATHA.

MERIBAH (מְרִיבָה), Ex. 17 7; and 'Waters of Meribah' (מֵי מ׳), Dt. 33 8, etc. See MASSAH AND MERIBAH, § 2, and KADESH.

MERIBBAAL (מְרִיב בַּעַל), the name given to Jonathan's son in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 9, ii. β), 1 Ch. 8 34 (μεριβaaλ [B], μεφριβ.[1] [A], μεμφιβ.[2] [L]) = 9 40 (μaρειβaaλ [Bℵ], μaρειβaλ [ℵ once], μεχριβaaλ[3] [A], L as above). In the last mentioned passage the name appears as מְרִיבַעַל, Merībaal. To produce a clear etymology this was probably altered into מריב בעל, Merib-baal—i.e., 'Baal contends' (NAMES, § 42; cp JERUBBAAL). This form of the name is no doubt possible, but scarcely probable (see MEHETABEL). Merībaal is more difficult to explain. Some critics (e.g., St., Ki., Gray, HPN 200, n. 3) explain, 'man, or hero, of Baal,'—a view which may plausibly be taken to be confirmed by Ishbaal and Amariah.[4] The frequency, however, with which corrupt forms of Jerahme'el (the true name, as is elsewhere maintained, of Saul's clan; see SAUL, § 1) present themselves among the names assigned to Saul's relatives is a cogent ground for supposing that 'Meribaal' is really a corruption of Jerahme'el, through the assumed intermediate form Mahriel. Saul's daughter is only known to tradition by a name which is elsewhere (MICHAL) explained as a popular corruption of Jerahme'el[ith]. We can well understand, therefore, that both a son and a grandson of Saul may have been known to tradition by a similar name.

Cp 𝔊A's reading in 1 Ch. 9 40 (3), and note that 'Jerahme'el' probably lies hidden under MALCHISHUA (q.v.), the name given in MT to one of the sons of Saul, also that MEPHIBOSHETH (q.v.) may plausibly be taken to favour the above explanation. T. K. C.

AMARIAH (q.v.) is no doubt one of a group of distortions of Jerahmeel ending in -iah (cp MALCHIJAH, REPHAIAH). This is important for the origin of the prophet ZEPHANIAH (q.v.).

MERODACH (מְרֹדַךְ), the Hebraised form of Maruduk or Marduk, the patron deity of Babylon (BABYLONIA, § 26), and under the later empire, together with Nebo, chief deity of the Babylonians; also called BEL (q.v.) or BEL-MERODACH (Jer. 50 2, μαιωδακ [B], μεωδαχ [ℵAQ]). On his famous temple E-sagila, see BABYLON, § 5.

Nebuchadrezzar was devoted to him; among his many expressions of homage he even styles Marduk ilu baniya 'god my begetter.' Merodach (Marduk) enters into the composition of many Babylonian names; see esp. MERODACH-BALADAN, EVIL-MERODACH, and MORDECAI (cp KAT(2), 175 f. 422 f.). Cp NEBO.

MERODACH-BALADAN (מְרֹאדַךְ בַּלְאֲדָן; μαρωδαχ βαλαδαν [B], μ. [A], μαιωδαχ [ℵQ*], μερ. βαλαδαν [Qmg.]; Ass. Marduk-aplu-iddin[a]; Is. 39 1 †) was the second king of Babylon of this name. He reigned from 721-709 B.C.; he was then driven from Babylon, but recovered his power for a few months in 702 B.C. He was a Chaldean and already king of māt Tamdim, the Sea-land, in the reign of Tiglath-pileser III. The Chaldeans had been for some time encroaching upon Babylonia, and when Tiglath-pileser in 729 B.C. defeated Merodach-baladan, he was hailed as deliverer from a foreign yoke. Merodach-baladan had been able to secure the establishment of the Chaldean usurper Ukīn-zēr on the throne of Babylon, and on Tiglath-pileser's expulsion of that monarch, Merodach-baladan had to feel the weight of the conqueror's resentment, and become his vassal. Tiglath-pileser's death, and the ineffective rule of Shalmaneser IV., loosened the hold of Assyria on the S., and when Sargon II. came to the throne of Assyria, 721 B.C., Merodach-baladan, aided and abetted by the king of Elam, took the throne of Babylon. Sargon found his hands too full in other directions to interfere. The defeat of Merodach-baladan and his Elamite allies at Dūr-ilu in 721 B.C., was without result. Each side learnt to respect the other, and suspended hostilities for the time. Sargon held N. Babylonia with Assyria; Merodach-baladan had S. Babylon and Chaldea.

Merodach-baladan's policy was one of severe oppression. Owing his power to his own Chaldean subjects, to Elamite auxiliaries and Aramaic nomads, he had to provide for them. The nobles of Babylonia were sent as captives to the S., while the marauders were enriched with their lands and possessions. Hence, when after twelve years of incessant war on every side, save that of Babylonia, Sargon directed his victorious armies to the expulsion of Merodach-baladan, he, like Tiglath-pileser, was hailed as a deliverer. Sargon states that in his twelfth year he drove Merodach-baladan out of Babylon, and he reigned as legitimate king there himself for the last seven years of his life. Sargon is therefore the Arkeanus of the Ptolemaic Canon.

Merodach-baladan had attempted to stay Sargon's advance by an appeal to Kudur-naḫundi of Elam; but that monarch had already felt the weight of Sargon's hand and would not assist. One army broke up the Aramaic confederacy on the E.; another marched S. on Babylon. It was in 709 B.C. that Sargon entered the city unopposed, and taking the hands of Bēl became king de jure. Merodach-baladan had retreated nearer home to Iḳbi-Bēl in S. Babylonia. Thence he retreated again to his ancestral home of Bīt Yakīn. Sargon followed, and routing an auxiliary force of the S. Babylonian nomads, would have laid siege to Merodach-baladan in his stronghold. That monarch deserted his city and escaped to Elam for the time. Dūr-Yaḳīn surrendered, and Sargon was lord of all the S. of Babylonia.

Sargon reinstated the Babylonian exiles, restored their possessions, re-established the worship of the Babylonian divinities, and Babylon had peace and prosperity for five years. Sargon apparently fell by the hand of an assassin. For this sketch of his history cp Winckler's Sargon.

Sargon had probably left Babylon to put down the troubles in Armenia and the N. frontier states of Assyria, caused by the pressure of the Gimirri on the N., when he met his death. How long he was absent we do not know; but Merodach-baladan must have reached home and thence intrigued for the throne of Babylon. Sennacherib states that in his first year he drove Merodach-baladan out of Babylonia and set Bēl-ibni on the throne. Polyhistor assigns Merodach-baladan a reign of six months before Elibus or Belibus—i.e., Bēl-ibni. After his second expulsion, Merodach-baladan continued to be a menace to Assyria. Evidently his adherents in Babylonia were powerful, for Sennacherib treated the country as hostile, and inflicted on Babylon itself a terrible vengeance. He reduced it to impotence, and in the repeated campaigns which he and his lieutenants waged, reduced all the S. to ruins. How Merodach-baladan ended his days we do not know exactly; but his sons continued the struggle on to the days of Ašur-bāni-pal.

Merodach-baladan appears in 2 K. 20 12 and Is. 39 1 as king of Babylon in the time of Hezekiah. It is open to doubt whether his ambassadors really came to Hezekiah (see Che. Intr. Is. 227; Meinhold, Die Jes.-erzählungen, 19 f.); if so the occasion was perhaps one of Merodach-baladan's intrigues after his expulsion from Babylon. In the present Hebrew text he is called 'son of Baladan' (see SBOT, ad loc.); he himself claims (IR 5 17) to be of the ancient dynasty of Erba-Marduk. The earlier Merodach-baladan I. of Babylon was son of Melisiḫu, and of the Kassite dynasty, about 1167-1154 B.C. C. H. W. J.

MEROM, WATERS OF (מֵי־מֵרוֹם; μαρρων, με. [BAF], μερρωμ [L]), the scene of the great fight between the allied northern kings and Israel (Josh. 11 5 7 †). Many since Reland have identified the waters of Merom with the mod. Baḥret el-Ḥūle, known also as Σεμεχωνιτις[1] (or Σεμαχ, Jos. Ant. v. 5 1, BJ. iii. 10 7), and as ἡ Σεμεχωνιτῶν λίμνη (BJ iv. 1 1). This identification rests on the precarious assumption that the name Semachonitis, like Merom, is derived from a root 'to be high' (Ar. samaka), but also finds support in the statement of Josephus (Ant., l.c.) that Hazor lay over against it. Against this, it should be noticed that יַם, 'sea,' not מֵי, 'waters,' would be the natural designation for a lake;[2] and that the presumed situation does not quite accord with the geographical evidence in 11 8.[3] The last objection applies equally to two more recent identifications. (1) Mārūn er-Rās (Buhl, Pal. 234) or Mārōn (Rob.), situated WSW. of Kadesh; cp Josephus (Ant. v. 1 18), who places the scene of the fight at βηρωδη (= Meron?), not far from Kedesh. (2) Mērōn, WNW. of Ṣafed, celebrated as the burial place of Hillel and Shammai (cp Rel. 817).

Mērōn is no doubt the μηρω or αμηρωθ of Jos. (BJ ii. 20 6, Vit. 37), and possibly the márama of the name-lists of Rameses II. and Thotmes III. (cp WMM As. u. Eur. 220); in the list of Thotmes, however, Márama appears to be the name of a district (cp RP(2), 5 44; see below). There may very well have been several places of this name; the Onomastica mention a μερραν, merrom, 12 m. from Sebaste near Dothan, which they erroneously identify with our Merom (OS 278 99, 138 16).

It has been shown elsewhere (see JABIN, JOSHUA, § 8,

No perfectly satisfactory suggestion has yet been made as to the origin of סיבכי (also סופכי), the Talm. name of this lake; Neub. explains 'reedy.' The name of the Wady Semak on the E. of the lake favours the correctness of the spelling of Josephus, and the name Semachon may really be ancient, especially if Petrie is right in identifying it with the Šamḫuna of Am. Tab. (220 3).

JUDGES, § 7) that underlying our narrative is the account of a fight in which Zebulun and Naphtali gave a decisive defeat to the allied Canaanite kings. The chief of these were probably Jabin, king of Hazor, and Jobab, king of Meron or Merom (Madon seems to be incorrect). The victorious tribes pursued the Canaanites to Great Zidon (on the left) and the valley of Mizpah (on the right), which makes it highly probable that the scene of the fight must be placed farther N. (cp Bu. l.c.).

One solution of the problem would be this—to take Merom as the name, not of a place but, of the district in which the two tribes dwelt. Jerome points to this view by his rendering of Judg. 5 18, Zebulun vero et Nephtali obtulerunt animas suas in regione Merome, and a tempting correction of Dt. 33 23 (due to Clericus; see Schenkel, BL, s.v. 'Merom') would give welcome support[1] to the proposed theory, which is virtually that of Kneucker in BL. In this case 'waters of Merom' may be the designation of some stream which watered it. The district intended (which would lie N. of Lake Ḥūle) may perhaps be the second or more southerly state of ZOBAH (q.v.).[2] [It is possible that the problem of the 'Waters of Merom' may be treated most satisfactorily as a part of a larger problem, viz., where was the scene of the war with Jabin? There may have been an early misunderstanding. See SHIMRON.]

MERONOTHITE (מֵרֹנֹתִי), the designation of Jehdeiah (1 Ch. 27 30, ο εκ μεραθων [BL], ο εκ μαραθων [A], cp Pesh.) and Jadon (Neh. 3 7; BA om., ο μηρωναθαιος [L]); Jadon is associated with men of Gibeon and Mizpah, near which places Meronoth (?) must have been.

MEROZ (מֵרוֹז; μηρωζ [B], μαζωρ [A, see Moore], μαρωρ [L]), a locality mentioned in the Song of Deborah, as cursed by the 'angel of Yahwè' (i.e., probably the 'captain of Yahwè's host,' Josh. 5 13-15; see ANGEL, § 2) because they 'came not to the help of Yahwè, as valiant men' (Judg. 5 23). The description of the discomfiture of the Canaanites by Israel precedes; the blessing upon Jael follows. Jael is not an Israelite; Meroz, therefore, need not be an Israelitish locality. Jael, too, comes from the far S. of Palestine; Meroz, therefore, probably is a part of the same region. It is evidently a well-known locality, and since no 'Meroz' is known,[3] nor is there a Hebrew root ארז, 'to take refuge,' the form needs emendation in the light of the considerations just mentioned. Therefore, though 'Meron' could easily have become 'Meroz,' neither Shimron-meron (Josh. 12 20) nor Meron (Meirōn) near Ṣafed (Talm.) can be referred to. The form in 𝔊^AMO, however (Moore), yields up its secret at once. 'Mazor' comes from Miṣṣur (מִצּוּר)—i.e., the N. Arabian Muṣur or Muṣri, where in fact the Heberites, like all the Kenites, had dwelt.

Israel and Muṣur were linked by the closest ties; such at any rate must have been the belief of the author or reviser of the song. KADESH (q.v.) was in Muṣur; Hobab the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law, himself a worshipper of Yahwè, dwelt in Muṣur. The Kenites were represented certainly by Jael, not impossibly too by Barak (a corruption of Ḥeber?), yet the Muṣrites—the other Muṣrites (see HOBAB), we may say—sent no contingent to the army of Yahwè.

Though Winckler is not responsible for the above, it is plain that it fits admirably into his theory of the importance of Muṣri in the Hebrew tradition. See MIZRAIM, § 2 b.

[1] On Judg. 5 18 Vg. see Moore's remarks Judges, 157, and cp Marq. Fund. 6, where שָׂדֶה is explained as 'mountain country' (Ass. šadū; see FIELD, 1).

[2] Possibly our Merom is to be read in 1 Ch. 18 8 where מִכּוּן, 'from Cun' (certainly wrong) should possibly be emended into מִמֵּרוֹן, 'from Meron (Merom).' For analogies cp the form βηρωθη given by Jos. Ant. v. 1 18 (see above), also αμηρωθ (ib.) for mod. mērōn. See BEROTHAI, BETAH, CHUN.

[3] The combination of 'Meroz' with Muraṣṣaṣ, E. of Jezreel, NW. of Beisān (Guérin; cp Buhl, 217) is therefore too hazardous.

MESHA (מֵשָׁא; μασση [L], -ση [A], μανασση [E]). Gen. 10 30 gives the limits of the territory of the descendants of Joktan—'from Mesha towards Sĕphār, the mountain of the East.' The former limit, Mesha, has been sought in the Greek Mesene (Ges. Thes. and often), the territory about the mouth of the Euphrates and Tigris; but there is no evidence that this name was applied to that territory in Assyrian times, and the alluvial changes that have taken place there make inferences from a later age particularly untrustworthy (see Del. Par. 173-182); Delitzsch (Par. 242 f.) supposes that both Mesene and Mesha are derived from Mašu—the Syro-Arabian desert, particularly in its NE. portion—and that this is referred to in Gen. 10 30. However, the lack of any representation of the א, the difference in the first vowel, and the very large extent and indefiniteness of Mašu (hardly suitable for a boundary mark) make the identification uncertain.

Dillmann, therefore, proposes to change the points of משא, and read מַשָּׂא (cp 𝔊), which is the name of a branch of the Ishmaelites (see ISHMAEL, § 4 [6]. The theory is certainly plausible. Massa would then mark the northern limit of the Joktanite tribes. F. B.

MESHA (מֵישָׁא, §§ 5, 39; abbrev. from MISHAEL; a fem. name מישא is found in Palm. [see ZDMG 25 534, n. 8, and VOJ 4 33]; cp μαισα; μισα [BL], μωσα [A] ܡܫܐ [Pesh.]), a name in a genealogy of BENJAMIN [q.v., § 9, 2 β], 1 Ch. 8 9.† See JQR 11 108, § 6; see also § 3.

MESHA (מֵישַׁע; μωσα [BAL]), 1. king of Moab (2 K. 3 4), a 'sheepmaster,' who was tributary to Ahab, and paid the king of Israel an annual tax consisting of the wool of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams. The word rendered 'sheepmaster' (נֹקֵד) is peculiar, and might be better represented by 'naḳad-owner'—the term naḳad, as Arab. shows, denoting a particular kind of sheep, small and stunted in growth, but prized on account of their wool (see SHEEP).

What we know respecting Mesha centres round two events: (i.) his revolt from Israel; and (ii.) the war undertaken by Jehoram, Ahab's son, who came to the throne after the two-years' reign of his brother Ahaziah (2 K. 1 1 3 1), to re-subjugate Moab.

i. Mesha's revolt.—The biblical notice of the revolt from Israel is limited to the brief statement in 2 K. 1 1 (substantially = 3 5). In 1868, however, the Rev. F. Klein, a missionary of the Church Missionary Society, stationed at Jerusalem, in the course of an expedition on the E. side of the Dead Sea, was shown at Dhībān, 4 m. N. of the Arnon, the site of the ancient DIBON (q.v.), a slab of black basalt, about 3½ ft. high by 2 ft. wide, bearing an inscription, which proved ultimately to contain Mesha's own account of the circumstances of the revolt. M. Clermont-Ganneau, at that time an attaché of the French Consulate in Jerusalem, had, however, known independently for some time past of the existence of such a stone, and exerted himself now to secure it. Through, as it seems, some imprudent eagerness manifested by him, the suspicions and cupidity of the native Arabs were aroused; they imagined that they were about to be deprived of some valuable talisman; they consequently seized the stone, and partially destroyed it. Fortunately, a squeeze of the inscription had been obtained previously for M. Clermont-Ganneau, though not without much difficulty and danger, by a young Arab named Ya'ḳūb Caravacca; many of the fragments also were afterwards recovered, and as far as possible pieced together, by the same accomplished palæographer;[1] accordingly, although parts here and there are uncertain or missing, the inscription is in the main quite intelligible and clear. The stone, with the missing parts supplied in plaster of Paris from the squeeze, together with the squeeze itself, is preserved in the Museum of the Louvre (see the reproduction after col. 3042); there is also a facsimile in the British Museum. The characters are of the same type as those of the old Phœnician alphabet, and of the Siloam inscription. A transliteration will be found facing the illustration, below.

2. The inscription.

The horizontal line above a letter indicates that it is doubtful. The points between the words, and the perpendicular lines at the ends of sentences, are marked on the stone. In cases of doubt, the readings adopted are usually those of Lidzbarski (Ephemeris für Sem. Epigraphik, 1 1 ff. [1900]). There can be little question that in Smend and Socin's edition (Die Inschrift des Königs Mesa, etc., 1886) letters are given (esp. at the ends of lines) which are not really to be seen on either the stone or the squeeze. Smend and Socin's new readings were examined with great care by Clermont-Ganneau (La stèle de Mésa, examen critique du texte, in the JAs., Jan. 1887, pp. 72-112), and Renan (Journ. des Savans, 1887, pp. 158-164); and the text published in Dr. TBS [1890], p. lxxxvi, incorporated the results of their criticism. The uncertain places were again re-examined by K. G. A. Nordlander in 1896 (Die Inschr. des Königs Mesa von Moab), and most recently, as stated above, by the skilled epigraphist Lidzbarski, whose final readings, however, vary from those adopted in TBS only in minutiæ. A statement of the reasons for the readings adopted here has not seemed to be necessary, except in one or two instances.

The language in which the inscription is written differs only dialectically from the Hebrew of the OT. Here is a translation of the inscription:—

(1)[2] I am Mesha', son of Chemosh[kān ?],[3] king of Moab, the Daibonite. (2) My father reigned over Moab for thirty years, and I reigned (3) after my father. And I made this high place for Chĕmōsh in ḲR[Ḥ]H,[4] a [high place of sal][5]vation, (4) because he had saved me from all the assailants (?),[6] and because he had let me see (my desire) upon all them that hated me.

3. Translation.

Omri, (5) king of Israel, afflicted[7] Moab for many days, because Chemosh was angry with his land. (6) And his son succeeded him; and he also said, I will afflict Moab. In my days said he [thus;] (7) but I saw (my desire) upon him, and upon his house, and Israel perished with an everlasting destruction.

Omri took possession of the [la]nd (8) of Mēbēdeba,[1] and it (i.e., Israel) dwelt therein, during his days, and half his son's days, forty years; but Chemosh [resto]red (9) it in my days.

And I built Ba'al-Me'on, and I made in it the reservoir (?); and I buil[t] (10) Kiryathēn.

And the men of Gad had dwelt in the land of 'Aṭaroth from of old; and the king of Israel (11) had built for himself 'Aṭaroth. And I fought against the city, and took it. And I slew all the people [from] (12) the city, a gazingstock unto Chemosh, and unto Moab. And I brought back (or, took captive) thence the altar-hearth of Dawdoh (?), and I dragged (13) it before Chemosh in Ḳeriyyoth. And I settled therein the men of SRN,[2] and the men of (14) MḤRT.[2]

And Chemosh said unto me, Go, take Nebo against Israel. And I (15) went by night, and fought against it from the break of dawn until noon. And I took (16) it, and slew the whole of it, 7000 men and male strangers,[3] and women and [female stranger]s, (17) and female slaves:[4] for I had devoted it to 'Ashtor-Chĕmōsh. And I took thence the [ves]sels (18) of Yahwè, and I dragged them before Chemosh.

And the king of Israel had built (19) Yahaṣ, and abode in it, while he fought against me. But Chemosh drave him out from before me; and (20) I took of Moab 200 men, even all its chiefs; and I led them up against Yahaṣ, and took it (21) to add it unto Daibon. I built ḲRḤH,[2] the wall of Ye'ārin (or, of the Woods), and the wall of (22) the Mound.[5] And I built its gates, and I built its towers. And (23) I built the king's palace, and I made the two reser[voirs (?) for wa]ter in the midst of (24) the city. And there was no cistern in the midst of the city, in ḲRḤH.[2] And I said to all the people, Make (25) you every man a cistern in his house. And I cut out the cutting for ḲRḤH[2] with (the help of) prisoner[s (26) of] Israel.

I built 'Aro'er, and I made the highway by the Arnon. (27) I built Beth-Bamoth, for it was pulled down. I built Beṣer, for ruins (28) [had it become. And the chie]fs[6] of Daibon were fifty, for all Daibon was obedient (to me). And I reigned (29) [over] an hundred [chiefs] in the cities which I added to the land. And I built (30) [Mehē]dĕ[b]a,[1] and Beth-Diblathên, and Beth-Ba'al-Me'on; and I took thither the naḳad[7]-keepers, (31) . . . . sheep of the land.

And as for Ḥoronên, there dwelt therein . . . . (32) . . . . And Chemosh said unto me, Go down, fight against Ḥoronên. And I went down . . . . (33)[8] . . . . [and] Chemosh [resto]red it in my days. And . . . . (34)[9] . . . . And I . . . .

The inscription is of interest, philologically as well as historically, though only a few of its more salient features can be noticed here. In syntax, form of sentence, and general mode of expression, it resembles closely the earlier historical narratives of the OT. The vocabulary, with two or three exceptions, is identical with that of Hebrew. In some respects, the language of the inscription even shares with Hebrew distinctive features, such as are not known in the other Semitic languages.

4. Language.

Thus, the waw consec. with the imperf., הושיע 'to save,' עשה 'to make,' גם 'also,' ראה ב' ,ירש 'to take in possession,' הרג, לפני, צהרם, החרים 'to ban,' נרש ,בקרב, and esp. אשר. It shares אנך, as the pron. of the 1st pers. sing., with Heb. and Phœn., as against Aram., Arab., and Eth. (in all of which the form is without the ך).

[1] An independent copy of ll. 13-20 had also been made for M. Clermont-Ganneau, before the stone was destroyed, by another Arab, Selīm el Ḳāri: see the Exam. crit. 34. Squeezes of different fragments were also obtained by Capt. (now Sir C.) Warren.

[2] Numbers in parenthesis indicate lines of the inscription.

[3] S. and S., Nordl., כמשמלך, 'Chemosh-melek'; Cl.-G., כמשגד 'Chemosh-gad,' with the suggestion that perhaps כמשלך, 'Chemoshshillek' (cp Phœn. Eshmun-shillek, Ba'alshillek) should be read. Lidzb., after a careful measurement, declares that there is not room for more than two letters after כמש: from such traces as are visible on the squeeze, he thinks the first most probably כ, the second may be כ, מ, נ, or פ. Without definitely deciding, he suggests כמשכן as possible: cp כְּנַנְיָהוּ ,יְכָנְיָהוּ.

[5] After ב there is, according to Lidzb., only 𐤍 (נ) to be seen, which, however, might easily be the remains of 𐤌 (מ). After 𐤍, Lidzb. thought that he could discern three parallel strokes, like those of 𐤎 (ס), and afterwards some marks which might be remains of a כ: he accordingly suggests בנסך. After this, nothing is visible; but there is room for one, or even two letters: the י therefore, is quite possible. S. and S., and Nordl., read בִּמְשׁעִ ה, which, with the foll. ישע, Nordl. renders 'for many deliverances' (the duplication as 2 K. 3 16, etc.). [במת]י, the suggestion of Nöld., adopted by Wright and others, as it does not seem to be impossible, and (unlike Lidzb.'s בנסך, 'with a libation of deliverance'?) yields a good sense, has been retained here.

[6] S. and S., המלכין; Cl.-G. and Nordl., השלכין, with which Lidzb. agrees, remarking that there is no trace of the shaft of the 𐤌 (מ) after the ה. What שלכין may mean, is, however, far from apparent. In Heb. השליך (not used in Ḳal) means to cast or fling: in Arabic salaka (i) is to insert, put in, make to enter (on a way): possibly in Moabitish the verb may have acquired the meaning of to impel, assail. Still, what we should expect is some term denoting a class (such as 'the raiders,' 'the shooters'), not one that would be more naturally qualified by 'my.'

[7] See Deut. 22 24, and cp Ges.-Kautzsch, 111[b], n. Or, if it might be supposed that the engraver had accidently omitted על after מל, 'Omri reigned over Israel, and afflicted,' etc.

[1] The Mêdĕbāh of Nu. 21 30, Josh. 13 9 16, Is. 15 2.

[2] The vocalisation of names given in capitals is uncertain.

[3] I.e., resident aliens (the Heb. גֵּר). Or (pronouncing גֻּרֹת גֻּרַן), upon the suggestion that גור, which in Heb. denotes the young of a lion, in Moab. denoted young people, 'lads . . . and [lass]es' (so S. and S., Cl.-G., Lidzb.).

[4] See Judg. 5 30.

[5] In Heb. the word (עֹפֶל) is used of a fortified hill or mound: cp (in Samaria) 2 K. 5 24, and (in Jerusalem) Is. 32 14, 2 Ch. 27 3 33 14, Neh. 3 26 f. See OPHEL.

[6] That is to say, [היה ור]ש; so Derenbourg (1870), S. and S., and most. Halévy, however, in his study of the inscription (Rev. Sém. 1900, pp. 236-8, 289 ff.) suggests plausibly (p. 292) ש[בא] for ש[ור]—i.e., 'I built Beṣer, for ruins had it become, with the help of [cp l. 25] fifty men of Daibon,' etc.

[7] The reading is possible, though not certain. Lidzbarski prefers מִעָּר, after which Halévy supplies (l.c.) [ני הבקר ואת מיטב]—i.e., 'the choice[st of the oxen, and the best of the] sheep'; but there does not seem to be room for more than nine letters, and the meaning given to מַעֲרַנִּים ('le plus exquis') is questionable, having no support from Heb. usage.

[8] Halévy conjectures [ואל (32) תחם בקר ימן רבן]—i.e., 'and fought against the city for many days.'

[9] The first two words here are obscure. Halévy proposes, 'And beside it there was set' (ועל ידה מֻשָּׂם), supposing the sequel to relate to a guard of twenty men: but the sing. followed by [עשרן שמרן] is difficult. The gap is, in fact, too large to be filled up with any confidence.

The most noticeable differences, as compared with Heb., are the ת of the fem. sing., and the ן of the dual[1] (note, however, צהרם l. 15), and plural (the ת, and the ן of the plur., occurring only sporadically in the OT), הבמת זאת (not הזאת) l. 3, the conjug. הלתחם (the Arab. 8), קיר 'city,' אחז 'to take' a city (Heb. לכד), and some words which, though they occur in the OT, are not the usual prose terms—viz., חלף l. 6 'to succeed' (cp Is. 9 9, and Ar. ḫalafa), בקע l. 15 of the 'break' of dawn (Is. 58 8, but in prose עלה, Gen. 19 15 etc.), גְּבָרן (exceptional in Heb., as Jer. 43 6 44 20) and גְּבָרֹת (=Heb. נשים) l. 16, רְחָמֹת l. 17 (Judg. 5 30).

Some of the more interesting parallels to the OT in matter or expression may be briefly noted.

l. 3 the במה or 'high-place' (cp Is. 15 2 16 12 in Moab itself, as well as often besides); l. 13 etc., Chemosh, the national god of Moab (Nu. 21 29 Jer. 48 46 etc.); ll. 4, 7, to look upon an enemy (viz., with satisfaction at his fall), Ps. 59 11 [10] 118 7; l. 5 afflicted, Ex. 1 11 etc.; Chemosh was angry with his land, cp 2 K. 17 18 Ps. 60 3 [1]; l. 10 the Gadites in Ataroth (11 m. N. of the Arnon) 'from of old,' cp Nu. 32 3 34 (GAD, § 8); l. 12 a gazingstock unto Chemosh, Nah. 3 6 Ezek. 28 17; altar-hearth, Ezek. 43 15 f.; l. 13 before Chemosh (in triumph), cp before Yahwè, 1 S. 15 33 2 S. 21 9; ll. 14 32, and Chemosh said, etc., cp Josh. 8 1 Judg. 7 9 1 S. 23 4 2 S. 24 1; l. 17 החרים to ban or devote, as 1 S. 15 3 and often; l. 19 to drive out before, exactly as Dt. 33 27 Josh. 24 18; l. 28 משמעת (lit. obedience), the construction exactly as Is. 11 14.

The localities named in the inscription are nearly all mentioned in the passages of the OT which describe the territory of Reuben or Gad (Nu. 32 34-38 Josh. 13 15-28), or allude to the country held by Moab (esp. Is. 15 Jer. 48): the only places not mentioned in the OT are קרחה, שרן, מחרת, and היערן, For further particulars, see the writings cited below, § 7, esp. the monographs of Nöldeke and Nordlander; also Dr. TBS, pp. lxxxix-xciv, and the textual details in W. H. Bennett's art. 'Moab' in Hastings' DB.

We may proceed now to notice the chief features of historical interest presented by the inscription. According to Nu. 21 13 Josh. 13 15-28, the Arnon formed the dividing-line between Israel and Moab on the E. of Jordan, the territory N. of it being assigned formally to the tribes of Reuben and Gad; but these tribes were never able to hold it permanently against the encroachments of the Moabites. David had reduced the Moabites to the condition of tributaries; but it may be inferred from Mesha's inscription that this relation had not been maintained. Omri, however, the capable founder of the fourth Israelite dynasty, determined to re-assert the Israelite claim, and gained possession of at least the district around Medeba (12 m. E. of the N. end of the Dead Sea—on the N. border of Reuben, acc. to Jos. 13 9 16) which was retained by Israel for forty years till the middle of Ahab's reign, when Mesha revolted.

5. Historical questions.

According to 2 K. 1 1 3 5, the revolt took place after Ahab's death (853-2 B.C.); but l. 8 of the inscription names expressly 'the middle of the reign of Omri's son—i.e., of Ahab. The statement occasions, however, a difficulty; for according to 1 K. 16 23 29, Omri reigned twelve years and Ahab twenty-two years; whereas forty years reckoned back from Ahab's eleventh year to Omri's conquest of Moab would imply that Omri's reign embraced at least twenty-nine years, instead of twelve. Nordlander, however (p. 70), and Winckler (AOF 2 406, in an art. on Die Zeitangaben Mesa's), read 'his sons' days' (בְּנֹה, like יָמֹה, in the same line), in which case the 22 years of Ahab would be increased by the 2 of Ahaziah (1 K. 22 51) and the 12 of Jehoram (2 K. 3 1). This, if it does not wholly remove the difficulty, at least diminishes it: if the 'half' of these three reigns be not taken too strictly, but allowed to mean (say) 20-21 years, it will bring the revolt very near the end of Ahab's reign, and with the addition of Omri's 12 years, will yield a period which might not unfairly be described roundly as 'forty' years. In any case, the use of the term 'half' shows that the inscription was not set up until after the completion of the other 'half' of the period referred to; in all probability, not until after the fall of the dynasty of Omri, which, not less than Mesha's own successes, may well be alluded to in the 'destruction' of l. 7. (The rendering of l. 8 suggested above, col. 792 n., is ingenious, but scarcely probable.)

How complete was the state of subjection to which Moab had been reduced is shown by the enormous tribute of wool paid annually (notice the frequentative tense והשיב) to Israel (2 K. 3 4). The inscription names the principal cities which had been occupied by the Israelites, but were now recovered for Moab; and states further how Mesha was careful to rebuild and fortify them, and to provide them with cisterns and other requisites for resisting a siege. So far as is known, all the cities mentioned (except, as it seems, Ḥoronaim) lay within the disputed territory N. of the Arnon. The evident satisfaction with which Mesha records the triumphs of Chemosh over Yahwè (ll. 12, 17-18) is a characteristic trait in the religious feeling of the times.

ii. Jehoram's war.—The attempt made by Jehoram to subjugate Moab, and recover the lost territory, forms the subject of 2 K. 3 6-27: Mesha is not, indeed, mentioned here by name; but the connection leaves no doubt that he is the 'king of Moab' intended. Jehoram, Jehoshaphat, and the 'king' of Edom, uniting their forces, marched round the S. end of the Dead Sea—for the cities N. of the Arnon, which, as we have learnt from the inscription, had been fortified by Mesha, would be an obstacle to invasion from that direction—and so entered the territory of Moab. The invading army suffered from want of water: at Jehoshaphat's suggestion (cp 1 K. 22 7), the prophet Elisha (who happened to be present) is consulted: he bids them dig trenches in the sandy soil, which are speedily filled with the needed water. The Moabites, seeing the rays of the rising sun reflected in the pools, imagined that the invaders had quarrelled and massacred one another: eager to spoil what they suppose to be the abandoned camp, they rush forward, but are repelled and put to flight with great loss. After this, the combined armies advance into the land unopposed, and make havoc of it in every direction. Mesha, reduced to desperation, by his vain endeavours to escape out of Ḳir-ḥareseth, offers his eldest son 'that should have reigned in his stead' as a burnt-offering, to propitiate the anger of his god: there came in consequence 'great wrath' upon Israel, and the Israelites, without pursuing their successes further, at once evacuated the country. Mesha, though his land and people had suffered greatly, was thus left in possession of his independence. (See, further, on some details of this narrative, ELISHA, § 5, JEHORAM, § 3 f., KIR-HARESETH, also SALT [VALLEY OF].)

6. Jehoram's war.

Among the abundant literature dealing with the Moabite stone may be mentioned in particular (in addition to what has been already referred to) two arts. by Clermont-Ganneau in the Rev. Arch. 1870, Mar., pp. 184-207, June, pp. 357-386; Nöldeke, Die Inschr. des K. Mesa von Moab (1870) (in some cases founded upon readings discovered since to be incorrect, and hence to be supplemented by an art. in the LCBl. Jan. 8, 1887, cols. 59-61); Ginsburg, The Moabite Stone (very full), 1870,(2) 1871, [Prof. W. Wright,] North British Review, Oct. 1870, pp. 1-29 (very valuable). For other literature, see Lidzbarski's Handb. der Nordsem. Epigraphik, 415 (1898), with the references. On the history of the discovery of the stone, and questions arising out of it, see Clermont-Ganneau, La stèle de Mésa roi de Moab, 1870 (a short brochure, with plate and map—the first public notice of the stone); Ginsburg(2), 9 ff. 31 ff.; PEFQ, Jan.-March, 1870, pp. 169 ff. (a reprint of letters in the Times by Warren, Grove, Deutsch, and Clermont-Ganneau), and 1871, pp. 281 ff. (letter from Klein), Petermann, ZDMG 24 (1870), 640-44 (transl. in Ginsb.(2) 12 ff.): some of the judgments passed on Clermont-Ganneau to be qualified by the remarks of Wright, 3; cp also Warren, PEFQ, l.c., p. 182. 7. Literature.

2. A Calebite, father of Ziph; 1 Ch. 2 42 (מֵישָׁע, μαρεισα [B], μαρισας [A], μουσα [L]; [illegible] [Pesh.]; Mesa [Vg.]). Probably a corrupt reading for MARESHA [q.v.]. S. R. D.

MESHECH (מֶשֶׁךְ). 1. Gen. 10 2 1 Ch. 1 5 Ezek. 27 13 etc. See TUBAL AND MESHECH.

2. 1 Ch. 1 17 = Gen. 10 23, MASH (q.v.).

MESHELEMIAH (מְשֶׁלֶמְיָה, משלמיהו, § 30; on the name see below), the eponym of a 'course' of Korahite doorkeepers (1 Ch. 26 1 ΜΟϹΟΛΛΗΛ [B], ΜΟϹΟΛΛΑΜ [A], ϹΕΛΕΜΙΑϹ [L]), father of Zechariah (9 21 [μασαλαμι B, μοσολλαμ A, μεσολλαμια L] 26 2

[1] Vocalised by Nöldeke (p. 33) -ên; but to be read as -ân (Ḳiryathân, etc.), if the view be correct (Ges.-Kau., § 88 c with the reff.) that these forms are not properly duals, but noun-endings: see, however, König, ii. 1 437.

[μοσαλησ B, μασελλαμια A, σελεμια L]). He is also called SHELEMIAH (26 14 σαλαμια [B^{b}], -ειa [B*] σελεμία [AL]) and SHALLUM (9 19 σαλωμων [B], σαλωμ' [A], σελλουμ [L]); in 9 17 a different Shallum (cp SHALLUM, 8) seems to be meant.

From a purely linguistic point of view we might suppose משלמיה to be a fuller form of משלם (Meshullam?) and explain 'requited of Yahwè'; see MESHULLAM, and cp NAMES, § 30. But a historical study of the group of proper names to which both Meshullam (?) and Meshelemiah (?) belong suggests that both names are disguises of an ethnic name, such as שלמי or even ישמעאלי (cp SHALLUM). In the genealogy of Meshelemiah (1 Ch. 26 1-3) we find several ethnic names—e.g., Jathniel = Ethani, Elam = Jerahmeel. T. K. C.

MESHEZABEEL, or rather, as in RV, MESHEZABEL (מְשֵׁיזַבְאֵל—i.e., 'God is a deliverer,' §§ 30, 83; cp Ass. Mušēzib-ilu). Perhaps an artificial formation from SHOBAL (q.v.); this would probably fit the names with which this name is grouped (Che.).

1. Signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7), Neh. 10 21 [22] (μεσωζεβηλ [BℵA], βασση, ζαβιηλ [L]); perhaps to be identified with

2. The ancestor of MESHULLAM (13) mentioned in Neh. 3 4 (μασεζεβηα [ℵ]; μασεζειηλ [A]; μασσιζαβελ [L]; B om.) and also with

3. The father of PETHAHIAH (Neh. 11 24; βασηζα [Bℵ*A], βασηζβεηλ [ℵ$^{c.a}$], μασσιζαβεηλ [L]).

MESHILLEMOTH (מְשִׁלֵּמוֹת; see below).

1. An Ephraimite, temp. Pekah, 2 Ch. 28 12 (μοσολαμωθ [BA], μασσαλιμωθ [L]).

2. b. Immer, a priestly name in the genealogy of AMASHAI [q.v.], Neh. 11 13 (om. Bℵ*A; μασαλαμιθ [ℵ$^{c.a\ mg.\ inf.}$]; -λλιμωθ [L]); given in 1 Ch. 9 12 as Meshillemith (מְשִׁלֵּמִית, μασελ[ι]μωθ [BL], μοσολλαμωθ [A]). Cp GENEALOGIES, § 6, col. 1662.

Linguistically we might incline to point מְשֻׁלָּמוֹת (see NAMES, § 75). More probably, however, it is a disguised ethnic or local name, ות standing for ת ָ; cp מַעֲכָת. See MESHULLAM, and notice that 'Berechiah' (cp Bicri) and 'Immer' (see above, 1 and 2), are probably corrupt disguises of JERAHMEEL [q.v., § 4] (Che.).

MESHOBAB (מְשׁוֹבָב, § 62; cp SHOBAH, ELIASHIB), one of the Simeonites who in the time of Hezekiah dispossessed the Meunim (1 Ch. 4 34, μοσωβαβ [BA], ἐπιστρέφων [L]).

MESHULLAM (מְשֻׁלָּם, as if 'kept safe [by Yahwè],' but in its origin probably an ethnic (Che.),[1] a name frequently occurring in post-exilic literature; μοσολλαμ [BℵAL]; cp also the Jewish horseman μοσολλαμος in the pseudo-Hecatæus, Jos. c. Ap. 1 22, also the Nab. names משלמא, משלמו [Cook, Aram. Gloss. 78 f.]).

1. Grandfather of the scribe SHAPHAN [q.v.], 2 K. 22 3 (μεσολλαμ [BL], μεσσαλημ [A]).

3. A Gadite chief, 1 Ch. 5 13 (μοσολαμ [B]). Cp MICHAEL.

4. A name in a genealogy of BENJAMIN [q.v., § 9, 2 β], 1 Ch. 8 17 (μεσομμα [L]), probably the same as Misham v. 12. See JQR 11 103, § 1.

5. The father of Sallu and grandson of HASENUAH [q.v.], in list of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerusalem (EZRA ii., § 5 [b], § 15 [1] a), 1 Ch. 9 7 (μοολλαμ [B]) = Neh. 11 7 (μεσουλαμ [A], μεσολλαμ [L], αμεσουλα [B], -μ [ℵ]).

6. b. Shephathiah, a Benjamite, 1 Ch. 9 8 (μασεαλημ [B], μασαλλαμ [A]). See note 1 (end), and cp SHEPHATIAH.

7. b. Zadok, grandfather of Seraiah, a priest in list of inhabitants of Jerusalem (see EZRA ii., § 5 [b], § 15 [1] a), 1 Ch. 9 11 (μοσολλομ [BA]) = Neh. 11 11 (μεισουλαμ [B], μεσ. [Aℵ]). See SHALLUM, 6.

8. b. Meshillemith b. Immer, an ancestor of Maasiai or Amashai, a priest in list of inhabitants of Jerusalem (see EZRA ii., 5 [b], § 15 [1] a), 1 Ch. 9 12. In Neh. 11 13, the name is omitted; see MESHILLEMOTH, 2.

9. A Kohathite overseer placed by Ch. in the time of Josiah, 2 Ch. 34 12 (μεσολλαμ [L]).

10. Head of family, temp. Ezra (see EZRA i., § 2, ii. § 15 [1] d) Ezra 8 16 (μεσουαμ [B], μεσολλαμ [AL]) = 1 Esd. 8 44 MOSOLLAMON, RV MOSOLLAMUS (μεσολαβων [B], μοσολλαμον [A], μεσολλαμ [L]).

16. Signatory, and

17. Priestly signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7), Neh. 10 20 [21] (μεσουλαμ [BℵA], μεσσολλαμ [L]), and v. 7 [8] (μεσουλαμ [BℵA]) respectively.

In this article it is proposed to give an account of the large district lying N. and E. of Palestine as far as may be necessary to supplement the articles SYRIA and ASSYRIA. How far the region commonly called Mesopotamia is represented by any specific names in the OT may be an open question (see ARAM-NAHARAIM, HARAN, NAHOR, PADAN-ARAM): Israel heard of peoples rather than countries; its writers speak of the Aramæan, the Hittite, the Assyrian, rather than of the lands they occupied; besides, the independent importance of Mesopotamian states was a thing of the past when the OT writers lived. To understand the course of events, however, it is necessary to take account of the vast tract intervening between Israel and the great empires that reached out to it from beyond Damascus.

1. Name and reference in EV.

In the EV 'Mesopotamia' represents in the OT the Hebrew ARAM-NAHARAIM (q.v., § 1), being a rendering adopted from the LXX, where it represents also other Hebrew forms.[1] In Judith 'Mesopotamia' is the land where Israel settled when it migrated from Chaldæa (2 24 5 7 f. 8 26). In Acts 7 2 it seems to be Ur-Kasdim itself. In Acts 2 9, however (list of seats of the Diaspora), there can be little doubt that the reference is to the region between the Euphrates and the Tigris.

The Mesopotamia (Μεσοποταμία, ἡ μέση τῶν ποταμῶν

[1] If an Arabic nuance is permissible, one may explain the name as meaning 'submissive [to Yahwè]'; cp Di.-Ki. on Is. 42 19. [The name may, however, be an adaptation of an old tribal name, presumably Ishme'eli (cp MESHELEMIAH). Note that Shallum and Meshullam seem in two cases (7 20), to be interchangeable, also that Shallum is a Simeonite name and that Meshullam (see 6) possibly had Zephathite connections, while Meshelemiah (also interchangeable with Meshullam, see 20) occurs in 1 Ch. 26 2 in a list of names largely of tribal origin.—T. K. C.]

[1] Aram (Nu. 23 7 Judg. 3 8 [A]), Aram-naharaim (Gen. 24 10 Ps. 60 [title in Sym.]), Naharaim (1 Ch. 19 6 Ps. 60 [title]), Paddan (Gen. 28 2 [A], 5 [E], 6 7 [D$^{sil.}$ E], 33 18 35 9 26 46 15 48 7), Paddan Aram (Gen. 25 20 [AD] [μεσο sup ras A[1]], 28 2 [D$^{sil.}$ E], 5 [AD], 7 [A], 31 18), Pethor Aram Naharaim (Dt. 23 4). 𝔊^{AD} adds it in Gen. 27 43. See Hatch-Redpath, Supplement to Concordance.

[scil. χώρα or Συρία], Strabo) of Greek writers, the 'country amid the rivers' or one might say 'River-country,' is a purely geographical expression, the countries that it comprehends never having formed a self-contained political unity. The name occurs in Greek writers first at or after the time of Alexander; though it probably had its origin much earlier (cp ARAM-NAHARAIM).

2. Mesopotamia of Greeks.

The extremely fertile district that Xenophon traversed after crossing the Euphrates at Thapsacus, he calls Syria. The country beyond (i.e., E. of) the Araxes (Chabōras?) he calls Arabia—he describes it as a desert region in which his army had to suffer great hardships until it reached 'the gates of Arabia.'

The statements of Xenophon indicate a demarcation into two sections: the fertile portion, inhabited by agricultural Aramæans, stretching from the Euphrates to the Chabōras; and the desert portion, the home of wandering tribes, stretching on towards the Tigris. It would be rash, indeed, to conclude from this that Mesopotamia meant in practice the whole territory between the Euphrates and the Tigris; like its prototype Naharima it may have meant the fertile country inhabited in later times by Syrians, in earlier times by others—e.g., the Mitani (see § 17). In this case the real eastern boundary would be not the Tigris but the eastern border of the country watered by the Chabōras. Towards the W., however, the Greek Mesopotamia may, unlike Naharima, have reached no farther W. than the banks of the Euphrates. It was this district that practically constituted the political province of Mesopotamia after the final occupation of the country by the Romans (156 A.D.). On the other hand, when, as is often in Greek writers the case, the Euphrates and the Tigris are regarded as referred to in the very name Mesopotamia, the one bank of the river cannot be geographically separated from the other, and consequently narrow strips of country on the W. bank of the Euphrates and on the E. bank of the Tigris must be reckoned to the country 'amid the rivers.'

The limits towards the N. and the S. need not detain us. The country between the sources of the Euphrates and the Tigris belonged rather to Armenia. In this direction Mesopotamia properly ended with the Masius range. Towards the S. Mesopotamia was regarded as ending where Babylonia began.

3. Physical geography.

From what has been said it appears that Mesopotamia reaches its northern limits at the points where the EUPHRATES (q.v.) and the Tigris break through the mountain range and enter the lowlands. In the case of the Euphrates this takes place at Sumeisāṭ (Samosata), in that of the Tigris near Jezīret ibn 'Omar (Bezabdá) and Mōṣul (Nineveh). Consequently the irregular northern boundaries are marked by the lowland limits of those spurs of the Taurus mountains known in antiquity as Mons Masius and now as Ḳaraje Dāgh and Ṭūr 'Abdīn. Towards the S. the boundary was the so-called Median Wall, which, near Pirux Shapur, not much to the S. of Hīt (the ancient Is), crossed from the Euphrates in the direction of Ḳādisīya (Ōpis) to the Tigris. There the two rivers approach each other, to diverge again lower down. At the same place begins the network of canals connecting the two rivers which rendered the country of Babylonia one of the richest in the world; there too, in a geological sense, the higher portion of the plain, consisting of strata of gypsum and marl, comes to an end; there at one time ran the line of the sea-coast; and there begin those alluvial formations with which the mighty rivers in the course of long ages have filled up this depressed area. Mesopotamia thus forms a triangle lying in the NW. and SE. direction, with its long sides towards the N. and SW. It extends from 37° 30′ to about 33° N. lat. and from 38° to 46° E. long. and has an area of some 55,200 sq. m.

The points at which the rivers issue from among the mountains have an absolute altitude of between 1000 and 1150 ft., and the plain sinks rapidly towards the southern extremity of Mesopotamia, where it is not more than about 165 ft. above the sea. As a whole the entire country consists of a single open stretch, save that in the N. there are some branches of the Taurus—the Nimrūd Dāgh near Orfā, the long limestone range of 'Abd el-'Azīz, running NNW., and farther to the E. the Sinjār range, also of limestone, 7 m. broad and 50 m. long, running NNE. Between these two ranges—near the isolated basaltic hill of Tell Kōkab (Hill of Stars)—runs the defile by which the waters of the Chabōras, swollen by the Jaghjagha and other affluents from the Masius, find their way into the heart of Mesopotamia. The Khābūr proper, the ancient Chaboras, which rises in the three hundred copious fountains of Rās 'Ain (the ancient Rhesæna), and ultimately falls into the Euphrates near Ḳarḳīsiyā (Circesium), forms the boundary between the two, or more correctly the three, great divisions of Mesopotamia.

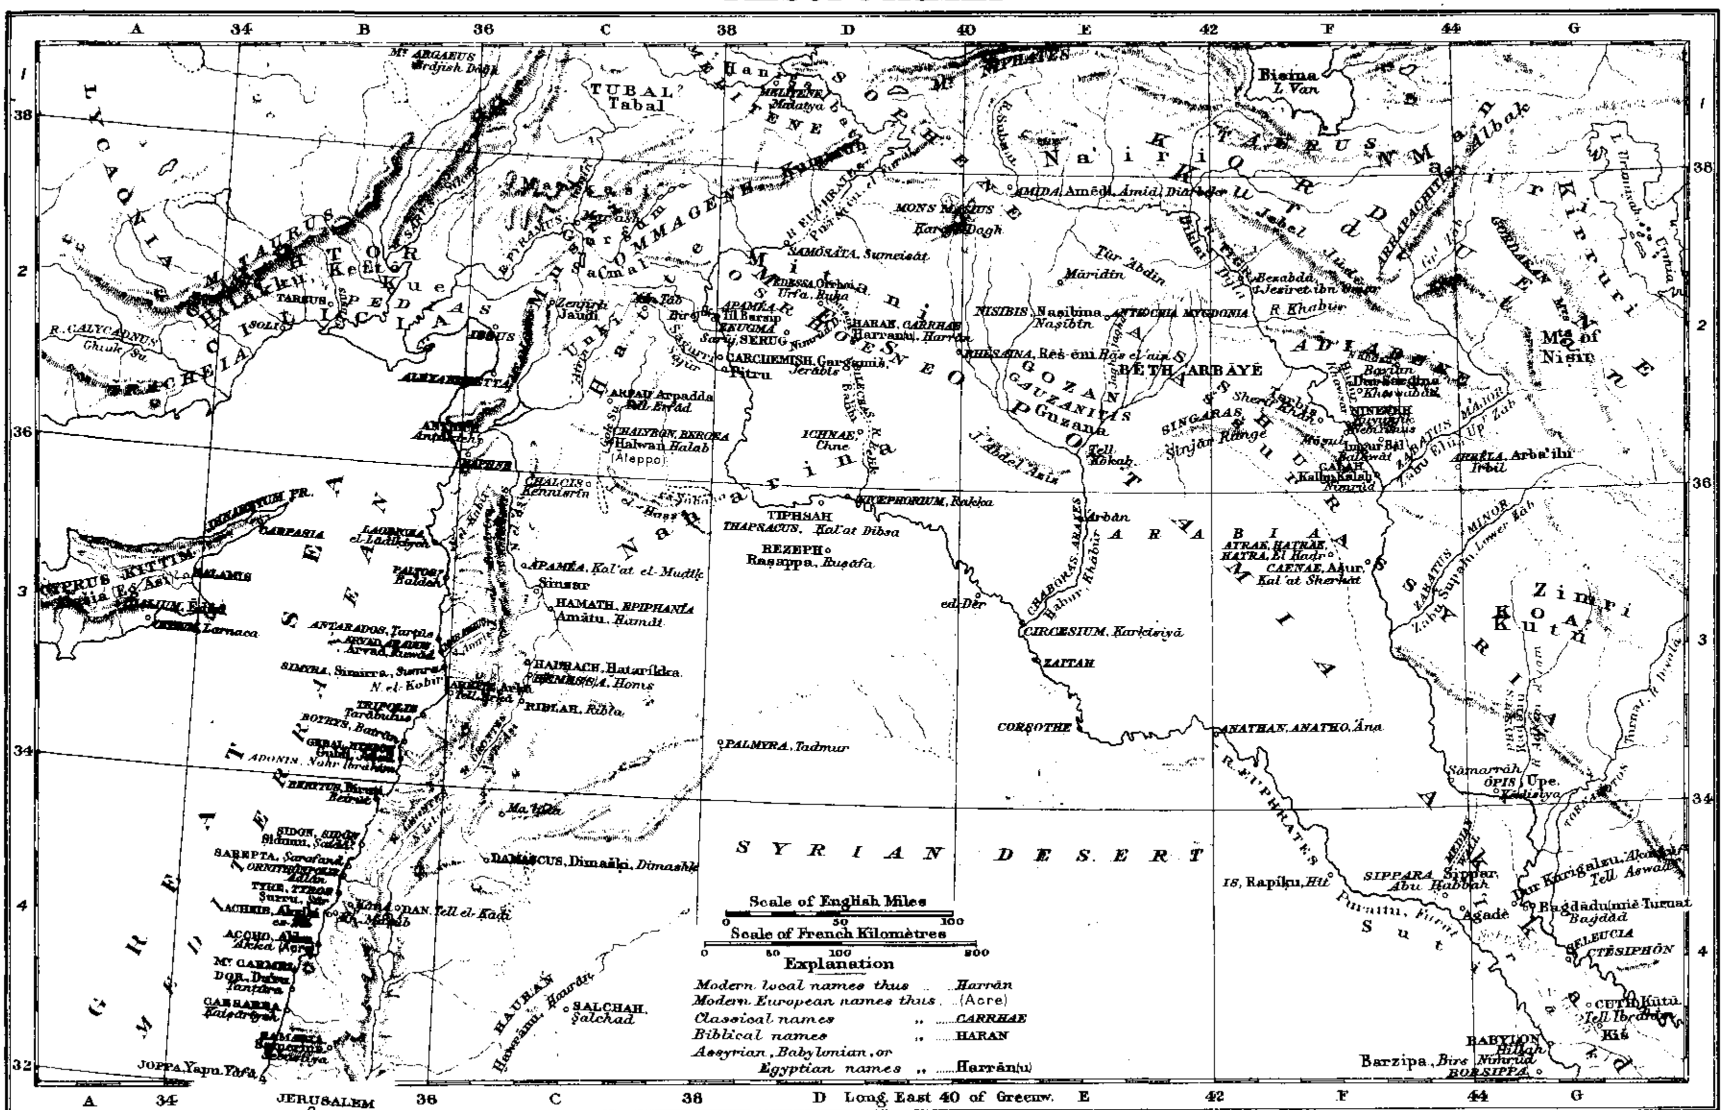
The divisions just referred to are (i.) the northern country W. of the Khābūr, (ii.) the northern country to the E., and (iii.) the steppe-land.

4. Divisions; towns.

i. Under the dominion of the Seleucids the country to the NW. of the Khābūr bore the name of Osrhoēne, or better Orrhoēne, and was for a time the seat of a special dynasty which at a later date at any rate was Arabian (Abgar). The capital of this kingdom was Orfa (Roha), the Edessa of the Greeks and Romans, the Orrhoi of the Syrians; it was at a later date a Roman colony, and bore also the name of Justinopolis. This once flourishing city lies on the small river Daisan (the ancient Scirtus). South of Edessa lie the ruins of Ḥarrān (see HARAN). A third town of this region is Serūj (see SERUG). The town lies between Ḥarrān and the Euphrates in a plain to which it gives its name. On the left bank of the Euphrates lay Apamēa (the modern Birējiḳ), connected with Zeugma on the other side by a bridge, and farther S., at the mouth of the Bilechas (modern Belikh), was the trading town and fortress Nicephorium, founded by command of Alexander, and completed by Seleucus Nicator, in memory of whose victory it was named. From the emperor Leo it received the designation Leontopolis. The spot is now known as Raḳḳa (see below). Farther up the fruitful valley of the Belikh lay the town of Ichnæ (Chne). Farther S. lay Circesium (Chaboras of Ptolemy, Phaleg of Isidor), not to be identified, as is often assumed, with CARCHEMISH [q.v.], which was on the right (W.) bank of the Euphrates; from the time of Diocletian Circesium was strongly fortified. The site is at present occupied by a wretched place of the name Ḳarḳīsiyā.

In ancient times a highly flourishing district must have stretched along the river Chaboras (Khābūr) to its principal source at Rās el-'Ain. The strip of comparatively desert country which now stretches along the lower course of the Khābūr was called by the Greeks Gauzanitis, and corresponds to the Gozan of 2 K. 17 6 (the Assyrian Guzana or Guzanu; see GOZAN).

ii. The country to the E. of the upper Khābūr is in many respects similar to that which has just been described. As the watershed of the Tigris is not far distant, the Masius range sends down into Mesopotamia only insignificant streams, the most important being the Hermas, the Mygdonius of the Greeks. On its banks was situated Nisibis (Neṣībīn), the chief city of the district, which commanded the great road at the foot of the mountains leading through the steppe, which here from the scarcity of water comes close up to the edge of the hills. In the Assyrian empire Naṣibina was the seat of an administrative official. In the time of the Seleucids the site was occupied by the flourishing Greek colony of Antiochia Mygdonia; but the new designation, transferred to the river and the vicinity of Nisibis from the Macedonian district of Mygdonia, afterwards passed out of use. Nisibis was an important trading city, and played a great part in the wars of the Romans against the Persians.



iii. The S. or steppe portion of Mesopotamia was from early times the roaming-ground of Arabian tribes; for Xenophon gives the name of Arabia to the district on the left (E.) bank of the Euphrates to the W. of the Khābūr; and elsewhere it is frequently stated that the interior at a distance from the rivers was a steppe inhabited by Arabes Scenitæ (Tent Arabs). Along the bank of the two great rivers ran a belt of cultivated country, and the rocky islands of the Euphrates also were occupied by a settled population. On the Euphrates, beginning towards the N., we must mention first Zaitah or Zautha, SE. of Circesium; next Corsothe, at the mouth of the Mascas; then Anatho or Anathan, the modern 'Āna; and finally Is (Hīt). On the Tigris the point of most importance is Cænæ (Καιναί of the Anabasis, which Winckler proposes to identify with Tekrit), S. from the mouth of the Great Zāb near the present Ḳal'at Sherḳāt; and not far distant towards the interior was Ātræ or Hatræ, also called Hatra (el-Ḥaḍr), the chief town of the Arab tribe of the Atreni.

From the Arabic geographers and travellers we gain the impression that a great part of Mesopotamia, with the exception of the southern steppe, of course, must at that time have been in a very flourishing condition; the neighbourhood of Nisibis especially is celebrated as a very paradise. In fact it is only since the Turkish conquest of the country under Sultan Selīm in 1515 that it has turned into a desert and gradually lost its fertility. As the nomadic Arabs have continually extended their encroachments, agriculture has been forced to withdraw into the mountains; and this is especially true of the western portions of Mesopotamia, the district of Rās el-'Ain, and the plain of Ḥarrān and Serūj, where huge mounds give evidence that the whole country was once covered with towns and villages. Under the Turks el-Jezīra does not form a political unity, but belongs to different pashaliks.

5. Recent times.

From this brief survey it appears that Mesopotamia, like Syria, constitutes an intermediate territory between the great eastern and western monarchies,—Syria inclining more to the W., and Mesopotamia to the E. In virtue of its position it frequently formed both the object and the scene of contests between the armies of those mighty monarchies, and it is wonderful how a country so often devastated almost always recovered. The roads, it is true, which traversed the territory were not mere military highways, but the main routes of traffic for Central Asia, Western Asia, and Europe. It is only in modern times, and since these lines of commercial intercourse have ceased to be followed, that the general condition of things has been so entirely altered.

The number of roads which in classical times traversed the country was very considerable; the Euphrates formed not a barrier but a bond between the nations on either side.

6. Roads.

At many places there were at least boat-bridges (zeugma) across. One of the most important of the ancient crossing-places must be sought, where in fact it still is, at Bîrejik (Apamea-Zeugma). From this point a great road led across to Edessa (Orfa): there it divided into two branches, the northern going by Amid (Diārbekr) and the other by Mārdīn and Nisibis to Mōṣul (Nineveh). (In quite recent times, in order to avoid the direct route across the desert and through the midst of the Bedouins, the post-road makes a great circuit from Nisibis by Jezīret ibn 'Omar to Mōṣul.) A second route crossed the Euphrates somewhat more to the S., and joined the other via Ḥarrān and Rhesæna. The principal crossing in Xenophon's time was at Thapsacus, almost opposite Raḳḳa; and it will be remembered also how important a part Thapsacus plays in the OT (see TIPHSAH). Sometimes a route along the Euphrates to Babylonia was followed, as is still frequently done by caravans at the present day; but even in ancient times this course was attended by more or less difficulty, the country being occupied by the chiefs of independent Arab tribes, with whom the travellers had to come to terms.

The condition of things in OT times must consequently be considered as essentially analogous to that of the present day. The central districts away from the rivers were occupied at certain seasons, according as they yielded pasture, by nomadic cattle-grazing tribes, the physical character of the country being then and now the same on the whole as that of the Syrian desert, which belongs not to Syria but properly to Arabia. The tells on the banks of the rivers show that in ancient times the country was covered with settlements and towns as far as irrigation was possible.[1] In the open country, however, beyond those limits there were Bedouins.

7. General condition.

At one time the Ṭai Arabs were the neighbours of the Aramæans, and consequently all Arabs bear in Syriac the name of Ṭayōyē. The district between Mōṣul and Nisibis received the name Bēth 'Arbāyē from its being occupied by Arabs. In the northern parts of Mesopotamia there are now tribes of mingled Kurds and Arabs which have to a greater or less degree abandoned their tents for fixed habitations and the tillage of the ground.

The Kurdish element appears only sporadically in the true Mesopotamian plain; but the Yezīdis, who form the population of the Sinjār range, may be referred to this stock. Of the old Aramæan peasantry there are no longer any important remains in the plain, the Aramæans having withdrawn farther into the Kurdish highlands, where, in spite of their wild Kurdish neighbours, they are more secure from exactions of every kind.

The plain of the northern country of the two rivers was at one time richly cultivated, and owed its prosperity to the industrious Aramæans, who formerly played so distinguished a part as a connecting link between the Persians and the Roman empire and afterwards between the western and the Arabian world, and whose highest culture was developed in this very region.

Quite otherwise is it now. In the plain there are almost no remains of the common Aramæan tongue. Apart from the scattered areas in which Kurdish prevails, the ordinary language is a vulgar Arabic dialect; but both Kurdish and Aramæan (Syriac) have exercised an influence on the speech of the Arab peasant. Certain Turcoman hordes also now roam about the Mesopotamian territory.

In climate and in the character of its soil, as well as in its ethnographic history, Mesopotamia holds an intermediate position. In this aspect also we must maintain the division into two quite distinct zones. The northern district of Mesopotamia combines strong contrasts, and is a connecting link between the mountain region of western Asia and the desert of Arabia. On the other hand, the country to the S. of Mesopotamia, or 'Irāḳ, has a warm climate, and towards the Persian Gulf indeed the heat reaches the greatest extremes.

8. Climate.

[1] This is confirmed by the latest traveller, von Oppenheim; see also the map in his Vom Mittelmeer zum Persischen Golf.

In Upper Mesopotamia, strictly so called, agriculture has suffered an extraordinary decline; in spite of excellent soil, very little of the land is turned to account.

9. Vegetation.

In the western district the fertile red-brown humus of the Orfa plain, derived from the lime of Nimrūd Dāgh, extends to about 12 m. S. of Ḥarrān. With a greater rainfall, and an artificial distribution of the water such as there was in olden times, agriculture would flourish. If spring rains are only moderately abundant, wheat and barley grow to a great height, and yield from thirty to forty fold.

Timber trees are few; plane trees and white poplars are planted along the streams, and a kind of willow and a sumach flourish on the banks of the Euphrates. Of the great forest which stood near Nisibis in the time of Trajan no trace remains; but the slopes both of the Masius mountains and of the Jebel 'Abd el-'Azīz, as well as, more especially, those of the Sinjār range, are still covered with wood.

The wide treeless tracts of the Low Country of Mesopotamia are covered with the same steppe vegetation which prevails from Central Asia to Algeria; but there is an absence of a great many of the arborescent plants that grow in the rockier and more irregular plateaus of western Asia and especially of Persia.

This comparative poverty and monotony of the flora is partly due to the surface being composed mainly of detritus, and partly to the cultivation of the country in remote antiquity having ousted the original vegetation and left behind it what is really only fallow ground untouched for thousands of years.

With few exceptions there are none but cultivated trees, and these are confined to the irrigated districts on the Euphrates and the Shaṭṭ.

The cycle of vegetation begins in November. The first winter rains clothe the plain with verdure. The full summer development is reached in June; and by the end of August everything is burnt up. A. S.[1]

There having been as yet no exploration by excavation in Mesopotamia (if we may use this term, as we propose to do in the rest of this article, merely for convenience, to denote the country stretching westwards of Assyria proper, and northwards of Babylonia), all that we can say about its earliest history is derived from such notices as have reached us in the Assyrian inscriptions of the Assyrian empire (since about 1500 B.C.), and in the Babylonian inscriptions of an earlier period. These notices are comparatively scanty; to a certain extent we have to rely upon the kind of historical conjecture which draws its deductions from the history of neighbouring lands and the analogy of times with which we are better acquainted.

10. Early Babylonian influence.

We may safely assume so much at least as this—that a civilisation like that of the Old Babylonia which is met with in the monuments of Telloh in the fourth and third millenia B.C. cannot have been confined to the southern portion of the Euphrates valley, but even then, as we know to have been the case at a later date, must have extended also to the upper valley. When we find a king like Gudēa (after 3000 B.C.) bringing material for his edifices from Phœnicia, the fact proves that in his day Mesopotamia, through which the western road lay, was already within the sphere of Babylonian civilisation, although we are not thereby informed as to its exact political position. It may be taken for granted that the greater kingdoms of South and North Babylonia were at pains to attach to themselves regions that were of such importance for their connection with the Mediterranean Sea, and thus we may safely represent to ourselves the history of Mesopotamia in those times as having been, approximately, similar to other better known histories.

Looked at from another point of view, Mesopotamia forms a region in some degree separated from the southern lands of the Euphrates, a region which gravitates quite as much towards Syria, properly so called, and Asia Minor as towards the centre of Babylonian civilisa-

11. Westward connection.

[1] [The work of revising the article 'Mesopotamia' in EB(9), and adapting it to form part of the present article has unfortunately had to be done without the help of the author, who died (24th June 1899) before he had given effect to his purpose.]

tion. Thus an impulse was given to an independent development in polity and culture, and it would have been indeed surprising if no independent states had ever come into being there, to carry on the civilisation of Babylonia on lines of their own.

12. Naharin.

The conjecture (based upon the probabilities of the case) that there were such states, finds confirmation as soon as history begins to supply us with facts regarding the lands in question. The Egyptian conquerors of the 18th and 19th dynasties, the Thotmes, the Amenhoteps, the Rameses between 1700 and 1400 B.C. knew of a state here, usually designated by them Naharin, which they enumerate in their tribute lists. Unfortunately their references are not of such a nature as to convey much information as to the character and history of Naharin.

13. The Mitani aliens.

This defect is made good all the more conspicuously in the Amarna letters (1500-1400 B.C.) which make us acquainted with a people called Mitani who had their abode here.[1] The correspondence of King Dušratta of Mitani with Amenhotep III. and IV. clearly shows that the race then dominant was non-Semitic, and manifestly of kin with the Ḫeta and the (Alarodian) peoples who at that time had their settlements in Armenia; but it shows also that it was alien in Mesopotamia, and, as the peculiarity of the script and language of the letters proves, had become possessed of a Semitic civilisation merely through conquest. For with but one exception these letters are written in the Babylonian-Assyrian character and language.

14. Mesopotamian language, etc.

This script and language, however, are shown by the peculiarities they exhibit, to possess definite rules of their own and to be quite distinct in character from the contemporary Babylonian. These peculiarities are exactly the same as those we meet with in the inscriptions—which begin very shortly afterwards—of the Assyrian kings Rammān(Adad?)-nirāri I. (in the 13th cent.) and Tiglath-pileser I. (about 1100). We now know enough of the beginnings of Assyrian history, however, to satisfy us that this 'orthography and grammar' cannot have developed in Assyria; moreover, we meet with it precisely under those Assyrian kings who subjugated (or subjugated anew) Mesopotamia, so that we thus have an independent proof of—what we had already conjectured from the nature of the country—the independent development of civilisation in Mesopotamia; for a splendid development of script and speech bearing all the marks of the influence of a definite school is possible only in a territory that enjoys independence both in its politics and in its culture.

15. Civilisation.

The script and style now usually designated Assyrian because appropriated by Assyria (which about this time was beginning to develop out of a little city-kingdom into a great empire) were thus originally Mesopotamian. This leads to the further conjecture that much else which we are accustomed to designate as Assyrian, because we first begin to meet with it in the time of the Assyrian supremacy (after 1300 and 1100), may also have been of Mesopotamian origin. The only excavations which have as yet been made in the Mesopotamian field—those of Layard in 'Arbān on the Ḫābūr—support such a conjecture.[2] The sculptures found there are plainly older than any Assyrian sculptures as yet known to us; but, though they belong to a period preceding that of the Assyrian supremacy, they are all of the type that is currently spoken of as Assyrian.

16. Political independence.

A further peculiarity which we are in the habit of regarding as specifically Assyrian is also doubtless pre-Assyrian—Mesopotamian. In Assyria dates are reckoned by eponyms (limu; see ASSYRIA, § 19), instead of by regnal years as in Babylonia (q.v. §§ 37 ff.). Certain clay tablets, however, which are said to have been found in Cappadocia, and belong approximately to the thirteenth century, employ the same method of dating. We must accordingly regard this as a further peculiarity of the Mesopotamian sphere of civilisation as contrasted with the Babylonian.

The political independence of Mesopotamia, alongside of the Babylonian kingdom, we are also led to infer from another fact. We are able clearly to make out that in the various conquests of Mesopotamia by the Assyrians, notably by Ašur-uballit, Rammān(Adad?)-nirāri I., and Shalmaneser I., in the fourteenth century, and by Tiglath-pileser and his predecessors about 1100—the Assyrian kings who hold Mesopotamia bear the title of šar kiššati, 'King of the World' (which later became the stereotyped title of all the kings) in association with that of 'King of Aššur' (of which it had precedence). Following the analogy of Babylonian royal titles, we are to see here the title of honour which had been borne by the sovereigns of Mesopotamia, whose legitimate heirs the Assyrians claimed to be.

17. History: Mitani supremacy.

From the thirteenth century onwards—that is to say from the time of the conquest of Mesopotamia by the Assyrians—we are able to follow the political fortunes of the country with some detail. We have seen that before this, at the period of the Amarna letters (15th cent.), it was in the hands of the non-Semitic Mitani. Even at that early date, however, we can discern how Ašur-uballit, the king of Aššur, is beginning to extend his power westwards, and coming into conflict with Dušratta of the Mitani. Accounts given by his successor attribute to him victories over the Šubari (the Assyrian designation of the Mitani), and in agreement with this is the fact that a recently discovered inscription designates him as Šar Kiššati, thus attributing to him the sovereignty of Mesopotamia.

18. Assyrian.

The Mitani supremacy was finally destroyed by Ašur-uballit's great-grandson Rammān(Adad?)-nirāri I. (about 1300), who, with his son Shalmaneser I., was the first to extend the Assyrian frontiers westward beyond the Euphrates, and northwards along the course of that river towards Armenia, at the same time seeking to secure these gains by planting Assyrian colonies. After the overthrow of Tukulti-Ninib I., son of Shalmaneser I., Mesopotamia passed into the possession of Babylonia, whose kings henceforward bear the title of Šar kiššati; but it was again reconquered by Assyria in the twelfth century (Ašur-riš-iši, Tiglath-pileser I.), only, after some further vicissitudes, to be finally incorporated with the rest of Assyria in the tenth century.

19. Ancient capital: Ḫarran.

We are not yet in possession of any information as to the rulers of this kingdom which maintained itself, as we have seen, in Mesopotamia alongside of that of Babylonia during the pre-Assyrian period. (The ascendency of the Mitani was, of course, only an episode.) Neither are we able to show by documentary proof what was the capital of the kingdom. Still it is hardly possible to doubt that it must have been Ḫarrān, a city of unrivalled importance in the most ancient times. This importance it owed to its position as the focus at which highways from the north (Armenia), from Babylonia, and from the west (the Mediterranean ports) converged, and this importance it continued to retain down to the

[1] A letter from the prince of Mitani is stated in a hieratic docket to have come from Naharna (no. 23 in Wi.'s ed., KB 5, p. xv; Erman, ZA 27 [1889], p. 63; cp Erman, SBAW, 1888, p. 584 and Maspero's note in Struggle of Nations, 146).

[2] Quite recently, M. v. Oppenheim has laid bare some old monuments at Rās el-'Ain on the Khābūr. They are representations on a gateway, quite similar to those found at Zenjirli (Sam'al) in Syria. As they certainly belong to the pre-Assyrian time, the Mitani inhabitants might be thought of as their originators (they would thus be 'Hethitisch' in the sense explained in Helmolt, Weltgesch. iii. 1 110 f.). Later, about the time of the Aramæan immigration, the stones were used again, and apparently it was then that the name of the ruler was added in cuneiform.

Greek and Sasanian periods (cp TRADE AND COMMERCE). We can also make out that in Assyrian antiquity the worship of the moon-goddess (Sin) of Ḥarrān had an importance equal to that of the gods of the Babylonian capitals; and when, still in the eighth century, we find at Sam'al (Zenjirli) in North Syria a dedication to the 'Baal of Ḥarrān,' this is, according to oriental ideas, a specific proof of the former sovereignty in Syria of the kingdom of Mesopotamia with a capital at Ḥarrān—a sovereignty which is also implied in the existence of a kingdom of Naharin in the Egyptian inscriptions.

20. Aramæan immigration. The Assyrian conquest of Mesopotamia in the fourteenth century coincides, as we learn from the inscriptions, with the immigration of a new population which thenceforward impressed its character upon the land down to the time of the Arab invasion and onwards. As soon as the kings of Assyria had annexed Mesopotamia, they required to defend it against the nomads of the steppe, 'the Syrian desert,'—in other words, Arabia—whom they designate as the 'Aramæan hordes' (aḫlamū Aramaya). Here we see the same play of circumstances as had been witnessed thousands of years before, reached its best-known historical manifestation in the Mohammedan conquest, and can still be observed even in our own day. As long as they are not firmly kept in check by a strong power, the Bedouins continually encroach upon the cultivated territory. With the fall of Tukulti-Ninib I. (about 1275) and the decline of the Assyrian power, these 'Aramæans' began to have a free hand and to be able to enter Mesopotamia unhindered. When the Assyrians again took possession of the country, we find them instituting new campaigns, and claiming new victories over the 'Aramæan hordes' (Ašur-riš-iši, Tiglath-pileser I.). The subsequent decline of the Assyrian power under the successors of Tiglath-pileser I. (after 1100) exposed the country once more to their attacks; and thus was rendered possible an immigration which we can best compare with that of the Hebrews into Canaan two centuries earlier, or that of the Chaldæans or Kaldi a little later into Babylonia. What we know is that the entire land was taken possession of by Aramæan tribes, who, in the first instance, made themselves masters of the open country, but subsequently occupied the cities as well. It was then—between about 1050 and 950—that Mesopotamia received the Aramæan population, to which we owe the biblical phrase ARAM-NAHARAIM (q.v.). As soon as Assyria again took the upper hand (about 900), and especially under Ašur-naṣir-pal (881-868), the Aramæan tribes, which by this time had developed into petty principalities, were again brought into subjection. Shalmaneser II. brought to a successful close the work of his father, and thenceforward Mesopotamia continued to be Assyrian down to the fall of the empire, though not in such a degree as to affect the Aramæan character of the population. Afterwards, it became Babylonian under Nabopolassar and Nebuchadrezzar.[1] A. S.,[2] §§ 2-9; H. W., §§ 10-20.

MESSIAH[3] (Dan. 9 25 f.), MESSIAS (AV Jn. 1 41 4 25), are transcriptions (the first form modified by reference

1. The title. to the etymology) of the Gk. ΜΕϹϹΙΑϹ (ΜΕϹΙΑϹ, ΜΕϹΕΙΑϹ), which in turn represents the Aramaic מְשִׁיחָא (mĕšīḥā), answering to the Heb. הַמָּשִׁיחַ, 'the anointed.'[4] The Hebrew word with the article prefixed occurs in the OT only in the phrase 'the anointed priest' (Lev. 4 3 5 16 6 22 [15]); but 'Yahwè's anointed' is a common title of the king of Israel, applied in the historical books to Saul and David, in Lam. 4 20 to Zedekiah (see LAMENTATIONS, § 8), and in Is. 45 1 extended to Cyrus. In the Psalms corresponding phrases (my, thy, his anointed)[1] occur nine times, to which may be added the lyrical passages 1 S. 2 10 Hab. 3 13. In the intention of the writers of these hymns it refers to the king then on the throne,[2] or, in hymns of more general and timeless character, to the Davidic king as such (without personal reference to one king);[3] but in the Psalms the ideal aspect of the kingship, its religious importance as the expression and organ of Yahwè's sovereignty, is prominent.

When the Psalter became a liturgical book the historical kingship had gone by,[4] and the idea alone remained, no longer as the interpretation of a present political fact, but as part of Israel's religious inheritance. It was impossible, however, to think that a true idea had become obsolete merely because it found no expression on earth for the time being; Israel looked again for an anointed king to whom the words of the sacred hymns should apply with a force never realised in the imperfect kingship of the past. Thus the psalms, especially such psalms as the second, were necessarily viewed as prophetic; and meantime, in accordance with the common Hebrew representation of ideal things as existing in heaven, the true king remains hidden with God. The steps by which this result was reached must, however, be considered in detail.

2. The Messianic hope. The hope of the advent of an ideal king was only one feature of that larger hope of the salvation of Israel from all evils, the realisation of perfect reconciliation with Yahwè, and the felicity of the righteous in him, in a new order of things free from the assaults of hostile nations and the troubling of the wicked within the Hebrew community, which was constantly held forth by all the prophets, from the time when the great seers of the eighth century B.C. first proclaimed that the true conception of Yahwè's relation to his people was altogether different from what was realised, or even aimed at, by the recognised civil and religious leaders of the two Hebrew kingdoms, and that it could become a practical reality only through a great deliverance following a sifting judgment of the most terrible kind. The idea of a judgment so severe as to render possible an entire breach with the guilty past, and of a subsequent complete realisation of Yahwè's kingship in a regenerate nation, is common to all the prophets, but is expressed in a great variety of forms and images, conditioned by the present situation and needs of Israel at the time when each prophet spoke. As a rule the prophets directly connect the final restoration with the removal of the sins of their own age, and with the accomplishment of such a work of judgment as lies within their own horizon; to Isaiah the last troubles are those of Assyrian invasion, to Jeremiah the restoration follows on the exile to Babylon; Daniel connects the future glory with the overthrow of the Greek monarchy. The details of the prophetic pictures show a corresponding variation; but all agree in giving the central place to the realisation of a real effective kingship of Yahwè; in fact the conception of the religious subject as the nation of Israel, with a national organisation under Yahwè as king, is common to the whole OT, and forms the bond that connects prophecy proper with the so-called Messianic psalms and similar passages which theologians call typical—i.e., with such passages as speak of the religious relations of the Hebrew commonwealth, the religious meaning of national institutions, and so necessarily contain ideal elements reaching beyond the empirical present. All such passages are frequently called Messianic; but the term is more properly reserved as the specific designation of one particular branch of the Hebrew hope of salvation, which, becoming prominent in post-canonical Judaism, used the name of the Messiah as a technical form (which it never is in the OT), and exercised a great influence on NT thought,—the term 'the Christ' (ὁ Χριστός) being itself nothing more than the translation of 'the Messiah.'

3. Development of the idea.

In the period of the Hebrew monarchy the thought that Yahwè is the divine king of Israel was associated with the conception that the human king reigns by right only if he reigns by commission or 'unction' from him. Such was the theory of the kingship in Ephraim as well as in Judah (Dt. 33 2 K. 96); [but it is only] the great Judæan prophets of the eighth century who connect Israel's deliverance with the rise of an ideal Davidic king, full of Yahwè's spirit (Is. 96 f. 11 1 f. Mic. 5 2) [though the genuineness of these passages has been disputed].[1] This conception, indeed, is not one of the constant elements of prophecy; the later prophecies of Isaiah take a different shape, looking for the decisive interposition of Yahwè without the instrumentality of a kingly deliverer. Jeremiah again speaks of the future David or righteous sprout of David's stem[2] (23 5 f.); and Ezekiel uses similar language (34 23 f. 37 24 f.); but that such passages do not necessarily mean more than that the Davidic dynasty shall be continued in the time of restoration under a series of worthy princes seems clear from the way in which Ezekiel speaks of the prince in chaps. 45 9 46 2 12. As yet we have no fixed doctrine of a personal Messiah, only material from which such a doctrine might by and by be drawn. The religious view of the kingship is still essentially the same as in 2 S. 7 12 f., where the endless duration of the Davidic dynasty is set forth as part of Yahwè's plan of grace to his nation.

There are other parts of the OT—notably 1 S. 8 12—in which the very existence of a human kingship is represented as a departure from the ideal of a perfect theocracy. And so, in the exilic and post-exilic periods, when the monarchy had come to an end, we find pictures of the latter days in which its restoration has no place.

Such is the great prophecy in the second part of Isaiah in which Cyrus is the anointed of Yahwè, and the grace promised to David is transferred to ideal Israel ('the servant of Yahwè') as a whole (Is. 55 3). So too there is no allusion to a human kingship in Joel or in Malachi, and in the Book of Daniel it is collective Israel that appears under the symbol of a 'son of man,' and receives the kingdom (7 13 18 22 27).

[On the other hand in Hag. 2 23 Zech. 3 8 6 12 the hope of the Messiah is connected with the name of Zerubbabel, and, possibly in the early Greek period, a prophetic writer has given us the fine prophecy of a victorious but 'humble' Messiah in Zech. 9 9 f. Some critics, too, refer to a late post-exilic period the prophecies of a personal Messiah in Isaiah and Micah mentioned above (cp ISAIAH ii., § 6 f.; MICAH [BOOK]), and it is undeniable that the Messianic king is referred to in the Psalter (see PSALMS, § 14).

4. Later conception.

Meantime, however, the decay and ultimate silence of the living prophetic word concurred with the prolonged political servitude of the nation to produce a most important change in the type of the Hebrew religion. The prophets had never sought to add to the religious unity of their teaching unity in the pictorial form in which from time to time they depicted the final judgment and future glory. For this there was a religious reason. To them the kingship of Yahwè was not a mere ideal, but an actual reality.

Its full manifestation, indeed, to the eye of sense and to the unbelieving world, lay in the future; but true faith found a present stay in the sovereignty of Yahwè, daily exhibited in providence and interpreted to each generation by the voice of the prophets. And, while Yahwè's kingship was a living and present fact, it refused to be formulated in fixed invariable shape.

When the prophets ceased, however, and their place was taken by the scribes, the interpreters of the written word, when at the same time the yoke of foreign oppressors rested continually on the land, Israel no longer felt itself a living nation, and Yahwè's kingship, which presupposed a living nation, found not even the most inadequate expression in daily political life. Yahwè was still the lawgiver of Israel; but his law was written in a book, and he was not present to administer it. He was still the hope of Israel; but the hope was all dissevered from the present; it too was to be read in books, and these were interpreted of a future which was no longer, as it had been to the prophets, the ideal development of forces already at work in Israel, but wholly new and supernatural. The present was a blank, in which religious duty was summed up in patient obedience to the law and penitent submission to the Divine chastisements; the living realities of divine grace were but memories of the past, or visions of 'the world to come.' The scribes, who in this period took the place of the prophets as the leaders of religious thought, were mainly busied with the law; but no religion can subsist on mere law; and the systematisation of the prophetic hopes, and of those more ideal parts of the other sacred literature which, because ideal and dissevered from the present, were now set in one line with the prophecies, went on side by side with the systematisation of the law, by means of a harmonistic exegesis, which sought to gather up every prophetic image in one grand panorama of the issues of Israel's and the world's history.

5. Post-canonical.

The beginnings of this process can probably be traced within the canon itself, in the book of Joel and the last chapters of Zechariah;[1] and, if this be so, we see from Zech. 9 that the picture of the ideal king early claimed a place in such constructions. The full development of the method belongs, however, to the post-canonical literature, and was naturally much less regular and rapid than the growth of the legal traditions of the scribes.

The attempt to form a schematic eschatology left so much room for the play of individual fancy that its results could not quickly take fixed dogmatic shape; and it did not appeal to all minds alike or equally at all times. It was in crises of national anguish that men turned most eagerly to the prophecies, and sought to construe their teachings as a promise of speedy deliverance in such elaborate schemes of the incoming of the future glory as fill the APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE (q.v.). But these books, however influential, had no public authority, and when the yoke of oppression was lightened but a little their enthusiasm lost much of its contagious power. It is therefore not safe to measure the general growth of eschatological doctrine by the

[1] [For references to recent criticism, see ISAIAH [ii.], MICAH [ii.]. Prof. W. R. Smith referred in this connection to passages in Amos and Hosea as pointing forward to a Davidic king. The genuineness of the whole passage Am. 9 8-15, has, however, been shown to be very doubtful (see AMOS, § 10), and though Hosea in 8 4 appears to refer to the illegitimacy of the northern kingdom, the words 'and David their king' (ואת־דויד מלכם) in Hos. 3 5 are certainly a gloss in the interests of Judah. The strong tendency of recent criticism is to include other favourite Messianic passages in the list of later insertions, springing from a time when the Messianic idea had experienced a rich development, e.g., Hos. 1 11 [2 2] Mic. 2 12 f. Is. 11 10 33 17 (with the sections to which the last two passages belong (and perhaps Gen. 49 10 (on which cp Dr. J. Phil. 14 28), in case שילה is a corruption of שֶׁלּוֹ, and the writer alludes to Ezek. 21 27 [32], which he interprets Messianically. See, however, SHILOH ii.]

[2] [Is this designation of the Messianic king suggested by Is. 4 2? It is true, the ṣémaḥ of Yahwè (צֶמַח יהוה) there is explained by most either of the fertility of the soil or (cp Is. 60 21) of the new growth of pious inhabitants in the Messianic age (cp ISAIAH ii., § 5). On the other hand, in Zech. 3 8 6 12 צֶמַח already appears as a kind of proper name.]

apocalyptic books, of which Daniel alone attained a canonical position.

In the Apocrypha eschatology has a very small place; but there is enough to show that the hope of Israel was never forgotten, and that the imagery of the prophets had moulded that hope into certain fixed forms which were taken with a literalness not contemplated by the prophets themselves (see ESCHATOLOGY, § 58, a). It was, however, only very gradually that the figure and name of the Messiah acquired the prominence which they have in later Jewish doctrine of the last things and in the official exegesis of the Targums. In the very developed eschatology of Daniel they are, as we have seen, altogether wanting, and in the Apocrypha, both before and after the Maccabee revival, the everlasting throne of David's house is a mere historical reminiscence (Ecclus. 47 11 1 Macc. 2 57). So long as the wars of independence worthily occupied the energies of the Palestinian Jews, and the Hasmonæan sovereignty promised a measure of independence and felicity under the law, in which the people were ready to acquiesce, at least, till the rise of a new prophet (1 Macc. 14 41), the hope that connected itself with the house of David was not likely to rise to fresh life, especially as a considerable proportion of the not very many passages of scripture which speak of the ideal king might with a little straining be applied to the rising star of the new dynasty (cp the language of 1 Macc. 14 4-15).

It is only in Alexandria, where the Jews were still subject to the yoke of the Gentile, that at this time (about 140 B.C.) we find the oldest Sibylline verses (3 652 f.) proclaiming the approach of the righteous king whom God shall raise up from the East (Is. 41 2) to establish peace on earth and inaugurate the sovereignty of the prophets in a regenerate world. The name Messiah is still lacking, and the central point of the prophecy is not the reign of the deliverer but the subjection of all nations to the law and the temple.[1]

6. Pharisees.

With the growing weakness and corruption of the Hasmonæan princes, and the alienation of a large part of the nation from their cause, the hope of a better kingship begins to appear in Judæa also; at first darkly shadowed forth in the Book of Enoch (chap. 90), where the white steer, the future leader of God's herd after the deliverance from the heathen, stands in a certain contrast to the inadequate sovereignty of the actual dynasty (the horned lambs); and then much more clearly, and for the first time with use of the name Messiah, in the Psalter of Solomon, the chief document of the protest of Pharisaism against its enemies, the later Hasmonæans.

It was a struggle for mastery between a secularised hierarchy on the one hand (to whom the theocracy was only a name), whose whole interests were those of their own selfish politics, and on the other hand a party (to which God and the law were all in all) whose influence depended on the maintenance of the doctrine that the exact fulfilling of the law according to the precepts of the scribes was the absorbing vocation of Israel. This doctrine had grown up in the political nullity of Judæa under Persian and Grecian rule, and no government that possessed or aimed at political independence could possibly show constant deference to the punctilios of the schoolmen.

The Pharisees themselves could not but see that their principles were politically impotent; the most scrupulous observance of the Sabbath, for example—and this was the culminating point of legality—could not thrust back the arms of the heathen. Thus the party of the scribes, when they came into conflict with an active political power, which at the same time claimed to represent the theocratic interests of Israel, were compelled to lay fresh stress on the doctrine that the true deliverance of Israel must come from God, not from man. We have seen indeed that the legalism which accepted Yahwè as legislator, while admitting that his executive sovereignty as judge and captain of Israel was for the time dormant, would from the first have been a self-destructive position without the complementary hope of a future vindication of divine justice and mercy, when the God of Israel should return to reign over his people for ever. Before the Maccabee revival the spirit of nationality was so dead that this hope lay in the background; the ethical and devotional aspects of religion under the law held the first place, and the monotony of political servitude gave little occasion for the observation that a true national life requires a personal leader as well as a written law. But now the Jews were a nation once more, and national ideas came to the front. In the Hasmonæan sovereignty these ideas took a political form, and the result was the secularisation of the kingdom of God for the sake of a harsh and rapacious aristocracy. The nation threw itself on the side of the Pharisees; but it did so in no mere spirit of punctilious legalism, but with the ardour of a national enthusiasm deceived in its dearest hopes, and turning for help from the delusive kingship of the Hasmonæans to the true kingship of Yahwè, and to his vicegerent the king of David's house.

It is in this connection that the doctrine and name of the Messiah appear in the Psalter of Solomon. See especially Ps. 17, where the eternal kingship of the house of David, so long forgotten, is seized on as the proof that the Hasmonæans have no divine right.

This conception of the kingship is traced in lines too firm to be those of a first essay; it had doubtless grown up as an integral part of the religious protest against the Hasmonæans. And while the polemical motive is obvious, and the argument from prophecy against the legitimacy of a non-Davidic dynasty is quite in the manner of the scribes, the spirit of theocratic fervour which inspires the picture of the Messiah marks the fusion of Pharisaism with the national religious feeling of the Maccabee revival.

7. NT times.

It is this national feeling that, claiming a leader against the Romans as well as deliverance from the Sadducee aristocracy, again sets the idea of the kingship rather than that of resurrection and individual retribution in the central place which it had lost since the captivity. Henceforward the doctrine of the Messiah is at once the centre of popular hope and the object of theological culture. The NT is the best evidence of its influence on the masses (see especially Mt. 21 9; cp also Jn. 4 25); and the exegesis of the Targums, which in its beginnings doubtless reaches back before the time of Christ, shows how it was fostered by the Rabbins and preached in the synagogues.[1] Its diffusion far beyond Palestine, and in circles least accessible to such ideas, is proved by the fact that Philo himself (De Præm. et Pœn., § 16) gives a Messianic interpretation of Nu. 24 17 (𝔊). It must not indeed be supposed that the doctrine was as yet the undisputed part of Hebrew faith which it became when the fall of the state and the antithesis to Christianity threw all Jewish thought into the lines of the Pharisees. It has, for example, no place in the Assumptio Mosis or in Eth. En. 1-36, 91-104 (cp APOCALYPTIC, §§ 27, 29, 65; ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 59, 65, 73). But, as the fatal struggle with Rome became more and more imminent, the eschatological hopes which increasingly absorbed the Hebrew mind all group themselves round the person of the Messiah.

In the later parts of the Book of Enoch (the 'symbols' of chaps. 45 f.), the judgment day of the Messiah (identified with Daniel's 'son of Man') stands in the forefront of the eschatological picture. Josephus (BJ 6 5, § 4) testifies that the belief in the immediate appearance of the Messianic king gave the chief impulse to the war that ended in the destruction of the Jewish state; after the fall of the temple the last apocalypses (Baruch, 4 Ezra) still loudly proclaim the near victory of the God-sent king; and Bar Kocheba, the leader of the revolt against Hadrian, was actually greeted as the Messiah by Rabbi 'Aḳiba (cp Lk. 21 8). These hopes were again quenched in blood. The political idea of the Messiah, the restorer of the Jewish state, still finds utterance in the daily prayer of every Jew (the Sh'mônè 'Esrê), and is enshrined in the system of Rabbinical theology; but its historical significance was buried in the ruins of Jerusalem.

8. Jesus.

But the proof written in fire and blood on the fair face of Palestine that the true kingdom of God could not be realised in the forms of an earthly state, and under the limitations of national particularism, was not the final refutation of the hope

[1] In Sibyll. 3 775, νηόν must undoubtedly be read for υἱόν.

[1] The many Targumic passages that speak of the Messiah [especially in the Targum of Jonathan ('the king Messiah')], are registered by Buxtorf, Lex. Chald., s.v.

of the OT. Amidst the last convulsions of political Judaism a new and spiritual conception of the kingdom of God, of salvation, and of the Saviour of God's anointing, had shaped itself through the preaching, the death, and the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth.[1] As applied to Jesus the name of Messiah lost all its political and national significance, for his victory over the world, whereby he approved himself the true captain of salvation, was consummated, not amidst the flash of earthly swords or the lurid glare of the lightnings of Elias, but in the atoning death through which he entered into the heavenly glory. Between the Messiah of the Jews and the Son of Man who came not to be ministered to but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many, there was on the surface little resemblance; and from their standpoint the Pharisees reasoned not amiss that the marks of the Messiah were conspicuously absent from this Christ. But when we look at the deeper side of the Messianic conception in the Psalter of Solomon, at the heartfelt longing for a leader in the way of righteousness and acceptance with God which underlies the aspirations after political deliverance, we see that it was in no mere spirit of accommodation to prevailing language that Jesus did not disdain the name in which all the hopes of the OT were gathered up (cp JESUS, § 26 f.). The kingdom of God is the centre of all spiritual faith, and the perception that that kingdom can never be realised without a personal centre, a representative of God with man and man with God, was the thought, reaching far beyond the narrow range of Pharisaic legalism, which was the last lesson of the vicissitudes of the OT dispensation, the spiritual truth that lay beneath that last movement of Judaism which concentrated the hope of Israel in the person of the anointed of Yahwè.

9. Rabbinical development.

It would carry us too far to consider (1) the details of the conception of the Messiah and the Messianic times as they appear in the later apocalypses or in Rabbinical theology, and (2) the questions that arise as to the gradual extrication of the NT idea of the Christ from the elements of Jewish political doctrine. A word, however, is necessary as to the Rabbinical doctrine of the Messiah who suffers and dies for Israel, the Messiah son of Joseph or son of Ephraim, who in Jewish theology is distinguished from and subordinate to the victorious son of David. The developed form of this idea is almost certainly a product of the polemic with Christianity, in which the Rabbins were hard pressed by arguments from passages (especially Is. 53) which their own exegesis admitted to be Messianic, though it did not accept the Christian inferences as to the atoning death of the Messianic king.

That the Jews in the time of Christ believed in a suffering and atoning Messiah is, to say the least, unproved and highly improbable. See, besides the books above cited, De Wette, Opuscula; Wünsche, Die Leiden des Messias (1870). The opposite argument of King, The Yalkut on Zechariah (Cambridge, 1882), App. A, does not really prove more than that the doctrine of the Messiah Ben Joseph found points of attachment in older thought.

10. A Babylonian parallel.

[Among the non-Christian parallels to the belief in a Messiah a Babylonian parallel deserves special attention.[2] It is to be found in the legend of Dibbarra the Plague-god.

'Sea-coast against sea-coast, Elamite against Elamite, Cassite against Cassite, Kuthæan against Kuthæan, country against country, house against house, man against man. Brother is to show no mercy towards brother; they shall kill one another.'

One cannot help comparing Mk. 13 12 Mt. 10 21. The countries mentioned are those nearest to Babylonia, which are to be a prey to war and anarchy until 'after a time the Akkadian will come, overthrow all and conquer all of them.' The triumph of Ḥammurabi, king of Babylon, is foretold in this part of the poem or prophecy. This great king is to open a golden age of peace, and even if a Buddhist parallel to Is. 9 2-6 11 1-9 may also be adduced,[1] it is historically very conceivable that a Babylonian belief may be the real parent both of this and of all other Messianic beliefs within the sphere of Babylonian influence. METHEG-AMMAH (מֶתֶג הָאַמָּה; ΤΗΝ ΑΦΩΡΙϹΜΕΝΗΝ [BAL]; frenum tributi, [Syriac]). Two variously explained words (2 S. 8 1) which AV (cp RVmg.) apparently regards as the name of a place. The whole passage runs in AV, 'And after this it came to pass that David smote the Philistines, and subdued them: and David took Metheg-ammah out of the hand of the Philistines.' RV, however, renders 'Metheg-ammah' by 'the bridle of the mother-city' (so, too, Ges., Stade, Driver), which is supposed to mean 'the authority of the capital' (i.e., of Gath; cp 1 Ch. 18 1, where אֶת־גַּת וּבְנֹתֶיהָ, 'Gath and its towns,' is substituted for את־מתג האמה).[2]

There is no evidence, however, that ammāh, אמה, meant 'capital' in Hebrew, or that one of the five Philistine cities was regarded as the capital, and as having authority over the other four. The text is corrupt, and since 𝔊 (τὴν ἀφωρισμένην = הַמִּגְרָשׁ?) is here evidently based on an incorrect text, and the reading of 1 Ch. has the appearance of being a purely arbitrary emendation, we must set aside Ch. and 𝔊 altogether, and endeavour to restore a text out of which MT and the text which underlies 𝔊 may have been corrupted. In Exp.T, Oct.

[1] [Rhys David's Hib. Lect. 1881, p. 141; Che. Jew. Rel. Life, 101.]
[2] So 𝔊, Vg. Pesh. (+'the small ones that were round about it') has a doublet, the variant being [Syriac] (?).

1899, p. 47 f., it is proposed to emend 2 S. 8 1*b* into 'and he took Ashdod [i.e., Ašdudimmu; see ASHDOD], the city of the sea, out of the hand of the Philistines' (וַיִּקַּח אֶת־אַשְׁדּוֹד מְחוֹז הַיָּם מִיַּד־פְּלִשְׁתִּים). It is possible that the writer of 2 S. 8 1-6 (R_D) had before him a text of 1 S. 7 14, in which the cities taken by the Philistines from the Israelites were described as lying between Ekron and Ashdod (but 𝔊ᴮ ἀπὸ Ἀσκάλωνος ἕως Αζοβ), and that he represented David as having (with foreign assistance?) once more recovered these cities for Israel. The present writer suspects, however, that there has been a great misunderstanding relative to the name of the southern people against which both Saul and David warred, and that the true name was not Pĕlištīm (Philistines) but Ṣārephāthīm (Zarephathites). See SAUL, ZAREPHATH. This theory affects many passages in 1 and 2 S., and among them 1 S. 7 14, where we should perhaps read, 'And the cities which the Zarephathites had taken from Israel were restored from Ḥalūṣah (𝔊ᴮ reads 'Ashkelon') as far as REHOBOTH,'[1] and 2 S. 8 1, where we should not improbably read, '. . . David smote the Zarephathites, and subdued them, and David took the Maacathite region (הַמַּעֲכָתִי) out of the hand of the Zarephathites.' The latter view accords with H. P. Smith's remark that 'Metheg-ammah,' being described as taken 'out of the hand of the Philistines,' must have been 'some tangible possession, probably a piece of territory.'[2] On the district referred to, see MAACAH.

Both of the above emendations enable us to account for MT's מתג האמה and 𝔊's probable reading הַמְגֹרָשׁ. For earlier attempts to deal with the problems see the annotations of Wellhausen, Driver, Klostermann, and Köhler's judicious note (Bibl. Gesch. 2 244 f.). The suggestion of Whitehouse (Acad., Feb. 2, 1890) and Sayce (Early Hist. Hebrews, 414 n.) that אַמָּה is the Babylonian ammatu, 'mainland,' 'earth,' is hardly wanted; Sayce even considers the entire phrase to be a transcription of metek ammati, 'the road of the mainland' (of Palestine). But if this had been adopted as a Hebrew geographical term, would it not have occurred again elsewhere? It is more natural to suppose corruption. מתג and האמה are two corrupt fragments of הַמַּעֲכָתִי.

MEUNIM, RV (AV MEHUNIM, or MEHUNIMS, except in Neh. 7 52), a people, or peoples, of uncertain affinities, if the name is not due to textual errors.

(a) An explanatory note in 1 Ch. 4 39-41 makes this statement. In the time of Hezekiah certain Simeonites made a raid into Gedor (גְּד[וֹ]ר) or rather Gerar (גרר; Ew., Ki., etc., γεραρα), 'as far as the east of the valley' (גיא, 𝔊ᴮᴬ τῆς γαι), and took that 'wide, quiet, undisturbed' land for themselves, destroying the original inhabitants, who were 'of Ham' (מִן־חָם), or rather 'of Jerahmeel ([ירחמאל]; cp HAM, ii.), 'and the Meunim that were found there' (so RV,[3] following Kre, הַמְּעוּנִים; Kt. המעינים; μιναίους [BA]; κιναίους [L]). To understand the words 'for they that dwelt there aforetime,' etc. (v. 40*b*), we must remember that 'Amalekites' is probably only a distortion of 'Jerahmeelites' (see JERAHMEEL, § 4). Between a large part of the Jerahmeelites—i.e., Amalekites—and the Israelites there was a feud (1 S. 15). It now becomes easier to understand the connection of vv. 39-41 with vv. 42 f. Those of the Jerahmeelites that had escaped from the slaughter mentioned in v. 41 were killed by the Simeonites in Mt. Seir. The wide, quiet land spoken of, to the E. of the gai' (i.e., the Wādy Jerūr; see GERAR), is according to Buhl E. of the Wādy Māyin, near the Biyār Māyin, or wells of Māyin, which are two in number, and have a water which is 'sweet as the waters of the Nile' (see Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 345). Possibly, as Buhl suggests,[4] the name Māyin is an echo of the ethnic name Meunim. Cp also Ma'ān, the name of a district E. of Wādy Mūsa, near Petra (cp Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 31-35).

Some would refer in this connection to the Minæans. There is a Minæan inscription in which a district called Miṣran and another district called Ma'in al-Miṣr are mentioned as being under a Minæan governor.[1] According to Wi. this can only refer to the N. Arabian region el-Miṣr and the Minæan colonies in N. Arabia (AOF (1) 29 337). Hommel also builds a theory upon this inscription (AHT 272 ff.).

The criticism of the Hebrew text, however, has not been searching enough. מעונים (Meunim), like מעוננים (MEONENIM) in Judg. 9 37, is a corruption of an indistinctly written עמלקי (Amalekites), which was a gloss on ירחמאלים (Jerahmeelites), now represented by the corrupt אהליהם (quite a common corruption). Thus the Meunim give place to the Amalekites.

(b) In 2 Ch. 26 7 Uzziah is said to have been victorious against the Philistines, the Arabians in Gur-baal [7] (גּוּר־בַּעַל),[2] and the Meunim (הַמְּעוּנִים; μειναίους [B], μιναίους [AL]).[3] But גור־בעל is a corruption of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel), and מעונים is to be explained as in (a).

(c) The third passage is 2 Ch. 20 1*b*, where most commentators now read 'some of the Meunim' (see Ki. in SBOT;[4] MT מֵהָעַמּוֹנִים, RV 'some of the Ammonites,' but cp mg.); the b'ne Moab and the b'ne Ammon are mentioned just before. But the geography of 2 Ch. 20 as it now stands is not that of the original story, which must have spoken of Jehoshaphat's enemies as the b'nē Miṣṣur and the b'nē Jeraḥme'el. עמהם and מהעמנים are both probably corruptions of ירחמאלים (Jerahmeelites). See ZIZ. (Some MSS read מֵהַמְּעוּנִים; 𝔊 has ἐκ τῶν μ[ε]ιναίων [AB], ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν αμμανειμ [L].)

(d) In Job 2 11 ZOPHAR 'the Naamathite' is called in 𝔊 Μ[ε]ιναίων βασιλεύς, and in 11 1 etc., ὁ Μ(ε)ιναῖος, as if מְעוּנִי. Hommel (Exp. T 8 472; AHT 252) follows 𝔊; cp (a), end. See, however, ZOPHAR.

(e) The 'Maon' of Judg. 10 12 is disputed (see MAONITES). Glaser and Hommel[5] insist on identifying 'Maon' with the Minæans. Cp Moore, Judges, 280.

(f) In 1 K. 11 18 Thenius and Stade (Gesch. (1) 1 302) read for 'Midian' 'Maon,' as making the route of Hadad, the young Edomitish prince, more intelligible. The whole section, however, needs the most searching criticism. 'From the city of Midian' (so 𝔊ᴮᴬ; MT 𝔊ᴸ 'from Midian') should be '(some of) the servants of his father,' which is a corrupt repetition from v. 17. So Klo. (see Che. JQR 11 552 [1899], and cp HADAD).

(g) The 'children of [the] Meunim' (מְעוּנִים; AV MEHUNIM) are mentioned among the NETHINIM in the post-exilic list, Ezra 2 50 Neh. 7 52 (in 1 Esd. 5 31 MEANI, RV MAANI). The list being partly at least artificial no great stress can be laid on the name, which is possibly a corrupt form of Jeraḥme'elim. Children of captives (Buhl and others) are scarcely meant, for Nethinim is probably an expansion of Ethanim, 'Ethanites.' See NETHINIM. 𝔊's readings are: Ezra 2 50, μανωεμειν [B], μοουνειμ [A], μοων. The name has been fancifully explained in various ways by the Rabbins (cp Onk., Abarbanel), but is probably (like DI-ZAHAB) a corruption of מִצְרַיִם, Miṣrim—i.e., the N. Arabian land of Muṣri, which is referred to thrice in the list of Edomite kings (vv. 32 37 39). Mehetabel is called 'daughter of Miṣrān (מצרן, corrupted into מטרד), a daughter of Miṣrim' (מצרים), where 'Miṣrim' is simply a variant of Miṣrān. Cp Hommel, AHT 264 n.

MIBHAR (מִבְחָר, § 5; ΜΕΒΑΑΛ [Bℵ], ΜΑΒΑΡ [A], ΜΑΒΑΑΡ [L]), one of David's heroes (1 Ch. 11 38). The name is a corruption of 'of Zobah' (see HAGRI).

MIBSAM (מִבְשָׂם, 'sweet odour'? ΜΑΒΣΑΜ [EL]), perhaps to be explained as 'Basemath' [see 2], or less probably an old error for מרשם, in which case we may (with Hommel) compare marsimani, an Arabian tribe mentioned together with the Tamudi, etc. (Sargon's cylinder, l. 20, KAT(2), 146 277; Sprenger, Geog. MIBZAR (מִבְצָר; ΜΑΖΑΡ [BADEL]), a 'duke' ('allūph*) or 'clan' ('éleph) of Edom (Gen. 36 42 1 Ch. 1 53, ΜΑΒΣΑΡ [A], ΒΑΜΑΗΛ [L]). Eusebius and Jerome (OS(2), 277 63 137 11) speak of a large village called Mabsara (μαβσαρα), which still existed in Gebalene, subject to Petra. Hitzig (on Is. 34 6), however, identified it with Bozrah, which, like Mibzar in Gen. l.c., is mentioned with Teman in Am. 1 12. See BOZRAH.

MICAH (מִיכָה, § 51; short for MICHAIAH [q.v.] or for an ethnic underlying this name; Μ[Ε]ΙΧΑ [BAL]).

1. A contemporary and fellow-worker of Isaiah; his name is prefixed to the sixth of the books of the 'Twelve Prophets'[1] (see below). Of his external circumstances we know nothing, save that he bore the surname 'the Morasthite' (Mic. 1 1 Jer. 26 18; μ[ε]ιχαιας [BAQ], μιχεας [ℵ in Jer.]), from his birth-place MORESHETH-GATH (q.v.). The statement that he prophesied under Jotham, as well as under Ahaz and Hezekiah (1 1), is probably the remark of a later writer—the same who made the chronological insertions in Is. 1 1 and Hos. 1 1, who wished to indicate thereby that Isaiah, Hosea, and Micah were, roughly, contemporary (Nowack). The earliest date at which we know Micah to have prophesied is in the reign of Ahaz; in 1 2 ff. he foretells the destruction of Samaria. Cp CHRONOLOGY (Table V, col. 797 f.). The threat against Jerusalem in 3 12 was, however, according to Jer. 26 18 ff., pronounced in the time of Hezekiah. Micah, or a disciple of Micah, may in fact have sought to preserve the prophecy against Samaria by working it into a prophecy on the kingdom of Judah. That Micah prophesied as late as the reign of Manasseh, cannot be held to have been rendered probable (on Mic. 6 f. see MICAH, BOOK OF, § 4).

2. A man of the hill-country of Ephraim who built a shrine with objects of worship, and hired a Levite to perform the due services. The history of the carrying off of both priest and sacra by the tribe of DAN (q.v.) as related in Judg. 17 f. is supposed to come from two sources, for the analysis of which see JUDGES, BOOK OF, § 12 (מִיכָיְהוּ, 17 1 4, cp MICHAIAH, 6 f.; μειχαιας [B]).

The story is evidently intended to account for the foundation of the sanctuary of Dan, but has suffered greatly from the manipulation of editors.

There is an underlying tradition which perhaps had reference (as a searching criticism renders probable) not to the conquest of a city in the far north but to that of a place which seems to have been prominent in the early Israelitish traditions, viz., Halūṣah,[1] close to which was an important sanctuary called Bethel. One version of the conquest of Halūṣah, according to this theory, is given in Gen. 33 (see SHECHEM); another, in Judg. 17 f. The story begins with a certain Micah, whose name (see MICHAIAH) indicates his Jerahmeelite origin. He lives in the highlands of Mount Jerahmeel ('Ephraim' miswritten for 'Jerahmeel' as in 1 S. 1 1, see RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM). Being probably the head of a clan (cp Judg. 18 22), he had there a sanctuary of his own, and when a young man 'from Zarephath of Jerahmeel' came to Mount Jerahmeel, seeking priestly employment, Micah received him as his priest. (Zarephath was apparently the headquarters of the clan of Moses, known as 'Levites'; see MOSES, § 17). After this we learn that the path of this Jerahmeelite was crossed by a party of Danites, who had been sent to explore the land of Miṣṣur on the N. Arabian border; these Danites forced the young priest to accompany them, to give them divine oracles. They 'came to Halūṣah, and saw the people that dwelt therein . . . in Misrephath (Zarephath) of the Miṣrites (v. 27), etc.' They captured and destroyed the city, which 'was in the valley that belongs to Rehoboth' (v. 28). Then they rebuilt it, and called its name Dan, and set up there Micah's graven image, with the young Levite, who was of the Moses clan, as their first priest. The sanctuary is said to have lasted until the captivity of the ark[2] (vv. 30 f.). See SHILOH; but cp Moore's able and acute attempt to make the best of the received text.

3. b. MERIBBAAL (q.v.); grandson of Jonathan in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 9, ii. β), 1 Ch. 8 34 (μιχια [B]), 9 40. In 2 S. 9 12 his name is written מִיכָא, MICHA. Note that one of his sons is called (1 Ch. 8 35) 'Melech,' which the present writer has explained elsewhere also as a distortion of 'Jerahmeel.'

4. b. Shimei, a Reubenite, 1 Ch. 5 5 (ηχα [B]).

5. b. Uzziel, a Kohathite Levite; 1 Ch. 23 20 (μειχας [B], μι. [L])=24 24 f. (L μιχαιας once in v. 24 and om. in v. 25) where AV has MICHAH.

MICAH (BOOK)

Until recently the book which bears the name of Micah was unaffected by the disintegrating tendency of modern criticism.

1. Early criticism. Ewald was led by the peculiarities of chaps. 4 f., to say that they might conceivably, though by no means necessarily, be the work of a contemporary of Micah. He also proposed a critical view of chaps. 6 f., which is by no means destitute of plausibility, and he held that the comforting promise in 2 12 f. must be an interpolation from the margin. The decision of questions such as these, to which others have to be added, is of considerable importance, not only for our view of the date of Micah (on which [see MICAH i., 1] the late editorial statement in the heading is no authority) and of his character as a prophet, but also for the history of biblical religion. We shall, first of all (§ 2), give an exposition of the state of criticism in 1883, and then (§ 3 f.) mention the points in which, since that date, the criticism of Micah has taken steps in advance.

2. Criticism in 1883. a. Chaps. 1-3 are (apart from 2 12 f.) a well-connected prophecy of judgment. In a majestic exordium Yahwè himself is represented as coming forth in the thunderstorm from his heavenly palace, and descending on the mountains of Palestine, at once as witness against his people, and as the executer of judgment on their sins. Samaria is sentenced to destruction for idolatry; and the blow extends also to Judah, which participates in the same guilt (ch. 1). Whilst Samaria is summarily dismissed, the sin of Judah is analysed at length in chaps. 2 and 3, in which the prophet deals no longer with idolatry, but with the corruption of society, and particularly of its leaders—the grasping aristocracy whose whole energies are concentrated on devouring the poor and depriving them of their little holdings, the unjust judges and priests, the hireling and gluttonous prophets who make war against every one 'that does not put into their mouth' (3 5), but are ever ready with assurances of Yahwè's favour to their patrons, the wealthy and noble sinners that fatten on the flesh of the poor. The prophet speaks with the strongest personal sympathy of the sufferings of the peasantry at the hands of their lords, and contemplates with stern satisfaction the approach of the destroyer who shall carry into exile 'the luxurious sons' of this race of petty tyrants (1 16), and leave them none to stretch the measuring line on a field in the congregation of Yahwè (2 5). The centre of corruption is the capital, grown great on the blood and wrongs of the provincials, the seat of the cruel princes, the corrupt judges and diviners.[1] For their sake, the prophet concludes, Zion shall be ploughed as a field, Jerusalem shall lie in ruins, and the temple hill return to jungle (3 12).

The internal disorders of the realm depicted by Micah are also prominent in Isaiah's prophecies; they were closely connected, not only with the foreign complications due to the approach of the Assyrians, but also with the break-up of the old agrarian system within Israel, and with the rapid and uncompensated aggrandisement of the nobles during those prosperous years when the conquest of Edom by Amaziah and the occupation of the port of Elath by his son (2 Kings 14 7 22) placed the lucrative trade between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea in the hands of the rulers of Judah. On the other hand the democratic tone which distinguishes Micah from Isaiah is explained by the fact that Micah's home was not in the capital but in an insignificant country town.[2] He can contemplate without a shudder the ruin of the capital of the aristocracy because he is himself one of the oppressed people. Nor does this ruin seem to him to involve the captivity or ruin of the nation as a whole; the congregation of Yahwè remains in Judæa when the oppressors are cast out (2 5); Yahwè's words are still good to those that walk uprightly; the 'glory of Israel' is driven to take refuge in Adullam (1 15),[3] as in the days when David's band of broken men was the true hope of the nation; but there is no hint that it is banished from the land. Thus upon the prophecy of judgment we naturally expect to follow a prophecy of the reintegration of Yahwè's kingship in a better Israel, and this we find in 2 12 f. and in chaps. 4 f.

b. Both 2 12 f. and 4 f., however, present difficulties, and Kuenen (Ond.[(1)], 2 350) remarks on the great differences of critical opinion. 2 12 f. seems to break the pointed contrast between 2 11 and 3 1 and is therefore regarded by some as a gloss, by others (e.g., Ewald and Roorda), less plausibly, as an example of the false prophecies in which the wicked rulers trusted. 4 f. is of course much more difficult. It is becoming more and more felt[4] that 4 11-13 stands in direct contradiction to 4 9 f., and indeed to 3 12.

The last two passages agree in speaking of the capture of Jerusalem; the first declares Zion inviolable, and its capture an impossible profanation. Such a thought can hardly be Micah's, even if we resort to the violent harmonistic procedure of imagining that two quite distinct sieges, separated by a renewal of the theocracy, are spoken of in consecutive verses. An interpolation, however, in the spirit of such passages as Ezek. 38 f., Joel 3 [4], Zech. 14, is very conceivable in post-exilic times, and in connection with the growing impulse to seek a literal harmony of all prophecy on lines very different from the pre-exilic view in Jer. 26, that predictions of evil may be averted by repentance.

Another difficulty lies in the words 'and thou shalt come to Babylon' in 4 10. Micah unquestionably looked for the destruction of Jerusalem as well as of Samaria in the near future and by the Assyrians (1 9); but, according to Jer. 26 17 f., this was the judgment which Hezekiah's repentance averted. It is easy to see that the words in Mic. 4 10 are a later gloss.[1] The prophetic thought is that the 'daughter (population) of Zion' shall not be saved by her present rulers or defensive strength; she must come down from her bulwarks and dwell in the open field; there, not within her proud ramparts, Yahwè will grant deliverance from her enemies.[2] This thought is in precise harmony with chs. 1-3, and equally characteristic is what follows in ch. 5. Micah's opposition to present tyranny expresses itself in recurrence to the old popular ideal of the first simple Davidic kingdom (4 8), to which he has already alluded in 1 15. These old days shall return once more. Again, guerilla bands[3] (בת־גרוד) gather to meet the foe as they did in the time of Philistine oppression. A new David, like him whose exploits in the district of Micah's home were still in the mouths of the common people, goes forth from Bethlehem to feed the flock in the strength of Yahwè. The kindred Hebrew nations are once more united to their brethren of Israel. The remnant of Jacob springs up in fresh vigour, inspiring terror among the surrounding peoples, and there is no lack of chosen captains ('seven shepherds and eight princes,' 5 5) to lead them to victory against the Assyrian foe. The supports of that oppressive kingship which began with Solomon, the strongholds, the chariots and horses so foreign to the life of ancient Israel, are no more known; they disappear together with the divinations, the idols, the maṣṣēbās and ashērās. The high places, however, are left untouched.[4]

c. Chap. 4 1-4. Some difficult problems are suggested by Mic. 4 1-4, which (excepting v. 4) occurs in a slightly modified form in Is. 2 2-4 (cp ISAIAH ii., § 5). The words have little connection with the context in Isaiah; but whether we can safely ascribe them to Micah is uncertain.

The ideas do not reappear in chap. 5, and the whole prophecy would perhaps be more consecutive and homogeneous if 4 6 (where the dispersed and the suffering are, according to chap. 2, the victims of domestic not of foreign oppression) followed directly on 3 12. At the same time we can hardly say that the passage belongs to a later stage of prophetic thought than the eighth century B.C.[5]

d. Chap. 6 1-7 6. That chaps. 1-5 form a single well-connected Book of Micah, can be held (WRS, Proph. 427). No sooner, however, do we get into chap. 6, than new phenomena present themselves. Yahwè appears to plead with his people for their sins; but the sinners are no longer a careless and oppressive aristocracy buoyed up by deceptive assurances of Yahwè's help, by prophecies of wine and strong drink; they are bowed down by a religion of terror, wearied with attempts to propitiate an angry God by countless offerings, and even by the sacrifice of the first-born. Meantime the substance of true religion is forgotten; fraud and deceit reign in all classes, the 'works of the house of Ahab'[6] are 'observed' (worship of foreign gods). Yahwè's judgments are multiplied against the land, and the issue can be nothing else than its total desolation. All these marks fit exactly the evil times of Manasseh as described in 2 K. 21. Chap. 7 1-6, in which the public and private corruption of a hopeless age is bitterly bewailed, obviously belongs to the same context. Micah may very well have lived into Manasseh's reign; but, without appealing to the title, we can see clearly that the style differs from that of the earlier part of the book. It is therefore prudent to regard the prophecy as anonymous. So far at least we may go with Ewald.

e. Chap. 7 7-20. With 7 6, as Wellhausen justly remarks, the record breaks off abruptly; vv. 7-20 represent Zion as already fallen before the heathen, and her inhabitants as pining in the darkness of captivity. The hope of Zion is in future restoration after she has patiently borne the chastisement of her sins. Then Yahwè shall arise mindful of his oath to the fathers, Israel shall be forgiven and restored, and the heathen humbled. The faith and hope which breathe in this passage have the closest affinities with the book of Lamentations and Is. 40-66. W. R. S. —T. K. C.

3. Later criticism. In revising the above conclusions the writer would probably have made larger concessions to the criticism of Wellhausen, whose edition of the Minor Prophets supplements (so far as Micah is concerned) his remarks in Bleek's Einl.(4) (1878), pp. 425 f. Stade, too, would perhaps have received fuller justice. For though we painfully miss the detailed introduction to Micah, with which some critical scholar, not tied to the Massoretic text, must one day present us, it would seem that Stade's pioneering work is the most important and influential which has yet been done on this part of the prophetic literature.

There are still no doubt representatives of a mediating and even a conservative criticism.

König, for instance, thinks it enough (Einl. 328) in reply to Stade's remark that Mic. 4 f. refers, not to some definite nation or nations, but vaguely to 'many peoples' to appeal to Is. 8 9 29 7 Jer. 3 17. On these passages, however, a keener criticism has much to say which König overlooks. In 4 10 he recognises no doubt an insertion, but somewhat strangely assigns it to the last years before the exile. On chs. 6 f. he agrees with Ewald.

Driver (Intr. (6), 328) is even more cautious. He thinks that the existing book of Micah is 'a collection of excerpts, in some cases fragmentary excerpts, from the entire series of the prophet's discourses,' and though he admits that there is much probability in Ewald's date for 6 1-7 6, he thinks, in accordance with Wellhausen,[1] that this does not quite exclude the authorship of Micah.

Ryssel is entirely, and Wildeboer and Elhorst are predominantly, conservative. The theory of Elhorst is ingeniously novel. He accounts for the present arrangement or rather disarrangement of Micah by an elaborate theory respecting the transcribers, who may have had before them the prophecies written in columns, and may partly have misunderstood, partly have economised space, and have thrown the whole book into confusion. That 4 9-14 [5 1] and 5 8 [9] are post-exilic, even Elhorst frankly admits. Kuenen, the greatest of Dutch critics, agrees with Ewald as to 6 1-7 6; 7 7-20 he holds to be probably exilic, and 2 12 f. to be an exilic interpolation. So too the passages 4 6-8 11-13 and 5 9-14 in their present form are held to be exilic and post-exilic; but 4 1-4 Kuenen regards as pre-exilic, though not the work either of Micah or of Isaiah.

We now pass to the consideration of the doubtful passages in Micah from the point of view indicated in the article ISAIAH (ii.).

4. Present position of criticism. To draw out in full the argument from phraseology and ideas would be a remunerative but too lengthy task; it may, however, be hoped that the intrinsic probability of the results here given will commend them to readers. Kosters has treated of the phraseology of 6 1-8 9-16 7 1-6 7-20 in Th.T 27 269 f. 272 f. Such arguments, however, will in future have to take more account of probable corruptions of the Hebrew text, some of which will be here indicated.

(a) Our first pause is at 1 10-15, which, from its artificial paronomasias (see JQR 10 573-588), seems hardly more worthy of Micah than Is. 10 28-32 is worthy of Isaiah. It is plausible to refer the passage, not indeed to the time of Sennacherib,[1] but to an editor or supplementer, of literary rather than prophetic gifts, in the post-exilic period, when the outrages of the Edomites were still fresh in remembrance.[2]

(b) 2 5 10. These passages do not fit into the context, and probably come from some other writing (Ruben). So, too, Nowack, as to v. 5.

(c) 2 12 f. This passage presupposes the Exile and the Dispersion, and presents phraseological resemblances to exilic and post-exilic works.[3] Presumably this passage has been substituted for one which was either too strongly expressed to please the late editor, or had become illegible.

(d) 3 2*b* 3*b*. Superfluous and unimportant. See Nowack.

(e) It is hardly possible that the original collection of Micah's prophecies closed with the short prophecy of the desolation of Jerusalem in 3 12, and the question arises whether fragments of the true conclusion of Micah may not be imbedded in chaps. 4 f. which in their present form are clearly not the work of Micah, or indeed of any single writer. Opinions on this point are divided. Nowack thinks that 4 9 10*a* 14 [5 1] and 5 9-13 may belong to Micah, though more parallels in writings of the age of that prophet would certainly be desirable. 4 1-4 and 5; 4 6-8 (cp 2 12 f.), 5 2-6 [1-5] (not homogeneous); 5 7-9 [6-8] and 14 [15] are all post-exilic insertions; possibly 5 2 4 were originally connected with 4 6-8. To the present writer, however, these results of Nowack appear to lack a sufficiently firm text-critical basis.

In the study of Micah, as elsewhere, the next step forward will have to be taken by critics who are not afraid to attempt the correction of the traditional text. Volz has already suggested that 5 9-14 [10-15] in its original form may have described how Yahwè's anger against the disobedient people of Judah showed itself in the destruction of the civil and religious institutions (cp Hos. 3 4) which had assumed a form displeasing to him, and that it is the natural sequel of 4 9-10*a* 14 [5 1]. This suggestion appears to be right; only the connected passage should be said to begin at 4 8, and does not include v. 14 (revised text), and we cannot safely say that any part of it is the genuine work of Micah. It is quite true that Micah may conceivably have spoken of a siege of Jerusalem; but the description in 4 8-10*a* 5 9-14 [10-15] may be post-exilic, even as the text now stands, and must be so, if it is, as we think, corrupt in certain important points (on v. 8 see OPHEL). On an improved textual basis we can affirm with much probability that some post-exilic writer, looking back on the Babylonian invasion, described in the style of prediction, how the N. Arabian peoples (whose outrages impressed most of the Jews much more than those of the Chaldæans[4]) came against Jerusalem, and carried away some of its inhabitants as captives, and how the civil and religious system of Judah, which was permeated with falsehood, was destroyed. From what context this passage was taken, we know not. The editor who placed it in the book of Micah appears to have sought to correct the severity of its tone. This he did by so transforming 5 9-14 [10-15] as to make it a prophecy of religious regeneration and also of judgment on heathen nations, and further, by inserting 4 10*b*-14, and 5 4 f. [3 f.], which tell how the Jews, while on Jerahmeelite soil, will be delivered, and how the Ishmaelite plunderers will suffer a crushing blow at Zarephath.[5] Henceforth, whenever a raid is attempted by Ishmaelites, there will be no lack of leaders to retaliate on the invaders.

1 Wellhausen, however, feels a difficulty in assigning to Micah the expressions מבית עברים פריתיך (v. 4) and צדקות יהוה (v. 5).

1 Cp Smend, Rel.-gesch.(2), 237, n. 2, end; G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, 1 362.

2 Read probably in 1 15*b*, 'unto Jerahmeel (not, unto Adullam) shall the glory of Israel come.' Cp 4 10, where read, for 'thou shalt go unto Babylon,' 'thou shalt go unto Jerahmeel.'

3 On the exegesis, cp Driver (Expositor, 1887 b, 263-269), who takes the king to be the Messiah. The parallelism, however, favours another view (the king = Yahwè; cp Is. 52 12 Jer. 31 8 ff.). So Nowack.

4 Note in this connection that Jer. 50 f., commonly regarded as a prophecy against Babylon, may possibly refer in part to Jerahmeel (see LEB-KAMAI, MERATHAIM, SHESHACH).

5 'At Zarephath' (בצרפת) has become in the traditional text בַּשֵּׁבֶט; similar corruptions of צרפת probably occur in the Psalter. See Crit. Bib.

Another writer, devoted to the Messianic hope, inserted (5 1 3 [2 4]) a prediction of the Messiah, who was to come from Beth-ephrath, i.e., Bethlehem (see EPHRATH, 2); 5 2 [3] is evidently a later gloss, affirming that the depression of Israel will last only till the birth of the Messiah. Still another writer, to whom the kingship of Yahwè was hope and comfort enough, seems to have produced 2 12 f. and 4 6 f., with the object of mitigating chaps. 1 f. and 3 respectively, and also 5 6-8 [7-9] in explanation of the somewhat obscure prophecy in 5 4 f. [5 f.].[1] That 4 1-4 and 5 is of post-exilic origin, may here be assumed; v. 5, however, is later than vv. 1-4 (see Nowack).

(f) 6 1-8 9-16, and 7 1-6 are generally grouped together, and are by some assigned (together with 7 7-20) to the time of Manasseh; the complaints in 6 9 ff. and 7 1 ff. of far-reaching moral corruption, and of the disappearance of 'godly men' (7 2), the reference to the 'statutes of Omri' and 'all the works of the house of Ahab' (6 16), and to the practice of the sacrifice of the firstborn (6 7) have been held to point to this date; but the passages ought not to be grouped together.

1. 6 1-8 is in the optimistic, rhetorical tone of Deuteronomy (cp Dt. 4 26 5 29 10 12 f.), and may fitly be grouped with Ps. 81 8-16 [9-17], and perhaps 50 7-15, and Is. 43 22-28. It is a literary rather than, in the full sense of the word, a prophetic work, and certainly not pre-exilic. The special reference to the Zarephathites and the Jerahmeelites (=the Philistines and the Amalekites) which most probably occurs in 6 4[2] favours this view. The passage must surely be incomplete, and we may well suppose that it originally closed with a prophecy of the renewed expulsion of the Jerahmeelites from Canaan such as we can trace with virtual certainty underneath the text of Ps. 81 17 [16],—

From those of Jerahmeel would I rescue him,
From Miṣṣur and Zarephath would I deliver him.

The reference to the most awful form of sacrifice in 6 7 seems to be as purely rhetorical as that to 'rivers of oil.' The writer may have gone on to say that Yahwè took no pleasure in any sacrifice but that of obedience, and that if that had only been rendered, Yahwè would have delivered his people from the Arabians.

2. 6 9-16 is not stronger in its complaints of the prevalence of fraud than many of the psalms. The obscure phrases in v. 16, supposed to require a pre-exilic date, because they contain the names of Omri and Ahab, are better regarded as corrupt; עָמְרִי should be אֲרַמִּים, and אחאב should be ירחמאל. The psalmists speak of a faction of wicked lawless Jews, who acted in concert with the Edomite oppressors.

3. 7 1-6 reminds us of Pss. 12 14 58 Is. 56 11-57 1 59 1-15*a*. Cp Intr. Is. 317 ff. Verse 5*b* may perhaps suggest the existence of mixed marriages (cp Ezra 9 f.).

(g) 7 7-20—We have seen already (§ 2, end) that 7 7-20 has distinctly post-exilic affinities. The 'enemy' spoken of in vv. 8 10 is not Babylon, for there is no evidence that the Jews are now in Babylon. Nor is it the heathen world in general (Giesebrecht, Beitr. 149; Wellh. Kl. Pr.(2), 149); this view depends on the accuracy of MT. The 'enemy' is a personification of the people which, in the psalms, gives such trouble to pious Israel by the mocking question, 'Where is thy God' (Ps. 42 3 10 79 10)—i.e., the people of N. Arabia: the Jerahmeelites or Edomites (see PSALMS, § 28).

In v. 12 we should probably read, 'In that day those that are left of thee (נִשְׁאָרַיִךְ) shall come from Ishmael and the cities of Miṣṣur to the river (Euphrates)'—i.e., the Jews who are in N. Arabia and by the Euphrates shall hasten to the common centre, Jerusalem. And in v. 14 Yahwè's flock (Israel) is probably said, in the true text, to dwell not 'in the forest in the midst of Carmel,'[3] but 'in Arabia, in the midst of Jerahmeel.' The passage reminds us of Lam. 5 where in v. 5, according to the most probable readings, the Miṣrites and the Ishmaelites (i.e., the N. Arabians) are represented as the oppressors of the Jews (see LAMENTATIONS, § 7; and cp PSALMS). It now becomes impossible to think of the years following the captivity of Tiglath-pileser for the composition of the passage (GASm. 373); Bashan and Gilead are referred to on account of their fertility (cp Ezek. 34 14), and as representing parts of Palestine into which the Jewish race and its religion had not yet, in early post-exilic times, penetrated.[1]

Our result is that in no part of chaps. 4-7 can we venture to detect the hand of Micah. What the real Micah was, must be learned from chaps. 1-3, which are mostly genuine. The inserted and appended passages are, however, of the utmost value for the later period of Jewish religion, though the text needs careful examination.

MICAIAH (מִיכָיָה), 2 K. 22 12 etc. See MICHAIAH. For 2 Ch. 13 2 see MAACAH ii., 3.

MICHA, RV MICA (מִיכָא, abbrev. from מִיכָיָהוּ, see MICHAIAH; μ[ε]ιχα [BℵAL]).

1. Son of Mephibosheth (2 S. 9 12). See MICAH, 3.

2. A Levite signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7), Neh. 10 11 [12] (om. Bℵ*).

3. A Levite in list of inhabitants of Jerusalem (EZRA ii., § 5 [b], § 15 [1] a), 1 Ch. 9 15 Neh. 11 17 (μαχα [Bℵ])=1 Ch. 9 15, cp Neh. 11 22 (αμειχα [ℵ*]). See MICHAIAH (6).

4. RV MICAH, father of Ozias, Judith 6 15 (χειμα [A]).

MICHAEL (מִיכָאֵל; μ[ε]ιχαηλ [BAFL]).

The name occurs frequently, but only in post-exilic writings. If it was always pronounced Mī-chā-ēl, it was doubtless taken to mean 'Who is like El' (cp Dt. 33 26, and see §§ 24, 38); to the author of Daniel's visions it must have meant this. We must not, however, suppose that either this writer, or P, or the Chronicler, or any other post-exilic writer, coined the word as an expression of monotheistic faith. All that late writers did was gently to manipulate an ancient ethnic name so as to suggest the uniqueness of their God (see MICHAIAH).

On the history of the name 'Michael' see Crit. Bib., where it is explained as a popular corruption of Jeraḥmeel.

1. An Asherite, father of SETHUR [q.v.] (Nu. 13 13). Other Asherite names corrupted from Jerahmeel occur in 1 Ch. 7 30-39, including Ahi, Imrah, Arah, Hanniel, and especially MALCHIEL.

2, 3. Two Gadites (1 Ch. 5 13, μαχαηλ [L], 14). On v. 14 see Crit. Bib.

4. A name in the genealogy of Asaph (1 Ch. 6 40 [25]). Note in same verse 'Malchiah,' which is also no doubt based on a corruption of Jerahmeel.

5. b. Izrahiah, of Issachar (1 Ch. 7 3). In the same genealogy note the names Rephaiah and Jeriel, also distortions of Jerahmeel.

6. b. Beriah in a genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch. 8 12 ff.), which contains other distortions of Jerahmeel, such as Jeremoth and Jeroham. Cp BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. β.

7. A Manassite, one of David's warriors (1 Ch. 12 20). Note in same verse the Manassite name 'Elihu,' another distortion of Jerahmeel (see JOB [BOOK], § 9). Cp DAVID, § 11 a, iii.

8. An Issacharite, father of OMRI [4] (1 Ch. 27 18 μεισαηλ [B]). The forms μεισαηλ, μισαηλ, if correct, presuppose the reading 'Mishael.' Michael, however, is probably correct; a variant (in the same verse) is Jeḥiel. Both Michael and Jeḥiel come from Jeraḥmeel; MISHAEL (q.v.) has a different origin.

[1] Note שְׁאֵרִית in all these passages, and cp Giesebrecht, Beiträge, 42.

[2] 'I sent before you Moses, Aaron, and Miriam' (6 4) is very strange, and still more unexpected is 'from Shittim unto Gilgal' (6 5). Probably את־משה אהרן ומרים and מן השטים עד הגלגל are both corruptions of צרפתים וירחמאלים or פלשתים ועמלקים, and ואשלח comes by transposition from אחלש. 6 4 should therefore run thus,—'For I brought thee up out of the land of Miṣrim, and redeemed thee out of the house (territory) of the Arabians, and I defeated before thee the Zarephathites and the Jerahmeelites' (=the Philistines and the Amalekites). For very improbable explanations of the text, see Nowack's note.

[3] G. A. Smith (437) omits יער בתוך כרמל in his translation, but in the note suggests 'dwelling alone like a bit of jungle in the midst of cultivated land.' Yet if Bashan and Gilead are proper names must not יער and כרמל be so too?

[1] Cp Wellh. IJG(1) 163. The view there taken of passages in Pss. 68 and 87 is, however, open to question on text-critical grounds.

9. A son of king Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 21 2, μ[ε]ισαηλ [BA]). Observe that Jehoshaphat's wife probably came from the Negeb (see SHILHI).

10. Father of Zebadiah, of the sons of SHEPHATIAH (q.v.) in Ezra's caravan, Ezra 8 8 (μαχαηλ [A])=1 Esd. 8 34 (μ[ε]ιχαηλος [B, om. A]). See EZRA i., § 2, 2 15 (i.) d.

11. Michael, one of the 'chief princes' (הַשָּׂרִים הָרִאשֹׁנִים, Dan. 10 13), or 'the great prince' (ib. 12 1, הַשַּׂר הַגָּדוֹל; 𝔊 ὁ ἄγγελος ὁ μέγας, 'the great angel'), the name given to the guardian angel of Israel (cp Dan. 10 21, 'your prince,' and 12 1, 'Michael . . . stands for [supports] those belonging to thy people'; cp Enoch 20 5). In this character he is referred to as opposed to the prince-angels of Persia and Greece (Dan. 10 13 20). Possibly he is referred to in Mal. 3 1, 'Behold, I send mine angel, and he shall prepare the way before me,' and Bar. 6 7 (Ep. of Jer.), 'for mine angel is with you' (i.e., with Israel).

Probably enough the later meaning of Michael was the most influential reason for the name given to this archangel. However, another reason may also have had weight—viz., that (if the present writer's theory of Is. 29 1 Mic. 4 8 [see LO-RUHAMAH, OPHEL, and cp Crit. Bib.] be accepted) an early name of Jerusalem, known to Isaiah, was 'Jerahmeel.' When, through Babylonian and Persian influence,[1] names were given to the angels, it was natural that the four greatest should receive names representing the name Jerahmeel, which had once been borne by Jerusalem and which was still dear to an important section of the Jerusalem community (see PEREZ, ad fin.). It is a remarkable proof of the unwillingness of the psalmists to encourage innovations that, just as there is no Satan in the Psalter, so there is no trace of any angelic name, though the idea (also late) of patron angels of nations is not wanting (see ANGELS, § 4, with note).

It will be noticed that the name of the opponent of Michael is not given in Daniel's vision (Dan. 10 13 12 1). In Rev. 12, however (a chapter of non-Christian origin, see APOCALYPSE, § 41), Michael and his angels are introduced fighting on behalf of the heavenly ones against 'the great dragon, the old serpent, who is called διάβολος and ὁ σατανᾶς' (v. 9). In the Babylonian myth the heavenly representative was the light god Marduk, and in the Book of Job and elsewhere Israel's God Yahwè takes Marduk's place (see BEHEMOTH, DRAGON). The transcendency of the divine nature, however, seemed to the writer of Daniel's visions to require that Yahwè should be represented by his archangel.

In Jewish theosophy Michael, who is sometimes designated אפוטרופס, ἐπίτροπος, plays an important part. He is the chief and greatest of the four great angels;[2] he stands at the right hand of the Almighty (Midr. Rab., Nu. 23 1), and is frequently opposed to Sammael, the enemy of God. Tradition connected him with many incidents in the history of Moses and especially with his burial (cp Targ., Jon. on Dt. 34 6, Midr. Rab. 11); and the altercation between this archangel and the devil, who claimed Moses' body, on the ground that he had murdered the Egyptian (Ex. 2 12), related in the Assumptio Mosis, chap. 14 (cp APOCALYPTIC, § 59), is alluded to in Jude 9.[3] According to Kohut (Jüd. Angel. 24) Michael is parallel to Vohumanô, 'Ahura's first masterpiece,' one of the Zoroastrian Amesha-spentas or archangels.

See, further, Lüken, Erzengel Michael (1898). T. K. C.

MICHAH (מִיכָה), 1 Ch. 24 24 f. AV, RV MICAH (q.v., 5).

MICHAIAH, RV MICAIAH (מִיכָיָה nos. 2, 6 f., מִיכָיָהוּ nos. 4 f., and abnormally מִיכָיְהוּ nos. 1, 3, cp MICAH, 2; μ[ε]ιχαιας [BℵAQ]). The name has a strange history. Like REPHAIAH [q.v.] it is properly one of the many popular corruptions of the tribal or ethnic name Jerahmeel (see MICAH, MICHA). Later writers, however, attached ו to it as the final letter in order to suggest the idea of the peerlessness of Yahwè (see MICHAEL); it is very probable, too, that some of those who used the name Michaiah (without a final -u) were reminded by it of the uniqueness of their God. Thus viewed, it resembles (as Schrader long ago pointed out)[1] the Assyrian name Mannu-ki-ilu-rabu ('Who is like the great God?'), to which Mannu-ki-Rammān (Adad), 'Who is like Adad,' may be added. The form מיכיהו, wherever it is used with reference to pre-exilic times, is probably incorrect—i.e., the final ו is due to an editor. It is worth noticing that the name of the 'man of Mt. Ephraim' in Judg. 17 is called מִיכָיְהוּ (Micaiehu) only in vv. 1 4; elsewhere he is called Micah; also that מִיכָיְהוּ, Micaiahu, only occurs twice—in the late Book of Chronicles (2 Ch. 13 2 17 7)—and that in one of these passages (2 Ch. 13 2) it corresponds to the מַעֲכָה (Maachah) of 1 K. 15 2 2 Ch. 11 20 ff. Now מַעֲכָה is probably the original of Micah and of Micaiah; and Micaiahu or Micaiehu (?) is a pious Jew's expansion of Micaiah. 'MAACAH' itself is probably a corruption of 'Jerahme'el.' For a good statement of the ordinary view it is enough to refer to Gray, HPN 157.

1. b. Imlah, a prophet who was consulted by Jehoshaphat with regard to the projected battle against the Syrians at Ramoth-Gilead, and for his unfavourable answer was imprisoned (1 K. 22 8-28 2 Ch. 18 7-27, ib. v. 8 מִיכָהוּ, Kt.). The interpolation of words from the opening of the Book of Micah in 1 K. 22 28*b* (BL om.), 2 Ch. 18 27, indicates that he was sometimes confounded with Micah the Morasthite (see MICAH, 1). The name was of course common. To prevent any doubts as to the origin of Jehoshaphat's contemporary, he is called ben Imlah; now Imlah may be very plausibly regarded as a corruption of Jerahmeel (ימלה from ירחמאל).

2. Father of ACHBOR (q.v.), 2 K. 22 12; in 2 Ch. 34 20 מִיכָה—i.e., MICAH (𝔊BA, however, μ[ε]ιχαια). His son's name Achbor, like his own, and like that of Ahikam, is a corruption of Jerahmeel. Cp PEREZ, ad fin.

3. b. Gemariah, who was present when Baruch read the roll of Jeremiah (Jer. 36 11-13). He too was probably a Jerahmeelite. 'Gemariah' has, like Gemalli and Gamaliel, probably grown out of Jerahmeel.

4. One of Jehoshaphat's commissioners for teaching the law (2 Ch. 17 7). The leader of the band is Ben-hail (from Ben-Jerahme'el). This Micaiah, too, was evidently a Jerahmeelite.

5. 2 Ch. 13 2. See MAACAH, 3 f.

6. b. Zaccur, a name in an Asaphite genealogy (Neh. 12 35). See MICHA, 3.

7. A priest in the procession at the dedication of the wall (see EZRA, ii., § 13*g*), Neh. 12 41 (Bℵ*A om.). Among his companions are Malchijah and Elam, both corruptions of Jerahmeel.

The remark made at the end of the article REPHAIAH (q.v.) seems to be fully justified. T. K. C.

MICHAL (מִיכַל, § 74 a, 'power'? or, like Abihail [see below] a corruption of Jerahme'el; 𝔊 μελχολ; μολχολ 1 S. 19 17 [A once], μελχορλ 1 Ch. 15 29 [ℵ]—i.e., מלכאל [cp Pesh.]=ירחמאל), younger daughter of Saul, if the statement in 1 S. 14 49 is correct (see MERAB), and wife of David. How she loved the youthful David and became his wife without purchase-money (mōhar), as Saul's recognition of his prowess (1 S. 18 20 ff.; see below); how by craft she saved his life (1 S. 19 11 ff.); how for a time David and Michal were parted (1 S. 25 44);[2] how at a later time David demanded her from Abner or Ishbosheth, and Palti, her husband, had to send her back (2 S. 3 13-16); how she mocked David for taking part in a sacred dance (2 S. 6 16 20-23),

[1] In Jer. Rōsh haššanah, 56 a, Ber. rabba, 48, it is said that the names of the months and of the angels came from Babylon.

[2] Michael, Gabriel, Uriel, and Suriel (cp ZURIEL) or Raphael.

[3] The words with which Michael repels the devil ἐπιτιμήσαι σοι κύριος, are taken obviously from Zech. 3 2; cp 𝔊.

[1] Die Ass.-Bab. Keilinschriften, 147 (1872).

[2] The statement in 1 S. 25 44, even if unhistorical, is valuable archæologically. It may be illustrated by a severe law of ancient Egypt, referred to by Grenfell and Hunt (Oxyrhynchus Papyri, ii.), which permitted a father to take away his married daughter from a husband who displeased him. This law was set aside as inhuman by Roman prefects.

was well known to the later tradition (see DAVID, SAUL). It is not difficult, however, to see that, from the romantic and idealistic tendency inherent in popular tradition, the marriage of David with Saul's daughter has been placed too early. It was only at Hebron that Michal became David's wife, and the marriage had the purely political object of uniting the tribes of Israel and the clans of Judah.[1] It was also only at Hebron that Michal bore David a child—viz., Ithream (2 S. 3 5), whose mother's name in 2 S. is corruptly given as Eglah. This ITHREAM (q.v.) seems to be the Jerimoth of 2 Ch. 11 18, where his mother's name is given as Abihail (read 'Abihail, daughter of Saul'). The existence of this son of Michal, however, was apparently unknown to the writer of 2 S. 6 23,[2] where it is stated that 'Michal, bath Šaul, had no child unto the day of her death.' Later generations seem to have been surprised not to hear of children of David by Michal, who (if 'Eglah' is, like 'Michal,' a corruption of Abigail = Abihail) must have taken precedence of all David's other wives ('David's wife' is her description in 2 S. 3 5). An occasion for David's supposed dislike of Michal was therefore invented. In the unpleasing story in 2 S. 6 16 20-23 David takes up the same attitude of a defender of an ancient but (to some) offensive religious custom as is taken by Samuel in 1 S. 15. On Michal's true name see further SAUL, § 6; on her 'five sons' (2 S. 21 8), see MERAB; and on the name of her second husband, see MERAB, PHALTI.

The lateness of the story in 1 S. 18 25-27 is generally thought to be proved by its reference to the ערלות of the Philistines. This however, presupposes the correctness of MT. It has (one may hope) been shown elsewhere that in no less than three passages ערל has been miswritten for ירחמאלים, and that in 1 S. 18 25, omitting a gloss and a dittogram, the speech of Saul should run, 'The king desires not any purchase-money, but to be avenged on the Jerahmeelites.' The story is nevertheless late. Winckler (GI 2 179 200) agrees, so far as the lateness of the story is concerned. He also agrees that Michal was not connected with David till after the death of Ishbaal, when, to avoid the danger of pretenders to the crown, he obtained possession of Saul's daughter Michal and his grandson Meribbaal (MEPHIBOSHETH). MICHEAS (Micheæ), 4 Esd. 1 39. See MICAH, 1.

MICHMASH, Michmas in Ezra 2 27 = Neh. 7 31 = 1 Esd. 5 21 MACALON (מִכְמָשׁ, מִכְמָס, μαχ(ε)μας [BℵAL]; in 1 Esd. 5 21 [εκ]μακαλων [BA], μακμας [L]), the scene of one of the most striking episodes in OT history (1 S. 14, see SAUL, § 2), was a place in Benjamin, about 9 R. m. N. of Jerusalem (OS 280 47 140 5).

1. References and situation.

Though it did not rank as a city (Josh. 18 21 f.), Michmash was recolonised after the exile (Neh. 11 31; μαχαμας [Bℵ*A]), and, favoured by the possession of excellent wheat land (Mishna, Men. 8 1), was still a very large village (Μαχμας) in the time of Eusebius. The modern Muḫmās is quite a small place.[3] [Conder found large stones, a vaulted cistern, and several rough rock tombs.]

The historical interest of Michmash is connected with the strategical importance of the position, commanding the N. side of the Pass of Michmash, which made it the headquarters of the Philistines and the centre of their forays in their attempt to quell the first rising under Saul, as it was also at a later date the headquarters of Jonathan the Hasmonæan (1 Macc. 9 73; μαχμαις [Vª]). From Jerusalem to Mount Ephraim there are two main routes. The present caravan road keeps the high ground to the W. near the watershed, and avoids the Pass of Michmash altogether. Another route, however, the importance of which in antiquity may be judged of from Is. 10 28 f. (μαχμα [ℵ*]), led southwards from Ai over an undulating plateau to Michmash. Thus far the road is easy; but at Michmash it descends into a very steep and rough valley, which has to be crossed before reascending to Geba.[1] At the bottom of the valley is the Pass of Michmash, a noble gorge with precipitous craggy sides; (on the difficulty of 'Bozez' and 'Seneh' in 1 S. 14 4 see § 2). On the N. the crag is crowned by a sort of plateau sloping backwards into a round-topped hill. This little plateau about a mile E. of the present village of Muḫmās, seems to have been the post of the Philistines, lying close to the centre of the insurrection, yet possessing unusually good communication with their establishments on Mount Ephraim by way of Ai and Bethel, and at the same time commanding the routes leading down to the Jordan from Ai and from Michmash itself.

A geographical and textual study of 1 S. 14 4-16, in continuation of SAUL, § 2, will not be unfruitful.

2. On 1 S. 14 4-16.

Geographically we are much indebted to Conder. He points out the accuracy of the passage in which Josephus describes the camp of the Philistines. It was, Josephus says, 'upon a precipice with three peaks ending in a small but sharp and long extremity, whilst there was a rock that surrounded them, like bulwarks to prevent the attack of an enemy' (Ant. vi. 6 2). Such a site actually 'exists on the E. of Michmash—a high hill bounded by the precipices of Wādy Suweinīt on the S., rising in three flat but narrow mounds, and communicating with the hill of Muḫmās, which is much lower, by a long and narrow ridge, the southern slope of which is immensely steep.' Towards Jeba' (Geba), therefore, an almost impregnable front is presented; but the communication in the rear is extremely easy; the valley here is shallow, with sloping hills, and a 'fine road, affording easy access to Muḫmās and the northern villages.' The camp of Saul, according to Conder, was probably in those 'fields of Geba which must have lain E. of the village on the broad corn plateau overhanging Wādy es-Suweinīt.' The 'holes' of the Hebrews (v. 11) are of course the line of caves on both sides of the Wādy es-Suweinīt. On one important point Conder corrects Robinson, who speaks (BR 1 441) of 'two hills (in the valley) of a conical or rather spherical form,' having steep rocky sides, and corresponding to the Bozez and Seneh of 1 S. 14 4. The existence of these hills is denied by Conder. The valley, he says, 'is steep and narrow, each side formed of sharp ledges and precipitous cliffs.' These craggy sides are called 'teeth,' and each 'tooth' receives a name, the one that of Bozez, the other that of Seneh. As Gautier (180, n.) observes, however, 'the word "tooth" is not to be taken quite literally. The reference is to walls (cp RV 'crag') of rocks.' He adds, 'it is impossible to say which of the two cliffs was called Bozez, and which Seneh; moreover, the meaning of these two names is unknown. It is also important to notice, owing to the ambiguity of the phrase (מול), that the southern wall—i.e., that turned northward—fronts Michmash, and that the northern wall, turned southward, fronts Geba.' The two former points are real difficulties.

שֵׁן cannot be used in the supposed sense; it can indeed be used of the jagged points of rocks, but not for a wall of rock. שן probably should be צִנָּר (cp Aram. טנרא a rock); הסלע should be omitted as a gloss. Also the whole clause on the names (from וְשֵׁם to סֶנֶה) should be omitted as a corrupt form of v. 5. Note that מצוק in v. 5, like בוצץ in v. 4, is a corruption of מִצָּפוֹן.

We should probably render therefore, 'there was a wall of rock on the one side, and a wall of rock on the other side. The one wall of rock rose up on the N.,' etc. See further the account in SAUL, § 2.

[3] [According to Gautier, it has lately increased considerably.]

MICHMETHAH, RV Michmethath (הַמִּכְמְתָת), a town, or (note the art.) district, mentioned in connection with ASHER (q.v., ii.), on the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh, Josh. 16 6 (ικασμων [B], μαχθωθ [A], αχθ. [L]), 17 7 (δηλαναθ [B], [απο ασηρ] μαχθωθ [A], [απο ασηρ] της μ. [L]). See ASHER, 2 (and cp Buhl, Pal. 202).

Conder's theory that the plain E. of Nāblus called el-Makhna is referred to may perhaps find support in the statement of Jos. (Ant. v. 1 22) that the Ephraimite territory extended northward from Bethel to the Great Plain (an appellation which does not always in Jos. mean Esdraelon); but the appearance of corruption in both contexts renders it very uncertain. No emendation of the text has been offered.

MICHRI (מִכְרִי, cp MACHIR [מָכִיר]; μαχειρ [B], μοχορε [A], μαχειρι [L]; so also Pesh. ܡܟܪܝ), a Benjamite (see BENJAMIN, § 9, iii.) inhabitant of Jerusalem (see EZRA ii. § 5 [b] § 15 [1] a), 1 Ch. 9 8†, omitted in ‖ Neh. 11 7. The name should perhaps be read Bichri; cp BECHER.

MICHTAM (מִכְתָּם) in the headings of Pss. 16 56-60; also, by an easy conjecture, in Is. 38 9 (SBOT, with Stade and others for מִכְתָּב, EV 'a writing'). An old tradition finds the sense of 'inscription,' as if the Michtam-psalms were to be inscribed on stones (𝔊 Theod. στηλογραφία or εἰς στηλογραφίαν; so Quinta in Ps. 56; cp Tg. גליפא חריצא, sculptura recta; Vet. Lat. tituli inscriptio). Another favourite explanation was 'humble and perfect' (מָךְ תָּם); the Targum adopts this, except in Pss. 16 and 60;[1] also Jerome, Aquila, and Symmachus. De Dieu and many moderns (so, too, AV), after Ibn Ezra and Ḳimḥi, derive from kéthem (כֶּתֶם) 'gold'; as if the Michtam-psalms were honoured above others and perhaps even written in golden letters, like the Arabic poems called Mu'allaḳāt. All this is but ingenious trifling. The most probable solution is suggested by 𝔊's version of מכתם (for so the translator of Is. 38 9 probably reads)—viz. προσευχή (so 𝔊^{B}ℵQΓ; 𝔊^{A} ᾠδή, προσευχή), which seems to correspond to תְּחִנָּה or תַּחֲנוּן 'supplication.' The two most fertile sources of error—transposition and corruption of letters—have combined to produce the non-word מכתם 'Michtam'; parallel cases are MASCHIL, MAHALATH. T. K. C.

MIDDIN (מִדִּין; αινων [B], μαδων [A], μαδδειν [L]), the doubtful name of a city in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. 15 61). 𝔊^{B} suggests the reading 'Ænon' 'a place of springs'; the spot intended might be near 'Ain el-Feshkha, not far from which there are now two ruined places, Khirbet el-Feshkha and Khirbet el-Yahūd (see BETH-ARABAH). 𝔊^{BA} attributes the giant of 2 S. 21 20 to μαδων (EV 'of great stature'). Another and preferable course is to read for מדין, מִצּוּר (for which there are parallels). Miṣṣur would be a record of Miṣrite influence (see MIZRAIM).

The former identification, however, depends entirely on the correctness of the ordinary view of the 'Ir ham-melaḥ (EV 'city of Salt') and En-gedi in v. 62. If these two names are corruptions of 'Ir-Jeraḥmeel and En-kadesh, it becomes probable that Middin, NIBSHAN, and SECACAH should be placed to the S. of Judah not too far from 'Ain Gadīs. T. K. C.

MIDIAN (מִדְיָן;[2] μαδιαμ, -αν; in Judith 2 26, Acts 7 29 AV has MADIAN; gent. מִדְיָנִי, οι μαδιηναιοι [BADF], οι μαδιναιοι [L]).

The notices respecting the Midianites are by no means uniformly consistent. As to their occupation, we sometimes find them described as peaceful shepherds, sometimes as merchants, sometimes as roving warriors, delighting to raid the more settled districts. Knowing what we know, however, of the way of life of Arabian tribes, we need not regard these representations as inconsistent. As to their geographical position, which is, for the comprehension of historical narratives, of much importance, we also meet with some diversity of tradition. We must first refer to the genealogy in Gen. 25; Midian is there (vv. 1 f. = 1 Ch. 1 32) represented as a son of Abraham and KETURAH (q.v.). The name Midian (more properly Madyan) does not appear to occur either in Egyptian or in Assyrian documents. Friedrich Delitzsch, however (Par. 304; cp KAT[(2)] 146), identified the Ḫayapa of the cuneiform inscriptions with EPHAH (q.v.), one of the 'sons' of Midian —i.e., a Midianite tribe. This identification, if correct, shows us (1) that עיפה should be pronounced עֵיפָה or עִיפָּה (not עֵיפָה), and (2) that Midianites dwelt in the northern part of the Ḥijāz. The latter point follows from the fact that in Tiglath-pileser's time (745-727 B.C.) the Ḫayapa are mentioned with the people of Tēmā, a locality which is still so called (see ISHMAEL, § 4), and in Sargon's reign (722-705 B.C.) with the tribe called Thamūd, the later geographical position of which is known (KB 2 21). It is true, a late prophetic writer (Is. 60 6) speaks of the camels of Midian and Ephah, as if Midian and Ephah were distinct peoples. This, however, is unimportant, since the writer most probably derived the names from older writings. Another son of Midian in Genesis (l.c.) is named EPHER (עפר), who is identified by Knobel with the tribe of Ghifār, which in the time of Muḥammed had encampments near Medīna. That is all the light shed by the Genesis genealogy on the geographical position of Midian. It is, however, historically suggestive that of the five sons of Midian in Gen. 25 4 three (Ephah, Epher, and Hanoch) have namesakes among the Israelites. It is probable enough that some Midianite clans became assimilated to Israel.

Proceeding to Exodus (3 1), we find the father-in-law of Moses described as 'priest of Midian' (see HOBAB, JETHRO); and from the fact that in Judg 1 16 he is called, not 'the Midianite,' but 'the Kenite' (cp AMALEK), we may perhaps infer (though to be sure the conjecture is somewhat hazardous) that the Kenites, or at least a portion of them, were at one time or another reckoned as Midianites. However that may be, there is no doubt as to the inference next to be mentioned. It is stated in Ex. 3 1 that Moses led the flocks of his father-in-law to 'Horeb the mountain of God,' from which it is plain that the narrator placed the Midianites in the Sinaitic peninsula—i.e., apparently in the southern part of it. In the regal period (1 K. 11 18) we find Midian represented as a district lying between Edom and Paran, on the way to Egypt—i.e., somewhere in the NE. of the Sinaitic desert (but cp HADAD, where the correctness of the reading מדין is questioned). The poem at the end of Habakkuk also seems to place Midian in the region of Sinai (Hab. 3 7; cp CUSHAN). Lastly, in E's version of the tale of Joseph we read of Midianite traders journeying through the pasture grounds of Jacob's sons towards Egypt (Gen. 37 28*a* 36; cp ISHMAEL, § 3). None of these passages, however, gives us any information as to the geographical position of Midian.

Elsewhere in the OT the Midianites are described as dwelling to the E. of Israel. Abraham sends the sons of his concubines including Midian, 'eastward to the east country' (Gen. 25 6); cp EAST [CHILDREN OF THE]. The story of Balaam, too, yields a not uninteresting geographical point. It has been shown by a critical analysis of Nu. 22 that, in one of the older forms of the story of Balaam, Midian took the place of Moab, and was represented as situated more to the E. than Moab.

The important struggle of the people of northern and central Palestine, under GIDEON (q.v.) or JERUBBAAL, against the Midianites of the Syrian desert is related in Judg. 6 f. (a composite section—see JUDGES, § 8). We have here a vivid presentation of the struggle, which so continually recurs in those countries on a greater or smaller scale, between the agricultural population and the wandering tribes of the desert. Of the Bedouins, in particular, we have an admirable picture.

[1] In the heading of Ps. 60 Tg. has פרשנן, 'a copy.'

[2] מְדָנִים in Gen. 37 36 is naturally a mere scribe's error, which could have been corrected from the context even if the Sam. text and 𝔊 had not preserved the true reading.

Such passages as Judg. 8_{24}, 'for they had golden ear-rings (or nose-rings?), because they were Ishmaelites,' imply accurate knowledge (see RING, § 2). The nomads must have come in full force against their neighbours to the W., until the latter took courage, assembled their troops, and drove out the invaders. The memory of this was long cherished by tradition, as we see from Is. 9_{4} [3] 10_{26} Ps. 83_{9} [10] f. (μαζιαμ [R]). Whether the defeat of Midian by the Edomite king Hadad (Gen. 36_{35}) 'in the field of Moab' (see FIELD)—in the vicinity, therefore, of Gideon's last victories—may be brought into connection with this war, is a subject of controversy (see Ewald GVI(3) 2_{476}; but cp BELA); it seems very probable.

It is a mere reflex of the story of Gideon that we find in the account of the war waged by the Israelites in the time of Moses against the Midianites, who had led them into sin (Nu. 25_{6-9}; on chap. 31, see Dillmann, and Driver, Introd.(6), 68, who recognise its secondary character). The narrative bears the stamp of artificiality and is thoroughly unhistorical. It is worth noticing that the writer places the home of the Midianites in the northern portion of Moab, which afterwards becomes the territory of the tribes of Reuben and Gad. (On the names of the 'five kings of Midian,' see REKEM, ZUR, etc.)

This variety of statement as to the geographical position of the Midianites need not surprise us. Tribes that dwell in tents and breed camels—and as such the Midianites are represented in many passages of the OT—may shift their territory in the course of ages; they are also liable to internal disruption, not to mention the fact that many tribes regularly move from place to place according to the season of the year. Moreover, the grouping of the tribes and clans is by no means constant; hence we can easily understand that whilst in the Genesis lists Ishmael is a step-brother of Midian, in Judg. 8_{24} the Midianites are represented as a branch of Ishmael.

Midian as a nation disappears from history at a very early period. Whilst, however, the principal sphere of the activity of the Midianites was the country to the E. of Israel, we find in a region at a considerable distance to the S. a trace of this people lasting down to the end of the middle ages and even to modern times.

Ptolemy (6_{7}) mentions a place called Μοδίανα, on the coast of Arabia, and his definition of its position relatively to Ὄννη makes it certain that he refers to the locality which the Arabic geographers call Madyan, in the neighbourhood of Unā ('Ain 'Unā, now pronounced 'Ainūna). Madyan is the first halting-place to the S. of Ḥaḳl, the second to the S. of Aila ('Aḳaba), on the pilgrim route to Mecca. According to an Arabic account the place is abundantly supplied with water, and so it was found to be by the famous traveller Rüppell; it was, therefore, peculiarly suitable for a permanent settlement. At present it is known as Maghāir Sho'aib, 'the Caves of Sho'aib,' after the name of the prophet of Madyan mentioned in the Koran. From this point Rüppell reached Maḳnā in seven hours, journeying in a WSW. direction. Madyan is, accordingly, almost exactly opposite the extremity of the Sinaitic peninsula; though cut off by the sea, it is not far from the pasture-grounds of the ancient Midianite priest and from the district once inhabited by the Ḥayapa. Being only a short way from the sea it is treated by Ptolemy as a place on the coast, and even one of the ancient Arabic geographers describes it in similar terms. Nor can we be surprised to find that in the same passage of Ptolemy it appears again, under the name of Μαδιαμα, as an inland place near Maḳnā and Akale (Ḥaḳl). Double references of this kind occur elsewhere in the works of geographers who derived their information from several different itineraries and thus could hardly avoid such mistakes (see, however, Sprenger, Die alte Geog. Arab., § 16, 209). The passage in Ptolemy excludes the notion that the place acquired the name of Madyan in consequence of its being identified with the Madyan of the Koran, or in other words, that the name was borrowed indirectly from the OT. A further proof of this is that the poet Kuthaiyir (died in 723 or 724 A.D.), who was very well acquainted with the district in question, also mentions the name. Perhaps even the mysterious figure of Sho'aib may have been derived from genuine Midianite tradition, and brought by Muḥammed into connection with narratives of biblical origin. In any case the site must be one in which, at some time or another, a portion of the nomadic Midianites established a settlement, so that the name of this long-forgotten people became permanently attached to the spot.

MIGDAL-EL (מִגְדַּל־אֵל, 'tower of God'?—rather, like Migdal in some other cases, from 'Jerahmeel'; μεγαλα [αρειμ] [B], μαγδαλιη (ωραμ) [A], μαγδαλιηλ (ω.) [L]), a 'fenced city' of Naphtali (Josh. 19_{38}), mentioned with Iron and Beth-anath, and therefore most plausibly identified, not with Mejdel-Kerūm (Knobel), nor with Mujēdil (PEFMem. 1_{96}, after Guérin), nor with a MAGDALA on the Sea of Galilee, but with Mejdel-Silim, between Mujēdil and Hūnīn, well within the limits of Naphtali.

The name which follows, without the conjunctive particle, is HOREM [q.v.], which is evidently due to a mistake. The scribe glanced over Beth-anath and Beth-shemesh, and wrote עָרִם (whence חרם) too soon. T. K. C.

MIGDAL-GAD (מִגְדַּל־גָּד, 'tower of Gad,' cp BAAL-GAD; μαγαδα γαδ [B], μαγδαλγ. [AL]), a city in the lowland of Judah, included in the same group with Lachish and Eglon (Josh. 15_{37}), and possibly the Maktir or Migdal mentioned in a list of Rameses III. with places identified as Judahite (Sayce, RP (2), 6_{39}). It is not improbably the Magdali of Am. Tab. (237_{26}) mentioned with 'En-anab (see ANAB) and other places in S. Judah. Jerome gives it a bare mention as Magdala (OS 139_{12}). Guérin (Jud. $2_{130-132}$) identifies this place with the large village el-Mejdel, two m. inland from 'Asḳalān. So fertile a district needed a protecting Migdal (tower). But surely this site is too near a Philistine fortress. El-Mejdel may be either the village with a strong tower near Ashkelon called Belzedek in Josephus (BJ iii. 2_{3}), or perhaps the inland city of ASHKELON (q.v.). Remains of marble columns abound. T. K. C.

MIGDOL (מִגְדֹּל] מִגְדּוֹל Jer. 46_{14}]; μαγδωλος, castra, Vg. [cp Aq., Symm.] in Ex., turris in Ez. [='tower,' AV], Magdalum in Jer.), the name of one, or two, Egyptian places. So far as the form is concerned, the name represents nothing but the Egyptian pronunciation of the Hebrew word מִגְדָּל, 'tower, castle,' accented ḳāmeṣ being regularly rendered by ō in Egyptian.

In names of towns, we can trace this loanword, written ma-k-tì-ra (the tì can be read to), ma-ga-dĭ-ra, back to the fourteenth century B.C. Sahidic Coptic has preserved it as ⲙⲉϭⲧⲟⲗ, Lower Coptic ⲙⲓϫⲧⲱⲗ, ⲙⲉϣⲧⲱⲗ, ⲙⲓϫⲧⲟⲗ[1] and thus it occurs also in various geographical names. Semitic names were frequent in the eastern regions of the Delta, owing to their mixed population, cp GOSHEN, § 4.

1. The first Migdol is mentioned in Ex. 14_{2} (less clearly in Nu. 33_{7}). The Israelites encamp 'between Migdol and the sea,' at the moment of leaving Egypt. Evidently, this place was only a small fortified border town, more probably nothing but a fort protecting the roads from the E. It would be possible to compare a locality, mentioned in pap. Anastasi, 5_{20}. Two runaway slaves are pursued near Ṯ-ku (Sukkoth? cp EXODUS i., § 10) to the 'closing fortification (s-ga-ira, סגר) of Ṯ-ku,' thence to the S. and to 'the fortress' (ḥtm, not ETHAM, q.v.); but they pass 'the northern wall of the Watchtower (ma-k-tì-ra) of Sety I.' This 'Maktol of king Sety I.' which is, certainly, to be sought for NW. of the region of Ṯku-Succoth-Maskhūṭa, not far from the modern Isma'īlīye, would fulfil all conditions for those assuming the Crocodile Lake as the 'Sea' of the Exodus-narrative. As long, however, as it is impossible to determine the other two geographical names (PIHAHIROTH and BAAL-ZEPHON) connected with the passage through the sea, we cannot say much regarding this location, and must accept it with the greatest caution (cp EXODUS i., § 11). There must have been various other Migdols or 'towers' along the eastern border of Egypt to guard it against inroads of desert-tribes. A trace of such a fort is to be found, for example, in the modern name Bīr-Magdal (Bīr Maktal), in the desert, 23 m. NE of Isma'ilīye.[1] Others, the situation of which cannot be determined,[2] occur in the inscriptions. Thus the name is too frequent to admit an easy identification. For another view of the geography, see MOSES, § 11.

2. In Ezek. 29 10 (μαγδουλου [Q]) desolation is threatened to Egypt, 'from Migdol (so AV^mg.) to Syene'; so also in 30 6—Migdol thus marking the N. and Syene the S. limit of the country (see SYENE). In Jer. 44 1 Migdol heads the list of Egyptian towns in which the Jewish refugees from the Babylonians had congregated (Migdol, Tahpanhes, Noph). In 46 14, accordingly, the same three cities are the field of Jeremiah's activity in proclaiming the coming desolation of Egypt by Babylonian armies. (The passages are treated elsewhere from a different point of view; see PATHROS, § 2, and Crit. Bib.) Stephen of Byzantium mentions Magdōlos as a city of Egypt on the authority of Hecatæus.[3] The Itinerarium Antonini places Magdolo 12 R. m. S. of Pelusio, 12 m. N. of Sile, on a road which ultimately leads to Serapiu—i.e., the city Serapeum near the E. end of Goshen. It is evident that this frontier city of the Itinerarium cannot be identified with that of Exodus (as has frequently been assumed), being situated too far N. of Goshen. On the other hand, it is quite likely that this Magdolo(n) is the Migdol of the prophets. Its situation near Pelusium 'the key to Egypt,' agrees well with the presence of a colony of Jewish fugitives. However, a town at the entrance of Goshen would fulfil the same conditions and would fit well in the parallelism to Memphis. We have only to consider that, apparently, there was no larger city on the frontier of Goshen, such as would be required for giving shelter and occupation to a great number of immigrants. Thus the northern Migdol is at least much more probable than one of the various small frontier-fortresses of that name (see note 4). The above place is usually identified with Tel(l)-es-Semūt,[4] 12 Eng. m. SW. of Pelusium, at a distance agreeing with the Itinerarium, possibly only somewhat too far E. No certainty, however, can be attributed to this identification.[5]

[1] Actually identified with the biblical Migdol by Ebers, entirely against the description in Exodus, as it is outside of Egypt and far from the lakes.

[2] Among the desert forts enumerated by Sety I. (cp W. M. Müller, Asien, p. 134) occurs 'the Ma-k-ti-ra of Sety I.'; cp Rosellini, Mon. Stor. 50. This does not seem to be identical with that mentioned in pap. Anastasi (see above). We should expect to find it more to the NE. of the great border city Ṯa-ru. Some Egyptologists have erroneously confounded this and the biblical Migdols with a royal 'tower' or magdol in Phœnicia, mentioned under Rameses III. (Ros. op cit. 133).

[4] 'Hill of direction,' from its situation near the road to Syria. It has, of course, nothing to do with an ancient city Sm-bḥd(t?), compared by Brugsch.

[5] Champollion thought of various Egyptian places called mashtūl, but this name is, most likely, Arabic ('plantation,' cp Schleiden, Dillmann). Winckler, Amarna Letters, no. 159, l 28, understands magdali in the phrase 'behold, Acco is like magdali in Egypt,' of the biblical city, whilst the present writer (op. cit. glossary) would prefer to take it in the general sense 'watch-tower, fortress,' as an allusion to the numerous border-fortifications.

of Judah (Is. 10 28, 𝔊 Pesh. read Megiddo; in Q^mg. θ' μαγεδδων . . α' c' και . το εβραικον μαγρω̄. Magron [Vg.]). The enemy passes necessarily through Aiath, Migron, and Michmash; Migron is therefore identified with the ruins of Makrūn, N. of Michmash on the road to Ai (cp Baed. Pal.(2), 119, Buhl, Pal. 176 f.). If the text of 1 S. 14 2 (εκ μαγων [B], εν μαγεδδω [L]) be correct, we also find a Migron situated 'in the border (קצה) of Geba' (so read for 'Gibeah'),[1] and as the context shows, between Geba and Michmash, and therefore S. of the Migron in Isaiah. The two places cannot be identified (cp Di.); either there were two Migrons, or (the defining words 'in Migron' being superfluous) the text in 1 S. 14 2 must be corrupt.

Wellhausen, Budde, H. P. Smith would read מִגְרָן '(in the) threshing floor,' Klostermann conjectures מגרש '(in the) common-land.' The former, however, is an assumed word, and the latter is post-exilic in use. The corruption seems to be more deeply seated; מגרון may be a corruption of רִמּוֹן, rimmōn. A glossator, finding the two readings רמון and מגרון (מגדון), probably harmonised them by representing the rimmōn or pomegranate tree[2] as situated in a place called Migron (Magedon). In Zech. 12 11 (see HADADRIMMON), MT and (even more clearly) 𝔊 still preserve the same two competing readings רמון and מגדון.

MIJAMIN (מִיָּמִין, § 99) or MINIAMIN (so EV), but rather, MINJAMIN; מִנְיָמִין; cp Benjamin, and Miniamīni, one of the Jewish names found by Hilprecht and Clay in the business documents from Nippur (Th. LZ, Aug. 6, 1898, col. 434). Probably a corruption of Jerahmeel (Che.); note μιληλος (cp Mahalalel) and μαηλος (cp Elam in Ezra 2 7 31).

1. The name borne by one of the 24 (post-exilic) priestly courses; 1 Ch. 24 9 (βενιαμειν [B], μ[ε]ιαμειν [AL]). Also the name of a Levite, temp. Hezekiah, 2 Ch. 31 15 (βενιαμ[ε]ιν [BAL]), of a priest, temp. Nehemiah, Neh. 12 5 (AV MIAMIN; μειμιν [ℵc.a mg.], μιαμειν [L], Bℵ*A om.), of a 'father's house,' etmp. Joiakim, Neh. 12 17 (βενιαμειν [ℵc.a mg.], μιαμειν [L], Bℵ*A om.), of a signatory under Nehemiah, Neh. 10 7 (μιαμειμ [B], -ν [AL], μειαμων [ℵ]), and of one of those who took part in the services at the dedication of the wall, Neh. 12 41 (βενιαμειν [ℵc.a mg.], μιαμειν [L], Bℵ*A om.).

2. AV MIAMIN, in list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i., § 5 end), Ezra 10 25 (αμαμειν [Bℵ], μεαμιμ [A], μιαμειδεας [L])=1 Esd. 9 26 MAELUS (μιληλος [B], μαηλος [A], μιαμιδαιας [L]).

MIKLOTH (מִקְלוֹת; 1 Ch. 8 31 f. μακαλωθ [BA], μαγεδδωθ [L]; 9 37 f., μακελλωθ [B and ℵ once], μακεδωθ [A], μακελωθ [L]). 1. No doubt a member of the Benjamite genealogy in 1 Ch. 8 30-38 (see BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. β). The name should be supplied in 8 31 from B and 9 37.

The name is probably a corrupted abbreviation of 'Jerahmeel. But for the numerous parallels to this, it might mean 'rods, see NAMES, § 75.

2. According to MT a (supernumerary) officer of David (1 Ch. 27 4, μακελλωθ [L]; Vg. Macelloth; Pesh. om.). BA (rightly) omit v. 4*a*—i.e., the clause containing Mikloth. Notice that מקלות is suspiciously like ומחלקתו, which itself appears to be due to dittography.

MIKNEIAH (מִקְנֵיָהוּ, as if 'Yahwè is possessor,' § 36; μακενια[ς] [BℵA], μακκανια(ς) [L]), a Levite musician, 1 Ch. 15 18 (μακελλεια [B], μακκελλα [ℵ], μακκανια [L] 21). Perhaps, however, we should read מַתַּנְיָהוּ, 'Mattaniah.'

T. K. C.

MILALAI (מִלֲלַי), a Levite musician, Neh. 12 36 (BℵAL om.). A corruption of Jerahmeel, like Gilalai which follows. Cp Mahalalel, and see Guthe in SBOT ad loc.

MILCAH (מִלְכָּה, § 44; μελχα [BADELF]; MELCHA).

1. Bath Haran, wife of Nahor (Gen. 11 29 22 20 23

[1] See GIBEAH, § 1.

[2] For another plausible but hardly probable view of רמוי in 1 S. 14 2 see RIMMON ii., 2.

24 15 24 47†). If the view taken elsewhere (HARAN, NAHOR) is correct, it is most probable that (on the analogy of [2] below, and of HAMMOLEKETH) we should correct Milcah into SALECAH (q.v.). If, however, we think the traditional readings, 'Haran' and 'Nahor,' to be safe, it will be plausible to explain Milcah on the analogy of SARAH (q.v.) as a divine title, 'queen,' and Jensen (ZA, 1896, p. 300) has aptly referred to the titles maliktu or malkatu, 'princess,'[1] and malikat ilāni (i.e., either 'princess of the gods' or 'giver of decisions [mālikat, partic.] of the gods')[2] borne by Ištar. In the Sumerian hymns Ištar is called the daughter of the moon-god. To the early Israelites, however, Milcah (or Malcah ?) would be the 'queen' of the children of Isaac. The possibility of a connection with Jerahmeel may also be mentioned.

2. A daughter of ZELOPHEHAD (q.v.), Nu. 26 33 27 1 36 11 Josh. 17 3†. The name seems to be miswritten for SALECAH (q.v.), מ and ס being easily confounded (cp 1 K. 21 4, סר for מר).

MILCOM (מִלְכֹּם; μελχομ [AL], μολχ. [AQ; conformation to μολοχ]; MELCHOM), the national god of the Ammonites (1 K. 11 5 33, 2 K. 23 13).[3] The same name should be read in Jer. 49 13 (so 𝔊 μελχολ [Bℵ; A in v. 1], Vg., Pesh.), where MT erroneously pronounces malcham, 'their king.'[4] In some other cases ancient translators and modern interpreters have read the consonants מלכם as a proper name; thus, in 2 S. 12 30 (μελχολ. τοῦ βασ. αὐτ [B]) = 1 Ch. 20 2 for MT 'the crown of their king' 𝔊BA has the doublet Μολχολ (B; Μολχομ A) τοῦ βασιλέως αὐτῶν (see also Vg. in Ch.), and this interpretation, which is found in the Talmud ('Ăbōdā Zārā 44 a) and Jewish commentators, is adopted by Geiger, Graetz, Wellhausen, Driver, Klostermann, and others (cp מלכן in 2 S. 12 31). The special interest of the passage lies in the fact that, if this view be correct, we should naturally infer that Milcom at Rabbah was represented by an idol in human form and of considerable size (see IDOL, § 4 f.). In Am. 1 15 Aquila and Symmachus read Μελχομ, and are followed by Jerome. This interpretation—probably suggested by the resemblance to Jer. 49 3—is not favoured by the parallel, 2 3. In Am. 5 26, for MT מלכּכם 'your king' (where 𝔊 and Vg. have Moloch; whence Acts 7 43), Aquila read Μολχομ, Jerome (? Sym.) Melchom, Syriac (also in Acts) Malchom. A reference to Milcom is out of place, whatever the meaning of the difficult verse may be. Finally, in Zeph. 1 5 some Greek minuscules have Μελχομ (so Vg., Pesh.), others Μολοχ (so Qmg.); in the context Milcom is very improbable; 'their king' is doubtless the god who received this title (Molech).

Many scholars, in ancient and modern times, have been of the opinion that Milcom was the same deity as Molech, an identification which is in part responsible for the confusion of the names that is found in the versions. The only ground for this identification, apart from the obvious similarity of the names, is 1 K. 11 7, 'Molech the abomination of the Ammonites,' compared with vv. 5 and 33 (Milcom). The Hebrew text of v. 7 is in itself suspicious (מלך without the article), and 𝔊L has Μελχομ(-ο [A]), doubtless the true reading. The high-place which Solomon erected for Milcom is said to have been on the Mount of Olives (2 K. 23 13), whilst Molech was worshipped, so far as our sources show, only in the Valley of Hinnom; and the name of Milcom is never coupled with the sacrifice of children which was characteristic of the Molech cult (Ew., Movers, Dies., and Kue.). Others therefore rightly distinguish Milcom, the national god of Ammon, from Molech (see MOLECH).

[2] G. Smith, Hist. of Assurb. 121; Del. Ass. HWB 412.

[3] 𝔊 has in 1 K. 11 5 33 τῷ βασιλεῖ αὐτῶν [BA on v. 33], τῶν βασιλέων αὐ. [A in v. 5]; in 2 K. 23 13 μολχολ [B], αμελχομ [A], μολοχ [L].

[4] There is no reason to think that the Massoretes meant malcham to be taken as a proper name, though it is so understood by Rashi.

Nothing further is known of this god, whose name has not been found outside of the OT. The name is obviously derived from mélek, 'king' (cp Phœn. milk in proper names, and see MOLECH); the last syllable is probably an inflection, the nominative ending with the old determinative mimation (Baudissin; cp Lagarde); so that the name signifies simply 'king'. Those who regard מלכם as a compound, equivalent to מלך עם, 'king of the people' (Kue., and others), or ''Am (the god of Ammon) is king' (Eerdmans) give no satisfactory explanation of the syncope of the guttural.

Literature.—Milcom has generally been treated in connection with Molech; see the literature in the latter article.

MILDEW (יֵרָקוֹן, yērāḳōn; ωχρα [Dt. 28 22], ικτερος [1 K. 8 37 (A), 2 Ch. 6 28 Am. 4 9], ανεμοφθορια [Hag. 2 17]) is five times mentioned in connection with שִׁדָּפוֹן, šiddāphōn, 'blasting.' The adj. יָרָק, yārāḳ, signifies 'greenish-yellow'; in Jer. 30 6 yērāḳōn is used of deathlike pallor, and as applied to corn it means doubtless the hue of decay produced by the Puccinia graminis, Pers.

Puccinia graminis is a very common and widely distributed fungus, which after hibernating on the dead leaves and leaf-sheaths of grass-plants alights first on such leaves as those of the barberry;[1] after this a fresh generation is produced, the spores of which being carried by the wind enter and act upon the leaves of grass-plants. (See the account in EB(9) 16 293 f., and esp. Sachs, Textbook of Bot.(2), 332-5.) Arabic cognates of ירקון denote 'jaundice.'

MILE (μιλιον), Mt. 5 41†. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MILETUS (μιλητος, Acts 20 15 17; 2 Tim. 4 20 [where AV has MILETUM by a mere error]) stood on the southern shore of the bay of Latmus into which the Mæander flowed. The site, now deserted, bears the name Palatia, from the ruins of its huge theatre, the largest in Asia Minor.

1. History.

The period of the greatness of Miletus lay six centuries before the time of Paul. Even in Homer (Il. 2 868) 'Carian Miletus' is a city of renown. During the early Greek period, it was the port for the trade of the Mæander valley. This is seen from its early coinage (Head, Hist. Num. 502); and the existence of trade with Phrygia is attested as early as the sixth century B.C. by Hipponax, who twits the Phrygian traders at Miletus with their bad Greek (Hipp. frg. 36 [30]: καὶ τοὺς Σολοίκους, ἢν λάβωσι, περνᾶσιν | Φρύγας μὲν ἐς Μίλητον ἀλφιτεύσοντας, quoted by Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM 37). [Miletus is given in 𝔊 as the source of the wool that was imported to Tyre (Ezek. 27 18). It represents apparently the Heb. צחר. Pliny speaks of Milesia lana (HN 29 9), and Vergil of Milesia vellera (Georg. 3 306).] Ephesus was in many respects a more convenient port for much of the trade of the Mæander valley; but for a long time the energy of the Milesians enabled them to defy all rivalry (cp Herod. 5 28, τῆς Ἰωνίης ἦν πρόσχημα). Their commercial relations were very far-reaching—with Egypt (Herod. 2 178, Strabo 801), with the Pontus, on the shores of which they planted more than seventy colonies (Str. 635, Ephesus ap. Athen. 524), and with lower Italy. The energy of the city disappeared under Persian rule after its capture in 494 B.C., when the inhabitants suffered transportation to the Tigris (Herod. 5 30 6 18 f.) and Ephesus began to assert herself. Miletus possessed no fewer than four harbours, one of them large enough for a fleet; but in course of time the silt brought down by the Mæander blocked the harbours and the entire gulf of Latmus (Plin. HN 2 91 5 31) so that the site of the town is now as much as five or six miles from the sea. This process must have advanced some way even in Paul's time (about 57 A.D.); but how far is not certainly known.

[1] In this form it is called Æcidium Berberidis, Garth.

On the one hand, the island of Lade in front of Miletus was apparently still an island in Strabo's time—about 19 A.D.—(cp 635, πρόκειται δ' ἡ Λάδη νῆσος πλησίον): it is now a hillock in the plain, 2 miles W. of the town. On the other hand, Priene, lying almost due N. of Miletus, on the opposite shore of the gulf, was close to the sea, and the Mæander entered the gulf at a point between that town and Miletus (Strabo, 636): the site of Priene is now 10 m. or more from the sea.

It appears, therefore, that the silting-up process has been more rapid on the northern side of the gulf than on the southern; and this agrees with the fact that at the present day the southern loop of the river, as it winds through the alluvial plain, seems to be the ancient channel. We must conclude that, at the time of Paul's visit, it was possible to sail across to Priene, whereas to-day the track crosses the plain and the ferry over the Mæander (Mendere Chai): the land journey must have involved an immense detour of over 40 m. round the head of the gulf.

The death-blow of Miletus was given by its capture by Alexander the Great (Arrian, Anab. I 19 f., Strabo, 635). In Paul's time, therefore, Miletus, though still called a μητρόπολις of Ionia,[1] was a second-rate town. A sure index of its unimportance is to be seen in the fact that it did not lie on any great Roman road. For the eastern trade-route turned off sharply to the E. at Magnesia 15 R. m. S. of Ephesus (Plin. HN 5 31), and did not touch Miletus. The most direct route to Ephesus, some 30 m. distant in an air-line from Miletus, was by way of Priene, crossing Mt. Mycale to mod. Chanli (anc. Panionium) and thence along the coast to mod. Scala Nova, which is about 10 m. from Ephesus (cp Murray's Handb. to AM, iii.).

2. Paul's visit. Paul came to Miletus the day after leaving Samos, the intervening afternoon and evening having been spent at Trogyllium (AV), or in Samos Roads (RV).[2] He had 'determined to sail past Ephesus,' as he was anxious to spend Pentecost in Jerusalem (Acts 20 16): finding that the vessel would be detained some time (how long is not stated) at Miletus, he sent thence to invite the Ephesian elders to meet him (v. 17). The next evening after leaving Miletus was spent at Cos (Acts 21 1).

Conforming to the conditions of navigation on this coast, Paul's vessel sailed very early in the morning from its anchorage at Trogyllium, taking advantage of the N. wind, and soon traversing the 20 m. to Miletus. Paul thus reached Miletus probably before noon; and his messenger may have waited for the evening breeze from the S. (the Imbat), which would carry him across the gulf (about 12 m.) to Priene. Eight hours would suffice for the journey thence to Ephesus, by the path above described. The elders would not travel as fast as a single messenger; but it would be possible for them to reach Priene twelve hours after the arrival of the messenger at Ephesus; and if a boat were in readiness there they might be in Miletus by midnight. The ship would weigh from Miletus after midnight with the first breath of wind from the N. (cp Acts 21 1, εὐθυδρομήσαντες, 'running before the wind'). Forty hours is therefore the minimum of Paul's stay in Miletus. This would just allow him to see the elders during the two or three hours before sailing. Probably, however, it would be right to allow another day for the unlading and lading of the ship at Miletus. This would allow more ample time for the various items in the calculation; and would mean that the elders availed themselves of the morning wind from Priene, and reached Miletus probably before noon, forty-eight hours after Paul's arrival there, and spent with him the last twelve or fourteen hours of his vessel's stay.[1] The impression given by the passage (Acts 20 17-21 1) is that there was little margin of time.

Paul was not master of the movements of the vessel, otherwise he would have touched at Ephesus. The somewhat ambiguous expression of v. 16 ('Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus,' AV: κεκρίκει . . . παραπλεῦσαι, 'to sail past,' RV) refers to a decision made at Troas (Acts 20 6) when selecting the coaster upon which a passage was to be taken. The omission of Ephesus from the itinerary was not the choice of Paul; it was a disadvantage outweighed by the speed of the ship upon which he finally decided to embark. The fact that she could not accomplish her lading at Miletus in time to take advantage of the first (or perhaps even the second) morning's wind, was an unforeseen way out of the difficulty.

On the visit of Paul to Miletus implied in 2 Tim. 4 20, see TIMOTHY, EPP. TO, and cp TROPHIMUS. W. J. W.

MILK. At every period of their national life, from the earliest to the latest, the Hebrews made large use of milk as an article of diet. It is therefore rightly mentioned by Ben Sira, even before wine and oil, among 'the principal things for the whole use of man's life' (Ecclus. 39 26), for the nomad ancestors of the Hebrew tribes had long been nourished on the milk of their flocks (Gen. 18 8) before their descendants took possession of 'the vineyards and oliveyards which' they 'planted not' in the land of Canaan. Indeed, 'when the spring milk is in, the nomads [of central Arabia] nourish themselves of little else. In poorer households it is all their victual those two months' (Doughty, Ar. Des. I 325). So, too, Palmer testifies of the Arabs of the great desert of et-Tih, to the S. of Palestine. 'In many parts of the desert, milk forms the sole article of diet obtainable by the Bedouin, and I have heard a well-authenticated case of an Arab in the N. of Syria, who for three years had not tasted either water or solid food'[2] (Desert of the Exodus, 2 294).

Milk, in its fresh state, is always חָלָב, ḥālāb; LXX and NT γάλα.

1. Ḥālāb. This word occurs over forty times in the OT—predominantly in a figurative sense (see § 4 below)—about one-half of all the occurrences being in connection with the standing description of Palestine[3] as a land 'flowing with milk and honey' (fifteen times in the Hexateuch sources, J and D, also Lev. 20 24 [H], Jer. 11 5 32 22 Ezek. 20 6 15; Ecclus. 46 8; Bar. 1 20). Some slight confusion has arisen from the fact that ḥālāb, milk, and ḥēleb, fat, were expressed by the same unpointed consonants; thus in Ezek. 34 3 𝔊 has preserved the better, and now generally adopted, reading: 'Ye enjoy the milk, etc.' (reading ḥālāb for ḥēleb, and so Ps. 119 [𝔊 118] 70). Conversely 𝔊 reads ḥēleb for ḥālāb in Job 21 24 Is. 55 1 Ezek. 25 4.

Ḥālāb includes the human mother's milk (Is. 28 9), which the Hebrew infants enjoyed for from two to three years (2 Macc. 7 27), as well as the milk of the females of the herd (בָּקָר) and of the flock (צֹאן), the latter including both sheep and goats (Dt. 32 14 Prov. 27 27 Ezek. 34 3 [see above] 1 Cor. 9 7). To what extent the milk of the she-camel (Gen. 32 15 [16]) was used by the Hebrews is not known.

[That camel's milk was drunk is inferred from Gen. 32 15. A reference to it may also underlie the extraordinary phrase עִם־חֵלֶב כִּלְיוֹת חִטָּה, 'with the kidney fat of wheat,' which should probably be read [עִם־חֲלֵב בְּכָרוֹת [חֶמְאָה, 'with the milk of female camels' (חֶמְאָה, 'soured milk,' is misplaced). In Ps. 81 16 147 14 the text is also probably corrupt. T. K. C.]

In a mountainous country like Palestine, the small cattle must always have formed the large part of the peasant's stock, and their milk, especially goats' milk (Prov. 27 27), was apparently more highly prized. The milk was milked (in later Hebrew חָלַב) into pails (עֲטִינִים, 'ăṭīnīm, Job 21 24 EV[mg.] and moderns) and preserved, as among the Bedouins still, in skins (Judg. 4 19, see

[1] So Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 294, where it is suggested that Paul landed at Miletus on Thursday, April 28, 57 A.D., and sailed again early on Sunday morning, May 1.

MILK

BOTTLE). A diet largely of milk was supposed to give a special whiteness to the teeth (Gen. 49 12).

From the thrice repeated command: 'Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk' (Ex. 23 19 34 26 Dt. 14 21),[1] we may certainly infer that the custom in vogue among the Arabs of boiling a kid or a lamb in milk (Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins, 1 63) was not unknown to the earlier Hebrews (cp MAGIC, § 2*a*).

The reasons for its prohibition are still obscure. If the words are to be taken in a strictly limited and literal sense, they might be set down to purely humanitarian motives (cp Dt. 22 6 f.). Probably the reason first suggested by Maimonides, and approved by Bochart, Spencer, and various later writers, is the best—that we have here the prohibition of a heathen Canaanite rite, the details of which are beyond our ken.

Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem.(2) 221 n.) is inclined to range this prohibition alongside of the more familiar taboo which forbids the eating of flesh 'with the blood,' inasmuch as milk has sometimes been regarded 'as a kind of equivalent for blood, and as containing a sacred life.' Offerings of milk are found among the ancient Egyptians (Wilk. 3 417), Arabs, and Carthaginians (Rel. Sem.(2) 220 with reff.); but such offerings have no place in the Hebrew cultus. Josephus's averment that Abel brought 'milk and the firstfruits of his flocks' (Ant. i. 2 1) as a sacrifice to God is only another instance of the confusion, above referred to, of ḥālāb and ḥēleb. This absence of milk from the sacred offerings of the Hebrews is most probably due, as Robertson Smith has suggested (op. cit. 220 n.), to the exclusion of all ferments from presentation at the altar (Ex. 23 18 Lev. 2 11), for in hot climates milk ferments rapidly, and hence, as we shall see presently, is generally drunk or eaten sour.

The last remark leads naturally to the discussion of some of the forms in which milk figures as an article of diet, otherwise than in its fresh or 'sweet' state.

2. Hem'āh, leben, and samn.

To this day the wandering tribes of Arabia consider the milk of their camels and their flocks as more refreshing if it has been slightly fermented or soured by being poured into the milk-skin (semīly), on the inner side of which are still sticking sour clots from the previous milking (cp the use and source of leaven in breadmaking), and there shaken for a brief period (Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 263, and Eastern travellers passim). To this slightly sour milk (the oxygala of Pliny HN 28 36), known indeed in the East widely (not, however, in Egypt) simply as leben ('milk'), which is also applied to what we term buttermilk (Burckhardt, Notes, etc., 1 240), the Hebrews gave the name ḥem'āh (חֶמְאָה, from an unused root, חמא, in Arabic, 'to be thick, hard,' but see Ges.-Buhl(13); in 𝔊 rendered βούτυρον,[2] Vg. butyrum and hence EV 'butter'). This is placed beyond doubt by the incident of Jael and Sisera, in which the former took the milk-skin (נֹאד הֶחָלָב, Judg. 4 19) and gave her visitor 'milk (yea), sour milk (חֶמְאָה), in a lordly dish' (5 25). The same refreshing draught is probably intended in Gen. 18 8 and Dt. 32 14 ('butter of kine and milk of sheep').

[In 2 Ch. 28 15 EV represents that 'all the feeble' of the captives of Judah taken by Pekah were 'carried upon asses, and (so) brought to Jericho.' וַיְנַהֲלוּם בַּחֲמֹרִים, however, cannot, in accordance with usage, be rendered 'carried them upon asses.' לְכָל־כּוֹשֵׁל is also suspicious (three ל, two כ). There is a great error in the text. Read וַיְכַלְכְּלוּם בְּחֶמְאָה וְקָלִי וַעֲדָשִׁים (cp 2 S 17 28 f.), 'and they sustained them with soured milk and parched corn and lentils.' ('Them' = the whole body of captives.) ינהל and יכלכל have a tendency to get confounded (see Ball on Gen. 47 18; Che. on Ps. 31 4).—T. K. C.]

Ḥem'āh, including the miswritten חֵמָה (Job 29 6) and the cognate מַחְמָאֹת (Ps. 55 21 [22], where, however, we should read and point מַחֶמְאָה פָּנָיו, 'his face was smoother than ḥem'āh) is found in other places, and in regard to these, as well as to the passages already cited, there has been great diversity of rendering—sour-milk, curds, cream, butter, buttermilk, each having its advocates. Of the eight places referred to, the most explicit, and perhaps the latest, is Prov. 30 33, 'the pressing of milk (מִיץ חָלָב) bringeth forth ḥem'āh.'

Here it may be explained that milk consists of numberless minute globules of fat, each encased in a thin albuminous envelope, floating in a watery, colourless fluid. To procure butter, which is simply the fat of milk, it is necessary by concussion to break this albuminous envelope or skin, which allows the enclosed fat-globules to come together and form the fatty mass which we term butter. Now this result the Arab housewives have obtained, from time immemorial, by simply rocking the milk-skin to and fro on their knees till the butter comes 'in a clot at the mouth of the semīly' (Ar. Des. 2 67), or the skin 'is hanged in the fork of a robust bearing-stake of the nomad tent' (ib. 1 324), or it may be suspended, as by the more settled peasantry, from a primitive tripod of sticks (see illustration, Picturesque Palestine, Div. 6 48). Butter, of course, does not keep in a hot climate; the Arabs and Syrians, accordingly, boil the fresh butter over a slow fire, throwing in coarse meal or 'burghul' (boiled wheat, see FOOD, § 1) to clarify the mass. This clarified butter, the best of which is said to have 'the odour of a blossoming vine,' is known throughout the Arabic-speaking East as samn (in India as ghee), and is one of the most valuable articles of commerce in Arabia.[1] In view of the extent to which melted butter enters into the menu of Bedouin and fellahin alike—to whom samn is all that 'clotted cream' is to a Devonshire man, and more—and in view of the unchanging customs of the East, one is prepared to find something equivalent to samn in the earlier biblical period. This we find unmistakably in Prov. 30 33, where we have an exact description of the rocking and pressing of the milk-skin, so that the rendering of EV, which follows 𝔊, is amply justified, 'the churning of milk bringeth forth butter.' Equally clear is the comparison in the amended text of Ps. 55 21, 'his face is smoother than butter,' where neither sour milk nor curds is admissible. Again samn, as the most prized of all the preparations of milk, is suggested by Job 29 6, of which a modern paraphrase would run: 'I sat, up to the lips in clotted cream.'[2] The two modern equivalents here advocated for the biblical ḥem'āh—viz., leben and samn—we find side by side in the much-glossed passage, Is. 7 15-22 (for which see Cheyne and Duhm, in loc.). In the last verse, in particular, we render 'because of the abundance of milk he shall eat samn' (v. 22*a*), a gloss entirely at variance with the context, which speaks of the poverty of the land when the few inhabitants shall be reduced to the simplest nomad fare, 'sour milk and wild honey' (22*b*).

Cheese is referred to, according to EV, in three

1 For some of the more remarkable views entertained regarding this enactment, see art. 'Milk' in Kitto's Bib. Cycl. The refinements of the later, and still binding, Talmudic law (see especially Ḥullīn, 8 1 ff.) are referred to elsewhere (COOKING, § 8). Only locusts and fish, not the flesh of animals, venison, or fowl (see Jewish commentaries on Ḥullīn, l.c.) may still be boiled in milk.

2 Βούτυρον, lit. 'cow-cheese,' is now regarded as an instance of Volksetymologie, being an attempt on the part of the Greeks to reproduce the sound of the native Scythian name (see Hehn, Kulturpflanzen u. Hausthiere(6), 153 ff. with O. Schrader's note, 159, which see also for the attitude of the classical peoples to butter. Cp Pliny, HN 28 35 and the extracts from other classical writers given in Ugolini, de re rustica Vet. Hebr. in Thes. 29 174 ff.).

1 Doughty estimates the trade with Mecca alone at £2000 annually (Ar. Des. 2 457).

2 Butter in the East is made ordinarily from whole milk (but see § 3), hence חמאה never probably in any passage literally signifies our 'cream,' although Rashi in his commentary—writing, however, in the West—defines חמאה in Gen. 18 8 as 'the fat of milk (שומן החלב), which they skim from its surface.' As a link between biblical times and the present day, we would point to the usual Targum rendering of חמאה—viz., שְׁמַן (lit. 'fat'), by which we understand the Arabic samn. The βούτυρον (𝔊) of the Greek-speaking Jews of Egypt was manifestly in that climate samn.

passages of the OT, and in each case it represents a different expression in the original.

3. Cheese. (a) The most explicit of these is Job 10 10 where the patriarch, referring to the growth of the human fœtus, asks the Almighty: 'Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled (lit. thickened) me as cheese' (כַּגְּבִינָה)?

Here we have the ordinary Hebrew word for cheese, gĕbhīnāh, as found in the Mishna (passim), where also הֶעֱמִיד is the standing expression for curdling (reff. below), while the denominative גִּבֵּן, gibbēn, signifies to make cheese, hence מְגַבֵּן, mĕgabbēn, a cheese-maker (Tōseftā Shabbāth 9 [10] 13).

That cheesemaking was a flourishing industry in Jerusalem in NT times is usually inferred from the name of the valley between the eastern and western hills, the valley of the cheesemakers (τῶν τυροποιῶν, Jos. BJ v. 4 1 [Niese, § 140]). However, the contention recently submitted by some scholars of note (Halévy; Buhl, Pal. 132 etc.), that this name is a euphemism, has considerable plausibility. At the end of the so-called Tyropœon lay the dung gate (שַׁעַר הָאַשְׁפֹּת, Neh. 2 13 etc.), and hence it is conjectured that the original name of the valley was the 'dung or refuse valley' (gē hā-ašpōth), changed by a transposition of consonants into gē ha-šaphōth, cheese- or curd-valley (see below, b).

The milk was curdled by means of rennet (קֵבָה, 'Ăb. Zār. 2 4; cp Dt. 18 3); also of the acrid juice of the leaves and roots of certain trees and plants ('Orla 1 7). After being drained of the whey (קוֹם, Nĕdār. 6 5; מֵי חָלָב [water of milk], Makhshīr. 6 5), the curds were salted (Nĕdār., l.c.), shaped into round discs (עִגּוּל), and dried in the sun. These were hard enough to be cut with a hand-saw (Shabb. 17 2). The cheese of Bithynia enjoyed the highest repute in antiquity (Pliny, HN 11 97), but was forbidden to the Jews because it was curdled with the rennet that had been procured from calves not ritually slaughtered, or had been offered in heathen sacrifice ('Ab. Zār. 2 4).

(b) The present which David took to his brothers at the front—viz., ten חֲרִיצֵי הֶחָלָב (lit. 'cuts of milk,' 1 S. 17 18)—can hardly have been anything but 'ten fresh-milk cheeses' (cp 𝔊^L τρυφαλίδας [soft cheeses], 𝔊^A στρυφαλίδας, Vg. decem formellas casei).

(c) Quite obscure, on the other hand, is the present which David himself received at a later period, of ḥem'ā (here probably samn) and שְׁפוֹת בָּקָר, which EV (after Pesh. and Tg.) renders 'cheese of kine' (2 S. 17 29; 𝔊^BA σαφφωθ βοῶν, 𝔊^L γαλαθηνὰ μοσχάρια). Wetzstein advocates 'cream of kine,' similar to the preparation of thick cream scalded and sold in small wooden cylinders in Syria under the name of ḳishṭa. It is sometimes eaten with sugar[1] (see Wetzstein under 'Viehzucht' in Riehm's HWB and ZATW 3 276 ff.). It is tempting, however, to read שְׁאָפוֹת (from שָׁאַף, to rub down, crush, etc.), and to find in the expression the dried curds of the present day, which, rubbed down and mixed with water, give a most refreshing drink.

So universal an article of food as milk could hardly fail to suggest a variety of figures to the biblical writers.

4. Milk in OT figures. As the natural food of infants milk is used in the NT to express the first elements of religious instruction (1 Cor. 3 2 Heb. 5 12 f. 1 Pet. 2 2). In the oft-repeated phrase, 'flowing with milk and honey' (see HONEY), so expressive of the rich productiveness of the promised land, milk represents the common elements of the Hebrew dietary, as honey does its delicacies (cp wine and milk, Is. 55 1). So Joel embodies his conception of the surpassing fertility of the soil in the Messianic age in a picture of the hills flowing with milk (Joel 3 [4] 18). Together with snow, milk is typical of the whiteness of the human skin (Lam. 4 7), and, probably, of the human eye (Cant. 5 12). A bride's kisses are refreshing as honey and a draught of fresh milk (ib. 4 11), to which also the joys of the nuptial couch are compared (5 1).

MILL, MILLSTONES. The hand-mill is one of the most widely distributed of human inventions. Under

[1] The writer has eaten this delicacy in the Lebanon under the name of leben.

MORTAR will be found some account of the earlier appliances which served the same purpose (cp Nu. 11 8, mill and mortar mentioned together) among the Hebrews as among the Romans. For the latter we have not only the express testimony of Pliny and other writers for the later origin of the hand-mill, but also the still more important witness of the Latin terms pistor, pistrinum, etc.[1]

The handmill, as consisting like the old Scottish querns of two parts, was named רֵחַיִם, rēḥáyim (mod. Egypt raḥāya),

1. The mill and its parts. rarely טְחוֹן, ṭᵉḥōn (Lam. 5 13; cp ṭaḥūn, the Egyptian water-mill) and טַחֲנָה, ṭaḥănāh (Eccles. 12 4). Since the stones were originally of the same size, the mill looked as if cleft in two, hence פֶּלַח, pélaḥ (something cleft) was the old name for either millstone, the lower of which was then פֶּלַח תַּחְתִּית, pélaḥ taḥtīth (Job. 41 24 [Heb. 16], AV following 𝔊, Vg. etc., 'a piece of the nether millstone,' but see RV), the upper פֶּלַח רֶכֶב, pélaḥ rékeb (Judg. 9 53, 2 S. 11 21). In NT times the stones were distinguished simply as the רֶכֶב (chariot, or perhaps the rider, Arab. rākib, already Dt. 24 6), and the שֶׁכֶב (lier, our 'bed-stone,' Bāb. Bath. 2 1). The corresponding names in the Greek OT and in NT are: for the mill, μύλος,[2] Ex. 11 5, etc., perhaps Mt. 24 41 (best MSS); millstone is λίθος μυλικός only in Lk. 17 2 (in best MSS, see below), also μύλος Rev. 18 21 (B), 22, according to usual interpretation also Mt. 18 6 Mk. 9 42 (best MSS, but see below); the favourite Greek name of the upper stone, the catillus of the Romans, was ὄνος the ass, also ἐπιμύλιον (Dt. 24 6 Judg. 9 53 [B]; perhaps also μύλος, Judg. 9 53 [AL], 2 S. 11 21 f.); the nether millstone, the Roman meta, was μύλη in the special sense, but does not occur in the Gk. Bible. The mill-house or pistrinum was μυλών (Jer. 52 11 [not in Heb.], Mt. 24 41 [D and TR]), and perhaps μύλος (Mt. l.c. [א B]).

The hand-mill of the Hebrews (רֵחַיִם שֶׁל יָד, Zābīm 4 3, modelled on the Gk. χειρομύλη) can scarcely have differed in any important particular from the mill still in use in the East among Bedouins and fellāḥīn alike, although it probably presented the same variety of shape and size in different parts of the country.

Thus in some parts the stones are both flat, in others the lower is slightly convex and the upper correspondingly concave; some mills have both stones of equal diameter; in others, the upper, which is invariably the lighter, is of smaller diameter. This last seems to have been the usual fashion among the Jews of the first and second centuries A.D., when the diameter of 'the rider' was usually a couple of handbreadths less than that of 'the bed-stone' (Bāb. Bath. 2 1). The average diameter of the modern hand-mills is probably about 18 inches.

The lower stone is always of some hard stone, whilst the upper, in Syria at least, is almost invariably of the black, porous lava of Ḥaurān, which has the admirable quality of always preserving a rough surface. Through the centre of 'the rider' a funnel-shaped hole is chiselled out, and in the corresponding part of the bed-stone a stout peg of wood is inserted, by which the upper stone is kept in place. The upper stone is turned by means of an upright wooden handle inserted in its upper surface, near the edge. The mill is fed by pouring the grain in handfuls into the centre opening of the rider and may be placed on a sheepskin, or inside a large circular tray, placed on the ground to receive the flour[3] as it passes out between the stones.

Grinding the flour or barley-meal for the household need has in all ages been peculiarly women's work (Mt.

2. The work of the mill. 24 41—hence 'the grinders' of Eccles. 12 3, lit. as RV^mg. 'grinding women'), and a millstone has more than once in the world's history been an effective weapon in a woman's hand (Judg. 9 53 2 S. 11 21; cp the fate of Pyrrhus). Among the Jews grinding stood first among the housewifely duties, from which the young wife could only be released if she had brought, as part of her dowry, a slave girl as a substitute (Kĕthūbōth 55). In the houses of the great, the work of the mill fell to the female slaves (Ex. 11 5), hence the command to 'the daughter of Babylon' to 'take the millstones and grind meal' (Is. 47 2) is a prophecy of impending slavery. The same idea may underlie Job's words regarding his wife (Job 31 10*a*), although the parallelism certainly suggests a coarser interpretation, which the Vg. also finds in Lam. 5 13 (see the comms.). Male prisoners and captives were likewise compelled to this species of hard labour, as was Samson (Judg. 16 21), and, according to the Greek text of Jeremiah (52 11), king Zedekiah in Babylon. In the passage from Lamentations just alluded to (5 13), the Hebrew poet pathetically describes the lot of the young exiles, condemned to bear the heavy millstones to grind for their captors, while the boys stumbled beneath the wood[1] to fire their bread. The slaves were wont to lighten the burden of their labour with a song, the ᾠδὴ ἐπιμύλιος of the classics (a specimen from Plutarch apud Blümner, op. cit. 33), a practice to which there is a reference in the Gk. text of Eccles. 12 4 (φωνῆς τῆς ἀληθούσης).

[1] Servius' comment on Virgil, Æn. I 179, is often quoted: 'quia apud maiores nostros molarum usus non erat, frumenta torrebant et ea in pilas missa pinsebant, et hoc erat genus molendi, unde et pinsitores dicti sunt, qui nunc pistores vocantur.'

[2] The classical μύλη is used in the LXX only metaphorically of the molar teeth.

[3] A large basin or tray for this purpose seems intended by the יָם or 'sea' (i.e. basin; cp the 'brazen sea' of the Temple) of the mill (יָם הָרֵחַיִם), several times mentioned in the Talmud.

The form of the hand-mill or quern above described was doubtless the same as that which it first assumed among the classical peoples (cp Blümner's standard work, Technologie, etc. 24); but among the Romans of the later republic and the empire the form was somewhat different.

3. The mills of the Romans.

From a square or circular stone base rose the fixed nether millstone in the shape of a blunted cone, hence called meta, with an iron peg or pivot inserted at the top. The upper stone, the catillus, was cut into the shape of an hour-glass, or, more precisely, of the old-fashioned reversible wooden egg-cup. Its lower half was hung on the above-mentioned pivot, over and surrounding the meta, and the whole catillus was turned by means of a couple of handspikes through holes in its waist or narrowest part (see the illustrations in Smith's and Rich's Dicts. of Antiquities, s.v. 'Mola,' and in Blümner, op. cit. 27). The corn was poured into the upper half of the egg-cup, so to say, which served admirably as a hopper, and found its way through certain apertures in the waist to be ground between the surface of the cone-shaped meta and the inner surface of the lower half of the catillus. We mention these details mainly because we have discovered evidence, overlooked or misunderstood by previous writers, that this form of the mill was not unknown among the Jews of NT times. Thus in the regulations for the sale of house property, we have the following distinction in Jewish law, between fixtures that went with the house, and movables that did not (Bāb. Bath. 4 3) 'Whoso has sold a house has sold the door but not the key, the fixed mortar but not the movable one, the istrobīl (אסטרוביל) but not the ḳalath (קלת), etc.' Again, in Zābīm 4 2 we find mentioned together the istrobīl and the ḥămōr (חֲמוֹר) of the hand-mill (שֶׁלְּרֵחַיִם שֶׁלְּיָד). Now these terms have been entirely misunderstood by the authoritative commentators on the Mishna (see apud Surenhusius in loc.). In reality the ḥămōr of the hand-mill is nothing but the ὄνος (ass) or upper millstone of the Greeks (cp Hesychius, s.v. μύλη: καὶ οὕτω λέγεται καὶ ὁ κάτω τῆς μύλης λίθος τὸ δὲ καὶ ἄνω ὄνος),[2] which, again, from the shape of its upper portion, is also named the ḳalath (Gk. κάλαθος, a tapering, funnel-shaped basket).[3] Similarly, the istrobīl is the Gk. στρόβιλος, a spinning-top, the likeness to which of the meta or lower stone with its ribbed surface is self-evident. The mills of this construction were larger and heavier—those of Pompeii are about 5 to 6 feet in height—than the ordinary Jewish hand-mill, and, as we have seen, were built into the floor of the house. They were capable of being adjusted so as to produce flour of varying fineness; by this means, and by the process of bolting described below (col. 3095, begin.), were obtained the different sorts of 'flour' and 'fine flour' to which there is reference in the Mishna (Makhshīr. 10 5).

[1] Since Ibn Ezra it has sometimes been absurdly supposed that 'the wood' here means the light and unremovable handles of the mills! (So Hoheisel, De molis, etc., adopted in Smith's DB, art. 'Mill.')

[2] The learned author of the art. 'Bread' in Hastings' DB (1 317 a), in the section on the Hebrew hand-mill, in making ὄνος the 'nether millstone' has allowed himself to be misled by the erroneous and now antiquated findings of Hoheisel and other early investigators who wrote before the discovery of actual mills, esp. at Pompeii, had made their construction intelligible.

[3] Thus Pliny (HN 21 2) describes the flower of the lily as paulatim sese laxantis (tapering), effigie calathi.

In addition to these, the molæ manuales, the Romans made use of a still larger mill of the same construction turned by worn-out horses or asses, hence named molæ jumentariæ or molæ asinariæ (illustr. ut sup.).

4. The mola asinaria.

A reference to these ass-mills has been found by all commentators in Jesus' denunciation of him who shall cause the little ones of the kingdom to stumble, for—according to Mt.—'it is profitable for him that a μύλος ὀνικός (AV 'millstone,' RV 'great millstone,' RV^mg. 'a millstone turned by an ass') should be hanged about his neck and that he should be sunk in the depth of the sea' (Mt. 18 6 RV).[1]

We cannot here discuss the readings of the parallel passages, Mk. 9 42 Lk. 17 2; it must suffice to note that the μύλος ὀνικός is repeated in the textus receptus of Lk., where the best MSS and editors read λίθος μυλικός—i.e. the ordinary millstone (so RV)—which, again, is the received reading of Mk., where the best MSS have μύλος ὀνικός (RV with mg. as above).

What, then, was the μύλος ὀνικός? Is it the case, as a recent commentator puts it, that 'the vehement emphasis of Christ's words is toned down in Lk. here, as often elsewhere' (A. B. Bruce, Exp. Gk. Test. ad Lk. 17 2)? Has the third evangelist really reduced the heavier 'millstone turned by an ass' to the stone of an ordinary handmill? We reply that the μύλος ὀνικός of the first two evangelists is simply a literal Gk. rendering of mola asinaria or ass-mill, as indeed Jerome (Mt. l.c.), and before him the Peshiṭta, have perceived (cp Stephanus, Thes. Ling. Græc. 988). The words used by Jesus we suppose to have been the חֲמוֹר שֶׁלְּרֵחַיִם of the Mishna, or their Aramaic equivalent in the Gĕmārā חֲמָרָא דְרֵיחַיָא, the ass or upper millstone, which, as the removable stone (cp Mishna above), would most readily occur to contemporary readers of Lk.'s λίθος μυλικός. The author of the second gospel, probably followed by the author of the first, has confused the two meanings of חמור and ὄνος as applied to the upper millstone and the live animal that turned it—a confusion from which other Greek writers are not free (Blümner, op. cit. 35, n. 3). The result of this confusion is the impracticable suggestion of the offender having hung about his neck the relatively enormous weight of a whole mola asinaria. Only large private establishments or professional millers (טוֹחֵן, Dĕmai 3 4) would possess one of this class of mill. There is no reference in the Bible, it may be added, to the third class of ancient mills, the molæ aquariæ, or water-mills, now so largely used in Syria.

The Hebrew creditor is forbidden (Dt. 24 6) to 'take to pledge' either the whole mill[2] (RV) or even the upper stone, 'for he taketh the man's life to pledge,' in other words, the means by which the family sustenance was provided.

This law was later extended to include all the utensils necessary for the preparation of food (Bābā Mĕṣī'a 9 13, cp Jos. Ant. iv. 8 26 [Niese, § 270]). The user of the hand-mill in this direction

[1] For the Greek punishment known as καταποντισμός see the special treatises cited by Winer, RWB(3), 2 13, and Goetz, op. cit. In the Gospels, of course, we have a mere figure of speech.

[2] King James's translators, following a tradition as old as the second century A.D. adopted by Jewish commentators (see Rashi on Dt. l.c.), quite falsely rendered רֵחַיִם by 'nether millstone.'

was not limited to grinding wheat and barley. Beans, lentils, fruit, etc., might all be passed through the family mill (Mishna, passim). For the olive-mill (רחים של זיתים) and the pepper-mill (ר״ של פלפל) see OIL and SPICES respectively.

In order to obtain the 'fine flour' (סֹלֶת) required for the sacred offerings as well as for the finer sorts of bakemeats, it was necessary to bolt or sift the flour (קֶמַח) that came from the mill by means of a bolt-sieve (נָפָה, Is. 30 28, Mishna passim, the κόσκινον [Ecclus. 27 4] of the Greeks). To judge from the comparison of the model pupil to the nāphāh 'which lets out the ḳémaḥ and keeps back the sōleth' (Ābōth 5 15)—a passage misunderstood both by Jewish and Christian commentators (see, e.g., in Surenhusius)—the naphah used for this purpose was not a sieve with meshes like the modern munḫul (see Wetzstein, ZDPV 14 3 f.) but a close-bottomed sieve, the modern minsef. The bolting was effected by a combined up-and-down and rotatory motion—the verb (הַרְקִיד), used of the process of sifting the flour in Shabb. 7 2, means literally 'to cause to dance'—by which the heavier particles of the flour were collected at one side and thrown over the edge of the sieve.

5. The mill in figures. Among the figures which Hebrew writers have borrowed from the mill, in addition to the figure for slavery (Is. 47 2) already explained, may be noted Isaiah's graphic denunciation of the rich magnates of his day who ground 'the faces of the poor' (Is. 3 15). 'The dull rumour of the running millstones is' at this day 'as it were a comfortable voice of food in an Arabian village, when in the long sunny hours there is often none other human sound' (Doughty, Arab. Des. 2 179). So it was in the villages of Judæa, and hence the cessation of the 'comfortable voice' of the mill (קוֹל רֵחַיִם, Jer. 25 10; cp Rev. 18 22, φωνὴ μύλου) is to Jeremiah and the seer of Patmos an important factor in that 'solitude' which a ruthless enemy is wont to make and 'call it peace.' The essential hardness of the 'nether millstone' is the source of a popular proverb, first met with in Job (41 24 [16]). The identity of function in the case of the millstones and the teeth has suggested a figure common to many tongues (Eccles. 12 3 4; cp μύλη in the 𝕲 = dens molaris). In the Talmud, to have a millstone round one's neck is to be burdened with domestic cares, which are fatal to the fruitful study of the Tōrāh (Kiddūsh. 29 b). In the mediæval Hebrew work, the Choice of Pearls, 'he who poses as a wise man without the true wisdom is like to the "ass" (חֲמוֹר, the upper millstone) of the mill; which goes round and round without moving from its place' (cited but misunderstood by Goetz, op. cit. 219, and by those who quote from him; see ap. Hastings, op. et ll. cc.). Finally, it may be added that some have found in the Gk. proverb ὁ φεύγων μύλον ἄλφιτα φεύγει the original of Paul's wise injunction, 'if any man will not work, neither let him eat' (2 Thess. 3 10).

6. Literature. A considerable amount of special literature has been devoted to the mills of the ancients. The principal older works are Joh. Heringius, De Molendinis, 1663; Hoheisel, Dissertatio de Molis Manualibus Veterum, 1728; and esp. Goetzius, Diss. de Molis et Pistrinis Veterum, 1730—the two last reprinted by Ugolinus in his Thesaurus Antiquitatum Sacrarum, vol. xxix. These have all been superseded by Hugo Blümner's classical treatise Technologie und Terminologie der Gewerbe und Künste bei Griechen und Römern, 1875, Bd. 1 23 ff. A good summary in art. 'Mola' in Smith's Greek and Roman Antiquities(3).

A. R. S. K.

MILLENNIUM. Once, and only once, in the NT we hear of a millennium, for neither 1 Cor. 15 23 f. nor 1 Thess. 4 16 f. points in this direction.

1. References. We hear in Rev. 20 2-5 of a period of a thousand years during which 'the dragon [the old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan]'[1] (see DRAGON, § 2) is confined in the abyss, 'that he should deceive the nations no more until the thousand years be finished,' while the martyrs 'who worshipped not the beast nor his image,' alone of the dead live again, and reign with Christ. This revival of the martyrs is called 'the first resurrection' (v. 6), and at the end of the millennium Satan shall be loosed out of his prison for a little time to deceive the nations (v. 7; cp v. 3). See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 75, 88.

Why this specification of 1000 years? The Book of Enoch (91 12) gives a 'week' (see WEEK) as the period of the Messianic kingdom; the Apocalypse of Ezra (7 28 f.) gives 400 years, so also Rabbi, quoting Mic. 7 15 (Weber, Jüd. Theol. 373). It is in the Talmud that we find the statement that this kingdom will last for 1000 (or 2000) years. The world was to last for 5000 or 4000 years of evil; then, in the kingdom of the Messiah, 1000 or 2000 years of Sabbath-rest were to come for God's people. This idea may have been common in the time of the writers of the Apocalypse.

2. Origin of the idea. But was the idea really of Jewish origin? We may reasonably suspect that many of the later ideas were of Babylonian or Persian origin, though the new growths became thoroughly Jewish; and it is quite fair, in dealing with suspected Persian influences, to use the later Zoroastrian Scriptures, because these writings, even if late in composition, are admitted to embody and to develop genuine early traditions. Now it was the later Zoroastrian belief that time consisted of a series of twelve millenniums, the last of which should be marked by a wonderful progressive amelioration of the lot of the human race. Before the end of this twelfth millennium Saoshyans, the 'Triumphant Benefactor,' the last of the posthumous sons of Zarathustra, would be born. During the space of 57 years all evil would be destroyed, and at the end of this period Ahriman the fiend would be annihilated, and the renovation for the future existence (cp 'the new heavens and the new earth') would occur.[1]

3. Influence of the belief. Much fanaticism has sprung up in the Christian church from an exaggerated belief in the millennium. But so much must be admitted—that the doctrines with which this belief is connected have been morally most efficacious. Both Zoroastrianism and Christianity are deeply indebted to the doctrine which they both share, or have both shared, of the conflict between the two principles of good and evil, and of the future renovation of the earth; and when, as in Christianity, this is coupled with a belief in the future advent, not of a mythical Saoshyans, but of the historical Author of the faith, it has given an extraordinary force and freedom to the operation of the Christian spirit.

The expression of what we may call millenarianism in the Apocalypse of John is comparatively temperate. It is quite otherwise with other early Christian works. The Jewish apocalypses were received as sacred books of great antiquity, and their contents were greedily absorbed. Even the Gentile Christians were conquered by millenarianism, and in proportion as, after the war of Bar-Kocheba, the Jews became indifferent to the Messianic hope, chiliastic ideas became naturalised in the Christian communities, and the books containing them were sedulously preserved. Thus Papias confounds expressions of Jesus with verses from the Apocalypse of Baruch (29 5; see Charles's note) referring to the astonishing fruitfulness of the soil in the Messianic days (see Iren. 5 33). Barnabas (Ep. 15) accepts the Jewish theory that the present world will last 6000 years from the creation, that at the beginning of the Sabbath (the seventh millennium) the Son of God will appear, to put an end to the period of 'the unjust one,' to judge the wicked, and to renovate the earth. He does not, however, like Papias, expatiate in sensuous descriptions; it is to be a time of holy peace. It is not the end, however; it is followed by an eighth day of eternal duration—'the beginning of another world.' Hence, according to Barnabas, the Messianic reign closes the present

[1] Probably an interpolation from 12 9.

[1] See West's translations in Sacred Books of the East, vols. v., xxiv.; especially Bundahiš 30 3; Dinkard 7 10.

αἰών. Justin (Dial. 80) speaks of chiliasm as a necessary element of orthodoxy, though he knows Christians who do not accept it. He believes that a restored Jerusalem will be the seat of the Messiah's kingdom, and assumes that all believers, together with patriarchs and prophets, will enjoy perfect happiness for a thousand years. In fact, he reads this view into the Johannine Apocalypse. Cerinthus, too, speculative as he was, clings to the chiliastic ideas, and pictures Christ's kingdom as one of sensual pleasures (Eus. HE 3 28 7 25).

After the middle of the second century these expectations gradually retired into the backgroud. So early as the year 170 A.D., the party of the so-called Alogi rejected the whole body of apocalyptic writings, and denounced the Apocalypse of John as a mass of fables (cp APOCALYPSE, § 4). Perhaps their own hostility to Montanism was the cause. Here we may pause, noting, however, in conclusion that in the time of Eusebius the Greek Church was saturated with prejudice against the Apocalypse, on account of its 'Jewish' chiliasm.

MILLET (דֹּחַן, dōḥan; ΚΕΓΧΡΟΣ ; MILIUM) is once mentioned, along with wheat, barley, beans, lentils, and spelt, as an ingredient in bread (Ezek. 4 9†).

The Hebrew name is also found in Aramaic and Arabic. It may refer to the dark colour of the grain, since *dahan*ᵘⁿ means 'smoke' and *duḥnat*ᵘⁿ 'a smoky colour.' As it is in modern Egypt and Palestine the name of the common millet, Panicum miliaceum, L., this is probably the plant intended; it has been cultivated in Egypt since prehistoric times. Another kind of millet, Andropogon Sorghum, Bed., is also grown in Palestine (see Tristram, NHB 470): with this De Candolle (Orig. 306) is inclined to identify the Heb. dōḥan, but remarks that the modern Arabic word is applied to the variety saccharatus. Andropogon Sorghum seems to have had an African origin and to have been cultivated by the ancient Egyptians.

Generally supposed to be the designation of a kind of castle or other fortification.

(a) In Judg. 9 6 20, some identify it with the Tower of Shechem (vv. 46-49), a view which Moore pronounces 'very doubtful.' For a probable solution of the problem, see SHECHEM, TOWER OF.

(b) In 2 K. 12 20 [21], Joash is said to have been slain 'at Beth-millo (on the way?) that goes down to Silla.' So RV. But הירד סלא is probably a corruption of ירחמאל, which is a (correct) gloss on מלא. Render, therefore, simply, 'at Beth-jerahmeel.' See JOASH.

(c) In 2 S. 5 9 1 K. 9 15 24 11 27 1 Ch. 11 8 2 Ch. 32 5 it would seem to refer to some part of the fortifications of the citadel of Jerusalem. Probably, as in (a) and (b), מלוא is a corruption of ירחמאל. The most probable text of 2 S. 5 6 8 shows that the original population of Jerusalem was Jerahmeelite; and that of Is. 29 1, that it was sometimes called ('Ir) Jerahmeel—i.e., 'city of Jerahmeel' (see Crit. Bib.). Winckler, however (GI, 2 251), thinks that Beth-millo is an expression for a temple; he compares Ass. mullû = tamlû, a terrace or artificial elevation (cp Targ. מְלִיתָא). Within the fortification (מְצוּדָה) of the ancient Jerusalem was the sacred hill with its sanctuary; round this, for security, David built his house (2 S. 5 9). It was the same Beth-millo—i.e., 'sanctuary'—which Solomon, according to Winckler, restored; the tradition that the temple of Solomon was erected on a new site being late and incorrect. See JERUSALEM, § 21, and TEMPLE.

MINA (ΜΝΑ), Lk. 19 13 RVᵐᵍ· See MANEH.

MINES, METAL-WORK (Job 28 1 מוֹצָא, AVᵐᵍ·, RV 'mine'; 𝔊. ΤΟΠΟΣ ΟΘΕΝ ΓΙΝΕΤΑΙ; 1 Macc. 8 3 [ΚΑΤΑΚΡΑΤΗΣΑΙ] ΤΩΝ ΜΕΤΑΛΛΩΝ EV 'mines').

1. Were there mines in Palestine?

From passages like Dt. 8 9, 'A land whose stones are iron, And out of whose hills thou mayest dig copper,' and 33 25, 'The bolts be iron and bronze,' we might naturally infer that there were mines in Palestine. When we consider, too, that Solomon had his own workmen in the Lebanon who hewed out stone and prepared timber for his buildings (1 K. 5 13-18 [27-32]), it would not be strange if he also had miners. There may be a reference to this in a notice in 𝔊ᴮ of 1 K. 2 46*c*, which precedes a reference to his building of Θερμαι (see TADMOR) in the desert, καὶ Σαλωμων ἤρξατο ἀνοίγειν τὰ δυναστεύματα τοῦ Λιβάνου, if Winckler (Alttest. Unt. 175; GI, 2 235 261) is right in assuming that δυναστ. covers a Hebrew word meaning 'mines.' That iron was found in the Antilibanus, and copper in the Lebanon, is certain (see COPPER, IRON). It is not easy, however, to find such a Hebrew word as is required.[1] In Job 28 we have a somewhat technical description of mining operations; but the probability is that it refers to the mines of Upper Egypt and the Sinaitic peninsula. It is not, indeed, less interesting on that account, and it is fitting that the imagery employed in eulogising wisdom should not be exclusively derived from Palestine. There is, however, so much corruption in the text (cp GOLD, SAPPHIRE) that one may justly hesitate to institute a comparison between the details of the poet and those of a careful collector of knowledge like Pliny, except as regards the obviously sound portions. It is true that v. 1 refers to the washing of gold (זקק, properly 'to filter, strain'), such as is described by Diodorus (see GOLD, § 2), and v. 2 to the smelting of copper, whilst in v. 4 RV quite correctly renders, 'He breaketh open a shaft' (the marginal rendering of v. 4*a*, 'The flood breaketh out from where men sojourn' may be suggestive, but can claim no philological plausibility). The only other direct reference to mines is in 1 Macc. 8 3, where the Romans are said to have told Judas the Maccabee of the successful efforts they had made to win the gold and silver mines of Spain. In truth, the mineral wealth of Spain was such that that country seemed to the ancients a veritable El Dorado (see Posidonius, ap. Strab. 145 ff.). See, further, AMBER, COPPER, GOLD, IRON, LEAD, SILVER, TIN.

Our result thus far is disappointing. Mining was not and could not be as present to the mind of a Jew as it was to that of an Arab. Such a saying as that ascribed to Mohammed, 'Men are mines,'[2]—i.e., they produce only what nature inclines them to produce; they cannot produce what is not already in them,—would have been impossible in the mouth of a Jew (cp Mt. 7 16-18).

There are, however, many references to metallurgical operations.

2. Metallurgy.

(a) Smelting supplies one of the most favourite figures to Jewish teachers. There is a striking passage in Ezekiel (22 18-22) where the process of the smelter, who blows the fire in which the copper, tin, iron, and lead have been placed, is compared to the judgments about to come on the house of Israel. The same image, however, is also used for consolation—e.g., in Is. 1 25 (cp FURNACE). See Pliny, HN, 37 47, and Rawlinson, Phœnicia, chap. 10.

(b) The casting of images and other sacred objects (Ex. 25 12 26 37 Is. 40 19 1 K. 7 46) of gold, silver, or copper, is also mentioned, but not the casting of objects of iron.

(c) The hammering of metal, and making it into broad sheets (Nu. 16 38 [17 3] Is. 44 12).

(d) Soldering and welding (Is. 41 7); (e) polishing (1 K. 7 45); (f) overlaying with plates of gold, silver, or copper (Ex. 25 11-24 1 K. 6 20 2 Ch. 3 5 Is. 40 19). FURNACE, JOB, § 11.

These operations seem to have been carried on to a considerable extent among the Israelites. We learn, however, that in Solomon's time it was necessary to obtain Phœnician assistance in executing the metal work for the temple (1 K. 7 13 ff.). See, further, FURNACE; HIRAM, 2; HANDICRAFTS; JOB, § 11.

MINGLED PEOPLE (עֶרֶב, 1 K. 10 15 Jer. 25 24; elsewhere עֵרֶב, pointed on the assumption that the word means 'mixture'—i.e., 'a mixed multitude' [almost always with art.; see below]; ΕΠΙΜΙΚΤΟϹ, ϹΥΜ., ΤΟΝ ΛΑΟΝ ΤΟΝ ΑΝΑΜΕΜΙΓΜΕΝΟΝ [L in Neh.]). In Jer. 25 20 50 37 it is supposed to mean the foreign mercenaries in the Egyptian and Chaldæan armies respectively (cp ARMY, § 9). In 1 K. 10 15 Jer. 25 24 Ezek. 30 5 it is more difficult to give a plausible justification of the rendering, since here the word undeniably has an ethnographic significance. The most critical course is, probably, in all the passages mentioned, to point עֲרָב, 'Arabia,' though a middle course is preferred by some scholars (see ARABIA, § 1).[1] In Jer. 25 24 it is obvious at a glance (cp 𝔊 and Aq., Theod. in Qmg.) that there has been dittography (see ARABIA, § 1); 'mingled people' is the makeshift of an editor who had to evade this. In Jer. 25 20 'and all Arabia,' which is the correct rendering of the consonants of the text, should be omitted, as due to a scribe's error (cp v. 24); in Jer. 50 37 the Arabian population in Babylonia is referred to.

The same word, without the article, occurs in Ex. 12 38 (where רב, ignored by EV, is dittographed), Neh. 13 3, where it is rendered Mixed Multitude. In the former passage it is supposed to mean the colluvies of various races which accompanied the Israelites at the Exodus (cp Nu. 11 4 Dt. 29 11 [10] Josh. 8 35); in the latter, the Ammonites, Moabites, and others, with whom Ezra found that the Judæan Jews had had intercourse, contrary to Dt. 23 3 ff. It is plain, however, that to produce a proper antithesis between ערב and 'Israel' the former word ought to be the designation of a people—i.e., we ought in both passages to point עֲרָב, Arabians (so, in Neh. l.c., E. Meyer, Entst. 130). THE MIXED MULTITUDE is also the rendering of הָאסַפְסֻף in Nu. 11 4.

האספסף is usually taken to be a synonym of ערב רב (Geiger, Urschr. 71, after Sam. ערברב), and to mean the non-Israelites in the host of the Hebrews. However, if ערב means 'Arabians,' אספסף must be a corruption of some word of similar meaning. A more probable correction than שאסים, Shāsīm—i.e., the Shāsu of the Egyptian inscriptions, is צָרְפָתִים, 'Zarephathites.' See MOSES, § 11, ZAREPHATH. A connection with Osarsiph (Manetho's name for Moses) or with Asaph can hardly be thought of. T. K. C.

MINIAMIN (מִנְיָמִין), 2 Ch. 31 15 Neh. 12 17 41. See MIJAMIN.

MINISTER. 1. The word most usually so rendered is מְשָׁרֵת, mĕšārēth (ΛΕΙΤΟΥΡΓΟϹ; minister), pt. of שרת 'to serve' (in a free and honourable capacity, as distinguished from עבד, which denotes the service of a slave). See Ex. 24 13 (Joshua), 2 S. 13 17 f., 2 K. 4 43 6 15, Prov. 29 12; fem. in 1 K. 1 15. In later writings, it is specially used of the service of God or of 'the altar' (Is. 61 6 Jer. 33 21 Joel 1 9 13 2 17); see also Ps. 103 21 104 4. It is noteworthy that where the Hebrew text of Sirach (4 14) gives מְשרתי קדש משרתיה, 'Ministers of holiness are her (Wisdom's) ministers,' the Greek uses two different verbs, οἱ λατρεύοντες αὐτῇ λειτουργήσουσιν ἁγίῳ.

2. פלח, Ass. palāḫu, to fear or worship, is used in Ezra 7 24 of the 'ministers of the house of God.' The same verb is met with in Dan. 3 12 14 17 f., 6 17 21 7 14 27 (φοβεῖσθαι, λατρεύειν, δουλεύειν).

3. For כֹּהֵן (2 S. 8 18 1 K. 4 5) see MINISTER (CHIEF).

4. ὑπηρέτης Lk. 4 20 Acts 13 5, RV 'attendant.'

5. διάκονος Mt. 20 26 Mk. 10 43. See DEACON, § 1, and MINISTRY, § 40.

6. λειτουργός (a) A minister of God, generally; Rom. 13 6 Heb. 1 7 (=Ps. 104 4). (b) A minister of Jesus Christ, Rom. 15 16, where ἱερουργοῦντα τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ follows—i.e., 'doing the work of a priest of the gospel' (Jowett). (c) Applied to Christ, as the sole officer or administrator in the true sanctuary, τῶν ἁγίων λειτουργός, Heb. 8 2.—In Acts 13 2, λειτουργούντων αὐτῶν τῷ κυρίῳ is of course metaphorical, and alludes to the doctrine of the NT and of certain psalmists that prayer is the most acceptable sacrifice. Note that λειτουργούντων is followed by νηστευόντων; prayer and fasting are naturally combined. In Heb. 10 11 the same verb is used of the OT priests; so λειτουργία in Lk. 1 23 Heb. 8 6 9 21. Figurative uses of λειτουργία in Phil. 2 17 30 2 Cor. 9 12; cp Rom. 15 27.—Of the more special use of λειτουργία, connecting it with the office of the Holy Eucharist, there is no trace in the NT. It is usually said that the ordinary Greek usage gives no suggestion of the application of λειτουργέω found in the LXX and the Greek NT, though here and there in Diod. Sic., Dionys. Halicarn., and Plutarch λειτουργός is used of priests.[1] It has been shown, however, that λειτουργέω and λειτουργία are often used of ministering in the temples in the Egyptian papyri (for references see Deissmann, Bibel-studien, 138).

MINISTER, CHIEF (כֹּהֵן), the title of an office in the courts of David and Solomon, 2 S. 8 18 (David's sons, ΑΥΛΑΡΧΑΙ); 20 26 (Ira the Jairite, ΙΕΡΕΥϹ); 1 K. 4 5 (Nathan, not in 𝔊BL) in RVmg.. This rendering expresses the view of Baudissin[2] and Buhl[3] (Ges.(13)-Bu.(2)). 'Probably,' says Baudissin, 'the title of priest was attached, honoris causâ, to kings' sons and high officers.' H. P. Smith, Löhr, and others support this view. 'The traditional exegesis,' says H. P. Smith, 'has difficulty in supposing David's sons to be priests in the proper sense, for by the Levitical code none could be priests except descendants of Aaron.' The Chronicler is supposed to have already felt this difficulty; in 1 Ch. 18 17, we read 'And the sons of David were the chief beside the king' (RV 'chief about the king' οἱ πρῶτοι διάδοχοι [διαδόχου L] τοῦ βασ.). Robertson Smith[4] quotes 2 S. 8 18, along with 2 K. 10 11 12 2, as proving that the higher priests were grandees. (See also Driver, TBS, 220.)

But (a) in 1 K. 4 5 כֹּהֵן, 'priest,' is followed by רֵעֶה, 'friend.' 'Priest-friend' is impossible; Hushai was a 'friend,' but no priest. Plainly כֹּהֵן is a gloss, which in 𝔊 has actually expelled the word which it sought to explain. כֹּהֵן, therefore, would seem to be the wrong word. (b) In 1 K. 4 6, as Klost. has shown, we ought to read, not אחישר, but אָחִיו שַׂר; Zabud then was a כהן (corrupt surely) who was Azariah's brother and the officer over the palace. In Is. 22 15 the governor of the palace is called a סֹכֵן.[5] Obviously סֹכֵן or סֹכְנִים (as the case may require) should be substituted for כֹּהֵן or כֹּהֲנִים in 2 S. 8 18 20 26 1 K. 4 5. David's sons, then, and Zabud, son of Nathan, were sōkĕnīm,—i.e., 'chief ministers' or administrators (see TREASURER), or, to adopt another current title, 'friends' (see FRIEND). In 1 Ch. 18 17 we should perhaps read הָיוּ סֹכְנִים לְדָוִיד, 'were David's administrators.' The emendation was incidentally suggested long ago for 2 S. 8 18 by Hitzig (on Ps. 110); independently the present writer has given the same view in a more complete form with a discussion in the Expositor, June, 1899. T. K. C.

[1] Aquila and Symmachus, in accordance with MT of 2 Ch. 9 14, actually read עֲרָב in 1 K. 10 15; 𝔊 (τοῦ πέραν [BA], ἐν τῷ πέραν [L]), however, presupposes הָעֵבֶר (cp v. 4)—i.e., 'the country beyond the river' (cp EBER).

CONTENTS

1. General. In so far as religion consists in a relation of the devout heart to God, every thing of the nature of a 'constitution,' any relation of superiority or subordination between certain human persons and others, anything that could be described as legal formality is essentially foreign to its nature. (a) The fact is certainly noteworthy that Sohm (see § 60), whose lifework it has been to study church law in all its forms, has expressed it as his deliberate judgment that strictly speaking no such thing ought ever to have existed (pp. 1-3). One evidence that a judgment of this kind has never been wholly without its advocates is to be found in the efforts towards reform which have at all times been made—efforts which, if not exclusively, almost always at least partially, were directed against existing ecclesiastical constitutions—as well as in the schisms and the sects which almost invariably have had it as their professed object to effect a return to the primitive Christian simplicity as conceived by them.

(b) The same history shows at the same time that any such object is impossible of permanent attainment. On this account alone it would be of importance that we should reach a clear idea of the way in which ecclesiastical forms of government first came into being. With this end in view the student's first task must be to inquire what were the worthy and wholly creditable causes that led to the formation of the first organised Christian fellowships.

Whatever the form of piety, the need of sharing it with others is felt, and once the devout soul has found comrades it cannot but seek to rejoice along with them in the glad possession they have found together. Once formed, this fellowship becomes a powerful support for each individual in the moments when he finds himself wavering, whether through doubts in his own mind as to the truth of his conviction, or through unfavourable outward circumstances, especially a time of persecution. The mutual love drawn forth in such a fellowship will also express itself in various forms of material help as occasion arises. The fellowship, moreover, is able to restrain the individual—even against his own will—from actions which would mean the abandonment of his higher ideals, and cast reproach on his past attainments. In so far as arrangements were necessary for these ends—regular meetings, care for the right conducting of these, articulate expression of the faith held in common, ministration to the necessities of those who might be in spiritual or bodily need, money collections, nay, even interference with the economical or ethical private affairs of those who might suffer without such intervention—everything accomplished in such directions must be regarded as a sign of progress.

(c) Such arrangements nevertheless carry within themselves a danger to the purity of religion.

The sharp division between members and non-members leads only too easily to an exaggerated consciousness of selectness and a depreciation of 'outsiders' (cp 1 Cor. 5 12 f.). The practically compulsory attendance at the regular meetings, the uniformity of the proceedings there, the formal common prayer, may result in a cooling of the emotions of the heart; such a thing as attachment to the religious principles of the community, yet without full formal assent given and without participation in all ceremonies, is not regarded as admissible; and yet it is easily possible that not only particular institutions but also (and above all) the formulated expressions of the common faith may take such a form as many a one may find himself unable to accept, whilst yet his attitude towards the matter in its religious essence is entirely sympathetic, and the impossibility of full membership in the community is felt by him as involving a grievous loss. The interference in the private affairs of individual members in like manner not only can easily be carried farther than is desirable; what is worse, in place of a pure concern for the imperilled individual may come concern for the interests of the community, for appearances, for the maintenance of decisions once arrived at (though now perhaps in need of reform), in a manner that may lead to grave injustices. Above all, there is apt to develop itself only too readily, in the persons charged with the duty of ruling and judging, an unhealthy sense of superiority, an autocratic, ambitious, and even, where money is concerned, an avaricious temper.

(d) All these phenomena, both on the one side and on the other, in their noble and, to an appalling extent, in their ignoble aspects, are already to be seen in the Old-Christian literature, canonical and extra-canonical, down to about 170 or 180 A.D.—that is, to the time which marks the close of the period now to be considered, as being the latest date within which the NT books could have arisen. In view of what these writings reveal, the following general observation admits of being made: the more elaborate the forms and institutions, the more conspicuously do their hurtful effects predominate. In the literature just mentioned we can already observe the beginning of every one of those tendencies which afterwards wrought so perniciously in the church. It will therefore perhaps not be wholly superfluous to remember that our historical investigation of these beginnings ought not to be carried on with too great partiality for them. At any rate it will be necessary at all times to bear in mind that our research has reference to a subject of only relative and, so far as the essence of religion is concerned, unquestionably only secondary importance. Historically speaking, it is evident that our first weighty thesis regarding the constitution of the church must be the same as that which has to be laid down regarding the canon (the two histories are closely parallel at all points) if we may adopt the famous words used by Arius of the Person of Christ; there was a time when it was not (ἦν ὅτε οὐκ ἦν).

I. JESUS

The truth of the thesis just enounced emerges immediately when we turn to the teaching of Jesus.

2. Jesus and Judaism. (a) It would be a great mistake to suppose that Jesus himself founded a new religious community.

The furthest that can be adduced in this direction is the saying (in Mt. 26 61 27 40 and ||s) that he would destroy the temple and in three days build up another—or 'it.' These two readings, however, differ considerably. The interpretation in Jn. 2 19-22 is to be left out of account. Jesus would certainly not have called his body a temple; the sole purpose of the writer in connecting the saying with the cleansing of the temple is to gain another of those words of two meanings which are so characteristic of the Fourth Gospel. If, however, Jesus really gave expression to the thought which, according to the synoptists (most clearly in Mk. 14 58: 'made with hands,' 'not made with hands'; χειροποίητον—ἀχειροποίητον), lies in the words, he certainly did not carry it out.

(b) Whatever the freedom of Jesus' outward attitude towards the law when he laid down such maxims as Mt. 5 32 34-37 12 7 f. 19 8, he must certainly have been, in the general conduct of his life, if not perhaps a strict legalist (according to Jos. Ant. xvii. 2 4, § 42, the Pharisees numbered altogether only some 6000), at least an adherent of the law; had he been otherwise we should not have found his personal disciples clinging so persistently to it or the Pauline doctrine of freedom from the law encountering the opposition it did. In a word, it was hearts not external conditions that Jesus sought to reform. He sought to arouse the conscience to make decision for itself, not himself to give the decisions.

Precisely in this element of restraint, in this confining himself to quite general principles of universal application, lay the enduring vitality of Jesus' work. Seldom do we find him giving definite form to institutions at all, as when he forbids oaths, or divorce; in the result, his adherents with the utmost calmness ignored them. Of the prohibition of oaths Paul knows nothing (Gal. 1 20 2 Cor. 1 23 11 31, etc.), the epistle to the Hebrews nothing (6 16); and, as for the prohibition of divorce, it was set aside by Paul in 1 Cor. 7 15, and by tradition (in Mt. [5 32 19 9], contrary to the testimony of Paul [1 Cor. 7 10 f.], as also of Mk. and Lk.) by the addition of the words 'saving for the cause of fornication' (παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας) or 'except for fornication' (μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ) (GOSPELS, § 145 d).

(c) In a saying which is shown by its very nature to be absolutely authentic (Mt. 5 23 f.) Jesus assumes that gifts are offered in the temple and demands merely that fraternal reconciliation shall be regarded as more important. The idea of the Ebionitic source in Lk. (GOSPELS, § 110) that one must wholly divest oneself of every earthly possession is so impossible of reconciliation with the fundamental thought of Jesus as to the all-importance of disposition and spirit that it can only be regarded as based on a misunderstanding. The exhortation given by Jesus to the rich man (Mk. 10 21 and s) to give all his goods to the poor, with utterances of a like kind (COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5), may have given occasion to such a view. We have, however, no certainty that Jesus would have spoken thus to every rich man; possibly he may have spoken as he did to the particular individual in the story either because he knew him or because he saw through him.

Or it may have been because the man desired to be a follower of Jesus and received into the inner circle

3. His inner circle. of his disciples. (a) For this inner circle Jesus had of necessity to devise some arrangement differing in various respects from those of ordinary civil life. The injunctions of Mt. 10 1-15 and ||s, however, in so far as they come from Jesus at all and not from a later time (GOSPELS, §§ 128 b, 136), are to be taken as applying only to the short missionary journey of the disciples, not to the period during which they are in the company of Jesus. The idea that Jesus gathered together all his adherents into one new religious community being impossible, the attempt is indeed often made to establish the conception of a 'community of disciples' in the sense that Jesus laid down special ordinances for these at least. Neither, however, can this be carried out. It is supposed that in this way justification can be found for the church's present disregard of the prohibition of oaths or of the precepts to let the unjust claimant of a man's coat have his cloak also, and when smitten on the right cheek to turn the other also (Mt. 5 34*a* 37 39-41) and, as regards the prohibition of divorce, for accepting as authoritative precisely those exceptions which were not laid down by Jesus. It is urged that strict principles like these were laid down by Jesus only for an ideal set of conditions such as he saw realised, or wished to see realised, in the community of his disciples but not for ordinary civil life. It would, however, be directly contrary to the ethical conceptions of Jesus that anything should become a rule for one, which did not require to be so for another. Or, were such precepts as those of Mk. 9 35 and ||s, bidding him that would be greatest become a servant, or those of Mt. 23 8, bidding all who hear to avoid the title of rabbi and cherish that of brother, intended only for 'ideal conditions' of society?

(b) We come now to the question as to positions of pre-eminence accorded to certain individuals. If Jesus did indeed designate the members of the inner circle of his disciples by the name 'apostles'—which remains doubtful notwithstanding Mk. 3 14 Lk. 6 13 (11 49)—we may be sure, from what has been adduced above, that at any rate he did not do so as conferring a particular rank upon them, but merely in order to denote the manner in which they were to serve. The same is true of Mt. 10 40: he who receiveth you receiveth me. Here the parallel in Lk. 10 16 is very instructive; he that heareth you heareth me, and he that rejecteth you rejecteth me. This does not put the disciples on a level with Jesus in respect of dignity, but is only a self-evident consequence of the presupposition that they fittingly carry on the preaching of Jesus. Equally instructive is the other parallel Mt. 18 5 = Mk. 9 37 = Lk. 9 48: whosoever receiveth a child in my name receiveth me.

The saying in Mt. 16 18 f. as to the primacy of Peter must be viewed in the same light. 16 19*a* ('I will

4. Saying about Peter. give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven') is the most that can be regarded as having actually come from Jesus—not, however, in the sense which it has in its present context where Peter is represented as the highest servant in a household (cp Is. 22 22), but only if we might venture to suppose that Jesus intended to convey something similar to what we find in Mt. 23 13 (ye shut the kingdom of heaven against men)—namely, that it is given to Peter, by preaching of the gospel, to open the door of the kingdom of heaven. 16 19*b* ('whatsoever thou shalt bind,' etc.), on the other hand, cannot have been intended for Peter alone, if only because in 18 18 it is applied to the entire aggregate of disciples in the widest sense (there all hearers of Jesus, not the apostles alone, are being addressed).

To judge by the connection with vv. 15-17, by binding and loosing (see BINDING AND LOOSING) is meant the non-forgiveness and forgiveness of sins (cp Is. 40 2 LXX: λέλυται αὐτῆς ἡ ἁμαρτία), and the word is so taken also in Jn. 20 23, though there with limitation to the apostles. In such a sense the word is, in the mouth of Jesus, impossible. The forgiveness and non-forgiveness of sins belong to God, and if Jesus as Messiah laid claim also to the exercise of such power (Mt. 9 6 and ||s) it is nevertheless impossible that he should have delegated it to any merely human authority—whether to each separate individual among his followers (for that only the aggregate of these as a corporation is to have this right, is by no means said in Mt. 18 18), or to the apostles, or even to Peter alone—still less would he delegate the power of declaring sins incapable of forgiveness. Even, however, when we disregard the connection and assume that by binding and loosing Jesus, in accordance with the original sense of the words, meant forbidding and allowing, it is very difficult to believe him to have said that what his followers, or even Peter, should determine in such a manner would also be held as forbidden or allowed in heaven.

In 16 18 we may entirely believe that Jesus said Peter really was, what his name implied, a rock (πέτρα; in Aram. the name and the appellative are absolutely identical); only the more incredible, on the other hand, is the continuation, the more certainly false its old Protestant interpretation, that by the 'rock' is meant not Peter's person, but his faith. Cp GOSPELS, §§ 136, 151.

A further consideration that tells against the genuineness of Mt. 16 18*b* is the occurrence in it of the word ecclēsia (ἐκκλησία).

5. An ecclēsia?

(a) After it has been seen to be impossible to maintain that Jesus founded any distinct religious community, there will still be felt in many quarters a strong desire to discover that he made provision for the founding of such an institution in the future. Whether he would have arrived at this had he lived longer is a question that must remain unanswered. ' In view of the shortness of his public activity, however, it is easy to understand why our sources should fail to supply us with any indication as to this. From the beginning of his ministry down even to the day of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem Jesus cherished the hope of winning the Jewish nation en bloc to his side. Only by a very definite act of renunciation could he have brought himself to contemplate but a small part of it as his ecclēsia.

(b) As for the word itself, it occurs elsewhere in the Gospels only in Mt. 18 17. There, however, it denotes simply the Jewish local community to which every one belongs; for what is said relates not to the future but to the present, in which a Christian ecclēsia cannot, of course, be thought of. Even in 18 15-17, however, we are not to see any precept intended to be literally carried out; it is only a concrete and detailed illustration of the thought that one ought to leave no stone unturned in order to bring an erring brother to repentance. Should anyone perchance have succeeded in effecting this in some other way, Jesus would never have looked upon such a result as a violation of the precept he had laid down. If the precept must have been meant to be taken literally, we should have therein a proof of its late origin. In any case, what demands our careful attention is the closing expression: let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican. No suggestion here of authorised excommunication. After the failure of every attempt at reconciliation the injured person is to regard his assailant as he regards a Gentile and a publican.

(c) Baptism also and the repetition of the last supper were no ordinances of Jesus (GOSPELS, §§ 136 end, 145 c).

On the last evening of his earthly life Jesus' purpose was fully attained when he had supplied his disciples with a mode of looking at his approaching death by which they could be protected against despair. That in after years and generations his actions and words on that occasion were ever anew recalled to memory has certainly been well; but for Jesus there was no occasion to enjoin this, as he could take it for granted as matter of course that what he had said as to the divine purpose of his death would impress itself indelibly on the minds of his disciples and supply them with the strength they needed for steadfastness in his cause. Conybeare (ZNTW, 1901, 275-288) shows that Eus. down to 325 A.D. read Mt. 28 19 thus: 'and make disciples of all the nations in my name, teaching them,' etc.

(d) If, finally, the conclusion of the parable of the tares, Mt. 13 28*b*-30, does not come from Jesus (GOSPELS, § 128 c), we are left without any evidence that he instituted measures for the cleansing of the church from its impure elements, whether sinners or heretics. The parable of the net (Mt. 13 47-50) is much slighter; it describes only what happens on the judgment day without dealing with the preceding actions of men.

This whole attitude of unconcern was rendered possible only because the portion of Mt. 23 8, not yet cited above (§ 3 a, end), applied to the situation: one is your teacher; cp 23 10 (one is your Master, even the Christ), though Jesus can hardly have expressed himself literally so. It was only the unconditional authority of Jesus and the possibility of his settling at once every question as it emerged that made any hard and fast regulations dispensable.

6. Jesus' authority.

(a) Yet, precisely on account of the greatness of the authority which he claimed and actually possessed, it requires further to be pointed out that he made the claim, essentially, not for his person but only for the cause which he represented. Assuredly he required of his disciples in a very energetic way that he should be believed and followed. Yet according to the synoptics he by no means made his own person the centre of religion in the manner in which we find this done in the Fourth Gospel.

Here again the continuation of the passages cited above (§ 3 b) is instructive: whosoever receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. Thus God is no otherwise represented by Jesus than Jesus by his apostles or by a child who is received in his name. 'In my name' can here quite simply mean: because I have enjoined such a reception of children. Different, but certainly not original, is the explanation added to 'in my name' (ἐν ὀνόματί μου) in Mk. 9 41: 'because ye are Christ's' (ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἐστε). Further, it is evident at a glance that one of the two members is superfluous and thus in all probability may be regarded as a later addition. Moreover, 'the name of Jesus' or even 'the Name,' without any addition (Acts 5 41 3 Jn. 7, etc.), became in the apostolic time so much of a watchword —used even in unnatural connections, as for example in Acts 15 26 ('men that have hazarded their lives for'), 21 13 ('to die at Jerusalem for'), 26 9 ('that I ought to do many things contrary to')—that it may be questioned whether it does not owe its origin to this later usage even in Mt. 10 22 ('ye shall be hated of all men for'), 24 9 ('hated of all the nations for' [= Mk. 13 13 Lk. 21 17]), 19 29. Similarly the formulation in Mt. 10 32 f. may be held open to question. In any case in Mt. 10 37-39 we may very well apply the principle that when Jesus names himself we ought to think ultimately of the cause represented by him ('whoso loveth father or mother more than me,' etc.). Instructive if certainly not original is the collocation in Mk. 8 35 10 29: 'for my sake and the Gospel's' (ἕνεκεν ἐμοῦ καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου: GOSPELS, 119 b) with the parallels 'for my name's sake' (ἕνεκα τοῦ ἐμοῦ ὀνόματος: Mt. 19 29) and 'for the kingdom of God's sake' (εἵνεκεν τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ θεοῦ: Lk. 18 29).

(b) The reason why this subordinate relation between the person of Jesus and the cause he represents must be consistently maintained and doubt entertained as to all that militates against it is to be sought in the passage which is elsewhere (GOSPELS, § 139) included among the 'foundation pillars' of a life of Jesus: 'whosoever shall speak' etc., Mt. 12 32. If, accordingly, Jesus demanded faith in his person, it was only as a means, not as an end in itself, and thus also not as an indispensable condition of salvation. The objects of the faith which he unconditionally demands are the reality of the Final Judgment on the one hand and the Fatherly Love of God on the other. Such a faith, however, can be cherished by any one in any position in life and in any religious fellowship. So small was the concern of Jesus to leave behind him, for the new religious fellowship which might be formed in connection with his preaching, even so much as the tangible centre which his person might supply, not to speak of definite institutions and laws. At the moment of his death, the whole church-constitution of future generations was yet to shape.

(c) We may perhaps deem this a disadvantage; but we must at the same time allow ourselves to be convinced that in view of what Jesus was it was inevitable; and perhaps after all a blessing lay concealed in the absence of formal constitutions drawn up with the authority of Jesus. When constitutions became antiquated there was no insuperable obstacle in the way of their removal; the pure religious-ethical gospel stood forth as the one eternally abiding thing still possessed of force to regulate and mould the new forms called forth by new times. History has at least clearly taught this: when once, rightly or wrongly, men attributed to Jesus certain arrangements, such as the primacy of Peter (and his alleged successors in Rome), the prohibition of oaths and of divorce (with exceptions in the latter case), the form of celebration of the eucharist, the age for baptism and the trinitarian formula to be employed in it, the immutability of these arrangements has created for the Christian church difficulties and dangers of the gravest character, seriously impeded its prosperous development, and even at times imperilled its very existence.

II. APOSTOLIC AGE

With the death of Jesus the whole situation changed. (a) The master had been taken away. In compensation for this loss came what his followers had not hitherto possessed: the belief in his resurrection. This was not belief in something future, like the Final Judgment, or in some attribute of God, such as his forgiving love, ever anew to be hoped for and experienced. It was belief in a fact of the past. Such a belief was open to historical criticism. In the event of a favourable issue it might promote a clearer intellectual apprehension without any participation of the heart. In the event of an unfavourable issue the whole of the new religion could be endangered. Furthermore, a firm confession of faith towards Jesus was attained; his later designation 'Jesus Christ' was properly speaking and essentially a sentence expressing this new faith: Jesus is the Messiah. There came to be a definitely fixed circle of persons who confessed this faith, and a precise delimitation from all those who were not members of the new society.

7. Fundamental facts regarding the primitive church.

(b) Moreover, there came into existence recurring meetings with observance of the Lord's supper and—very soon, at any rate—also an outward act of admission into the society, the rite of baptism.

The eucharistic formula in Mk. (14 22-24) and in Mt. (26 26-28) shows that in the regions to which the writers of these gospels belonged the words 'this do in remembrance of me' were still unused in the celebration, and thus also were still unknown as words of Jesus. On the other hand, Paul, who has them, must have believed them to have come from Jesus. The two facts can be reconciled only if we suppose that he had found (not these words indeed, but) as a matter of fact the actual repetition of the celebration current among Christians at the very beginning of his acquaintance with them, that is to say even in his persecuting days, and thus very shortly after the death of Jesus.

As for baptism its origin is strictly speaking very obscure. It is certain, however, that Paul takes it for granted as a matter of course in the case of every one who passes over to Christianity (Rom. 6 3 Gal. 3 27 1 Cor. 12 13—which is by no means invalidated by 1 13-17). This would be hard to understand if he himself was never baptized. Here also, as in the whole of what is said in succeeding sections relating to the apostolic age, we shall leave out of account what is related in Acts (on Paul's baptism, especially, see 9 18) as not being sufficiently trustworthy. Paul himself, however, appears in point of fact in Rom. 6 3-8 to presuppose his own baptism although often enough he inadvertently uses the first plural in cases where it does not apply at one and the same time both to himself and to all his readers (Gal. 3 13 23-25 4 5 1 Cor. 10 1 Rom. 4 1 7 6). Even so, it may still always remain a question whether he received baptism in accordance with a fixed custom or in accordance with a personal wish to receive a penitential baptism after the manner of that of John. In any case it cannot be doubted that the custom became fixed not long after the death of Jesus.

(c) Other institutions of the primitive church, which rest on the authority of Acts alone we shall return to later (§§ 21-23), confining ourselves at present to what may be regarded as perfectly certain. In this category we must place, in addition to what has already been indicated, the fact that the function of government in general lay in the hands of the original apostles and that at the time of the Council of Jerusalem James the brother of Jesus held a pre-eminent position; further, that the original apostles and the brethren of Jesus made missionary journeys among the Jewish populations and in doing so claimed for themselves and their wives material support at the hands of the communities which they founded (Gal. 2 9 1 Cor. 9 4-6); lastly, that the communities in Palestine within twenty or thirty years after the death of Jesus stood in need of pecuniary help from those founded by Paul (COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5).

Our information as to the conditions prevailing in the Pauline communities is tolerably exact.

Although Paul certainly liked to begin his missionary activity in the synagogue (ACTS, § 4), as soon as he had won converts, however few, whether Jews or Gentiles, for the faith in Jesus, a separate place of meeting became necessary. One or another of the converts offered the use of a room in his house for this purpose. Here on the one hand the believers came together 'to eat' (εἰς τὸ φαγεῖν: 1 Cor. 11 33)—i.e., for the observance of the love-feast followed by that of the Lord's Supper (not preceded, for otherwise the Supper could not have been disturbed as it sometimes was by the drunkenness of some of the partakers). The foods partaken of were brought by the members of the company, and it was only by a malpractice which had crept in that they were not equally divided. That they were purchased out of a common fund cannot be reconciled with 11 22, for the 'shame' arose only when, in consequence of the discontinuance of equal division, some had to suffer hunger because they were too poor to be able to bring with them a sufficient meal to the meeting. The expression 'supper' (δεῖπνον) points to the evening as the time, as also does the later accusation that Thyestean banquets (Θυέστεια δεῖπνα) were held at which children were slaughtered, and Œdipodean orgies (Οἰδιπόδειοι μίξεις) with a view to which the lights were extinguished.[1] How often the feast was celebrated, however, does not appear. 1 Cor. 16 2 throws no light upon this question, for there the Sunday contribution to the common collection is to be made by each individual at home (παρ' ἑαυτῷ). All that can be definitely made out is that in the 'we-source' of Acts (20 7 11) the observance there spoken of falls upon a Sunday. According to 1 Cor. 10 16-21 only members of the community took part in the celebration, and this (see 11 33: ἀλλήλους ἐκδέχεσθε) not merely at the Lord's Supper but also at the love-feast. From this it appears that there was held, apart from this kind of meeting, that other sort at which the addresses of instruction were delivered; for in these last strangers also may take part (14 16 f. 23-25). The question as to who should speak was left entirely to the suggestion of the Spirit (see SPIRITUAL GIFTS); often it happened even that several spoke at once (14 27-31) and women also took part (11 5).

8. The Pauline communities: meetings.

As regards organisation what is of importance here is (a) that not only are there no regular teachers, but that in the Epistles to the Corinthians no mention is anywhere made of any heads of the community. For effecting the cure of the malpractices which have crept in, Paul addresses himself not to any such officers but to the community as a whole. So also the community awards punishments (1 Cor. 5 2-5 2 Cor. 2 6) and chooses delegates (1 Cor. 16 3; cp 2 Cor. 8 19) by decision of a majority. We learn indeed that Stephanas and his household had given themselves to the service of the community; but the subordination which Paul desires with reference to them, as with reference to all others who are active in the same direction is not based upon their official position; it is regarded as entirely voluntary (1 Cor. 16 15-18). This is explained if we observe that not only the gifts of doctrine but also 'governments' (κυβερνήσεις) and 'helps' (ἀντιλήμψεις) or 'ministry' (διακονία) (1 Cor. 12 28 Rom. 12 7) are reckoned among the spiritual gifts. It is nevertheless also true that 'leaders' (προϊστάμενοι) occur, and that not merely in the Epistle to the Romans (12 8), on whose organisation as a Christian community Paul has had no influence, but also in Thessalonica (1 Thess. 5 12). It would actually appear therefore as if Paul in so weighty a matter as

9. Little organised.

[1] Just. Apol. i. 26 7, ii. 12 2-5; Epistle from Lyons (177 A.D.) in Eus. HE v. 1 14; so doubtless also even Tacitus, Ann. 15 44 ('per flagitia invisos . . . exitiabilis superstitio') and Pliny (Ep. x. 96 7, 112-113 A.D.; affirmabant morem sibi fuisse . . . rursus coëundi ad capiendum cibum, promiscuum tamen et innoxium). Perhaps even Acts 20 8 (from the 'we-source') is already intended to ward off this accusation.

this had not moulded all the communities for which he was responsible upon one and the same model, but had allowed himself to be guided in each case by the different local desires, or even had not personally interfered in the matter at all, but left things to follow their natural course of development. If in Rom. 16 2 Phœbe is called 'succourer' (προστάτις), the meaning is simply that as patrona she took special care of those under her charge, perhaps in particular exercised patronage in the recognised legal sense; it is not however permissible with Weingarten (see below, § 60) to extend this meaning also to the masc. participle (προϊστάμενοι). On Phil. 1 1 see § 57.

(b) How inchoate the state of matters was in the respects now under consideration appears in various other points as well.

In Corinth the members of the community were in the habit of bringing their disputes before the heathen courts; the women asserted their freedom as against the custom of veiling; unchastity occurred in various forms; and there were those, on the other hand, who believed that marital relations ought to be given up or that marriage was a thing to be avoided (1 Cor. 5 f. 7 1-7 36-38 11 2-16). The weaker brethren in Corinth who held meat offered to idols to be in all circumstances a thing forbidden (1 Cor. 8 10 23-11 1) were exceeded by those in Rome (Rom. 14). In Thessalonica many gave up regular work and became burdens on the others (1 Thess. 4 11 f.). These and similar phenomena show how gigantic were the difficulties to be overcome before the valuable content of the new religion could find for itself forms which should protect it against the danger of degeneration without at the same time suffocating it.

10. House-churches.

A word must here be given to the 'church in the house.' The expression would have nothing remarkable in it if it denoted merely the initial stage of an organised community (see above, § 8). In Rom. 16 5 1 Cor. 16 19 Philem. 2 Col. 4 15, however, we find in one and the same city several 'house-churches'; also in Rom. 16 14 f., whether we are here to understand that there were two or as many as eight. The meetings spoken of above (§ 8), accompanied with celebration of the Lord's Supper and doctrinal discourses, are however held in common for the Christianity of the whole city. It might on this ground be conjectured that the total number of the Christians inhabiting one and the same house is intended by the expression 'church in the house.' This, however, does not accord with the manner in which the word ecclēsia is invariably used. It must therefore, doubtless, be assumed that apart from the general meetings of the entire community, sectional meetings also were held,—perhaps because in the greater cities, especially for slaves, the distances were too great for regular attendance at the general place of meeting at certain hours. One can for example suppose sectional meetings for morning devotion.

What has just been said will be inapplicable to Col. 4 15 ('Salute the brethren that are in Laodicea, and Nympha[s], and the church that is in . . . [AV 'his'] house') if with ℵAC (so RV) we read 'their' (αὐτῶν) and refer it to 'the brethren in Laodicea and Nymphas' (τοὺς ἐν Λαοδικείᾳ ἀδελφοὺς καὶ Νυμφᾶν); for these words embrace the entire community. For this very reason the interpretation is unlikely. There is difficulty also, however, in Lightfoot's reference of 'their' (αὐτῶν) to Nymphas and his surrounding only; difficulty, too, attaches in another way to the reading 'her' (αὐτῆς) in B (RVmg.), since a fem. name would be Nymphē (Νύμφη) not Nympha (Νύμφα). The principal point, however, remains unaffected by these various readings.

It becomes at once apparent that in the organisation just described there is no imitation of the Jewish organisation of communities such as one might have expected to find in view of the high significance of the primitive circle of believers and the Jewish origin of Paul.

11. No connection with the Jewish organisation.

Even when the arrangements of a Jewish community in a heathen city, not those which prevailed in Palestine, are assumed as the basis, the difference which emerges is complete.[1] A Jewish community of the sort indicated had a constitution similar to that of a heathen municipal community. At its head stood the gerusia (γερουσία), whose members were 'presbyters' (πρεσβύτεροι), even though the latter title has not been established for Rome from the inscriptions. The acting body chosen from the gerusia constituted the archons (ἄρχοντες); at the head of these stood the gerusiarch (γερουσιάρχης). The officials were elected for a definite period. Their functions were civil: administration of property, jurisdiction—even in criminal matters—over the members of the community, and so forth. Distinct from this was the office of the 'ruler of the synagogue' (ἀρχισυνάγωγος) who had charge of the ordering of worship. At his side were an almoner and a synagogue servant. In Rome there were many such communities, each of them with its own governing body. These various 'synagogues' (συναγωγαί)—this was the name not only of the meeting-houses but also of the communities—had no common board as was the case in Alexandria. It is plain that in the Gentile-Christian communities everything was different from this. The participation of the women in the common worship and the love-feasts are also un-Jewish.

Of any reading or explanation of the OT scriptures such as was practised in the synagogue we hear nothing so far as Corinth is concerned; it can only have taken place in private, if at all, not at the stated acts of worship. All that the two institutions have in common, then, apart from the 'Amen' uttered in common by the community (1 Cor. 14 16) which must indeed have been borrowed,[1] will be the very vague feature that instructive discourses were held in both and that speakers were admitted without any special selection. With the Jews indeed these were, so far as we can judge from Acts 13 15, invited by the president of the meeting. In this last point, therefore, the Corinthian conditions are more closely in accord with the analogue to which we must now proceed to direct our attention.

12. Connection with pagan meetings for worship.

The pagan societies or clubs which devoted themselves to the cult of particular deities, and more especially in the form of mysteries, exhibit many instructive points of contact with the arrangements of the Christian community in Corinth.

(a) There also the constitution of the society was entirely democratic. It had elective heads; but all decisions were come to by the meeting as a whole. All members stood on a footing of complete equality and were called brethren and sisters. Women also were free to speak. In the meeting-room a place was set apart specially for strangers. To the common meals the individual participants brought each his share. Money grants were made to sister communities. The technical name for all such associations was eranos (ἔρανος) and thiasos (θίασος); but ecclēsia (ἐκκλησία) was also employed.

(b) The supposition that all these things arose independently within the community at Corinth under the pressure of an internal necessity, and without any consciousness of any of the coincidences we have enumerated, is not for a moment to be entertained. We may take it as absolutely certain that many of the Christians of Corinth had formerly belonged to pagan clubs of this kind. In that case, however, neither can it be regarded as conceivable that Paul should have remained ignorant of the coincidence. The opinion has been held that nevertheless he would have refrained from making use of any such forms as had served for the worship of demons (1 Cor. 10 20). In that case, however, he would have had to give up many things which nevertheless were indispensable. We shall therefore be safe in assuming that he did not hesitate about adopting any such forms if only he was satisfied that they could also be made of service in expressing the Christian idea.

In this manner the love-feast, for example, even if the bringing of his own provisions by each guest, and perhaps many another detail, were borrowed from the pagan syssitia, did not cease on that account to be serviceable for commemoration of the last supper of Jesus and as an expression of the idea of Christian brotherhood. To what an extent Paul was capable of becoming a gentile to gentiles is shown, to take a single example, in his speaking in 11 4 7*a* of a practice quite contrary to that of the Jews as being a matter of course, simply because from his Christian point of view it commends itself to him as being the only right one.

[1] So also perhaps the laying on of hands (§ 37 b).

(c) Adherence to the forms observed by such pagan associations, however, was even enjoined by a very weighty consideration. Christianity as a religio illicita was at all times exposed to prosecution by the State as soon as its distinctness from Judaism, which was a religio licita, came to be recognised. If this did not happen in Rome till towards the end of the reign of Domitian, as has been indicated as the most probable conclusion elsewhere (CHRISTIAN, § 9), it has been there also pointed out how singular the fact is. Such action on the part of the State must have been a subject of dread from a much earlier date. Conforming to the usages of a heathen cult gave the Christian the best hope of being able, according to the law cited elsewhere (CHRISTIAN, col. 756, begin.), to escape the attention of the authorities.

(d) The fact of this conformity once established, we may perhaps draw certain further inferences regarding Christian institutions as to points on which we have no direct information.

A heathen club had, as already stated (see a), elective heads. It is impossible to imagine that the Christian community in its turn can ever have wholly dispensed with such services as those rendered for example by persons who arranged the programme for a given meeting, saw to its being carried out, and the like. In that case it will be possible, indeed, that persons like Stephanas may have discharged such functions with the mere tacit approval of the community; still, another possibility is that those endowed with the gift of 'government' (κυβέρνησις) were actually elected to it. Only, in that case, we must not allow ourselves to forget that their functions by no means extended so far as to make it possible for Paul to demand from them the reform of those abuses which had crept in. Again, a pagan club had a common purse. In the Christian community this was not necessary either for the expenses of the common meals or for the collections made, and hardly in order to defray the costs of a place of meeting (above, § 8). It is possible, however, that such a purse was needed to meet the expenses of the teachers who came from a distance (§ 7, c), expenses which we learn were often heavy (2 Cor. 11 20 κατεσθίει). Paul alone made no draft on this source; but even his practice varied in different communities (1 Cor. 9 1-18 2 Cor. 11 7-12 Phil. 4 10-20).

13. Attitude of Paul.

The attitude assumed by Paul towards the communities of his own founding wholly departs from the analogy furnished by the heathen guilds of worship.

(a) Paul's attitude is wholly patriarchal. He acted on the ground that he was their father with thoroughgoing seriousness (1 Cor. 4 14 f.). He commands (1 Cor. 11 2 17-34 14 26-40 16 1), and that very definitely, precisely where institutions are concerned. He makes very short work with contumacy (7 40 11 16 14 37 f.). Partisanship on behalf of individual teachers he sets down (3 3 f.) to carnal-mindedness, disregard of his authority to arrogance (4 18). He disclaims judgment (ἀνακρίνειν) of himself in 2 14-16 4 3-5 with a clearness that leaves nothing to be desired. Against the Judaising teachers he declares himself in 2 Cor. 11 13-15 Gal. 1 7-9 5 10-12 with the greatest asperity. In short, in his person there appears the same unconditioned authority which Jesus had. Instead of the deference which Jesus found, Paul, it is true, had to encounter the liveliest opposition; claim the authority nevertheless he did, and for the most part he succeeded in asserting it.

(b) The chief enemies Paul had to deal with were the deeply-rooted immorality, and (next to that) the view, due to the influence of his own preaching, that every Christian has within himself the Holy Ghost and therefore does not need to recognise any authority over him. With regard to his decisions on questions affecting the life of the community, a feature of special interest is that, as in the case of Jesus, the decisions received the less attention just in proportion to the degree of speciality they possessed.

Whether his direction as to the punishment of the incestuous person (1 Cor. 5 1-8) was carried out we do not know; for 2 Cor. 2 5-11 7 12 refers not to this but to the case of another member of the community, who had uttered a grave slander against Paul.[1] We know, however, as regards the injunctions, pressed with so much earnestness, that women should be veiled, and that, except where there is danger of unchastity, marriage is better avoided (1 Cor. 11 2-16 7 1 f. 7-9 25 f. 29-35 40), at all times very little attention was paid to them; and as against his advice (7 21-24) that Christian slaves ought to make no effort to obtain civil freedom, the abolition of slavery is generally and rightly regarded as one of the most glorious, though belated, achievements of Christianity.

(c) Of greatest importance are the principles followed by Paul in his decisions. Much of the effect he produced is doubtless due to the fact that he withstood immorality and licentiousness with resolute strictness, without making any concessions, whilst yet avoiding the error of setting up an absolutely fixed law of any kind whereby the community's freedom of movement could be hampered and its enthusiasm for the new faith stifled.

Paul wished to be not lord of his converts' faith but only a helper of their joy (2 Cor. 1 24). Like Jesus, he made his appeal to the conscience,—in a particularly beautiful manner in dealing with the question as to meat offered to idols (1 Cor. 8 10 23-11 1). All things are lawful, but not all are expedient; knowledge puffs up, but love builds up; all things are to be done to edification; all to be done in a decent and orderly way (1 Cor. 6 12 10 23 8 1 14 26 40): such are some of the aphorisms which show in what spirit it was that Paul sought to lead on the members of the Christian community of Corinth to the establishment of well-ordered institutions. Placed upon its religious basis the same thought runs: all things are yours, but ye are Christ's (3 21-23). As regards slaves he has put this thought to an even too ideal use (7 21-24).

14. His standards.

With every effort to allow full play to individual freedom, Paul was nevertheless unable to avoid giving to certain things a normative value which later hardened into a rigid law and did serious injury to the religious life properly so called. (a) One such norm his Jewish training led him to find as a matter of course in the OT—that is to say, a book—and moreover in a method of interpreting the OT which found in it such things as the writers could never have dreamed. What was there which could not be deduced from such a book when, for example, in Dt. 25 4 it was possible to find, not somehow by way of later accommodation but actually as the proper primary meaning of the author, an injunction that Christian teachers are entitled to receive support from the communities they instruct (1 Cor. 9 8-10), or in Is. 28 11 f. that 'speaking with tongues' must be regarded as of subordinate value to the gift of 'prophecy' (1 Cor. 14 21 f.)? (b) Next to the OT came in point of authority the words of Jesus (1 Cor. 7 10 f. 9 14 11 23-25). This also was quite a matter of course; and yet it was a departure from that fundamental direction of the piety of Paul which declared that it sought in Jesus a redeemer, not a lawgiver. As, however, a church order was what had to be created, it was inevitable that the very individual who preached freedom not only from Mosaic law but from all law whatsoever (imposed on man from without, not emanating from within) had to set up as an external authority the 'law of the Christ' (νόμος τοῦ Χριστοῦ). Moreover, it is a law that cannot everywhere be expressed, as in Gal. 6 2, by some such word as 'love,' or, as in 1 Cor. 9 21, as the command to subordinate one's own personal inclinations to the great object of bringing about the fulfilment of the kingdom of God. Elsewhere, on the contrary, it is a law made up of a series of precepts, including many about particular things which could equally well have been ordered otherwise without danger to piety. The OT and the words of Jesus, however, taken together constitute the foundations of a canon. (c) Alongside of these Paul made tradition also into a norm; for it was a necessity with him to maintain his connection with the primitive Church, and he therefore lays weight upon the fact that what he preaches to the Corinthians he has himself previously received (1 Cor. 11 23 15 3).

15. Dogma.

What demands our attention next is the earliest instance of the action of that growing power which ultimately contributed so much to the moulding of piety into ecclesiastical forms. What, according to 1 Cor. 15 3, Paul received is a dogma; an explanation, to wit, of the death of Jesus as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of men. In his own experience, indeed, Paul has become acquainted with faith in the deepest way as consisting in the yielding up of the heart to the grace and mercy of God; and he well knows how to describe it as such. Nevertheless, we find him presenting to faith for its object not only, as the primitive Church had done (§ 7 a), a bare fact,—that of the resurrection of Jesus,—a fact that could possibly be brought into doubt or even disproved by historical criticism at any time, but also a dogma which has always the disadvantage of being liable to become burdensome to the lay conscience or to be questioned by the theological thinker—moreover, a special dogma that was not extensively held within the primitive Church at so early a time, and still less extensively at a later period when Paul was actually subjected to persecution by the Jewish-Christian party on account of his doctrine of the cross of Jesus (Gal. 5 11 6 12). Nay, more, he declares faith in this dogma to be a command of God.

[1] Schmiedel, HC 2 1, on 2 Cor. 2 11; Kennedy, The Second and Third Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians (1900), 105 n.

'Unbelief' (ἀπιστία) in Rom. 11 20 is equivalent to 'disobedience' (ἀπείθεια: Ti. WH; RV) in 11 30; as over against the Mosaic law which insists upon works, there is, according to Rom. 3 27, a divine ordinance (νόμος πίστεως) which demands belief in the atoning death and resurrection of Jesus; and the 'obedience of faith' (ὑπακοὴ πίστεως) of Rom. 1 5 is none other than that obedience to this divine ordinance which consists in believing. Properly speaking, faith is for Paul the exact opposite of works, not only the works of the Mosaic law but also everything upon which man could base any claim to the divine consideration (Rom. 11 6); but as soon as it is a fulfilment of a law it does constitute something which can ask to be considered. By the turn thus given to the matter Paul accordingly has deprived faith of one of its most precious attributes, and over and above the law of Christ, referred to above (§ 14), has introduced into Christianity a second law,—this time in the interests of the divine honour; for, it is argued, if God has once given up his Son to the death it would be a derogation from the greatness of this gift if so much as one individual were to seek salvation in any other way (Gal. 2 21 b).

16. Other points.

(a) Furthermore, it is hardly possible to avoid the impression that the interest of the community as a whole—in other words, respect for church-considerations—influenced Paul's decisions. Here, again, it is quite natural that he should wish that no occasion for evil speaking should be given by the community either to Jew or to Gentile (1 Cor. 10 32); yet the question must still be asked whether his judgment upon the incestuous person (1 Cor. 5 1-8) is dictated merely by concern for the salvation of the culprit—although, of course, this point of view was by no means wholly lost sight of.

Whilst, according to Gal. 3 26 f., baptism need be nothing more than the external declaration of the fact that the subject of it has embraced the Christian faith, in Rom. 6 3-8 it is represented with considerable vigour as an act producing upon the subject of it a certain effect which could not have been produced apart from the act. Again, the reason of the punishment threatened in 1 Cor. 11 27-30 is not that the bread and wine contained in a magical manner the body and blood of Jesus, but that the disregard shown for the sacred function is ethically wrong in every way; but we find the apostle referring in 1 Cor. 15 29 without any disapproval, on the contrary as if confirming his own position, to the baptism for the dead, in which unquestionably a magical view of the working of the sacrament is involved.

(c) Finally, it was Paul who, by the emphasis he laid upon the possession of the Spirit, laid the foundation for the distinction between pneumatic and psychic persons (1 Cor. 2 6-3 3)—a distinction which as employed by the gnostics went near to rending the church and, that this disaster might be avoided, made necessary that violent reaction which certainly would have been in the highest degree distasteful to the apostle himself (§§ 33, 53 b).

(d) The emphasis on the possession of the Spirit just referred to, however, was for Paul quite inevitable. For him it was upon the inspiration of the Holy Ghost that the validity of his own decisions, whether in matters of dogma or of government, rested. Upon the Corinthians, it is true, this made but little impression. In fact, they themselves possessed the gift of the Spirit, and that, too, according to Paul's own teaching. His subsequent withdrawal from this ideal opinion and declaration that they were not spiritual but carnal (1 Cor. 3 1-3) did not prevent them from continuing to make the claim for themselves and setting up their own views against Paul's as possessing an equal authority; and in such a case the apostle could only answer in the language of 1 Cor. 7 40: 'I think that I also have the Spirit of God.' Here was a conflict of decisions that had each been suggested by the Spirit. The true basis; for the unconditioned authority he claimed he accordingly sought in his apostleship. Here, however, he encountered new difficulties which we must now proceed to consider.

17. 'Apostle': wide sense.

(a) If the name 'apostle' itself did not come from Jesus (§ 3 b), it can easily have been transferred from those emissaries of the Jewish authorities in Jerusalem who used to travel up and down the countries of the dispersion for the temple dues which they brought with them to Jerusalem, and who were also charged with the function of carrying letters and advices to the people of the dispersion and generally with that of promoting a common consciousness of religious fellowship throughout the entire nation (Lightf. Gal.(4), 92-101, 'The name and office of an apostle'; Seufert [see below, § 60], 8-14). In the Pauline writings 2 Cor. 8 23 Phil. 2 25 come nearest to this use of the word.

(b) Even apart from these passages, however, other persons also besides Paul and the twelve are included under the name 'apostle.'

The wider meaning occurs in 1 Cor. 9 5 f. (Barnabas) 4 9 15 7 ('all the apostles' as distinguished from the twelve in 15 5), and eventually also in 1 Thess. 2 7, if Silas (cp Acts 16 19 40 17 1) and Timothy are included, and in Rom. 16 7, where on account of the καὶ ('who are of note among the apostles, who also have been in Christ before me') we can hardly understand the meaning to be that Andronicus and Junias (or a woman named Junia) are of note in the estimation of the original apostles, but must understand that Andronicus and Junias themselves are apostles. Further, the 'pre-eminent apostles' (οἱ ὑπερλίαν ἀπόστολοι) of 2 Cor. 11 5 12 11 are certainly not the original apostles (for Paul would never have expressed himself so sharply regarding these as he does in 11 13-15); rather must we take the expression as denoting certain persons who had come to Corinth itself and were looked upon by some as being in comparison with Paul the true apostles. It is not to be supposed that the Corinthians applied to them the expression 'the pre-eminent apostles' (οἱ ὑπερλίαν ἀπόστολοι), but Paul hits off their thought very well when he himself—ironically, of course—calls them so. He had seemed to the Corinthians 'simple of speech' (ἰδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ) (11 6); this also would explain itself best if the Corinthians had had opportunity of personally comparing his manner of speech with that of these people. If, now, the apostle in 11 13 calls them 'false apostles' (ψευδαπόστολοι), he does not thereby by any means deny that so far as outward qualification goes—aptness in teaching, and missionary practice of this—they really are apostles; it is only because they bring a 'different gospel' (ἕτερον εὐαγγέλιον) and are morally reprehensible that he designates them as false apostles. If this more extended meaning for the word apostle has been made good, Paul can easily have applied it in Gal. 1 19 also to James the brother of Jesus, although this is not exegetically certain, for the language can also mean 'other of the apostles saw I none, but only James [who is not an apostle]'; cp 2 16 Rom. 14 14 Mt. 12 4 Mk. 13 32 Rev. 9 4 21 27.

(c) It is quite certain, however, that it is not to Paul that this wider application of the word 'apostle' is due. His interest was quite in the other direction,—to limit the title as narrowly as possible; for his authority would naturally be diminished if the name of apostle placed him only in the same category as a large number of persons—many of them of very subordinate importance. Thus we may infer that the larger use of the word comes from the primitive Church and must have been customary there from the earliest times, for otherwise Paul would not have failed to point out that his opponents of subordinate rank were, strictly speaking, not entitled to be called apostles. What, then, let us ask, was the characteristic mark of an apostle according to this original meaning? It is not having been personally called by Jesus, nor having seen the risen Jesus, nor yet an exceptionally large endowment with spiritual gifts. On the one hand, all three do not apply to every person who is called apostle; on the other hand, the power to witness and the special endowment do not apply to those alone who are called apostles. The characteristic feature consists not at all in anything which such a man has or is, but in something which he does. Therefore it is not strictly correct to speak of apostleship as an office. It belongs, as also appears from 1 Cor. 12 28, to the charismata. Now, the characteristic activity of the apostle is the missionary one,—carried out, of course, not occasionally merely, but as a lifework (1 Cor. 15 10 Gal. 2 8). According to 1 Cor. 9 5 the original apostles also exercised this activity although at various times they had their abode in Jerusalem. If some of them took less part in the work than others, all equally received the same designation as they constituted a unity.

In the missionary sense of the word no one could possibly ever have disputed Paul's right to be called an apostle; and yet dispute it his adversaries did, as can at once be seen from the emphasis with which he claims the title.

18. Narrower sense.

(a) He describes himself, in fact, in 2 Cor. 1 1 as 'apostle by the will of God,' and in Rom. 1 1 1 Cor. 1 1 still more emphatically as called to be such (through the will of God), in Gal. 1 1 as 'apostle not through man but through Jesus Christ.' In 1 Cor. 9 1 as one proof of apostleship the question is asked, 'Have I not seen Jesus our Lord?' but another is added, 'Are not ye my work in the Lord?' This last, along with the addition in Rom. 1 1, 'separated unto the gospel of God,' is the criterion of missionary activity already spoken of above; the new criteria are those of having seen the risen Lord and of having been 'called.' In virtue of what he had seen Paul is qualified to bear witness to the resurrection of Jesus. This, however, many others also were able to do. Thus, what occurred at his conversion comes into consideration primarily, not because he then saw Jesus, but because he was then called by Jesus.

(b) To have urged this would have been purposeless had not his adversaries been in the habit of asserting that he was not an apostle because he had not been called thereto by Jesus. In their controversy with Paul his adversaries must thus have narrowed the meaning of the word and have made its differentia consist in a call by Jesus. On this account the original apostles acquired a unique position. On the most conspicuous of their number was bestowed the title of honour 'the pillars' (Gal. 2 9; COUNCIL, § 6). That Paul claimed to have received a similar call they thought they could ignore, as the claim could not be verified. The pseudo-Clementine Homilies (17 19) still represent Peter as saying to Simon Magus—under which mask Paul is disguised (see SIMON MAGUS),—'And how are we to believe your word when you tell us that he appeared to you?'

(c) Immediately before, Peter says in the same context, 'Can any one by a vision be made fit to instruct? And if you will say, It is possible, then I will ask, Why did our teacher abide and discourse a whole year with those who were awake?' The vision, it would appear from this, seemed questionable not only as regarded its divine origin but also as regarded its fitness to qualify an apostle for his work; and this, from the point of view of those who had living reminiscences of the conversation of Jesus while on earth to fall back upon, is perfectly intelligible.

(d) Hereby, however, at the same time a way was indicated by which it became possible to place above Paul such persons also as could not appeal to any call they had received from Jesus, if only they had known Jesus personally and for a longer or shorter time listened to his instruction.

To this class belonged those persons who first raised the party cry in Corinth, 'I am of Christ.' Their adherents followed them in taking up the same cry although they had never seen Jesus; but originally its simple meaning was, 'I am a personal disciple of Christ,' just as in the competing cries, 'I am of Paul,' 'I of Apollos,' 'I of Cephas' (1 Cor. 1 12). 2 Cor. 10 7 admits of no satisfactory explanation unless by 'any man' who 'trusteth in himself that he is Christ's' we are to understand the same persons as those who set up the party alluded to in 1 Cor. 1 12. These, however, as we can see from the connection in 2 Cor. 10-13, are none other than the 'pre-eminent apostles' (ὑπερλίαν ἀπόστολοι), who had practically won over the entire community to their side and alienated it from Paul. According to 2 Cor. 3 1 they had come with letters of commendation to Corinth. These, however, would have made but little impression if they had not proceeded from the primitive church, for the weightiest commendation which they can have contained must have been simply this: these men are genuine apostles, because they have known Jesus (COUNCIL, § 3).

(e) If, over and above this, a definite call is still sought for them, it is always open to us to suppose that they received this from the community which felt itself under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, just as we read in the case of the community at Antioch in Acts 13 1-4. Yet we have no direct proof of this; and the hostile attitude of the primitive church and of the original apostles who were at its head would on such an assumption of an official act appear in a still stronger light than it does on the other supposition which assumes only the irreducible minimum—that the primitive church and the original apostles tacitly sanctioned the issue of the letters of commendation by refraining from laying a veto on them.

(f) If the idea conveyed by the word 'apostle' was altered on the part of primitive Christianity in the manner just described, it is still by no means permissible to go so far as Seufert, who thinks that the definite fixing of the number of the original apostles at twelve was arrived at only in consequence of the struggle with Paul. Against such a view Paul would protest with the utmost emphasis. Gal. 2 or 2 Cor. 10-13 offered opportunity enough. He makes allusion to the twelve only in 1 Cor. 15 5; but there is no sufficient reason for our rejecting this passage as spurious with Holsten. It has to be recognised as a historical fact that Jesus himself chose twelve disciples to be his immediate attendants and to carry on his work. The choice of the number, that of the twelve tribes of Israel, becomes quite intelligible if the number of persons who suggested themselves to his mind as suitable approximated twelve. Even the subsequent election of Matthias need not be brought into question, although the discourse of Peter which is reported in connection with it (Acts 1 16-22) is absolutely unhistorical (ACTS, § 14, begin.).

19. Paul's views.

(a) Of the original apostles, when it was sought to give Paul a position subordinate to them, Paul speaks with little respect (Gal. 2 6 11-21); but he does not demand anything more than to be co-ordinated with them. The name 'apostle' did not secure for him such a position of equality, for the wider sense of the word was still current. For this reason Paul must have favoured restricting the designation to those who had been personally called by Jesus, and sanctioning the enhanced estimation in which the twelve were held, although by reason of the rivalry of these with himself his own personal interest lay in the other direction. The narrower sense of the word 'apostle' led to the consequence that the apostolate, after the death of its first bearers, could not be handed down, and, as an institution belonging entirely to the past, enjoyed an enhanced appreciation (§ 34). Personal disciples of Jesus who had not belonged to the number of the twelve, were from the end of the first century onwards no longer called apostles but 'disciples of Jesus' (μαθηταὶ τοῦ κυρίου: JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 4 e). The wider sense of the word 'apostle' has held its ground in the Didachè (see below, § 39 b). The story of the mission of the seventy which is peculiar to Lk. (10 1; cp GOSPELS, §§ 109, 128 b) is untrustworthy.

(b) Paul ranks the apostolic dignity extraordinarily high. In 1 Cor. 12 28 he gives it the first place (πρῶτον). In the same degree in which he humbly ranks himself far below Jesus, does he feel himself exalted as the ambassador of Jesus. He is a fellow-worker with God (1 Cor. 3 9), a 'minister' (λειτουργός) of Christ (Rom. 15 16), entrusted with the ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5 18 f.), capable of exhibiting the 'signs' of an apostle (2 Cor. 12 12; cp Rom. 15 19) which, in accordance with that name, far exceed the wonderful deeds of other Christians (1 Cor. 12 9 28; ἰάματα, δυνάμεις). As an apostle he can claim honour (1 Thess. 2 6, RV^mg.). As an apostle he feels himself also entirely filled and led by God (2 Cor. 3 5 f. 4 6); his conception of the gospel is for him absolute truth, and for everything opposed to it he has his 'anathema' (Gal. 1 8 f.). However easily we may feel ourselves inclined to agree with him, we must nevertheless never conceal from ourselves that such a degree of self-consciousness in all decisions carried within it the gravest dangers for a sound development of the Christian church. There might easily arise a situation of affairs in which we should find ourselves impelled emphatically to disapprove in another of that which we gladly applaud in the apostle.

The idea involved in the term 'church' has already been touched on in § 16.

20. Conception of the church in the apostolic age. (a) It being impossible to regard as historical the employment of the word ecclēsia (ἐκκλησία) by Jesus as a designation of the Christian community (§ 5 a, b), Paul is the first whose manner of using the word is open to our observation. In a quite preponderating majority of instances it denotes with him the community of a definite city or place (CHURCH, § 6), seldom the church as a whole. In Gal. 1 13 1 Cor. 15 9 Phil. 3 6 where Paul says that he persecuted the church (of God), this is spoken in a manner that lays no stress on the fact that the church, notwithstanding the local separateness of the various communities, constitutes a unity. This is done more clearly when, in 1 Cor. 12 28, Paul says that God has set in the church some to be apostles, others to be prophets, and so forth; for the apostles are servants of the whole church. The apostles alone, however: the prophets, teachers, and the rest are the servants only of the community in which they reside. As soon as prophets or teachers undertook missionary journeys, they became in those days forthwith apostles (§ 17). The ideal notion of a general church seems present also in 1 Cor. 10 32: 'give no occasion of stumbling . . . to the church of God.' This comprehensive meaning of the word is prepared for by the LXX using it to render the Heb. קָהָל (assembly), the aggregate of all the constituent members of the Jewish people (CHURCH, § 1), whilst in later Judaism it is the word 'synagogue' (συναγωγή) that is most commonly employed to denote the individual community (Schürer, GJV⁽²⁾ 2 36 1, note; ET 4 58, note). Nevertheless it would be an inversion of the natural order of things if we were to take this use of ecclēsia in the Pauline writings and elsewhere as primary, and the application to local communities as only derivative and secondary.

The roof cannot be placed upon the house till the walls have been built. The usage of profane Greek also, which can never have been without its influence upon all Gentile Christians at least, contemplates only a local community when ecclēsia is employed. Paul, moreover, would hardly have spoken of the Corinthian community taken by itself as a temple of God or a pure virgin of Christ (1 Cor. 3 16 f. 2 Cor. 11 2) if in his view these predicates had, strictly speaking, belonged only to the church as a whole. The images would be much more appropriate if Christ were regarded as having but one temple, one pure virgin. Since Paul nevertheless does not so speak, we can see how vague is his vision when he looks beyond the separate communities to the church as a whole. He also attaches but little value to uniformity of institutions in different places. For an example, see above, § 9 a. True, he often alludes to the existence of similar institutions elsewhere (1 Cor. 4 17 7 17 11 16 16 1 [14 33 b—which, however, along with vv. 34 f., in view of the contradiction with 11 5 13, may perhaps not be genuine]); he emphasises the fact that one community enjoys a good reputation in other communities (1 Thess. 1 7 f. 2 Cor. 8 1-5 9 2-5 Phil. 2 15) and exercises hospitality towards wayfaring brethren; by his own journeyings and those of his associates he awakens and stimulates the interest of the communities in one another. Still, the idea of the church as a whole does not play any great part in his writings.

If the idea has no great prominence with Paul, who nevertheless was endowed with the widest vision, certainly much less is it to be looked for in his contemporaries, and least of all in the primitive church with which the mission to the Gentiles was at all times a subordinate affair.

(b) There is one point, undeniably, in which Paul gave prominence to a thought which at a later date contributed greatly to the externalisation of piety. He promised not only the gift of the holy spirit but also the certainty of eternal life to every one who had become a member of the church (Rom. 8 29 f. 10 9-13 5 18-21). This followed as a matter of course for his ideal representation that at conversion every one becomes an entirely new man in the same way as he himself had become an entirely new man. Paul, however, is very far from regarding membership of the church as the cause of possession of the spirit and of eternal life.

The cause according to him is ever to be found, upon God's side in the divine mercy and grace, upon man's side in faith, in other words, in a thing which is purely subjective; and when he saw clearly the contradiction between the reality and the ideal he had assumed Paul did not hesitate to deny that the Corinthians were in possession of the spirit (1 Cor. 3 1-3), or to make eternal blessedness dependent for Christians also upon the issue of a judgment in which their condemnation was conceivable (Gal. 5 19-21 1 Cor. 3 17 6 9 f. 15 2 2 Cor. 6 1 11 15 Rom. 6 21 11 21 f. Phil. 3 19). None the less, however, was his ideal theory open to misconstruction and the abuse indicated above.

We turn once more from Paul to a consideration of the primitive church with the view of supplementing so far as possible what has been said already (§ 7).

21. Conjectures regarding the primitive church. (a) It is from the very outset manifest that the arrangements of the primitive church differed greatly from those of the Gentile Christian communities, for in Palestine any borrowing from the usages of pagan religious associations is not to be thought of. It is also clear that it was in Palestine that the development of the ecclesiastical constitution could most readily be slow since some at least of the apostles, or at any rate James the brother of the Lord, to whom willing deference was paid, were always within reach. By way of indicating with what caution the statements in Acts must be received we need only refer the reader here to the article COMMUNITY.

(b) The first thing we have definitely to set aside is the view that the Christian church was founded at the first Pentecost after the crucifixion. It had been founded long before, not by an express act of Jesus indeed, but by the faith in his resurrection and by the solidarity which was the result of this faith (cp the five hundred brethren who, according to 1 Cor. 15 6, saw the risen Jesus simultaneously). What happened at Pentecost resolves itself when critically considered into an intense manifestation of the gift of tongues as this is described by Paul and, on the basis of previous sources, by Acts (10 46 19 6; see SPIRITUAL GIFTS). With the discourse of Peter (2 14-36), which says nothing about any miracle, and with 2 12 f., according to which the Christians on that occasion were held to be drunk with new wine, would fit excellently some such sentence as 2 4, which, we may conjecture, immediately preceded in a written source, only with omission of 'different' (ἑτέραις: 'they were . . . speak with tongues . . . utterance'). Perhaps the occurrence intended in 2 1-13 is the same as that described much less fully in 4 31 after another source: 'the place was shaken . . . and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost and spake the word of God with boldness.'

(c) Moreover, it is exceedingly doubtful whether the occurrence was at Pentecost at all.

For Pentecost—according to the Babylonian Talmud at least (Pes. fol. 68 b)—is the feast of the giving of the law at Sinai (according to Jubilees, 6 17, in the first century A.D., at least the feast of the making of the covenant with Noah, with which that of the making of the covenant at Sinai could easily be conjoined). But the giving of the law is described by Philo (2 185 f. 188 295 ed. Mangey; ET, by Yonge, 3 146 etc.) in terms quite similar to those used in the description of the miracle in Acts; God's voice spread itself abroad, there went forth over all the earth an invisible sound which became changed into flame-like fire. The flame became articulate into the dialect to which the listeners were accustomed, and rendered the words so clearly that the hearer believed himself to be seeing rather than hearing. If any one finds himself indisposed to accept the miracle in Acts in a literal sense, it will be open to him to conjecture that the narrative is not independent of that in Philo; and in that case the date (Pentecost) was probably supplied by the same source.

(d) In proportion as the date is put back to an earlier period shall we be compelled to doubt whether the occurrence can have taken place in Jerusalem.

All that is certain is that three years after his conversion Paul found Peter and James at the head of a Christian community in Jerusalem (Gal. 1 18 f.); but that these two individuals and the other followers of Jesus belonging to Galilee should have established themselves in Jerusalem within so short a period as seven weeks after the death of the Master rests only upon the pre-supposition of Lk.—which cannot be accepted (see GOSPELS, § 138 a)—that the apostles never left Jerusalem at all after that event. If, however, they had—what is in accordance with all historical probability—betaken themselves to Galilee, it would have been very singular if they had, within a few weeks, again left house and home for a place where the greatest danger threatened them without any apparent motive or necessity for such a migration. It is to Galilee in all probability that we must look for the earliest beginnings and history of the church.

That the Mosaic law as a whole was adhered to is certain. Yet the length of the period—down to the date of the council of Jerusalem (see COUNCIL, § 4)—within which Paul's mission of emancipation from the law was allowed to go on unchallenged, would seem to indicate that the degree of legal strictness to which Christians submitted was not so severe as it became after the middle of the century. It can hardly be doubted that in Jerusalem attendance at the temple worship, and throughout Palestine in general, attendance at the synagogue services was still kept up. The specifically Christian gatherings, notwithstanding, served not only for the observance of the eucharist, but also for the mutual instruction and edification of believers through the word and common prayer. Exposition of the OT may easily have been a feature of such meetings. Appropriately enough, therefore, are the Christians in Acts 24 5 14 spoken of as a sect. They were distinguished essentially from the Jews by their belief in Jesus and by the obedience they yielded to his religious and ethical precepts.

22. The law.

The story of Hegesippus regarding James the brother of Jesus (Eus. HE ii. 23 4-18), which tells us that he had permission to go into the temple and pray for his people, and that the Jewish authorities took him, the head of the Christian community, up to a lofty place on the temple in order that he might bear witness against Jesus, is no doubt fabulous. Probably, however, it contains this much of truth that James, and with him the community under his leadership, had some good understanding with the Jews who did not believe in Jesus. We may suppose that James's death by stoning at the hands of the Jews in 62 A.D.—accounted for by Hegesippus as due to the witness he bore to Jesus on the occasion referred to—was what brought about the new turn of affairs when all religious connection of the community with Judaism was deliberately and permanently severed.

As for persons, it is not permissible to base conclusions on what we read in Acts 6 5 as to the election of the seven by the community, in 11 22 as to its sending of Barnabas to Antioch, or in 1 23-26 as to the election of Matthias by lot to the apostleship, whilst according to 8 14 the apostles themselves choose delegates from their own number. The author could easily figure such things to himself just as seemed natural and fitting. Too little prominence is given them to justify us in supposing that he found definite details regarding them in his source (cp § 37 a). In addition to the classes just mentioned, the presbyters are the only persons possessed of ruling functions who come into consideration for the apostolic time.

23. Appointments.

In Acts 11 30 the contribution from Antioch for relief of the sufferers from the famine in Palestine, in the reign of Claudius, is sent to the elders in Jerusalem. In itself considered, it is just as natural that in Palestine Christian institutions should be moulded after the Jewish pattern, 24. The presbyters.

as it was that outside of Palestine pagan models were followed; and as the Jews had their elders in every age (GOVERNMENT, §§ 16, 19; PRESBYTER, § 2) it is very natural to derive the Christian presbyters from these. It was not the Jews only, however, who had presbyters; Deissmann (Bib.-Stud. 153-155, ET 154-157) shows that there were presbyters in Egypt and in Asia Minor as well. If then we meet with them in Gentile-Christian communities also from the close of the first century onwards,[1] we cannot with confidence say that the institution has been derived from Jewish Christianity, for (1) neither is the epistle of James with its 'presbyters of the ecclesia' (πρεσβύτεροι τῆς ἐκκλησίας, 5 14 f.) (to whom the originally quite free gift of healing [1 Cor. 12 9 28] is now confined) essentially older than the two writings cited first in footnote 1, below,[2] nor (2) can we be certain that Acts, in what it says about presbyters, rests upon earlier sources and not rather upon the known conditions of the author's own time merely (cp ACTS, § 16).

Apart from 11 30, 14 23 is open to the suspicion of being an anachronism (see below, § 37 a), and elsewhere the presbyters make their appearance always (15 2 4 6 22 f. 16 4) in connection with the apostles or (21 18) with James the brother of Jesus, without having, so far as can be seen, any definite function assigned to them. In Jerusalem itself, at any rate, any function possessed by them could hardly have been a very important one to be exercised alongside of the original apostles or of James. In Jewish-Christian communities outside of Jerusalem we may look with greater certainty for presbyters who, in actual fact, stood at the head of their respective communities as we know they did at a later date in the Gentile-Christian churches; but on Gentile-Christian ground the institution could also have originated without borrowing from Judaism or from Jewish Christianity. Even without the presence of pagan examples it would have been a very natural thing for the men of more mature years to be made leaders of the community, and the official name could have developed afresh from its original character as denoting mere age, even if such a thing had not occurred elsewhere long before. The difficulty attaching to the elucidation of the idea contained in 'presbyter' (πρεσβύτερος) lies in good measure in this ambiguity (cp also JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 4 b). On the presbyters' sphere of duty in their relation to the bishops, see §§ 44-48; on the 'rulers' (ἡγούμενοι: Heb. 13 17) who 'watch on behalf of souls, as they that shall give account' (cp 13 7 24), see § 47 b.

III. POST-APOSTOLIC AGE

Of the post-apostolic age one of the most outstanding characteristics is its steadily advancing appreciation of the church. The idea of individual communities, though still the dominant one in Acts and in James (5 14), falls on the whole into the background, that of the general church becomes the regulative one. The church's most important attributes are unity and purity.

25. Rising appreciation of the church.

(a) The Epistle to the Colossians and (still more) that to the Ephesians[3] are specially taken up with this idea which constitutes one of the most important elements in their contents, and frequently recurs.

In both (Col. 1 18 24 Eph. 5 23) the church is the body, of which Christ is no longer as in Paul (1 Cor. 12 12 f.) the spirit, but the head, according to Eph. 1 22 the head over all; in spite of its subordinateness to Christ the church is yet a completion to him, so that apart from it he who nevertheless 'filleth all in all' would yet be as incomplete as a head without a trunk (Eph. 1 23); it is the connection of the church, no longer as in 2 Cor. 11 2 that of the individual community, with Christ, that is set forth under the figure of the bridal, or marriage, relation (Eph. 5 25-30, see also Rev. 19 7 f.), and is held to have been prophesied in Gen. 2 24 (Eph. 5 31 f.); through the church it is that to the [2] See CHRISTIAN, § 8, where Jas. is placed between Heb. and 1 Pet.; in JAMES (EPISTLE), § 5, it is placed still later.

[3] The Epistle to the Colossians, controverting the Gnostics as it does, cannot, in view of the statement of Hegesippus in Eus. HE iii. 32 7 f. that Gnosticism first arose in Trajan's time, be dated earlier than 100 A.D., and that to the Ephesians must be placed still later, exhibiting, as it does, a more advanced development of the idea of the church and also showing literary dependence on Col.; it must not, however, be brought lower than 130 A.D. as it was known to Marcion in 140 A.D.

angels, who have no inherent aptitude for this knowledge, is made manifest the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. 3 10). The establishment of the church is the aim of the world's entire evolution and the object of the divine economy (οἰκονομία: Eph. 1 10 3 2 9), that divine predetermination which has been a mystery from all eternity (3 11) and now is revealed to the apostles and prophets (3 3-5). It is destined to reach perfection even here upon earth (4 13); the prospect of a blessedness to be looked for only in the world beyond is found, in the two epistles, only in Col. 1 12 f. 3 1-4 Eph. 4 30. The most important thing in the idea of the church is, especially for Ephesians, its destination for the Gentiles and the fusion of these with the Jewish Christians (Eph. 2 11-22 3 6 Col. 3 11), who have their advantage historically only, in having been high salvation from the first (Eph. 2 13 17).

(b) So also in the Fourth Gospel (Jn. 10 16, 'other sheep . . . not of this fold . . . one flock, one shepherd'; 4 22, 'salvation is from the Jews,' cp JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, §§ 27, 39). Although the word ecclēsia is not employed by this author, any more than by the writer of 1 Jn. or 2 Jn., all three writings together with 3 Jn. have a strong churchly interest. In the gospel, however, as in Ephesians, the high dignity of the church is delineated in a purely ideal way, whilst 1 Jn. and still more 2 and 3 Jn., as also the Pastoral Epistles, draw the practical consequences with much energy. In 1 Tim. 3 15 in particular a new feature is the emphasis with which it is insisted that the Church is the 'pillar and ground of the truth' (στῦλος καὶ ἑδραίωμα τῆς ἀληθείας). (c) From the divine predestination of the church in Eph. 1 10 3 2-5 9-11 there is but a single step further to that of its pre-existence, which is accepted in Hermas, Vis. ii. 4 1, and in 2 Clem. 14 1. The church appears to Hermas in his visions, and large portions of his book are devoted to its nature. (d) The course of the development through well-nigh two centuries, which can here only be lightly sketched, reached its goal in the designation 'catholic church' which is met with, from about 170-180 A.D. onwards, in the Muratorian fragment (ll. 61, 66, 69), in Ignatius (ad Smyrn. 8 2), in the Martyrdom of Polycarp (superscription, and 8 1 16 2 19 2) and in an Antimontanistic writing (ap. Eus. HE v. 16 9). Cp, further, § 53 e.

Even Irenæus, however, about 185 A.D. has only periphrases, such as (i. 3 [i. 10 2]) ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ κόσμῳ διεσπαρμένη or (ii. 8 1 [9 1]) ecclesia omnis per universum orbem accepit . . . In the NT we find as honorific predicates only 'ecclēsia of God' (τοῦ θεοῦ: 1 Cor. 10 32 15 9, etc.; of an individual church in 11 22, etc.; in the plural 11 16) and 'ecclēsia of the saints' (τῶν ἁγίων: 14 33); elsewhere 'the holy (ἁγία) ecclēsia' (Herm. Vis. i. 3 4, etc.; cp Harnack, Lehrb. d. Dogmengesch. I.(2) 335, n. 3, ET 2 73, n. 4).

The whole development tends constantly more and more towards the proposition: extra ecclesiam nulla salus.

26. Extra ecclesiam nulla salus.

In principle, indeed, it is latent as soon as there is a church at all. A great difference depends, however, on whether the principle is insisted on or not, and, if insisted on, whether this is done theoretically merely, or also practically. Primarily, it is urged in order to make the invitation to join the church all the more pressing. If the invitation is complied with, the proposition becomes innocuous. On the other hand, if it is not complied with, or if the member once received has been expelled, this always comes to be associated with the idea that the person who refuses or is rejected at the same time becomes a lost soul. The thesis 'if thou believest . . . thou shalt be saved' (ἐὰν πιστεύσῃς . . . σωθήσῃ: Rom. 10 9, and frequently in other turns of expression) has always as its necessary counterpart, whether written or unwritten, that other proposition: 'he who has disbelieved shall be condemned' (ὁ ἀπιστήσας κατακριθήσεται: Mk. 16 16).

The presupposition that Christianity alone has power to save led to the fine idea in 1 Pet. 3 19 f., according to which Jesus preached in the underworld to the spirits of the departed there, and thereby afforded them the opportunity to become partakers of salvation. Yet the idea is very imperfectly expressed. It is not merely that the writer treats as 'spirits in prison' only those who had been disobedient in the days of Noah (which can only be explained as a borrowing from Enoch 10 11-14); even if the reader ventures to extend the preaching of Jesus to all the spirits of the departed then existing in the underworld, this means of grace fails to reach all those who have gone there after Jesus' time without having heard the gospel upon earth. With Hermas (Sim. ix. 16 5-7) the pious souls who died before the coming of Christ need in the underworld not only preaching but also baptism—which they receive through the apostles. In another direction, however, Hermas is very liberal, explaining (Vis. iii. 7 5 f.) that those who, after receiving the instruction of catechumens, but before receiving baptism, have relapsed into their former sins could, if they did penance, be built as living stones (not into the church, indeed, but) into a lesser building; cp Sim. viii. 6 5 f. This goes essentially a step further than is taken when Paul (Rom. 4 Gal. 3 6), proceeding on Gen. 15 6, regards the faith of Abraham, and Hebrews (chap. 11) the faith of all OT saints, as fully effectual for salvation; for in the excessive regard paid to the OT this inconsequence was only too natural. Christendom was regarded as simply the continuation of the OT people of God (Gal. 6 16 Heb. 2 16 f. 4 9 1 Pet. 2 9 Rev. 14 1, cp 7 4-8, etc.). True emancipation from the ban of the conception of the Church under which all the canonical writers stand is found for the first time in Justin in his memorable utterance (Apol. i. 46 2): 'Those who lived with [the] Logos are Christians, even though they have been thought atheists' (this is probably polemic against the 'men without God in the world' of Eph. 2 12 [ἄθεοι ἐν τῷ κοσμῳ]), 'as among the Greeks Socrates and Heraclitus and men like them; and among the barbarians Abraham, and Ananias, and Azarias, and Misael [the three men in the furnace in Daniel], and Elias, and many others' (οἱ μετὰ λόγου βιώσαντες Χριστιανοί εἰσιν, κἂν ἄθεοι ἐνομίσθησαν, οἷον ἐν Ἕλλησι μὲν Σωκράτης καὶ Ἡράκλειτος καὶ οἱ ὅμοιοι αὐτοῖς, ἐν βαρβάροις δὲ Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἀνανίας καὶ Ἀζαρίας καὶ Μισαὴλ καὶ Ἠλίας καὶ ἄλλοι πολλοί).

If we turn now to a survey of the most important institutions of the church (§§ 27-32), it appears that the oneness of that body which the church represents rests according to Eph. 4 3-6 upon the one Spirit, the one Lord, and the one Father; in other words, upon the Trinity—though still without the later dogmatic formulation of the oneness of these three persons or entities. It follows immediately from this that the one faith which is directed towards these three (4 5 13) is not formulated so simply as it was in the oldest times. This triad, which in the mouth of Jesus (Mt. 28 19) is unhistorical (§ 5 c; GOSPELS, § 136, end), and with Paul (2 Cor. 13 13) in this collocation has not yet been made an object of faith, constitutes rather the foundation of the regula fidei to which converts to Christianity had to signify their adherence at baptism and out of which by ever new additions the so-called symbolum apostolicum at last grew.

27. The confession of faith.

For the oldest extant forms from as early as the beginning of the second century see, for example, Harnack, Pat. ap. op. i. 2 115-142.[1] This rule already contains many more dogmas than those which Paul declared indispensable (§ 15); and faith in the formula 'one faith' (μία πίστις) no longer means the exercise of faith—a meaning which can be upheld for all the passages in Paul, even for Gal. 3 2 5 Rom. 1 5 (upon which cp § 15, end)—but the matter of faith: in a word, no longer fides qua creditur but fides quæ creditur. So also in the Pastoral Epistles, particularly clearly in Tit. 1 4 1 Tim. 1 19*b* 4 1 6 6 10 21 2 Tim. 3 8 (where a wrong attitude in respect of faith is the same thing as a wrong attitude in respect of truth in 2 18) and Jude 20 and 3 ('your most holy faith . . . once for all delivered unto the saints'). Here, accordingly, and throughout the whole of the post-apostolic literature much greater importance is attached to orthodoxy of belief than formerly.

In the Didachè, which is intended for catechumens of the entire church, we find the Lord's Prayer, as also his Law (upon which chaps. 1-5 are based) as a kindred bond of union. These two constitute the most precious heritage which the church has retained, and their genuineness is un-

28. The new moral law.

[1] The oldest Roman formula runs as follows:—I believe in God the Father, Almighty, and in Christ Jesus his son, the only-begotten, our Lord, who was born of the Holy Spirit and Mary the virgin, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried, who rose on the third day from the dead, who ascended into the heavens, who is seated at the right hand of the Father, whence he will come to judge quick and dead; also in [the] Holy Ghost, [the] holy church, forgiveness of sins, resurrection of [the] flesh. Amen. (πιστεύω εἰς θεὸν πατέρα παντοκράτορα, καὶ εἰς Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ τὸν μονογενῆ, τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν, τὸν γεννηθέντα ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου καὶ Μαρίας τῆς παρθένου, τὸν ἐπὶ Ποντίου Πιλάτου σταυρωθέντα καὶ ταφέντα, τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ ἀναστάντα ἐκ νεκρῶν, ἀναβάντα εἰς τοὺς οὐρανούς, καθήμενον ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ πατρός, ὅθεν ἔρχεται κρῖναι ζῶντας καὶ νεκρούς, καὶ εἰς πνεῦμα ἅγιον, ἁγίαν ἐκκλησίαν, ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν, σαρκὸς ἀνάστασιν· ἀμήν.) Kattenbusch (Apostol. Symbol, cp his own excerpt in ZTK, 1901, 407-428) dates this formula at about 100 A.D.

doubted. The externalisation, however, of which we have spoken shows itself in the Didachè in the manner in which these and other exhortations of the law are invested with the formal character of a positive injunction; the Lord's Prayer is to be offered three times a day, and Christians are to differentiate themselves from the hypocrites, that is, from the Jews, by fasting not on Monday and Thursday but on Wednesday and Friday (8 1-3). Here, as in kindred matters, Christianity takes more and more the form of a nova lex. This finds expression in the strikingly paradoxical conception of a law of liberty (Ja. 1 25), which is very well paraphrased in Barn. 2 6: 'the new law of our Lord Jesus Christ, being free from constraint' (ὁ καινὸς νόμος τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ἄνευ ζυγοῦ ἀνάγκης ὤν). Cp § 14 b.

29. The canon. The value attached to the words of Jesus led to a corresponding value being attached to the books in which these were recorded, and these formed the first portion of a NT canon. Before this last attained recognition the OT, as from the earliest days of Christianity, was regarded as a holy book: with particular fulness, in Hebrews, and—with far-reaching application of the allegorical method—in the Epistle of Barnabas; but also in the Fourth Gospel (JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 39), in the Pastoral Epistles (2 Tim. 3 15 f.), in 2 Pet. (1 19-21), in Ignatius (ad Philad. 9 2), etc. Eph. and Col. stand alone in laying no stress upon it. The NT, or rather, part of the writings now contained in it, was first raised to the same rank with the OT as 'holy scripture' somewhere between 170 and 180 A.D., and this not as the result of a gradually and naturally increasing appreciation, but because, in the conflict with Gnosticism and Montanism, a definite norm was needed to which appeal could be made on the one hand against the gnostic forms of the church's faith (e.g., 2 Tim. 2 18), and on the other hand alike against the traditions put forth by the Gnostics as resting on secret apostolic tradition and against the new prophecies of the Montanists. It is not by mere accident that the canonisation of the bulk of the NT dates from the same period as the rise of the designation 'Catholic Church.' See further, §§ 32 end, and 35 b-e.

30. The sacraments. In like manner the importance attached to the sacraments increased. In Eph. 4 5, 'one Lord, one faith,' is immediately followed by 'one baptism.' The necessity of baptism for salvation is expressly emphasised even in the 'pneumatic' Fourth Gospel (3 5). The next step is that, whilst in the apostolic age, and to a large extent even in the post-apostolic (GOSPELS, § 136, end; cp also Clem. Recog. I 39 73 [although there we read also of trinæ invocationis baptisma in 1 63] and even in the third century the opponents of Cyprian [epist. 73 16-18]), baptism was administered simply in the name of Jesus, the trinitarian formula is met with in Did. 7 1 and in Justin, Apol. i. 61 3. The intermediate stage, of two clauses only, is perhaps indicated by Rev. 14 14 Jn. 17 3 1 Tim. 2 5. The oneness of the eucharistic celebration is specially insisted on by Ignatius (ad Philad. 4, ad Eph. 20 2, ad Magn. 7 2). In Did. 9 4 10 5 the unity of the church, represented by the union of the grains of corn in the bread—an idea which figures in 1 Cor. 10 17 in a subsidiary degree only—appears as the central idea of the eucharist. The indispensableness of this sacrament for eternal life is strongly insisted on in Jn. 6 51-58, although the outward action is again divested of its value by 6 63. What sort of magical ideas were capable of being associated with it is seen in Ignatius (ad Eph. 20 2), where participation in the sacrament guarantees immortality:

'Bread, which is the medicine of immortality and the antidote that we should not die, but live in Jesus Christ for ever (ἄρτος ὅς ἐστιν φάρμακον ἀθανασίας, ἀντίδοτος τοῦ μὴ ἀποθανεῖν, ἀλλὰ ζῆν ἐν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ διὰ παντός); similarly Justin, Apol. i. 66 2: 'food from which our blood and flesh by transmutation are nourished' (τροφὴ ἐξ ἧς αἷμα καὶ σάρκες κατὰ μεταβολὴν τρέφονται ἡμῶν); and perhaps Didachè 10 3: 'didst bestow on us spiritual food and drink and eternal life' (ἡμῖν ἐχαρίσω πνευματικὴν τροφὴν καὶ ποτὸν καὶ ζωὴν αἰώνιον).

31. Treatment of sinners and of heretics. The purity of the church renders necessary, on the one hand, the conflict with immorality (2 Tim. 2 19), and on the other, the conflict with heresy. In church discipline concern for the salvation of the sinner becomes mingled more and more, not only with the churchly (§ 16 a), but also with the hierarchical, interest. As against heretics, since heresy (αἵρεσις), properly speaking, means a peculiar opinion and a special class of men who are held together by it—as in Josephus (Ant. xiii. 5 9, § 171 and often): the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes (cp above, § 18 d)—the only appropriate method of dealing with them is, naturally, by endeavouring to convince them, by means of oral discussion, of the erroneousness of their views. The epistle to the Ephesians reveals only in 4 14 5 6 that it has to do with opponents at all. So also the Fourth Gospel meets them not with polemic, but with positive statement. The epistle to the Colossians, in its polemical parts (chap. 2), makes use of restrained language and is at pains to adduce reasons for what it says. For the rest, however, the method of dealing with heretics constitutes one of the darkest pages in the whole history even of the earliest theology. The views disapproved of are simply rejected, and to those who hold them such impure motives are ascribed, and so many crimes (which yet have no sort of connection with the doctrines attributed to them) that it is hardly possible to persuade oneself of the justice of the representations. The conjecture suggests itself only too readily, that the churchly writers were neither able nor willing to do justice to the views of their opponents.[1] Whilst 1 Jn. simply shares the language of strong reprobation and censure, as of moral perversity, not intellectual error merely, which is met with in the Pastoral Epistles, in Jude, and in 2 Pet., 2 Jn. proceeds to practical measures by excommunicating the adversary (v. 10 f.). In the Pastoral Epistles it is possible to discover the order in which they were written (probably by different authors between 100 and 150 A.D.), by the attitude they disclose towards opponents. In 2 Tim. 4 14 the divine retribution is threatened upon Alexander; but, as a general rule, according to 2 24-26, the attempt ought to be made to win adversaries to a change of view by gentleness of demeanour. According to Tit. 1 13 3 10 the rebuke ought to be 'sharply' ('briefly': ἀποτόμως) given, and after the second admonition adversaries ought to be shunned. In 1 Tim. 1 20 Hymenæus and Alexander, the first mentioned of whom is named also in 2 Tim. 2 17 f. are given over to Satan. For a heretic is here prescribed the treatment which in 1 Cor. 5 5 was the punishment of the most scandalous. The conclusion of the parable of the tares (§ 5 d) did not everywhere meet with attention.

32. Enhanced appreciation of offices. For giving effect to all these things the church needed ruling persons, and it is for this reason that the scope of the present article has been widened so as to include consideration of institutions which, regarded in themselves, seem impersonal. Step by step, with the enhanced appreciation of the church and its institutions, the appreciation of the persons charged with its conduct advances also, and what originally was only a free activity occasionally exercised, develops from the nature of the case into an office. Whilst Paul (in 1 Cor. 12 28), after enumerating apostles, prophets, and teachers,

[1] As Paul permitted his followers to eat meat that had been offered to idols, and to form marriages with relations or with pagans (COUNCIL, § 11, begin.), it is not impossible that the author of Rev. 2-3 was simply hurling back the reproaches of 2 Cor. 11 13-15 and elsewhere when he used the language which we find in 2 2 (ἀποστ. ψευδεῖς), 2 6 14 f. 20-24. If the Epistles were not written till long after the death of Paul, the probability increases that they are directed not against him but against his successors; this, however, does not lessen the violence of their polemic.

goes on to give the sentence an impersonal turn and speaks of miracles, gifts of healing, helps, governments, kinds of tongues, in Eph. 4 11 the 'governments' have become persons—pastors. Moreover, they are promoted in rank, for they come immediately after apostles, prophets, and evangelists, and before teachers (unless, indeed, they are to be identified with these; see below, § 39 e). The management and administration of affairs became more and more the chief concern. The ultimate issue of the development is arrived at in Ignatius, with whom the bishop stands before all other bearers of office, apostles alone excepted. It is not by mere accident that this also synchronises with the introduction of the expression 'Catholic Church,' and with the rise of the NT Canon. See, more specially, §§ 49-54.

33. Value of this development.

In spite of every dark side which the development of the church displays when contrasted with the original gospel of Jesus, it has to be acknowledged, from the point of view afforded by history, that the development, as a whole, was inevitable if Christianity was to hold its own at all against two dangers to which it was exposed. On the one hand there was persecution, on the other hand the unlimited freedom involved in possession of the Spirit, as also the speculations—not so much religious as philosophical—of Gnosticism. As matters stood, a strict organisation really was essential. Exactly in proportion as the representatives of traditional Christianity fell below the Gnostics intellectually and otherwise, was it necessary for them to be able to lay hold of a fixed regula fidei, a canon, a high valuation of the sacraments. Similarly, the more the individual Christian felt himself unable to withstand the allurements of pagan life, the terrors of persecution, the infectious character of gnostic theories, the more was it necessary for men of strong character to hold the reins with firm hand. The evils which this necessarily brought in its train threatened indeed to carry the church so far away that it could no longer be recognised as truly and faithfully representing the essence of Christianity. At the same time, in what the church had succeeded in conserving—it may be in a violent and, in many respects, unchristian way—she possessed, though in conjunction with assets of a very questionable character, the genuine gospel of Jesus which still preserved its power to frustrate all distortion and obscuration of its true nature. In this way the church development of which we have been speaking has rendered to Christianity a quite inestimable service. What is to be regretted is not so much that the development occurred as that, along with the truly Christian element which was saved, there was transmitted to future ages also much that was foreign, or even hostile, to the essence of Christianity, taken on under stress of circumstances in a manner that now makes purification from such elements extraordinarily difficult.

34. Appreciation of first apostles (the Twelve and Paul).

We come now to a consideration of the various classes of persons whose action resulted in the development of the church which has just been sketched. First in order come the apostles in the narrower sense of that word (§ 18). In respect of their immediate call by Jesus himself it was impossible for them to have successors, and the regard in which they were held by succeeding generations grew all the more on that account.

(a) The apostles are represented as the founders of the church, and even Haupt (see below, § 60) accepts the unhistorical theory—possible only to a distant retrospect—that it was in the founding of the church by missions and organisation of communities, and not in the securing of a progressive development, that the task assigned to the apostles by Jesus lay. It is obvious, however, that these two do not admit of being separated, and that it could not have been either Jesus' wish or theirs that they should refrain from any further development of ecclesiastical organisation if this was open to them, especially in the case of so long a lifetime as is assigned, by Haupt as by others, to John the son of Zebedee.

(b) The result of this view, however, was that the apostles were also regarded as the foundation upon which the building of the church rests. In 1 Cor. 3 11 Jesus alone is this one foundation; in Eph. 2 20 he is only the corner stone, the foundation being the apostles and (NT) prophets (see § 38 a), in the former class Paul also being of course included. In Rev. 21 14, it is the twelve apostles of the lamb (without Paul) whose names are written upon the twelve foundation stones of the heavenly Jerusalem.

This verse has for long been with many theologians an obstacle to their regarding the Apocalypse as the work of one of these twelve. So also the reading of TR in 18 20, 'ye holy [not 'ye saints and ye'] apostles and ye prophets' (οἱ ἅγιοι [without καὶ οἱ] ἀπόστολοι καὶ οἱ προφῆται), as long as it was held to be the correct reading constituted a similar hindrance with many. The same consideration, however, demands to be applied to Eph. If it was really Paul who wrote the words in 3 5, 'his holy apostles and prophets' (τοῖς ἁγίοις ἀποστόλοις αὐτοῦ καὶ προφήταις), the case would be much the same as if to-day a bishop were to speak of the 'holy bishops of God.' According to Harnack (Ztschr. f. Kirchengesch., 1879, p. 391) the phrases invariably met with everywhere else down to the third century are only 'the good apostles, 'the blessed Paul,' 'the apostle Paul,' and the like; we find in Ignatius, ad Magn. 3 1, presbyters, and in Mart. Polyc. 17 1, martyrs called 'holy.'[1]

(c) The first apostles are further regarded as having received the Holy Ghost as no others had done. In Jn. 20 22 f. this gift is communicated by Jesus to his disciples along with the power of forgiving or retaining sins—a power which, according to Mt. 18 18 (§ 4) is not limited to them. According to Acts 8 14-19 19 6 only the Twelve and Paul, not missionaries of subordinate rank such as Philip, possess the power of conferring (by imposition of hands) the gift of the Holy Spirit upon the baptized—a position in direct contradiction not only to Paul but also to Acts 19 2, according to which authorities the gift comes of itself by the act of believing. A new theory of this kind could spring up all the more readily when, during the second century, the consciousness that every Christian possesses the Holy Spirit gradually fell into the background. For further consequences of this change of view, see § 37 b-e.

35. 'Apostolic' literature.

This exceptional spiritual endowment of the apostles qualified them also for the production of normative writings. (a) This consideration soon found practical application when obscure men, who could hope for no attention to books written in their own names, wrote under the names of apostles (2 Thess., Col., Eph., Pastoral Epistles, James, 1 and 2 Pet.; indirectly also the Fourth Gospel; cp JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 41).

This must not at all be regarded, in accordance with modern ways of looking at things, as forgery. The only reasonable view is that which takes as normal for the whole attitude of the ancient world towards such questions the saying of the Neo-platonist Iamblichus, who set it down to the credit of the Pythagoreans that, renouncing all praise for themselves, they turned everything to the honour and glory of their master. For Christianity in particular we may regard as normal the saying of the presbyter in Tertullian (de Bapt. 17), when asked why he had written the Acts of Paul and Thecla under the name of Paul, that he had done it for love of Paul ('id se amore Pauli fecisse'). The judgment of Tertullian upon this is also interesting; he has no moral censure for it but only sarcasm—'as if he were augmenting Paul's fame from his own store' ('quasi Pauli titulo de suo cumulans'); so, too, is the information Tertullian gives, that this presbyter was deprived of his office not because he had written a spurious work, but because in that work, contrary to the ecclesiastical order (1 Cor. 14 34), he had introduced Thecla's example as a warrant for women's teaching and baptizing.

(b) The view that apostles alone were fitted to be the writers of normative books came to be applied still more extensively when the canon was being fixed. None but apostolic writings could render that service against

[1] The holy prophets of 2 Pet. 3 2, since the apostles are mentioned after, not before, them, must be those of the OT. The expression, 'the holy choir of the apostles' (ὁ ἱερὸς τῶν ἀποστόλων χορός) cannot, with certainty, be traced to Hegesippus, since Eusebius (HE iii. 32 8) does not quote his words verbatim.

Gnostics and Montanists which the canon, according to § 29, was required to render. Were other writings also admitted it became impossible to establish any hard and fast line over against those Gnostic and Montanistic writings which, nevertheless, it was desired to exclude. Thus it became compulsory, on the one hand, to accept all writings which offered themselves as being of apostolic origin, and on the other hand, to declare to be apostolic every writing which it was not desired to drop, or which had already established itself so firmly that it could no longer be set aside.

(c) The violent measures which these considerations rendered necessary supply us with the reason why, in § 29, it was found necessary to reject what would otherwise have been the simplest and most natural view, that the books of the NT came gradually to be regarded as on a level with those of the OT by a silent and natural growth of the appreciation in which they were held.

The gospels attributed to non-apostolic men, Mark and Luke, had to be justified by the assertion that they rested upon the communications of Peter and Paul respectively, although Paul had confessedly not known Jesus at all during his life on earth. Of the epistles to Philemon, Titus, and Timothy we read in the Muratorian fragment (the only writing which enables us to see not only the fact but also the motive of the formation of the NT canon) [l. 61]; 'in honorem ecclesiæ catholicæ in ordinatione ecclesiasticæ disciplinæ sanctificatæ sunt.' With regard to the Fourth Gospel the fragment confirms what we know already from 21 24, that a plurality of persons attested the character of its author as eye witness (l. 14: 'ut recognoscentibus cunctis Johannes suo nomine cuncta describeret'; cp JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 40, end).

Of all these writings, in other words, the author of the fragment knew that their canonisation had to be carried through in the face of serious doubts.

(d) It has even been conjectured that writings like the epistle of James or 1 Pet. only now had the apostolic names prefixed after having existed for some time in an anonymous form, as the epistle to the Hebrews does even to this day. Conversely it has also been conjectured with regard to Hebrews, which has already reached a full close in 13 21, that the present conclusion—which by its mention of Timothy would seem to point to a Pauline origin—was added at this time, and the beginning, which had named a non-apostolic person as author, removed. The examples cited uuder (c), however, are sufficient to show that the establishment of the canon was set about with full deliberation, and that the leading thought in carrying out the task was the demand for apostolic origin.

(e) No difference is made by the fact that along with the principle just mentioned that of the catholicity of the contents of the books was also followed. This was done only where the apostolicity of origin was contested, as in the case of the Pastoral Epistles and the Fourth Gospel, and it was done simply in order to meet the doubt as to the apostolic origin. In the case of expressly non-apostolic writings like Mk. and Lk. a third principle was deferred to—that of traditional estimate; but the efforts made to prove an apostolic origin even for them show that the traditional estimate alone was not regarded as decisive any more than catholicity of contents was.

36. Peter and Paul.

The number twelve, as applied to the apostles had, in view of the obscurity of most of those men, only a schematic value. (a) Peter alone, in the recollection of the second century, could take a position of importance even approximating to that of Paul and, after him, James the brother of Jesus, and the John of Asia Minor (if we suppose him to have been the apostle; see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 3).

The pseudo-Clementine Recognitions (1 68 73 4 35) and Homilies (beginning, epistle of Peter, Ἰακώβῳ τῷ κυρίῳ καὶ ἐπισκόπῳ τῆς ἁγίας ἐκκλησίας) make James the universal bishop and represent Paul under the guise of Simon Magus (see § 18 bc, and SIMON MAGUS); and Justin, although acquainted with the writings of Paul, at least never mentions him, and (Apol. i. 39 3 50 12 Dial. 42) attributes the mission to the Gentiles to the twelve.

The Johannine writings, on the other hand, put forward the John of Asia Minor as the highest authority in such a manner that Peter everywhere falls behind the beloved disciple; he comes into competition with him even at the visit to the empty grave (20 3-9), and not till the appendix in chap. 21 is reached is he, in some measure at least, rehabilitated (JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 40). In Acts, however, care has already been taken to put forward Peter as the representative of the primitive apostles who was on a level with Paul at all points, even in the details of his miracles and sufferings (ACTS, § 4). This view could only be furthered by the belief that Peter had laboured in Rome (see SIMON PETER), which, as the metropolis of the world, very soon acquired a dominating position for all Christendom (so already in 1 Clem. 1 1 63 2 f.). So it came about that, in place of Jesus and in place of all the apostles and prophets (§ 34), Peter in his single person could seem, to a later redactor or supplementer of the First Gospel (16 18), to be the foundation of the church (§ 4).

(b) The belief, however, that Peter had been in Rome at the same time as Paul constituted the best possible reason for bringing forward, in highest prominence, the two men, who really had been so sharply opposed in their lifetimes, as representatives of Jewish and Gentile Christianity respectively, in fullest accord with each other. So it is that we find Ignatius writing to the Romans (4 3): 'not like Peter and Paul do I lay my commands on you'; and 2 Pet., the latest of the NT writings (160-180 A.D.), ratifies this oneness by making 'Peter' acknowledge the insight that has been given to Paul and reckon his epistles as integral parts of holy scripture whilst yet much that is contained in them—in other words the portions which are unacceptable to him—are gently set aside as 'hard to be understood' (3 15 f.).

37. Succession: laying on of hands.

That the first apostles possessed in a pre-eminent degree the Holy Spirit would have been a belief of little value for the later church if they had not been able in some way or other to transmit the gift. Of course, not to every one, but only to those who could be regarded as their successors in office.

(a) Already in 1 Clem. 42 4 44 2 f. it is represented as a thing quite made out, that the apostles appointed bishops and deacons in the communities founded by them, under the approval of these, and took steps to secure that as these bishops and deacons were removed by death proper men should be their successors. In like manner we read in Acts 14 23 that Paul and Barnabas chose elders in every community. When the absolute autonomy possessed by the community at Corinth is borne in mind (§ 9 a), this representation is very hard to believe. In Tit. 1 5 the task of appointing presbyters in every city of Crete is committed to Titus as representing Paul.

(b) The conception reaches completion, however, only when at installation there is conferred upon the person chosen a capability or power possessed by the person installing, but not possessed by the person installed without a solemn act. This power is no other than that special high measure of the gift of the spirit which is peculiar to the apostles. For its transmission the same act is needed as, according to Acts 8 17-19 19 6, was required for the communication of the Holy Spirit to new converts by the apostles—namely, the imposition of hands, which in Heb. 6 2 seems to be associated with baptism, and which is also appropriate to acts of blessing (Gen. 48 14-20 Mk. 10 16), and to acts of healing (Mk. 5 23 7 32 8 23 Acts 9 12 17 and often). It appears also as consecration to an office in Acts 6 6, and in the Mishna it is used at the installation of a judge (Schür. GJV(2) 2 152; ET ii. 1 177).

(c) The spirit of his office conferred upon Timothy is called (1 Tim. 4 14 2 Tim. 1 6) 'charisma,' χάρισμα (τοῦ θεοῦ).

It is, however, no such gift as that which, according to 1 Cor. 12 11, the Spirit bestows 'as he will'; it is bestowed on Timothy, according to 2 Tim. 1 6, 'through the laying on of my hands' (διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν μου). In other words, a purely magical conception, of which Beyschlag (see below, § 60) p. 95 says 'nothing more un-Pauline is to be met with anywhere in the Pastoral Epistles.' Nor is the criticism obviated by the fact that, according to 1 Tim. 4 14, this 'charisma' is bestowed upon Timothy 'by prophecy' (διὰ προφητείας). Prophetic indications that this or the other man was the right person to fill a given office may very easily have influenced elections (cp 1 18: 'according to the prophecies . . . on thee'), and such announcements may have been repeated at the solemn installation (cp Acts 13 1 f. and doubtless also 20 28: 'the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops'). Still, even in 1 Tim. 4 14 the imposition of hands is by no means lacking.

(d) Only, it is another custom that is here referred to —a custom which often enough may have asserted itself and therefore could not be passed over in complete silence by the writer—namely, the laying on of hands by the presbytery. It is, however, to be observed that it is represented only as a concomitant circumstance (μετά), not (as the laying on of hands by Paul in 2 Tim. 1 6: διά) as the cause of endowment with the gifts of office. As we can find a precedent for the act that effects endowment in the imposition of hands by Moses on Joshua, according to what we read in Nu. 27 18-23 Dt. 34 9, so for the act that merely accompanies endowment we have an analogous proceeding in the imposition of hands by the people in Nu. 8 10 at the installation of Levites which also resembles Acts 13 3. Whilst in Acts, however, the whole community lays its hands on the missionaries who are about to be sent forth, we find this function in 1 Tim. 4 14 already limited to the presbytery.

(e) The limitation just mentioned is connected with the further restriction that the communication of the gift of office is made not to every bearer of office, but only to Timothy; that is to say, to the representative of the bishop (see below, § 54 d). That he does not become a partaker in the apostolical succession for his own person alone, but with the capability, and also the duty, of further transmitting it, is shown by 1 Tim. 5 22 2 Tim. 2 2. From the verb here used (παράθου) it is at the same time clear that the 'trust' (παραθήκη) of 1 Tim. 6 20 2 Tim. 1 14 (less easily 1 12) is to be regarded along with 'charisma' (χάρισμα) as a more precise designation of the gift of office so bestowed. It seems thus to be looked upon as a valuable committed to the custodian's care to be faithfully kept and delivered up undamaged.

38. The prophets.

(a) After the apostles the first place is taken, not only in 1 Cor. 12 28 but also in Eph. 4 11, by the prophets; and in Eph. 2 20 3 5 they and they alone are associated with the apostles as constituting a unity. It follows not only from 4 11 but also from 3 5 that NT not OT prophets are intended, since to them the mystery hidden from former generations has now (νῦν) been revealed. The collocation in Rev. 18 20 ('ye saints and ye apostles and ye prophets') is similar, the prophets in this book taking (as can be easily understood) a prominent part throughout (10 7 22 6; along with the saints in 11 18 16 6 18 24, cp 22 9; also the two witnesses in 11 3 10 are called prophets). In Did. 13 3 (circa 130-160 A.D.) the prophets alone are called 'your chief priests' (with reference to 1 Cor. 9 13) and receive on this account the first-fruits; at the Lord's Supper, the presidency over which, as we can perceive, belongs to them, they are not, according to 10 7, restricted to the use of the formal prayers; to cast doubts upon their pneumatic utterances is the sin against the Holy Ghost (11 7; cp Mt. 12 31 f.).

(b) In the very next sentences, however, the author of the Didachè proceeds to give rules that neutralise this prohibition. He sets up criteria according to which his readers are to be able to discriminate between true prophets and false.

He who has not 'the ways of the Lord' (τρόποι κυρίου), he who does not himself practise what he teaches, he who in pneumatic utterance orders a table and then partakes of it, he who demands money or other things, is a false prophet. The greater the reverence for the spirit of God which speaks out of the prophets, the worse must have been the degeneracy which rendered such cautions necessary. In point of fact Hermas finds a whole mandatum (11) required in order to meet this need. Peregrinus was, according to Lucian (ch. 11-13 16), amongst the Christians a prophet (προφήτης), a leader of a Thiasus-band (θιασάρχης: as leader of the love-feast), 'a synagogue officer (ξυναγωγεύς: as preacher), 'president' (προστάτης), and experienced in his captivity the most extraordinary attentions and on his journeyings the richest maintenance. A goëtes such as he, who knew how to deal with Christians with the requisite cunning, had it in his power, according to Lucian about 166 A.D., to become a rich man within a very short time. Similar things can be found in Celsus about 180 A.D. (ap. Origen 7 9 11; vol. i. 700 and 702 ed. de la Rue). Perhaps we may also interpret Mt. 7 15-23 in the same sense ('false prophets . . . in sheep's clothing . . . have we not prophesied in thy name?' etc.), especially as prophecy in the name of Jesus during his lifetime could much less easily have happened than what Lk. (13 26 f.) has in the parallel passage: we have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets. The characterisation given by Hermas may possibly, in view of what has just been said, not be entirely exact. He says that a false prophet gives to individuals privately forecasts as to their future, but shrinks from coming forward in the public meeting of the congregation and speaks only when consulted (Mand. 11 5 f. 13 f.). On the contrary, the prophets just depicted were met with both as itinerant preachers and also as settled members of the communities to which they respectively belonged (cp Acts 11 27 21 10 as contrasted with 13 1). Only in the latter case are they (their good behaviour being, of course, presupposed), according to Did. 13 1 3, to receive the first-fruits. As their manner of speech was ecstatic indeed, yet, in contradistinction from the speaking with tongues, capable of being generally understood, it admits of being designated as 'doctrine' (Did. 11 10 Rev. 2 20), and conversely the false apostle of Did. 11 5 f. can be called a false prophet.

(c) It is only natural that, with the general falling off of that inspiration by which the spiritual gifts of the oldest Christianity are to be explained, the form also of ecstatic preaching became increasingly rare. In Did. 13 4 provision is made for the case of there being no prophet in a community; the firstling gifts are then to go to the poor. Partly the abuses already referred to, partly also the very pronounced recrudescence of ecstatic utterance among the Montanists, and the incompatibility of the unbridled individualism implied in this with the ecclesiastical organisation which in the meanwhile had grown to greater strength, served to bring the whole manifestation into discredit, and so to an end. The respect which the prophets lost must naturally have accrued to the bishops, who now came to be looked upon as the sole organs of the Holy Spirit (through the apostolical succession).

39. Apostles of Didachè; evangelists; teachers.

The third place (i.e., next to the apostles and the prophets) is by Paul (1 Cor. 12 28) assigned to the teachers; by the epistle to the Ephesians (4 11), on the other hand, it is given to the evangelists, whilst the teachers are relegated to the fifth place (yet see below, e).

(a) A possible inference is that the evangelists constitute a special class.

The view that the authors of written gospels are intended is quite impossible; but so also is the other that by 'evangelists' are meant subordinate missionaries who had not to teach but merely to recite the gospel history in accordance with a fixed type of narrative committed to memory (GOSPELS, § 115). If that were so, not only would the high appreciation bestowed upon them in Eph. 4 11 be remarkable; the limitation to a task of this description would be on missionary journeys quite unworkable. 2 Tim. 4 5 throws no light on the subject, for in the expression 'do the work of an evangelist' (ἔργον ποίησον εὐαγγελιστοῦ) it is presupposed that Timothy was not himself an evangelist. The explanation of what is meant by evangelist is doubtless, however, to be found by the help of the last passage in which the word occurs (Acts 21 8).

The evangelist mentioned in Acts 21 8—Philip—is the same as the person whose missionary activity in Samaria and with the Ethiopian eunuch is recorded in Acts 8 5-40. Thus by an evangelist we are to understand a non-apostolic missionary, all the more because in its original meaning 'gospel' (εὐαγγέλιον) also denotes not the history of Jesus but the glad tidings of salvation.

(b) In this case, however, an evangelist does not differ from an apostle in the wider sense of the word explained in § 17, and one could at most suppose that the word evangelist, which is met with only in writings of the second century, had come into use in place of the word apostle because the prevailing use of 'apostle' had come to be in the narrower sense. This we may take to be the true state of the case in the three writings referred to above (Acts, Eph., 2 Tim.). The Didachè affords evidence, indeed, that alongside of the narrower meaning the wider sense also maintained itself. The 'apostles,' however, who are contemporary with its author, are by no means on a level with the former bearers of that title. The early apostles figure only in the superscriptions (διδαχὴ τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων and διδαχὴ διὰ τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων τοῖς ἔθνεσιν); the contemporary apostles, on the other hand, rank after the prophets even, as only these last are put on a level with the high priests (13 3). According to 11 4 the (contemporary) apostles ought to be received like the Lord himself (cp Mt. 10 40); but according to Did. 11 1 f. this holds good of every teacher. The Didachè shows us how the apostles ought to be classified, ranking them along with the teachers. If prophets and teachers come before us together in 15 2 as 'those who are to be held in honour' (τετιμημένοι) it is impossible that it should be intended to exclude the apostles from this category.

(c) Nevertheless, there remains the distinction that the apostles pass from place to place; whilst by the teacher, who (like the prophet who is stationary in the community) is worthy of his hire (13 1 f.), we are plainly to understand a resident member of the local community. The apostles, however, do not devote themselves exclusively to mission work; they also come forward with the function of teachers in the already existing communities which they visit in the course of their travels. These itinerant teachers unquestionably did much, not only, as in Paul's time, towards the strengthening of the Christian conviction and zeal of the communities they visited by what they had to tell about things they had seen in other places, but also towards promoting that uniformity in ecclesiastical institutions and that high estimate of the dignity of the church which are so distinctive of the second century.

Of the vocation of the teachers broadly considered the epistle of James (3 1) thinks very gravely ('be not many teachers . . . we shall receive heavier judgment'). The writer of the epistle of Barnabas says (1 8 4 9), with that modesty which he affects, that he wishes to write his epistle 'not as a teacher' (οὐχ ὡς διδάσκαλος). Hermas (Sim. ix. 25 2) still holds to this, that the teachers possess the Holy Ghost (a position resting on Rom. 12 7). From the prophets they are distinguished by the non-ecstatic character of their speech. They are associated with the prophets as in Did. 13 1 f. 15 1 f., also Acts 13 1.

(d) In another respect also are the teachers on a level with the prophets: they were exposed to the same dangers. According to Did. 11 5 f. the teachers abused the regard in which they were held, exactly as did the prophets; and the same precautionary regulations were needed with respect to them.

In fact, we find one rule laid down with regard to the itinerant apostles which plainly was not ventured upon in the case of the prophets: they are to remain and receive maintenance in a community for only one day, and for two days only in cases of necessity (11 4 f.); whilst to a travelling Christian who is not a teacher, two days, or if necessary three, are conceded (12 2). This is certainly very humiliating for the teachers, and shows how bad their behaviour must sometimes have been. But further it has to be feared in the case of teachers—what was not so much the case, it would seem, with prophets—that they spread heretical views (11 2: ἄλλην διδαχὴν εἰς τὸ καταλῦσαι; 2 Jn. 10). There were, in fact, very many itinerant gnostic teachers, and the mere circumstance that communities were being accustomed to regard Christianity as a sort of philosophical school, and so to allow its practical duties to fall out of sight, was a grave one.

(e) Various means were employed to cope with these dangers. Either the churches were armed with a few simple watchwords by which they could themselves test the churchly correctness of the teachers. In this sense it is said in Did. 11 2 12 1 and in 1 Jn. 4 1 that teachers and other itinerants ought to be tested, and in 1 Jn. 4 2 f. 2 Jn. 7, also Polyc. 7 1, the formula for this is proclaimed as being 'that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh' (cp JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 47). Or, no admission is given to suspicious comers, and it is forbidden to receive them. So 2 Jn. 10. The same policy in the opposite sense was followed by Diotrephes, according to 3 Jn. 9 (cp § 55). This analogy shows how natural it was that the bishops should become the persons to take such measures and exercise their authority in carrying them out. Then, however, it became also necessary that they for their part should themselves see to the providing of correct teaching. The authors of the Pastoral Epistles desire therefore that the presidents of the various churches shall themselves undertake the business of teaching.

The bishop must be 'apt to teach' (διδακτικός: 1 Tim. 3 2; cp 2 Tim. 2 24 Tit. 1 9); his models, Timothy and Titus, are continually exhorted to teach (1 Tim. 4 11 6 3, etc.), their successors must be fitted for this work (2 Tim. 2 2), and the presbyters who labour in word and doctrine are to receive double remuneration (1 Tim. 5 17; cp § 50 d). According to Did. 15 1, bishops and deacons do the work also of prophets and teachers. The same combination of functions is perhaps indicated in Eph. 4 11 when at the end of the enumeration we find 'the shepherds and teachers' (not 'the teachers': τοὺς δὲ ποιμένας καὶ διδασκάλους without the repetition of τοὺς δὲ before διδασκάλους). So also already in Heb. 13 7, if 'governors' (ἡγούμενοι) be the heads of the community (see § 47 b).

According to Justin (Apol. i. 67 4), it is in fact the 'president' (προεστώς) who preaches on Sunday. But it was by no means always the case that bishops were capable of themselves discharging the teaching office. The development nevertheless ended in this, that they at least took in hand the supervision of the teachers. Teaching could never like prophecy become extinct, for it answered to a never-ending need of the Church, and was free from a transitory form such as ecstatic speaking is. The episcopate, however, in this respect also gained in power.

Clearest of all are the functions of the deacons, from the time that their office has become definite and formal.

40. Deacons and deaconesses.

(a) As we are compelled to disregard the narrative of Acts 6 relating to the Seven in this connection (see COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5, end), and must in the meantime also pass over Phil. 1 1 (see § 57), our first testimony for the office and functions of a deacon is found in 1 Clem. (§ 37 a). The more general and comprehensive the meaning of the terms for the person and his work and office (διάκονος διακονεῖν διακονία) in Paul and even in the Pastoral Epistles as applied to Timothy and Titus (see DEACON, § 3), the more certainly may we regard the terms as confined in the case of elected deacons to the humbler services which were found necessary in the community.

These services may, of course, have been very many and varied; the characteristic thing about them, however, is their subordinate nature. As to what they were we learn very little in detail. According to Justin (Apol. i. 67 5), one of them was that of carrying to church members detained from the eucharistic service their portions of bread and wine. The enumeration of the qualities to be looked for in a deacon in 1 Tim. 3 8 f. 12, and in Polyc. 5 2, says nothing as to their sphere of duty; it shows only that their office was by no means regarded as unimportant. In 1 Tim. 3 10, also, it is expressly enjoined that they are to be tested before receiving office, and in 3 13 a special reward is held out for the faithful discharge of their duties, whatever is meant by the 'degree' (βαθμός) which they are to attain.

(b) In particular, however, it is the prohibition of a second marriage (3 12) which brings the deacon so nearly into the same plane with the bishop—all the more because the author in 5 14 expressly wills that the younger widows remarry. Therefore, even though the services required by the deacons included those of the humblest possible kind, they themselves none the less belonged to the clergy. This also explains why it is that according to Did. 15 2 they are reckoned, together with the prophets and teachers, along with the bishops to the number of 'those who are to be held in honour' (τετιμημένοι), and according to 15 1 take part in teaching. This not only goes further than 1 Clem., which (1 3 21 6) demands honour only for the 'governors' ([προ-]ηγούμενοι) and the 'presbyters' (πρεσβύτεροι), although according to 42 4 44 2 f. the deacons also are instituted by the apostles or at their instance; it also goes beyond the Epistle to the Ephesians, which does not mention deacons at all, and in fact in the enumeration of offices so often referred to already in 4 11 f. means by 'ministry' (διακονία) something which all the members of the church ought to render. Ignatius goes still farther than the Pastoral Epistles and the Didachè; eleven times he names bishops, presbyters, and deacons as an inseparable unity, and demands on behalf of the last-named that heed be paid to them as to Jesus himself or to the command of God (ad Trall. 3 1; ad Smyrn. 8 1).

(c) Female deacons are mentioned in 1 Tim. 3 11, whilst the services of Phœbe (Rom. 16 1 f.) as 'succourer' (προστάτις: see above, § 9 a, end) will not have been entirely of a menial character (see DEACON, §§ 6 and 4). Amongst the humbler services rendered by the female deacons we may reckon that of washing the feet of the saints, spoken of in 1 Tim. 5 10. 1 Tim. 3 11 may be interpreted in the sense indicated with all the less hesitation because Pliny (112 or 113 A.D.) already makes allusion to 'females who were called ministers' (ancillæ quæ ministræ dicebantur) whom he caused to be put to the torture in his procedure against the Christians of Bithynia (Epist. x. 96 [97] 8).

The present will be an appropriate place in which to consider that other part taken by women in the ecclesiastical system, of which we read in 1 Tim. 5 3-16.

41. Widows.

If the passage were dealing only with the question of the support of widows, in the first instance by their own people (5 4 8 16*a*) and in the second instance by the church (v. 16*b*), or only with the qualities which were to be regarded as entitling or disentitling them to the support of the church (vv. 5-7 10 13-15) it would not have to be considered here. Of the widows who are to be supported by the community, however, three qualifications are demanded which it would not be reasonable to demand if the question were one of support merely: the widow must be not less than sixty, must have been the wife of one man, and be definitely pledged not to marry again (vv. 9 11). The author, according to v. 14, positively desires the younger widows to remarry, and therefore there would be no reason for making willingness to do so a ground for withholding that support which a widow of less advanced years might yet in certain circumstances urgently need. The renunciation of second marriage is rather to be regarded as placing these widows on the same level with the bishops and deacons (3 2 12). So also the injunction 'honour [them]' (τίμα: 5 3; cp Did. 15 1 f.).

Thus the 'widows' possess an office, and that too, of course, quite distinct from that of the deaconesses of 3 11: probably in fact, so far as we can conjecture, that of supervision of the female members of the community. This is what is pointed to also by the 'going about from house to house' (v. 13), and we can now perceive that the qualities which seemed to be spoken of with reference merely to eligibility for support may equally well have been insisted on as fitting their possessor for an office of oversight.

The enrolment in a formal list (v. 9) will also have reference to an office, and the 'first faith' (πρώτη πίστις) which, according to v. 12 is broken by re-marriage, will be not the promise of fidelity made to the first husband, but the promise to remain single which these widows in all probability had to make when appointed to their office. Thus the only point which could mislead is this, that the 'widows indeed' (ὄντως χῆραι) of v. 3 are defined in vv. 4 f. only as those who are childless, whilst the injunction to honour them rests not upon their childlessness but upon the office they hold. 'Those who are widows indeed' (τὰς ὄντως χήρας) has thus a double meaning which nevertheless has its reason in the state of the facts. For a suggestion that perhaps a trace of this use of words is even to be found already in Acts 6 1 see COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5, end.

The Ignatian Epistles which here also go beyond the Pastoral Epistles bring the matter into perfect clearness. In Smyrn. 13 1 Ignatius greets 'the households of my brethren with their wives and children, and the virgins who are called widows' (τοὺς οἴκους τῶν ἀδελφῶν μου σὺν γυναιξὶ καὶ τέκνοις καὶ τὰς παρθένους τὰς λεγομένας χήρας). Here 'widows' (χῆραι) is already so strictly technical an expression that its literal meaning no longer exactly fits. Outside of the families which Ignatius first names stand virgins as members of a class to which originally only widows belonged.

There still remain to be considered certain categories of persons with regard to whose employments our information is exceedingly scanty. (a) In Rev. 1 3 ('blessed . . . prophecy') it is presupposed that the book is to be read in presence of a congregation. This is, of course, a thing that is capable of being done in a quite casual way, and each several time, should the reading be repeated, by a different individual. It would, however, be somewhat pointless to invoke a blessing upon the reader as distinct from the hearers if his function was not a stated one. The art of reading is not universally diffused throughout those circles of society from which the Christian communities largely drew their membership. Again, in Justin (Apol. i. 67 3 f.) the reader is a distinct person from the president, who follows him with the sermon. Once more, the author of the homily, dating from about 160-180 A.D., which is usually known as the Second Epistle of Clement, says (19 1) that he reads this his present discourse to the hearers. One of the sources postulated by Harnack (in TU 2 5) for the Apostolic church-order (sources which he finds for the most part related to the Pastoral Epistles and the accounts of Justin, and assigns to a date somewhere between 140 and 180 A.D.) demands that the reader shall be 'a good narrator, knowing that he discharges the function of an evangelist' (διηγητικός, εἰδὼς ὅτι εὐαγγελιστοῦ τόπον ἐργάζεται).

42. Lectors, exorcists, etc.

Harnack is thus led to conjecture (l.c. 79-84) that 2 Clem. may have had some such reader as its author, especially as the writer goes on to say, further, that his preaching is an exhortation to pay heed to the text on which it is founded 'in order that ye may prepare salvation alike for yourselves and for him who reads in your midst' (τὸν ἀναγινώσκοντα ἐν ὑμῖν).

(b) We mention exorcists here, only in order to say that, even if their services were necessary at baptism, they had within our period by no means advanced in the direction of a stated position even so far as the readers conjecturally had, and that in any case information with regard to them is wholly wanting. The same holds good of the other inferior offices of later times—subdeacons, acolytes, ostiarii. Much rather would it be incumbent to speak of the martyrs, the ascetics (saints), and the virgins, as important personages of the post-apostolic, if not even of the apostolic, age, were it not that they all, though indeed enjoying a high degree of personal regard, were not in the several capacities mentioned in the regular service of the church. Cp § 44 c, end.

The last class remaining to be considered is that of the 'younger [men]' (νεώτεροι) who according to Acts 5 6 bury Ananias and Sapphira (in v. 10 they are called νεανίσκοι).

43. The νεώτεροι or νέοι and the πρεσβύτεροι.

(a) Since this act unquestionably comes under the category of the inferior services which, so far as we can conjecture, probably fell to the lot of deacons at a later period, the term 'younger men' (νεώτεροι) has been taken to be an expression to denote the forerunners of the deacons (the seven are first chosen in chap. 6), and it has even been held that the recurrence of the expression in 1 Pet. 5 5 is a proof that this epistle comes from the most ancient times, in which there were no deacons as yet. On this assumption, it would indeed be all the more singular that even at that early date the presbyters should have needed to be warned (v. 2 f.) against discontent with their office, greed, and ambition. We may be certain, however, at least of this, that these presbyters were not simply elderly people but leaders of the community, for only these last can tend (ποιμαίνειν). The flock (ποίμνιον) of v. 2 f. must be separated from the pastors (ποιμαίνοντες) by something more definite than mere age, which, indeed, furnishes no hard and fast limit, and Peter would not have called himself (v. 1) a 'fellow presbyter' (συμπρεσβύτερος) if 'presbyter' (πρεσβύτερος) were not an official position. It does not follow from this, however, that the 'younger men' (νεώτεροι), because contrasted with the presbyters, were also bearers of a definite office. Not they alone, but the whole community, have to obey the presbyters.

(b) We have here, therefore, a peculiar change of usage. In the primitive condition of matters when (as for example in Corinth; see § 9 a) there still was no president, a community naturally fell into two classes, the seniors and the juniors, and the seniors, even without any fixed regulation, were entitled to respect and deference from the juniors for their counsel and advice. This simple division continued, of course, even after the introduction of presbyters as governors of the community. Thus it comes about that in 1 Tim. 5, alongside of the official titles (v. 17), their age is also spoken of in v. 1 (so we must interpret, for in v. 2 we have 'elder women,' πρεσβύτεραι, which was never an official designation). In Tit. 2 1-6 the same rendering is made certain by the consideration that to the 'younger men'

(νεώτεροι) of v. 6 the antithesis is not 'elder men' (πρεσβύτεροι) at all but 'old men' (πρεσβῦται) (v. 2). But when 'elders' (πρεσβύτεροι) came to be used as an official designation 'younger men' (νεώτεροι) also changed its meaning so that it still continued to form the antithesis to the other word; it became a step towards, or a parallel to, the idea of 'layman.'[1] Thus it is in 1 Pet. 5 5 and, in all probability, also in Polyc. 5 3, where the duties of the 'younger men' (νεώτεροι) and of the virgins (παρθένοι) are enumerated in the middle place, between those of deacons and those of presbyters, and at the same time obedience towards the presbyters and deacons is enjoined on the 'younger men' (νεώτεροι).

(c) The most difficult of explanation are the 'young men' (νέοι) of 1 Clem. (in this writing νεώτεροι does not occur). In 1 3 and 21 6 the structure of the sentences is in harmony to the effect that honour is demanded in the first place for the 'governors' ([προ-]ἡγούμενοι) and next for the 'presbyters' (πρεσβύτεροι); then the duties of the 'young men' (νέοι) and afterwards those of the women are spoken of. The mention of the women, which is parallel to that of the 'virgins' (παρθένοι) in Polycarp, renders it probable that by 'young men' (νέοι) we are to understand all the male laity. The question still remains open whether the official persons with whom they are brought into contrast are to be sought in the 'governors' ([προ-]ἡγούμενοι) or in the 'presbyters' (πρεσβύτεροι: see below, § 47 b). In 3 3 allusion is made to the deposition of certain church leaders, but in dependence on Is. 3 5 (see BISHOP, § 8, end) where of old age it is said: 'the child will press against the old man' (προσκόψει τὸ παιδίον πρὸς τὸν πρεσβύτην). Clement can very well have preserved this meaning in his words 'the young were stirred up against the elder' (ἐπηγέρθησαν . . . οἱ νέοι ἐπὶ τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους) as he has also retained the other general antithesis from Isaiah: 'the base against the honourable' (ὁ ἄτιμος πρὸς τὸν ἔντιμον). Yet the selection of the word 'elders' (πρεσβύτεροι) instead of 'old men' (πρεσβῦται) points, as will be seen in § 45, to the fact, only too well known to the readers, that it was against official presbyters that the rising was. 'Elders' (πρεσβύτεροι) in this case has a double meaning which rhetorically is very effective; and so also 'young men' (νέοι). For since according to 47 6 only one or two persons had given occasion to the offence, it is very easily possible that these were young persons, but also at the same time that they stood in the position of laymen towards the presbyters in so far as these were official persons.

When we turn now to the most difficult portion of the whole question relating to the constitution of the church — that of the origin of monarchical episcopacy, it will be advisable to start from the hypothesis of Hatch (see BISHOP, § 5), as by its introduction an entirely new course has been given to the investigation. As, however, its author imposed upon himself at various points a cautious reserve, we shall arrive at the most questionable points more directly if we take as the basis of our remarks the more elaborated form which the hypothesis subsequently received from Harnack.

44. The bishops, according to Hatch and Harnack.

(a) Harnack distinguishes three organisations. (1) First, there is the spiritual or religious organisation consisting of apostles, prophets, and teachers, which served the church as a whole, not the separate communities, and possessed divine authority in virtue of its being endowed with the gift of the Holy Spirit. (2) The patriarchal, arising out of the natural preponderance of the older members of the community over the younger, yet not involving the attribution to the elders of any official quality. For Jewish-Christian communities Harnack assumes elective presbyteries on the basis of the Jewish model (§ 24); but so far as Gentile-Christian communities are concerned he disputes their existence for the whole of the first century and especially as regards 1 Clem., Acts, and 1 Pet. When the second century is reached, he recognises them, especially in Jam. 5 14 (τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους τῆς ἐκκλησίας) and in Polycarp and Hermas; adopting the expression of the last-named author (Vis. ii. 4 3) he calls them 'the presbyters who superintend the church' (οἱ πρεσβύτεροι οἱ προϊστάμενοι τῆς ἐκκλησίας).[1] They thus formed a ruling body selected from among the senior members of the community after the manner of the body which, under the name of συνέδριον τῆς βουλῆς, constituted the council in Greek cities in the Roman period. Ignatius (ad Trall. 3 1) calls the presbyters a 'synedrion of God' (συνέδριον θεοῦ). (3) Already in Phil. 1 1 (see below, § 57) Harnack finds the administrative organisation — i.e., episcopi and deacons who were chosen by the community to look after money matters, and more particularly the distribution of doles, yet still more, as Harnack, going beyond Hatch, urges, for the conduct of the worship.

The last thesis Harnack supports specially by reference to 1 Clem. 44 4: 'those who have brought forward the gifts' (τοὺς προσενεγκόντας τὰ δῶρα), because by the 'gifts or 'offerings' (δῶρα or προσφοραί, 36 1), according to 41 1 (where the Jewish form of worship in which these expressions occur is applied to the Christian), the prayers offered in the meetings of the congregation are intended; also by reference to the 'therefore' (οὖν) of Did. 15 1, after treating of the Sunday service in chap. 14: 'Appoint for yourselves therefore episcopi and deacons.' The distribution of doles, including the care for travelling brethren, which was a very important matter in those days, is the one characteristic function of the episcopi and deacons referred to by Hermas (Sim. ix. 27 2, cp 26 2).[2]

(b) These functionaries (episcopi and deacons) were, according to Harnack, chosen not without regard to the question whether they were possessed of a charismatic endowment for their sphere of duties; but their office did not place them in a position of superiority over the community as a whole; it only gave them an oversight over many members of the community. Originally between episcopi and deacons there was no distinction whatever; they were differentiated, however, quite naturally by reason of age, the humbler duties falling to the lot of the younger among them. Those who had to undertake the more responsible part of the duty thus belonged as matter of course to the senior section of the community, and since there was a select body chosen from among these, individual members of this smaller body — in other words individual 'presiding presbyters' (πρεσβύτεροι προϊστάμενοι) — were readily chosen to be episcopi. If those chosen to be episcopi did not already belong to the body just mentioned, they were, according to Harnack, very soon taken into it. Such members of this body as were at the same time episcopi are designated by Harnack in an expression which is not met with in the sources, as 'episcopal presbyters' (πρεσβύτεροι ἐπισκοποῦντες).

(c) The episcopi at first in respect of organisation had held a place apart from the presbyters and in respect of dignity had been inferior to them. The respect and influence enjoyed by the 'episcopal presbyters' (πρεσβύτεροι ἐπισκοποῦντες), on the other hand, according to Harnack steadily increased as compared with the non-episcopal members of the board. This was partly because the administration of money matters was in their hands, partly because they had charge of the worship, but principally because they also took upon themselves the work of teaching. Thus, with the gradual disappearance of the apostles, prophets, and teachers (see §§ 37 e, 38 c, 39 e), the divine authority possessed by these several orders passed to the episcopal presbyters, who had received through their election only a human authority and through their charismatic endowment only a general resemblance to the persons charged with the duty of teaching.

This transference of the regard enjoyed by the teaching persons to the officials charged with affairs of government is held by Harnack to be one of the most important particulars

[1] Λαϊκός does not occur in the LXX but is met with in Aq., Symm. Thdt., 1 S. 21 4 [5] (LXX βέβηλοι, scil. ἄρτοι as against ἱεροὶ ἄρτοι), similarly in 21 5 [6] Ezek. 22 26 48 15. The verb λαϊκόω is used by one or more of these translators in Ezek. 7 22 Dt. 20 6 28 30, and by LXX in some codices in Ruth 1 12. 1 Clem. 40 5 already has the expression ὁ λαϊκὸς ἄνθρωπος τοῖς λαϊκοῖς προστάγμασι δέδεται. The next instances of the employment of the word (Harnack, ad loc.) are not earlier than about 200 A.D.

[1] Yet 'presbyters' without qualifying phrase also occurs in Hermas (Vis. ii. 4 2 and iii. 1 8). As Hermas in the last passage says 'let the presbyters sit down first' they are doubtless also intended by the πρωτοκαθεδρῖται of Vis. iii. 9 7 (cp § 47 b).

[2] The only other passage where episcopi and deacons occur in Hermas is Vis. iii. 5 1, in this connection: apostles, episcopi, teachers, deacons.

which the Didachè has transmitted to us (so, already, the Pastoral Epistles also: see above, § 39 e). By this transference was brought about the cumulation of the dignity of all three groups (apostles, prophets, teachers) upon the one class of officials, the connecting of the presbyterate with the episcopi having been brought about before. All that was now wanting to the episcopi was participation in the dignity of a fourth group—the spiritual aristocracy, as it were—that, namely, of the ascetics, virgins, martyrs, etc. (§ 42 b). On the other hand, there arose as a new element in their favour the idea of the apostolic succession (§ 37).

(d) All that has been said holds good of the episcopi even for the time during which they still constituted a college; the special supremacy of the episcopi over the non-episcopal presbyters is older than the monarchy of the one bishop in the church of each separate locality. How this monarchy arose is one of the obscurest problems. According to the Ignatian Epistles, which Harnack regards as genuine and now (ACL, II. [= Chronol.] 1 381-406) assigns to 110-117 or at latest 117-125 A.D. (see, however, below, § 53 c-i), it appeared in Syria and Asia Minor at a much earlier date than in Rome, where Justin (circa 152 A.D.) is the first to give evidence for it whilst Hermas still knows nothing of it. The most various causes may have contributed together to its rise; Harnack regards as the most important of these the habituation of the otherwise so democratically constituted communities to the despotic influence which from the very first was exercised by apostles, prophets, and teachers in virtue of their possession of the Holy Spirit, and now passed over to the bishops.

In forming an opinion upon this unquestionably most important and acute construction it is necessary to set aside all vague impressions, such as that it is 'attractive,' or that it is 'complicated,' and to take one's stand upon facts that have been ascertained with as much certainty as may be possible. With this end in view let us examine in the first instance the preliminary question as to whether the 'presbyters' in Acts and 1 Clem. really are all the senior members of the community and not rather an elected board. That this last is the case in 1 Pet. we consider to have been established already (§ 43 a); yet this is without bearing upon the question of what is meant by episcopi. In Acts and 1 Clem., on the other hand, the episcopi are mentioned in conjunction with the presbyters.

45. The presbyters official persons in Acts and 1 Clem.

Now, that chosen rulers are intended in Acts 20 17 follows from the same considerations as those on which it follows (according to § 43 a) from 1 Pet. 5 1-5: in v. 28 the 'flock' (ποίμνιον) is mentioned as contradistinguished from them, and they are to feed the church of the Lord (read κυρίου) which he has purchased with his own blood. Here unquestionably the whole church, not the junior members alone, is intended. In 1 Clem. we have (§ 43 c) left the meaning of πρεσβ. in 1 3 and 21 6 undetermined, and do not require to determine it till later (§ 47 b). For a decision on the other passages we must start from the fact that according to 44 4 several episcopi had been deposed: 'It will be no light sin for us, if we thrust out of the bishop's office those who have offered the gifts unblamably and holily' (ἁμαρτία οὐ μικρὰ ἡμῖν ἔσται, ἐὰν τοὺς ἀμέμπτως καὶ ὁσίως προσενεγκόντας τὰ δῶρα τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς ἀποβάλωμεν), where 'bishop's office' (τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς) depends on 'thrust out' (ἀποβάλ.), not, as might at first sight appear, on 'the gifts' (τὰ δῶρα). Immediately afterwards we read (44 5): blessed are the departed presbyters: they need not to fear lest any one should depose them.

Harnack (TLZ, 1889, p. 419) renders: 'blessed are the deceased senior members of the community,' and urges in support that not only episcopi but also deacons are meant. Both together have been in fact mentioned in chap. 42. On the other hand, however, throughout the whole of chaps. 43 and 44 the deacons are mentioned only incidentally with 'the aforesaid persons' (τοὺς προειρημένους) in 44 2; but in 44 1 exactly as in 44 4 (see above) it is expressly the 'episcopate' (ἐπισκοπή) that is alone being spoken of; the apostles foresaw that strife would arise regarding the episcopal office. Thus 'presbyter' must be an official designation. In 54 2 we even find such an expression as this: 'the appointed presbyters.' Harnack (l.c. 424) renders: 'the old men who have been installed in the office' (of episcopi, that is, not the presbyterate). In that case, however, the expression ought to have run 'the appointed episcopi' (οἱ καθεσταμένοι ἐπίσκοποι).

If, however, the idea of office is made good for this place, we have no longer any right to refuse to admit it in 47 6 and 57 1 (see the passages under BISHOP, § 8). Neither is it by any means a 'desperate assumption' (so Harnack, loc. cit.) if in the same epistle elsewhere, 1 3 21 6, we still understand by the word πρεσβύτεροι not official persons, but seniors (see § 47 b). In the case of 3 3 it has been seen (§ 43 c) that in one passage a working together of both meanings is possible.

46. Presbyter identical with episcopus.

(a) We have now reached a point at which it will be proper to formulate the proposition which has been continually offering itself in the preceding section; the word presbyter, in the later chapters of 1 Clem. and also in 3 3 according to one sense of its twofold meaning, denotes not merely some kind of office, but definitely that of the episcopos.

In 44 4 f., in particular, both words stand in close proximity as expressions for the same idea. When Hatch's hypothesis was still unknown, Harnack had observed in his Patrum apostol. opera upon the 'episcopi and diaconi' (ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους) of 42 4: that then, as in the time of the apostles, the offices were two: episcopi (= presbyters) and diaconi ('luce clarius est, duos in clero ordines et apostolorum tempore et tum temporis {cap. 44} fuisse, episcopos {= presbyteros} et diaconos'). This still holds good.

The same remark, moreover, applies to Acts 20 17 where Paul summons the presbyters (τοὺς πρ.) of the church of Ephesus to Miletus and says to them (v. 28), 'the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops.' We by no means take this as representing the view of Paul; but all the more must it be held to represent the view of the writer of Acts. So too with Tit. 1 5-7 ('that thou shouldest . . . appoint elders in every city . . . for the bishop must be,' etc.). For the epistle of Polycarp, in which bishops are not mentioned, Harnack himself (transl. of Hatch, 233, n. 12) makes it plain that, according to 6 1 11 1, the presbyters (who figure as official persons) exercise the functions which on his view pertain to bishops (cp Lightfoot, Christ. Ministry, 53 f., and, on the date of the epistle, JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 47).

(b) It is true that, in Hermas, in the few places where presbyters are mentioned (see above, § 44 a, 2), the leadership of the church is the only thing predicated of them, whilst in the still fewer passages where bishops occur no function is expressly assigned to them beyond that of seeing to the support of the poor; but as against the facts already adduced this cannot be brought into account as turning the scale (cp further, § 47 a). So also with the argument that, apart from Polyc. 5 2-6 1, the conjunction presbyters and diaconi is never found, but always episcopi and diaconi; for the most obvious verbal antithesis of presbyter-elder is 'younger' (νεώτερος) (§ 43), whilst episcopus and diaconus have this in common that they describe the nature of the work of those respectively designated. Similarly too with the fact that along with apostles, prophets, or teachers, only bishops (and deacons), never presbyters, are enumerated; the instance in which this last is done being according to Harnack's own survey (TU ii. 2 111 f.; cp 148, n. 77 b) a solitary one (Herm. Vis. iii. 5 1),—for in Sim. ix. 25 2 26 2 27 2 the four cannot be regarded as members of a consecutive enumeration—and alongside of the solitary instance just mentioned we have Eph. 4 11 with its 'pastors' (ποιμένες) in such an enumeration—in other words, with an idea which Harnack (transl. of Hatch, 230) finds to be precisely identical with that of presbyters when it occurs in Hermas (Sim. ix. 31 5 f.). Nay, more: in the Pastoral Epistles Harnack himself finds this series: 'apostle, prophet (1 Tim. 1 18 4 14), evangelist (teacher), presbyters functioning as episcopi (πρεσβύτεροι ἐπισκοποῦντες), deacons' (on the third member of this series cp § 54 c below).

Lastly, as against the conclusion arrived at above nothing is to be gained by the suggestion that the absence of the word 'presbyter' from the Didachè is to be explained by the fact that it denotes no office. The bishops are mentioned in the Didachè only once (15 1); on the supposition that the presbyters were identical with them it must be regarded as a mere accident that the one name, not the other, was chosen. Or rather, not even an accident, for the deacons are placed in juxtaposition with them, and to 'deacon' the word 'presbyter' is not the most natural complement. Greater weight would be due to the consideration that for the Didachè there is no more a governing body in the church than there is in the Epistles of Paul to the Corinthians (§ 9 a). On this point, however, see § 56.

(c) In the meanwhile, we are in a position to say so much as this by way of answer to our question—that Harnack's expression 'presbyters functioning as episcopi' (πρεσβύτεροι ἐπισκοποῦντες) not only does not occur in the sources, but also is in contradiction with them, and that it is precisely in the First Epistle of Clement, which Harnack ranks so high as our first document for the amalgamation of the administrative with the patriarchal organisation, that this theory—upon which his entire construction depends—is most decisively wrecked. In it not only are the presbyters already official persons; the episcopi are also identical with them and are designated as presbyters neither because they were of more advanced age nor because they formed a part of the elected presbyterial college.

Or shall we say that linguistic usage is decisive against the identity of presbyters and episcopi?

47. Meaning and synonyms of ἐπίσκοπος.

(a) The proofs adduced by Hatch to show that episcopos in those times meant a finance officer are very interesting and weighty; but they are not wholly conclusive. The word has also quite other senses. In the LXX, for example, it signifies a military officer (Nu. 31 14 2 K. 11 15), or it is applied to God (Is. 60 17 Wisd. 1 6), as in fact it also is in 1 Clem. 59 3, or to Christ (1 Pet. 2 25: 'shepherd and bishop'; cp BISHOP, §§ 4 and 6). But, indeed, even apart from such examples as these, we should be by no means precluded from thinking that the etymological meaning of the word (to oversee) must be taken into account. It is pointed to by such phrases as (Herm. Vis. iii. 5 1) 'episcopi . . . who . . . discharged their overseership . . . purely' (ἐπίσκοποι . . . οἱ . . . ἐπισκοπήσαντες . . . ἁγνῶς) (which at the same time weakens the force of the remark of Harnack about Hermas referred to in § 46 b), or (Acts 1 20) 'overseership' (ἐπισκοπή). (More in Loofs, St.Kr., 1890, p. 628 f.).

(b) The synonyms also lead to a like conclusion. According to Acts 20 28 the bishops' duty is to shepherd (ποιμαίνειν); the bishops thus are synonymous with the 'pastors' (ποιμένες) of Eph. 4 11, as also appears from 1 Pet. 2 25. The pastors again, however, even Harnack (see above, § 46 b) has perceived to be in Hermas synonymous with 'presbyters,' and 'shepherding' (ποιμαίνειν) is the distinctive task of presbyters according to 1 Pet. 5 2. Further, where the shepherd goes before the flock he is their 'leader' (ἡγούμενος).

That 'leaders' (ἡγούμενοι) in Heb. denotes the heads of the church is an interpretation very much recommended by 13 17 ('they watch on behalf of your souls') and v. 24 and not set aside by v. 7; for in v. 7 it is not said that teaching is the primary task of the leaders (cp § 39 a)—in fact, the meaning may even be such an 'admonition' (νουθετεῖν) as we find in 1 Thess. 5 12 expressly attributed to the church rulers.

The phrase 'chief men' (ἄνδρες ἡγούμενοι) applied in Acts 15 22 as a title of honour to Judas Barsabbas and Silas is much too general to warrant us in taking it for a technical term which, were it to be so regarded, would rest upon the circumstance that, according to 15 32, they were prophets. Equally little reason is there for holding that in Hermas (Vis. iii. 9 7-10) the 'leaders' (προηγούμενοι) as teachers are distinguished from those who have precedence (πρωτοκαθεδρῖται) as presidents (see above, § 44 a 2, note), for the exhortation immediately following—'be not like sorcerers'—is given not to the first merely but to both. In Vis. ii. 2 6 'the leaders of the church' (οἱ προηγούμενοι τῆς ἐκκλησίας) fits the presidents very well. As regards 1 Clem., Harnack (TLZ, 1889, p. 419, n. 2) has already withdrawn the view previously set forth by him (TU 2 2, pp. 95 and 111) that 'leaders' ([προ-] ἡγούμενοι) in the sense of 'held in honour' (τετιμημένοι, Did. 15 2) applies only to apostles, prophets, and teachers. It was all the more certainly a mistaken view inasmuch as 'leaders' (ἡγούμ.) in 1 Clem. is six times used to denote high political functionaries (5 7 32 2 37 2 f. 51 5 55 1 61 1). It was necessary for Harnack to hold it as long as in 1 3 21 6 the presbyters for whom honour is demanded after the 'leaders' (ἡγούμενοι)—but in different phraseology (see the structure of the passages in § 43 c)—were taken to be official persons (§ 46 a). If, in accordance with his present view, we take the word in these two passages as meaning elderly people, there is yet nothing to hinder us from taking—contrary to his view—the 'leaders' ([προ-] ἡγούμενοι) in the sense of presidents of the church, as in all other passages.

This 'ruling' (ἡγεῖσθαι), however, in turn, is nothing else than the 'presiding' (προΐστασθαι) of 1 Thess. 5 12 Rom. 12 8 1 Tim. 5 17 or the exercise of the gift of 'government' (κυβέρνησις) in 1 Cor. 12 28. Such a church ruler is very well described in Tit. 1 7 comprehensively as a 'steward of God' (Θεοῦ οἰκονόμος). Thus the synonyms also lead us to the conclusion already indicated, that the distinction between the function of church government by presbyters and that of administration of finance and worship by episcopi must be given up.[1]

Much value is attached by Hatch and Harnack in support of their theory to episcopi and deacons being apparently closely connected, not only linguistically but also in respect of their functions. The fact is admitted; but it does not prove the theory. If there was only a single superintendency it of course carried with it the supervision also of the activity of the deacons, and was exercised in conjunction with them.

48. Connection between deacons and bishops.

So was it, admittedly, at a later date when the episcopus, as with Justin, was leader of the divine service and chief almoner in addition to his other duties; so also can it have been, therefore, at an earlier date, and all the more so as the conditions were comparatively simple. Already in 1 Cor. 12 28 only the gift of 'government' (κυβέρνησις), and in Rom. 12 6-8 only 'ruling' (προΐστασθαι), is presented as what can be regarded as the primitive form alike of the duty of the presbyters and of that of episcopi in the sense intended by Hatch and Harnack. For the very earliest times Hatch in point of fact supposes only one superintendency. This is valid, however, for the whole development; if in the 'helps' (ἀντιλήμψεις) the later deacons are prefigured, the later episcopi are prefigured in this whole function of leadership and not in an activity limited to matters of cultus or of finance. The warning against greed in which Harnack sees a weighty support for his description of the sphere of duty of the episcopi is given in 1 Pet. 5 2 to the presbyters.

The state of the question is essentially simplified by what has just been observed. The problem—first created by the hypothesis itself—as to how it came about that the episcopi who in the earliest times ranked after the presbyters came to rise above them, falls to the ground with that hypothesis. Thus the question that alone remains is simply this: how was it that the episcopate reached to the high position it ultimately did gain? This of its own accord divides into two: on the one hand, the question as to the origin of the supremacy of the episcopate—not, however, the supremacy of the college of episcopi over the college of presbyters, for the two were identical, but the supremacy over the community in the surprisingly high degree actually attained—and, on the other hand, as to the origin of the monarchy of the episcopus in the individual church. The explanations that can be given for the latter fact are only partially different from those that can be given for the former.

If we follow Harnack's representations as to the various organisations, summarised above (§ 44 a), then we can in point of fact actually distinguish three: that of the persons who teach, the patriarchal organisation of the senior members of the community, and that of the elective officials—that is to say, of the superintendents (without distinction between presbyters and episcopi) and of the deacons. Now, it is certainly correct to say that ultimately the dignities belonging to the two first-named organisations accrued by cumulation to the episcopi, even although the increment from the patriarchal element cannot, from the nature of things, have been very great; and the change is enormous. Nevertheless, it is at the same time reasonable to demand that the explanation shall endeavour to dispense, if possible, with any assumption of a break in the development, with any such supposition as that (with which Löning, for example, works in accounting for the monarchy of the bishop) of a change of constitution; for we have no trace of any such abrupt change. As a means towards this end, however, nothing can be said in favour of the suggestion of Loofs that the monarchy of the episcopus began already soon after 1 Clem., before the position of the episcopate as highest had established itself. Not only are the sources unanimous against this; the argument also that in the conduct of divine service the shifting presidency by various members of the governing college, and the alternation of these also in the free prayer and the preaching was not long tolerable, can claim little weight.

If now, in our search for the immediate causes which led to the supremacy of the episcopi, we leave out of account all such fanciful notions as that Christians believed representatives of Christ to be necessary before his own actual parusia, unquestionably (a) great weight is to be attached to the matter of financial control.

50. Money matters, conduct of service.

A considerable portion of the community was only too easily dependent on the officials who had control of the church's alms. (b) Only, this aspect of their functions would hardly in itself have led to the episcopi as conceived of by Hatch and Harnack becoming leaders of the service. The fact that expenses are incurred in connection with divine service was far from involving the necessity that the men whom we may liken to paymasters should offer the prayers and preside at the celebration of the eucharist. Much rather would this be naturally, and in the first instance, the function of such church members as are marked out for it by their Christian experience and worth. Such were, according to the view taken in the present article, the chosen presidents who at the same time managed the money matters of the community. The conduct of the service thus constitutes a second element which contributed to the raising of their dignity. Still, it was not in itself of extreme importance, for the teaching addresses delivered in the course of the service by any persons qualified for the task must doubtless have been looked upon as something still more important.

It is also surprising that our sources practically nowhere have anything to say as to the person to whom it pertains to conduct the eucharistic service; and the indication as to this point in the Didachè (10 7) actually points to the inference that prophets had precedence over the regular leaders of the function, not only in delivering free addresses but also at the eucharist. At the same time the function of conducting the divine service has given the author of 1 Clem. (40 f.) occasion to put the presidents on a level with the OT high priests or priests, which the Didachè does from a quite different point of view (that, namely, of their being entitled to the first-fruits) precisely with the prophets (13 3). From the end of the second century onwards this equation redounded greatly to the benefit of the bishops (cp § 59 a).

(c) For the sake of supplying the counterpart from the post-apostolic period to what has been shown in § 8 regarding the worship of the oldest Christian time, we briefly mention here that Pliny (§ 40 c)—more particularly for the Sunday (stato die: cp Barn. 15 9, Did. 14 1)—made out two distinct gatherings: one in the morning (ante lucem) for the purpose of responsive singing to Christ as a deity (carmen Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem), and to exhort one another mutually to good deeds, the other for a repast (ad capiendum cibum). The latter had been abandoned after Pliny's publication of the emperor's prohibition of 'hetæriæ' or religious confraternities. In fact, we find in Justin (Apol. 1 67) only one Sunday service, with lessons from the gospels or the prophets (§ 42 a), preaching by the president (προεστώς), common prayer, free eucharistic prayer by the president, Amen by the congregation, partaking of the eucharist, offering of voluntary alms to the president. When in 2 Pet. 2 13, in spite of the retention of 'feasting with' (συνευωχούμενοι) from Jude 12, the word 'love-feasts' (ἀγάπαις) gives place to 'deceivings' (ἀπάταις), this may perhaps be regarded as indicating that the agapæ or love-feasts were no longer in use at the date of 2 Pet.

(d) The application of the OT law concerning first-fruits to bishops led to another result: they were able to give up their civil callings and devote themselves wholly to the duties of their ecclesiastical office. By this they, and the presbyters and deacons under them, became for the first time a definite order of a spiritual kind. As citation is made in 1 Tim. 5 18 of the OT saying about the ox that treads the corn, and of the aphorism of Jesus (Lk. 10 7) that the labourer is worthy of his hire, we cannot doubt that by 'double honour' (διπλῆ τιμή) in v. 17 for the ruling presbyters who labour in teaching, is meant double remuneration, although perhaps in the form of gifts in kind, since fixed salaries were, even at the end of the second century, still uncommon and not looked upon with favour. Cp also 2 Tim. 2 4 6.

Since, however, the most material step in the development of the supremacy and monarchy of the episcopi was made in the period of gnosticism, the part taken by the episcopi in the work of teaching (§ 39 e) was in all probability one of the most important of the causes of their advancement.

51. Teaching authority.

It was not so much that the bishops themselves regularly preached, as that they looked after the orthodoxy of those who did preach.
